

CHIN P'ING MEI

CAST OF CHARACTERS xlix

Epigraph

PREFACE TO THE CHIN P'ING MEI TZ'U-HUA 3

PREFACE TO THE CHIN P'ING MEI 6

COLOPHON 7 Supplementary Material

FOUR LYRICS TO THE TUNE "BURNING INCENSE" 8

LYRICS ON THE FOUR VICES TO THE TUNE "PARTRIDGE SKY" 10

CHAPTER 1

Wu Sung Fights a Tiger on Ching-yang Ridge; P'an Chin-lien Disdains Her Mate and Plays the Coquette 12

CHAPTER 2

Beneath the Blind Hsi-men Ch'ing Meets Chin-lien; Inspired by Greed Dame Wang Speaks of Romance 43

CHAPTER 3

Dame Wang Proposes a Ten-part Plan for "Garnering the Glow"; Hsi-men Ch'ing Flirts with Chin-lien in the Teahouse 62

CHAPTER 4

The Hussy Commits Adultery behind Wu the Elder's Back; Yün-ko in His Anger Raises a Rumpus in the Teashop 82

CHAPTER 5

Yün-ko Lends a Hand by Cursing Dame Wang; The Hussy Administers Poison to Wu the Elder 96

CHAPTER 6

Hsi-men Ch'ing Suborns Ho the Ninth; Dame Wang Fetches Wine and Encounters a Downpour 111

CHAPTER 7

Auntie Hsüeh Proposes a Match with Meng Yü-lou; Aunt Yang Angrily Curses Chang the Fourth 125

CHAPTER 8

All Night Long P'an Chin-lien Yearns for Hsi-men Ch'ing; During the Tablet-burning Monks Overhear Sounds of Venery 147

CHAPTER 9

Hsi-men Ch'ing Conspires to Marry P'an Chin-lien; Captain Wu Mistakenly Assaults Li Wai-ch'uan 170

CHAPTER 10

Wu the Second Is Condemned to Exile in Meng-chou; Hsi-men and His Harem Revel in the Hibiscus Pavilion 188

CHAPTER 11

P'an Chin-lien Instigates the Beating of Sun Hsüeh-o; Hsi-men Ch'ing Decides to Deflower Li Kuei-chieh 205

CHAPTER 12

P'an Chin-lien Suffers Ignominy for Adultery with a Servant; Stargazer Liu Purveys Black Magic in Pursuit of Gain 224

CHAPTER 13

Li P'ing-erh Makes a Secret Tryst over the Garden Wall; The Maid Ying-ch'un Peeks through a Crack and Gets an Eyeful 253

CHAPTER 14

Hua Tzu-hsü Succumbs to Chagrin and Loses His Life; Li P'ing-erh Invites Seduction and Attends a Party 274

CHAPTER 15

Beauties Enjoy the Sights in the Lantern-viewing Belvedere; Hangers-on Abet Debauchery in the Verdant Spring Bordello 298

CHAPTER 16

Hsi-men Ch'ing Is Inspired by Greed to Contemplate Matrimony; Ying Po-chüeh Steals a March in Anticipation of the Ceremony 316

CHAPTER 17

Censor Yü-wen Impeaches Commander Yang; Li P'ing-erh Takes Chiang Chu-shan as Mate 337

CHAPTER 18

Lai-pao Takes Care of Things in the Eastern Capital; Ch'en Ching-chi Supervises the Work in the Flower Garden 356

CHAPTER 19

Snake-in-the-grass Shakes Down Chiang Chu-shan; Li P'ing-erh's Feelings Touch Hsi-men Ch'ing 376

CHAPTER 20

Meng Yü-lou High-mindedly Intercedes with Wu Yüeh-niang; Hsi-men Ch'ing Wreaks Havoc in the Verdant Spring Bordello 401

CHAPTER 21
Wu Yüeh-niang Sweeps Snow in Order to Brew Tea; Ying Po-chüeh Runs Errands on Behalf of Flowers	3
CHAPTER 22
Hsi-men Ch'ing Secretly Seduces Lai-wang's Wife; Ch'un-mei Self-righteously Denounces Li Ming	30
CHAPTER 23
Yü-hsiao Acts as Lookout by Yüeh-niang's Chamber; Chin-lien Eavesdrops outside Hidden Spring Grotto	43
CHAPTER 24
Ching-chi Flirts with a Beauty on the Lantern Festival; Hui-hsiang Angrily Hurls Abuse at Lai-wang's Wife	62
CHAPTER 25
Hsüeh-o Secretly Divulges the Love Affair; Lai-wang Drunkenly Vilifies Hsi-men Ch'ing	80
CHAPTER 26
Lai-wang Is Sent under Penal Escort to Hsü-chou; Sung Hui-lien Is Shamed into Committing Suicide	100
CHAPTER 27
Li P'ing-erh Communicates a Secret in the Kingfisher Pavilion; P'an Chin-lien Engages in a Drunken Orgy under the Grape Arbor	127
CHAPTER 28
Ch'en Ching-chi Teases Chin-lien about a Shoe; Hsi-men Ch'ing Angrily Beats Little Iron Rod	150
CHAPTER 29
Immortal Wu Physiognomizes the Exalted and the Humble; P'an Chin-lien Enjoys a Midday Battle in the Bathtub	166
CHAPTER 30
Lai-pao Escorts the Shipment of Birthday Gifts; Hsi-men Ch'ing Begets a Son and Gains an Office	194
CHAPTER 31
Ch'in-t'ung Conceals a Flagon after Spying on Yü-hsiao; Hsi-men Ch'ing Holds a Feast and Drinks Celebratory Wine	214
CHAPTER 32
Li Kuei-chieh Adopts a Mother and Is Accepted as a Daughter; Ying Po-chüeh Cracks Jokes and Dances Attendance on Success	242
CHAPTER 33
Ch'en Ching-chi Loses His Keys and Is Distrained to. Sing; Han Tao-kuo Liberates His Wife to Compete for Admiration	261
CHAPTER 34
Shu-t'ung Relies upon His Favor to Broker Affairs; P'ing-an Harbors Resentment and Wags His Tongue	282
CHAPTER 35
Harboring Resentment Hsi-men Ch'ing Punishes P'ing-an; Playing a Female Role Shu-t'ung Entertains Hangers-on	309
CHAPTER 36
Chai Ch'ien Sends a Letter Asking for a Young Girl; Hsi-men Ch'ing Patronizes Principal Graduate Ts'ai	345
CHAPTER 37
Old Mother Feng Urges the Marriage of Han Ai-chieh; Hsi-men Ch'ing Espouses Wang Liu-erh as a Mistress	360
CHAPTER 38

Hsi-men Ch'ing Subjects Trickster Han to the Third Degree; P'an Chin-lien on a Snowy Evening Toys with Her P'i-p'a 382

CHAPTER 39

Hsi-men Ch'ing Holds Chiao Rites at the Temple of the Jade Emperor; Wu Yüeh-niang Listens to Buddhist Nuns Reciting Their Sacred Texts 404

CHAPTER 40

Holding Her Boy in Her Arms Li P'ing-erh Curries Favor; Dressing Up as a Maidservant Chin-lien Courts Affection 438

CHAPTER 41

Hsi-men Ch'ing Forms a Marriage Alliance with Ch'iao Hung; P'an Chin-lien Engages in a Quarrel with Li P'ing-erh

CHAPTER 42

A Powerful Family Blocks Its Gate in Order to Enjoy Fireworks; Distinguished Guests in a High Chamber Appreciate the Lanterns

CHAPTER 43

Because of the Missing Gold Hsi-men Ch'ing Curses Chin-lien; As a Result of the Betrothal Yüeh-niang Meets Madame Ch'iao

CHAPTER 44

Wu Yüeh-niang Detains Li Kuei-chieh Overnight; Hsi-men Ch'ing Drunkenly Interrogates Hsia-hua

CHAPTER 45

Li Kuei-chieh Requests the Retention of Hsia-hua; Wu Yüeh-niang in a Fit of Anger Curses at Tai-an

CHAPTER 46

Rain and Snow Interrupt a Walk during the Lantern Festival; Wife and Concubines Laughingly Consult the Tortoise Oracle

CHAPTER 47

Wang Liu-erh Peddles Influence in Pursuit of Profit; Hsi-men Ch'ing Accepts a Bribe and Subverts the Law

CHAPTER 48

Investigating Censor Tseng Impeaches the Judicial Commissioners; Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Submits a Memorial Regarding Seven Matters

CHAPTER 49

Hsi-men Ch'ing Welcomes Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien; In the Temple of Eternal Felicity He Encounters an Indian Monk

CHAPTER 50

Ch'in-t'ung Eavesdrops on the Joys of Lovemaking; Tai-an Enjoys a Pleasing Ramble in Butterfly Lane

CHAPTER 51

Yüeh-niang Listens to the Exposition Of The Diamond Sutra; Li Kuei-chieh Seeks Refuge in the Hsi-men Ch'ing Household

CHAPTER 52

Ying Po-chüeh Intrudes on a Spring Beauty in the Grotto; P'an Chin-lien Inspects a Mushroom in the Flower Garden

CHAPTER 53

Wu Yüeh-niang Engages in Coition in Quest of Male Progeny; Li P'ing-erh Fulfills a Vow in Order to Safeguard Her Son

CHAPTER 54

Ying Po-chüeh Convenes His Friends in a Suburban Garden; Jen Hou-ch'i Diagnoses an Illness for a Powerful Family

CHAPTER 55

Hsi-men Ch'ing Observes a Birthday in the Eastern Capital; Squire Miao from Yang-chou Sends a Present of Singing Boys

CHAPTER 56

Hsi-men Ch'ing Assists Ch'ang Shih-chieh; Ying Po-chüeh Recommends Licentiate Shui

CHAPTER 57

Abbot Tao Solicits Funds to Repair the Temple of Eternal Felicity; Nun Hsüeh Enjoins Paying for the Distribution of the Dhāraṇī Sutra

CHAPTER 58

Inspired by a Fit of Jealousy Chin-lien Beats Ch'iu-chü; Begging Cured Pork the Mirror Polisher Tells a Sob Story

CHAPTER 59

Hsi-men Ch'ing Dashes "Snow Lion" to Death; Li P'ing-erh Cries Out in Pain for Kuan-ko

CHAPTER 60

Li P'ing-erh Becomes Ill Because of Suppressed Anger; Hsi-men Ch'ing's Silk Goods Store Opens for Business

CHAPTER 61

Han Tao-kuo Prepares an Entertainment for Hsi-men Ch'ing; Li P'ing-erh Painfully Observes the Double Yang Festival

CHAPTER 62

Taoist Master P'an Performs an Exorcism on the Lantern Altar; Hsi-men Ch'ing Laments Egregiously on Behalf of Li P'ing-erh

CHAPTER 63

Friends and Relatives Offer Funeral Oblations at a Memorial Feast; Hsi-men Ch'ing Is Reminded of Li P'ing-erh While Watching a Drama

CHAPTER 64

Yü-hsiao Kneels in Making an Appeal to P'an Chin-lien; Officers of the Guard Sacrifice to a Rich Man's Spouse

CHAPTER 65

Abbot Wu Meets the Funeral Procession and Eulogizes the Portrait; Censor Sung Imposes on a Local Magnate to Entertain Eunuch Huang

CHAPTER 66

Majordomo Chai Sends a Letter with a Consolatory Contribution; Perfect Man Huang Conducts a Rite for the Salvation of the Dead

CHAPTER 67

Hsi-men Ch'ing Appreciates the Snow White in His Studio; Li P'ing-erh Describes Her Intimate Feelings in a Dream

CHAPTER 68

Cheng Ai-yüeh Flaunts Her Beauty and Discloses a Secret; Tai-an Perseveres Assiduously in Seeking Out Auntie Wen

CHAPTER 69

Auntie Wen Communicates Hsi-men Ch'ing's Wishes to Lady Lin; Wang Ts'ai Falls for a Trick and Invites His Own Humiliation

CHAPTER 70

Hsi-men Ch'ing's Successful Efforts Procure Him a Promotion; Assembled Officials Report before Defender-in-chief Chu Mien

CHAPTER 71

Li P'ing-erh Appears in a Dream in Battalion Commander Ho's House; The Judicial Commissioners Present Their Memorials at the Audience

CHAPTER 72

Wang the Third Kowtows to Hsi-men Ch'ing as His Adopted Father; Ying Po-chüeh Intercedes to Alleviate the Grievance of Li Ming

CHAPTER 73

P'an Chin-lien Is Irked by the Song "I Remember Her Flute-playing"; Big Sister Yü Sings "Getting through the Five Watches of the Night"

CHAPTER 74

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien Solicits the Eight Immortals Tripod; Wu Yüeh-niang Listens to the Precious Scroll on Woman Huang

CHAPTER 75

Ch'un-mei Vilely Abuses Second Sister Shen; Yü-hsiao Spills the Beans to P'an Chin-lien

CHAPTER 76

Meng Yü-lou Assuages Yüeh-niang's Wrath; Hsi-men Ch'ing Repudiates Licentiate Wen

CHAPTER 77

Hsi-men Ch'ing Slogs through the Snow to Visit Cheng Ai-yüeh; Pen the Fourth's Wife Sits by the Window Waiting for a Tryst

CHAPTER 78

Hsi-men Ch'ing Ventures upon a Second Engagement with Lady Lin; Wu Yüeh-niang Invites Ho Yung-shou's Wife to View the Lanterns

CHAPTER 79

Hsi-men Ch'ing in His Sexual Indulgence Incurs an Illness; Wu Yüeh-niang Bears a Child upon the Death of Her Husband

CHAPTER 80

Ch'en Ching-chi Resorts to Pilfering Jade and Purloining Perfume; Li Chiao-erh Makes Off with the Silver and Returns to the Brothel

CHAPTER 81

Han Tao-kuo Takes Advantage of a Chance to Appropriate the Goods; T'ang Lai-pao Defrauds His Master and Disregards His Benevolence 1

CHAPTER 82

P'an Chin-lien Makes an Assignment on a Moonlit Night;
Ch'en Ching-chi Enjoys Two Beauties in a Painted Bower 17

CHAPTER 83

Ch'iu-chü, Harboring Resentment, Reveals a Clandestine Affair; Ch'un-mei Transmits a Note to Facilitate a Lovers'
Rendezvous 35

CHAPTER 84

Wu Yüeh-niang Creates a Stir in the Temple of Iridescent Clouds; Sung Chiang Uprightly Frees Her from the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold 54

CHAPTER 85

Wu Yüeh-niang Surprises Chin-lien in the Act of Adultery; Auntie Hsüeh Agrees to Sell Ch'un-mei on a Moonlit Night 72

CHAPTER 86

Sun Hsüeh-o Instigates the Beating of Ch'en Ching-chi; Dame Wang Marries Off Chin-lien to the Highest Bidder 90

CHAPTER 87

Dame Wang Hungers after Wealth and Receives Her Just Reward; Wu Sung Kills His Sister-in-law and Propitiates His Brother 113

CHAPTER 88

P'an Chin-lien Appears in a Dream in Commandant Chou Hsiu's Home;
Wu Yüeh-niang Contributes a Gift to a Subscription-Seeking Monk 131

CHAPTER 89

On the Ch'ing-ming Festival the Widow Visits the New Grave;
Wu Yüeh-niang Blunders into the Temple of Eternal Felicity 151

CHAPTER 90

Lai-wang Absconds Together with Sun Hsüeh-o;
Sun Hsüeh-o Is Sold to Chou Hsiu's Household 174

CHAPTER 91

Meng Yü-lou Is Happy to Marry Li Kung-pi;
Li Kung-pi in a Fit of Rage Beats Yü-tsan 194

CHAPTER 92

Ch'en Ching-chi Is Entrapped in Yen-chou Prefecture; Wu Yüeh-Niang Creates a Stir in the District Yamen 218

CHAPTER 93

Wang Hsüan Relies on Righteousness to Help the Poor; Abbot Jen in the Desire for Profit Invites Disaster 244

CHAPTER 94

Liu the Second Drunkenly Beats Ch'en Ching-chi; Sun Hsüeh-o Becomes a Trollop in My Own Tavern 269

CHAPTER 95

P'ing-an Absconds with Jewelry from the Pawnshop;
Auntie Hsüeh Cleverly Proposes a Personal Appeal 289

CHAPTER 96

Ch'un-mei Enjoys Visiting the Pools and Pavilions of Her Old Home; Commandant Chou Hsiu Sends Chang Sheng to Look for Ch'en Ching-chi 309

CHAPTER 97

Ch'en Ching-chi Plays a Role in the Commandant's Household; Auntie Hsüeh Peddles Trinkets and Proposes a Marriage Match 330

CHAPTER 98

Ch'en Ching-chi Opens a Tavern in Lin-ch'ing;
Han Ai-chieh Encounters a Lover in a Bordello 349

CHAPTER 99

Liu the Second Drunkenly Curses Wang Liu-erh; Chang Sheng Wrathfully Kills Ch'en Ching-chi 370

CHAPTER 100

Han Ai-chieh Seeks Her Father and Mother in Hu-chou; Ch'an Master P'u-ching Rescues Souls from Perdition 391

CAST OF CHARACTERS

THE FOLLOWING list includes all characters who appear in the novel, listed alphabetically by surname. All characters with dates in parentheses after their names are historical figures from the Sung dynasty. Characters who bear the names of historical figures from the Ming dynasty are identified in the notes.

An Ch'en, winner of first place in the chin-shih examinations but displaced in favor of Ts'ai Yün because he is the younger brother of the proscribed figure, An Tun; becomes a protégé of Ts'ai Ching and is patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing, later rising to the rank of secretary of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works; rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

An Ch'en's second wife.

An, Consort. See Liu, Consort.

An Tun (1042–1104), elder brother of An Ch'en, a high official whose name has been proscribed for his role in the partisan political conflicts of the late eleventh century.

An-t'ung, page boy of Aunt Yang.

An-t'ung, page boy of Miao T'ien-hsiu who is rescued by a fisherman and does his utmost to see justice done for the murder of his master.

An-t'ung, page boy of Wang Hsüan.

Apricot Hermitage, Layman of. See Wang Hsüan.

Autumn Chrysanthemum. See Ch'iu-chü.

Barefaced Adept, Taoist master from the Fire Dragon Monastery in the Obdurate Grotto of the Vacuous Mountains from whom Yang Kuang-yen acquires the art of lying.

Bean curd-selling crone who identifies the home of Commander Yüan in Potter's Alley to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Beanpole, The." See Hui-ch'ing.

Black-robed lictor on the staff of Ho Hsin.

Black-robed lictor who announces the arrival of Chang Pang-ch'ang and Ts'ai Yu to congratulate Chu Mien.

Black Whirlwind. See Li K'uei.

Brocade Tiger. See Yen Shun.

Busybody who directs Ch'iao Yün-ko to Dame Wang's teashop when he is looking for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Cassia. See Li Kuei-chieh.

Chai Ch'ien, majordomo of Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital.

Chai Ch'ien's wife.

Chai Ching-erh, Sutra Chai, proprietor of a sutra printing shop in Ch'ing-ho.

Chai, Sutra. See Chai Ching-erh.

Ch'ai Chin, Little Whirlwind, Little Lord Meng-ch'ang, direct descendant of Ch'in Jung (921–59), emperor Shih-tsung (r. 954–59) of the Later Chou dynasty (951–60).

Ch'ai Huang-ch'eng, paternal uncle of Ch'ai Chin.

Ch'an Master Snow Cave. See P'u-ching.

Chang An, caretaker of Hsi-men Ch'ing's ancestral graveyard outside Ch'ing-ho.

Chang, Auntie, go-between who helps arrange Ch'en Ching-chi's marriage to Ko Ts'ui-p'ing.

Chang Ch'eng, a neighborhood head in Ch'ing-ho.

Chang Ch'ing, a criminal innkeeper with whom Wu Sung seeks refuge after the murder of P'an Chin-lien.

Chang Ch'ing's wife.

Chang Ch'uan-erh, a garrulous chair-bearer in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Wei Ts'ung-erh.

Chang the Fourth. See Chang Ju-i.

Chang the Fourth. See Chang Lung.

Chang Hao-wen, Chang the Importunate, Chang the Second, proprietor of a paper shop in Ch'ing-ho, acquaintance of Han Tao-kuo.

Chang Hsi-ch'un, a ballad singer maintained at one time as a mistress by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Chang Hsi-ts'un, an acquaintance of Hsi-men Ch'ing's who invites him to his home for a birthday party.

Chang Hsiao-hsien, Hsiao Chang-hsien, Trifler Chang, "ball clubber" in Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.

Chang the Importunate. See Chang Hao-wen.

Chang Ju-i, Chang the Fourth, wife of Hsiung Wang, employed in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household as a wet nurse for Kuan-ko and later for Hsiao-ko, sexual partner of Hsi-men Ch'ing after the death of Li P'ing-erh, finally married to Lai-hsing.

Chang Ju-i's mother.

Chang Ko (1068–1113), promoted to the post of vice-minister of the Ministry of Works for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Chang Kuan, brother-in-law of Ch'en Hung and maternal uncle of Ch'en Ching-chi, militia commander of Ch'ing-ho.

Chang Kuan's sister. See Ch'en Hung's wife, née Chang.

Chang Kuan's wife.

Chang Lung, Chang the Fourth, maternal uncle of Meng Yü-lou's first husband Yang Tsung-hsi who unsuccessfully proposes that she remarry Shang Hsiao-t'ang and quarrels with Aunt Yang when she decides to marry Hsi-men Ch'ing instead.

Chang Lung, judicial commissioner of the Liang-Huai region.

Chang Lung's elder sister (Chang the Fourth's elder sister), mother of Yang Tsung-hsi and Yang Tsung-pao.

Chang Lung's wife (Chang the Fourth's wife).

Chang Mao-te, Chang the Second, nephew of Mr. Chang, the well-to-do merchant who first seduces P'an Chin-lien; a major rival of Hsi-men Ch'ing in the social world of Ch'ing-ho who, immediately after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, bribes Cheng Chü-chung to intervene with Chu Mien and have him appointed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's former position as judicial commissioner so he can take over where Hsi-men Ch'ing left off.

Chang Mao-te's son, marries Eunuch Director Hsü's niece.

Chang Mei, professional actor of Hai-yen style drama.

Chang, Military Director-in-chief, official in Meng-chou.

Chang, Mr., a well-to-do merchant in Ch'ing-ho who first seduces P'an Chin-lien.

Chang, Mrs., wife of Mr. Chang, née Yü.

Chang, Old Mother, go-between who tries to sell two inexperienced country girls, Sheng-chin and Huo-pao, to P'ang Ch'un-mei.

Chang, Old Mother, proprietress of an inn next door to Auntie Hsüeh's residence.

Chang Pang-ch'ang (1081–1127), minister of rites, promoted to the position of grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, puppet emperor of the short-lived state of Ch'u for thirty-two days in 1127.

Chang the Second. See Chang Hao-wen.

Chang the Second. See Chang Mao-te.

Chang Sheng, Street-skulking Rat, "knockabout" who, along with Lu Hua, shakes down Dr. Chiang Chu-shan at the behest of Hsi-men Ch'ing; later a servant in the household of Chou Hsiu, brother-in-law of Liu the Second; murders Ch'en Ching-chi when he overhears him plotting against him and is beaten to death by Chou Hsiu at the behest of P'ang Ch'un-mei.

Chang Sheng's reincarnation. See Kao family of the Ta-hsing Guard.

Chang Sheng's wife, née Liu, sister of Liu the Second.

Chang Shih-lien, Ch'en Hung's brother-in-law, related to Yang Chien by marriage, an official in the Eastern Capital.

Chang Shih-lien's wife, née Ch'en, Ch'en Hung's elder sister.

Chang Shu-yeh (1065–1127), prefect of Chi-chou in Shantung, later pacification commissioner of Shantung, responsible for the defeat of Sung Chiang and his acceptance of a government amnesty.

Chang Sung, Little. See Shu-t'ung.

Chang Ta (d. 1126), official who dies in the defense of T'ai-yüan against the invading Chin army.

Chang, Trifler. See Chang Hsiao-hsien.

Ch'ang, Cadger. See Ch'ang Shih-chieh.

Ch'ang the Second. See Ch'ang Shih-chieh.

Ch'ang Shih-chieh, Cadger Ch'ang, Ch'ang the Second, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten.

Ch'ang Shih-chieh's wife.

Ch'ang Shih-chieh's wife's younger brother.

Ch'ang Yü, Commandant, officer rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Chao, Auntie, go-between who sells Chin-erh to Wang Liu-erh.

Chao Chiao-erh, singing girl working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Chao, Dr. See Chao Lung-kang.

Chao Hung-tao, domestic clerk on the staff of Yang Chien.

Chao I (fl. early 12th century), Duke of Chia, twenty-sixth son of Emperor Hui-tsung by Consort Liu.

Chao K'ai (d. c. 1129), Prince of Yün, third son of emperor Hui-tsung by Consort Wang.

Chao, Lama, head priest of the Pao-ch'ing Lamasery outside the west gate of Ch'ing-ho.

Chao Lung-kang, Dr. Chao, Chao the Quack, incompetent specialist in female disorders called in to diagnose Li P'ing-erh's fatal illness.

Chao Lung-kang's grandfather.

Chao Lung-kang's father.

Chao No, investigation commissioner for Shantung.

Chao the Quack. See Chao Lung-kang.

Chao, Tailor, artisan patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Chao-ti, servant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.

Chao T'ing (fl. early 12th century), prefect of Hang-chou, promoted to the post of chief minister of the Court of Judicial Review.

Chao, Widow, wealthy landowner from whom Hsi-men Ch'ing buys a country estate adjacent to his ancestral graveyard.

Chao Yu-lan, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Ch'e, Hogwash. See Ch'e Tan.

Ch'e Tan, Hogwash Ch'e, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.

Ch'e Tan's father, proprietor of a wineshop in Ch'ing-ho.

Ch'en An, servant in Ch'en Ching-chi's household.

Ch'en, Battalion Commander, resident on Main Street in Ch'ing-ho from whom Hsi-men Ch'ing declines to buy a coffin after the death of Li P'ing-erh.

Ch'en Cheng-hui (fl. early 12th century), son of Ch'en Kuan, surveillance vice-commissioner of education for Shantung.

Ch'en Ching-chi, secondary male protagonist of the novel, son of Ch'en Hung, husband of Hsi-men Ta-chieh, son-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing who carries on a running pseudo-incestuous affair with P'an Chin-lien that is consummated after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing; falls out with Wu Yüeh-niang and is evicted from the household; drives Hsi-men Ta-chieh to suicide; attempts unsuccessfully to shake down Meng Yü-lou in Yen-chou; squanders his patrimony and is reduced to beggary; accepts charity from his father's friend the philanthropist Wang Hsüan, who induces him to become a monk with the Taoist appellation Tsung-mei, the junior disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing; is admitted to the household of Chou Hsiu as a pretended cousin of P'ang Ch'un-mei who carries on an affair with him under her husband's nose; also has affairs with Feng Chin-pao and Han Ai-chieh, marries Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, and is murdered by Chang Sheng when he is overheard plotting against him.

Ch'en Ching-chi's grandfather, a salt merchant.

Ch'en Ching-chi's reincarnation. See Wang family of the Eastern Capital.

Ch'en, Dr., resident of Ch'ing-ho.

Ch'en, Dr.'s son, conceived as a result of a fertility potion provided by Nun Hsüeh.

Ch'en, Dr.'s wife, conceives a son in middle age after taking a fertility potion provided by Nun Hsüeh.

Ch'en Hung, wealthy dealer in pine resin, father of Ch'en Ching-chi, related by marriage to Yang Chien.

Ch'en Hung's elder sister, wife of Chang Shih-lien.

Ch'en Hung's wife, née Chang, sister of Chang Kuan, mother of Ch'en Ching-chi.

Ch'en Kuan (1057-1122), a prominent remonstrance official, father of Ch'en Cheng-hui.

Ch'en Liang-huai, national university student, son of Vice-Commissioner Ch'en, friend of Ting the Second.

Ch'en, Master, legal scribe who assists Wu Sung in drafting a formal complaint against Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ch'en, Miss, daughter of the deceased Vice-Commissioner Ch'en whose assignation with Juan the Third results in his death.

Ch'en, Miss's maidservant.

Ch'en, Mistress. See Hsi-men Ta-chieh.

Ch'en the Second, proprietor of an inn at Ch'ing-chiang P'u at which Ch'en Ching-chi puts up on his way to Yen-chou.

Ch'en Ssu-chen, right provincial administration commissioner of Shantung.

Ch'en the Third, "cribber" in the licensed quarter of Lin-ch'ing.

Ch'en the Third, criminal boatman who, along with his partner Weng the Eighth, murders Miao T'ien-hsiu.

Ch'en Ting, servant in Ch'en Hung's household.

Ch'en Ting's wife.

Ch'en Tsung-mei. See Ch'en Ching-chi.

Ch'en Tsung-shan, ward-inspecting commandant of the Eastern Capital.

Ch'en Tung (1086-1127), national university student who submits a memorial to the throne impeaching the Six Traitors.

Ch'en, Vice-Commissioner, deceased father of Miss Ch'en.

Ch'en, Vice-Commissioner, father of Ch'en Liang-huai.

Ch'en, Vice-Commissioner's wife, née Chang, mother of Miss Ch'en.

Ch'en Wen-chao, prefect of Tung-p'ing.

Cheng Ai-hsiang, Cheng Kuan-yin, Goddess of Mercy Cheng, singing girl from the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hua Tzu-hsü, elder sister of Cheng Ai-yüeh.

Cheng Ai-yüeh, singing girl from the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Wang Ts'ai and Hsi-men Ch'ing, younger sister of Cheng Ai-hsiang.

Cheng, Auntie, madam of the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho.

Cheng, Battalion Commander's family in the Eastern Capital into which Hua Tzu-hsü is reincarnated as a son.

Cheng Chi, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

Cheng Chiao-erh, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, niece of Cheng Ai-hsiang and Cheng Ai-yüeh.

Cheng Chin-pao. See Feng Chin-pao.

Cheng Ch'un, professional actor in Ch'ing-ho, younger brother of Cheng Feng, Cheng Ai-hsiang, and Cheng Ai-yüeh.

Cheng Chü-chung (1059–1123), military affairs commissioner, cousin of Consort Cheng, granted the title of grand guardian for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, accepts a bribe of a thousand taels of silver from Chang Mao-te to intervene with Chu Mien and have him appointed to the position of judicial commissioner left vacant by the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Cheng, Consort, (1081–1132), a consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, niece of Madame Ch'iao.

Cheng Feng, professional actor in Ch'ing-ho, elder brother of Cheng Ai Hsiang, Cheng Ai-yüeh, and Cheng Ch'un.

Cheng the Fifth, Auntie, madam of the Cheng Family Brothel in Lin-ch'ing.

Cheng the Fifth, Auntie's husband.

Cheng, Goddess of Mercy. See Cheng Ai-hsiang.

Cheng Kuan-yin. See Cheng Ai-hsiang.

Cheng, Third Sister, niece of Ch'iao Hung's wife, née Cheng, marries Wu K'ai's son Wu Shun-ch'en.

Cheng T'ien-shou, Palefaced Gentleman, third outlaw leader of the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold on Ch'ing-feng Mountain.

Cheng Wang. See Lai-wang.

Ch'eng-erh, younger daughter of Lai-hsing by Hui-hsiu.

Chi K'an, right administration vice commissioner of Shantung.

Chi-nan, old man from, who directs Wu Yüeh-ning to the Ling-pi Stockade in her dream.

Ch'i family brothel in Ch'ing-ho, madam of.

Ch'i Hsiang-erh, singing girl from the Ch'i family brothel in Ch'ing-ho.

Ch'i-t'ung, page boy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

Chia, Duke of. See Chao I.

Chia Hsiang (fl. early 12th century), eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Chia Hsiang's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Chia Jen-ch'ing, False Feelings, neighbor of Hsi-men Ch'ing who intercedes unsuccessfully on Lai-wang's behalf.

Chia Lien, name to which Li Pang-yen alters Hsi-men Ch'ing's name on a bill of impeachment in return for a handsome bribe.

Chiang Chu-shan, Chiang Wen-hui, doctor who Li P'ing-erh marries on the rebound only to drive away ignominiously as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing becomes available again.

Chiang Chu-shan's deceased first wife.

Chiang, Gate God. See Chiang Men-shen.

Chiang, Little, servant of Ch'en Ching-chi.

Chiang Men-shen, Gate God Chiang, elder brother of Chiang Yü-lan, gangster whose struggle with Shih En for control of the Happy Forest Tavern in Meng-chou results in his murder by Wu Sung.

Chiang Ts'ung, Sauce and Scallions, former husband of Sung Hui-lien, a cook in Ch'ing-ho who is stabbed to death in a brawl with a fellow cook over the division of their pay.

Chiang Ts'ung's assailant, convicted of a capital crime and executed as a result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's intervention.

Chiang Wen-hui. See Chiang Chu-shan.

Chiang Yü-lan, younger sister of Chiang Men-shen, concubine of Military Director-in-chief Chang of Meng-chou who assists her husband and brother in framing Wu Sung.

Ch'iao, distaff relative of the imperial family whose garden abuts on the back wall of Li P'ing-erh's house on Lion Street, assumes hereditary title of commander when Ch'iao the Fifth dies without issue.

Ch'iao Chang-chieh, infant daughter of Ch'iao Hung betrothed to Hsi-men Kuan-ko while both of them are still babes in arms.

Ch'iao, Consort (fl. early 12th century), a consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, related to Ch'iao the Fifth.

Ch'iao the Fifth, deceased distaff relative of the imperial family through Consort Ch'iao whose hereditary title of commander passes to another branch of the family when he dies without issue.

Ch'iao the Fifth's widow. See Ch'iao, Madame.

Ch'iao Hung, uncle of Ts'ui Pen, wealthy neighbor and business partner of Hsi-men Ch'ing whose daughter, Ch'iao Chang-chieh, is betrothed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's son Kuan-ko while they are still babes in arms.

Ch'iao Hung's concubine, mother of Ch'iao Chang-chieh.

Ch'iao Hung's elder sister, Ts'ui Pen's mother.

Ch'iao Hung's wife, née Cheng.

Ch'iao, Madame, Ch'iao the Fifth's widow, née Cheng, aunt of Ch'iao Hung's wife, née Cheng, and of Consort Cheng.

Ch'iao T'ung, servant in Ch'iao Hung's household.

Ch'iao T'ung's wife.

Ch'iao Yün-ko, Little Yün, young fruit peddler in Ch'ing-ho who helps Wu Chih catch Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien in adultery.

Ch'iao Yün-ko's father, retired soldier dependent on his son.

Ch'ien Ch'eng, vice-magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district.

Ch'ien Ch'ing-ch'uan, traveling merchant entertained by Han Tao-kuo in Yang-chou.

Ch'ien Lao, clerk of the office of punishment in Ch'ing-ho.

Ch'ien Lung-yeh, secretary of the Ministry of Revenue in charge of collecting transit duties on shipping at the Lin-ch'ing customs house.

Ch'ien, Phlegm-fire. See Ch'ien T'an-huo.

Ch'ien T'an-huo, Phlegm-fire Ch'ien, Taoist healer called in to treat Hsi-men Kuan-ko.

Chih-yün, Abbot, head priest of Hsiang-kuo Temple in K'ai-feng visited by Hsi-men Ch'ing on his trip to the Eastern Capital.

Chin, Abbot, Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Eastern Peak on Mount T'ai.

Chin Ch'ien-erh, former maidservant in the household of Huang the Fourth's son purchased by P'ang Ch'un-mei as a servant for Ko Ts'ui-p'ing when she marries Ch'en Ching-chi.

Chin-erh, maidservant of Wang Liu-erh.

Chin-erh, singing girl in Longleg Lu's brothel on Butterfly Lane in Ch'ing-ho.

Chin-erh, singing girl working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Chin-erh's father, military patrolman whose horse is fatally injured in a fall and, for lack of replacement money, is forced to sell his daughter into domestic service.

Chin-kuei, employed in Chou Hsiu's household as a wet nurse for Chou Chin-ko.

Chin-lien. See P'an Chin-lien.

Chin-lien. See Sung Hui-lien.

Chin Ta-chieh, wife of Auntie Hsüeh's son Hsüeh Chi.

Chin-ts'ai, servant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.

Chin Tsung-ming, senior disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing.

Ch'in-tsung, Emperor of the Sung dynasty (r. 1125–27), son of Emperor Hui-tsung who abdicated in his favor in 1125, taken into captivity together with his father by the Chin dynasty invaders in 1127.

Ch'in-t'ung, junior page boy in the household of Hua Tzu-hsü and Li P'ing-erh, originally named T'ien-fu but renamed when she marries into the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ch'in-t'ung, page boy of Meng Yü-lou who is seduced by P'an Chin-lien and driven out of the household when the affair is discovered.

Ch'in Yü-chih, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Wang Ts'ai.

Ching-chi. See Ch'en Ching-chi.

Ching Chung, commander of the left battalion of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, later promoted to the post of military director-in-chief of Chi-chou, and finally to commander-general of the southeast and concurrently grain transport commander.

Ching Chung's daughter for whom he seeks a marriage alliance with Hsi-men Kuan-ko but is refused by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ching Chung's mother.

Ching Chung's wife.

Ch'iu-chü, Autumn Chrysanthemum, much abused junior maidservant of P'an Chin-lien.

Cho the Second. See Cho Tiu-erh.

Cho Tiu-erh, Cho the second, Toss-off Cho, unlicensed prostitute in Ch'ing-ho maintained as a mistress by Hsi-men Ch'ing and subsequently brought into his household as his Third Lady only to sicken and die soon thereafter.

Cho, Toss-off. See Cho Tiu-erh.

Chou, Censor, neighbor of Wu Yüeh-niang's when she was growing up, father of Miss Chou.

Chou Chin-ko, son of Chou Hsiu by P'ang Ch'un-mei the real father of which may have been Ch'en Ching-chi.

Chou Chung, senior servant in the household of Chou Hsiu, father of Chou Jen and Chou I.

Chou, Eunuch Director, resident of Ch'ing-ho whose invitation to a party Hsi-men Ch'ing declines not long before his death.

Chou Hsiao-erh, patron of Li Kuei-ch'ing and probably of Li Kuei-chieh also.

Chou Hsiu, commandant of the Regional Military Command, later appointed to other high military posts, colleague of Hsi-men Ch'ing after whose death he buys P'ang Ch'un-mei as a concubine and later promotes her to the position of principle wife when she bears him a son; commander-general of the Shantung region who leads the forces of Ch'ing-yen against the Chin invaders and dies at Kao-yang Pass of an arrow wound inflicted by the Chin commander Wan-yen Tsung-wang.

Chou Hsiu's first wife, blind in one eye, who dies not long after P'ang Ch'un-mei enters his household as a concubine.

Chou Hsiu's reincarnation, see Shen Shou-shan.

Chou Hsüan, cousin of Chou Hsiu's who looks after his affairs while he is at the front.

Chou I, servant in Chou Hsiu's household, son of Chou Chung and younger brother of Chou Jen, clandestine lover of P'ang Ch'un-mei who dies in the act of intercourse with him.

Chou I's paternal aunt with whom he seeks refuge after the death of P'ang Ch'un-mei.

Chou I's reincarnation. See Kao Liu-chu.

Chou Jen, servant in Chou Hsiu's household, son of Chou Chung and elder brother of Chou I.

Chou, Little, itinerant barber and masseur in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Chou, Miss, daughter of Censor Chou, neighbor of Wu Yüeh-niang's when she was growing up who broke her hymen by falling from a standing position onto the seat of a swing.

Chou, Ms., widowed second wife of Sung Te's father-in-law who commits adultery with him after her husband's death, for which Hsi-men Ch'ing sentences them both to death by strangulation.

Chou, Ms.'s maidservant.

Chou, Ms.'s mother.

Chou the Second, friend of Juan the Third.

Chou Shun, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing female lead parts.

Chou Ts'ai, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Chou Yü-chieh, daughter of Chou Hsiu by his concubine Sun Erh-niang.

Chu Ai-ai, Love, singing girl from Greenhorn Chu's brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, daughter of Greenhorn Chu.

Chu, Battalion Commander, resident of Ch'ing-ho, father of Miss Chu.

Chu, Battalion Commander's deceased wife, mother of Miss Chu.

Chu, Censor, resident of Ch'ing-ho, neighbor of Ch'iao Hung.

Chu, Censor's wife.

Chu family of the Eastern Capital, family into which Sung Hui-lien is reincarnated as a daughter.

Chu, Greenhorn, proprietor of a brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho situated next door to the Verdant Spring Bordello of Auntie Li the Third.

Chu Jih-nien, Sticky Chu, Pockmarked Chu, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten, plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter.

Chu Mien (1075-1126), defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, an elite unit of the Imperial Bodyguard that performed secret police functions; relative of Li Ta-t'ien, the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho; chief mover behind the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, for which service to the throne he is promoted to a series of high posts; one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.

Chu Mien's majordomo.

Chu Mien's son, granted the post of battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Chu, Miss, daughter of Battalion Commander Chu.

Chu, Pockmarked. See Chu Jih-nien.

Chu, Sticky. See Chu Jih-nien.

Ch'u-yün, daughter of a battalion commander of the Yang-chou Guard purchased by Miao Ch'ing to send as a gift to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ch'u-yün's father, battalion commander of the Yang-chou Guard.

Ch'un-hsiang, maidservant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.

Ch'un-hua, concubine of Ying Po-chüeh and mother of his younger son.

Ch'un-hung, page boy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

Ch'un-mei. See P'ang Ch'un-mei.

Chung-ch'iu, junior maidservant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household serving at various times Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Wu Yüeh-niang.

Chung Kuei, policeman from outside the city wall of the Eastern Capital into whose family Hsi-men Ta-chieh is reincarnated as a daughter.

Ch'ung-hsi, maidservant purchased by Ch'en Ching-chi to serve Feng Chin-pao.

Ch'ung Shih-tao (1051-1126), general-in-chief of the Sung armies defending against the Chin invaders.

Ch'ü, Midwife, maternal aunt of Lai-wang in whose house on Polished Rice Lane outside the east gate of Ch'ing-ho Lai-wang and Sun Hsüeh-o seek refuge after absconding from the Hsi-men household.

Ch'ü T'ang, son of Midwife Ch'ü, cousin of Lai-wang.

Coal in the Snow. See P'an Chin-lien's cat.

Died-of-fright, Miss, wife of Yang Kuang-yen.

False Feelings. See Chia Jen-ch'ing.

Fan family of Hsü-chou, peasant family into which Wu Chih is reincarnated as a son.

Fan Hsün, battalion commander in the Ch'ing-ho Guard.

Fan, Hundred Customers. See Fan Pai-chia-nu.

Fan Kang, next-door neighbor of Ch'en Ching-chi in Ch'ing-ho.

Fan, Old Man, neighbor of the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Fan Pai-chia-nu, Hundred Customers Fan, singing girl from the Fan Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.

Fang Chen (fl. early 12th century), erudite of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices who reports that a brick in the Imperial Ancestral Temple is oozing blood.

Fang La (d. 1121), rebel who set up an independent regime in the Southeast that was suppressed by government troops in 1121.

Feng Chin-pao, Cheng Chin-pao, singing girl from the Feng Family Brothel in Lin-ch'ing purchased as a concubine by Ch'en Ching-chi, later resold to the brothel of Auntie Cheng the Fifth who changes her name to Cheng Chin-pao.

Feng Chin-pao's mother, madam of the Feng Family Brothel in Lin-ch'ing.

Feng, Consort (fl. mid 11th-early 12th centuries), Consort Tuan, consort of Emperor Jen-tsung (r. 1022-63) who resided in the palace for five reigns.

Feng Family Brothel's servant.

Feng Huai, son of Feng the Second, son-in-law of Pai the Fifth, dies of injuries sustained in an affray with Sun Wen-hsiang.

Feng, Old Mother, waiting woman in Li P'ing-erh's family since she was a child, continues in her service when she is a concubine of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh, wife of Hua Tzu-hsi, wife of Chiang Chu-shan, and after she marries Hsi-men Ch'ing, supplementing her income by working as a go-between on the side.

Feng the Second, employee of Sun Ch'ing, father of Feng Huai.

Feng T'ing-hu, left assistant administration commissioner of Shantung.

Fifth Lady. See P'an Chin-lien.

First Lady. See Wu Yüeh-niang.

Fisherman who rescues An-t'ung and helps him to locate the boatmen who had murdered his master.

Flying Demon. See Hou Lin.

Fourth Lady. See Sun Hsüeh-o.

Fu-jung, maidservant of Lady Lin.

Fu, Manager. See Fu Ming.

Fu Ming, Fu the Second, Manager Fu, manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's pharmaceutical shop, pawnshop, and other businesses.

Fu Ming's wife.

Fu the Second. See Fu Ming.

Fu T'ien-tse, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Golden Lotus. See P'an Chin-lien.

Good Deed. See Yin Chih.

Hai-t'ang, concubine of Chou Hsiu much abused by P'ang Ch'un-mei.

Han Ai-chieh, daughter of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh, niece of Han the Second, concubine of Chai Ch'ien, mistress of Ch'en Ching-chi to whom she remains faithful after his death, ending her life as a Buddhist nun.

Han, Auntie, wife of Mohammedan Han, mother of Han Hsiao-yü.

Han, Baldy, father of Han Tao-kuo and Han the Second.

Han, Brother-in-law. See Han Ming-ch'uan.

Han Chin-ch'uan, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, elder sister of Han Yü-ch'uan, younger sister of Han Pi.

Han Hsiao-ch'ou, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, niece of Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Yü-ch'uan.

Han Hsiao-yü, son of Mohammedan Han and Auntie Han.

Han Lü (fl. early 12th century), vice-minister of the Ministry of Revenue, vice-minister of the Ministry of Personnel, brother-in-law of Ts'ai Ching's youngest son, Ts'ai T'ao, grants Hsi-men Ch'ing favorable treatment for his speculations in the salt trade.

Han, Master, formerly a court painter attached to the Hsüan-ho Academy, called upon by Hsi-men Ch'ing to paint two posthumous portraits of Li P'ing-erh.

Han Ming-ch'uan, Brother-in-law Han, husband of Meng Yü-lou's elder sister who lives outside the city gate of Ch'ing-ho; friend of Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i.

Han Ming-ch'uan's wife, née Meng, Mrs. Han, elder sister of Meng Yü-lou.

Han, Mohammedan, husband of Auntie Han, father of Han Hsiao-yü, renter of a room on the street front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property next door to that of Pen Ti-ch'uan and his wife, employed on the staff of the eunuch director in charge of the local Imperial Stables.

Han, Mrs. See Han Ming-ch'uan's wife, née Meng.

Han Pang-ch'i, prefect of Hsü-chou.

Han Pi, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho, elder brother of Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Yü-ch'uan.

Han, Posturer. See Han Tao-kuo.

Han the Second, Trickster Han, younger brother of Han Tao-kuo, "knockabout" and gambler in Ch'ing-ho who carries on an intermittent affair with his sister-in-law, Wang Liu-erh, whom he marries after the death of Han Tao-kuo.

Han Tao-kuo, Posturer Han, husband of Wang Liu-erh, son of Baldy Han, elder brother of Han the Second, father of Han Ai-chieh, manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's silk store on Lion Street who absconds with a thousand taels of his property on hearing of his death, content to live off the sexual earnings of his wife and daughter.

Han Tao-kuo's paternal uncle, elder brother of Baldy Han.

Han, Trickster. See Han the Second.

Han Tso, boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Han Tsung-jen, domestic clerk on the staff of Yang Chien.

Han Wen-kuang, investigation commissioner for Shantung.

Han Yü-ch'uan, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho, younger sister of Han Chin-ch'uan and Han Pi.

Hao Hsien, Idler Hao, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.

Hao, Idler. See Hao Hsien.

Ho Ch'i-kao, left administration vice-commissioner of Shantung.

Ho Chin, assistant judicial commissioner of the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, promoted to the post of commander of Hsin-p'ing Stockade and later to the post of judicial commissioner in the Huai-an office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, thereby creating the vacancy filled by Hsi-men Ch'ing in return for the lavishness of his birthday presents to Ts'ai Ching.

Ho Chin-ch'an, singing girl from the Ho Family Bordello on Fourth Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.

Ho Ch'in, son of Ho the Ninth who succeeds to his position as head coroner's assistant of Ch'ing-ho.

Ho Ch'un-ch'üan, Dr. Ho, son of Old Man Ho, physician in Ch'ing-ho.

Ho, Dr. See Ho Ch'un-ch'üan.

Ho, Eunuch Director. See Ho Hsin.

Ho Hsin (fl. early 12th century), Eunuch Director Ho, attendant in the Yen-ning Palace, residence of Consort Feng, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, uncle of Ho Yung-shou, entertains Hsi-men Ch'ing on his visit to the Eastern Capital.

Ho-hua, maidservant of Chou Hsiu's concubine Sun Erh-niang.

Ho Liang-feng, younger brother of Magnate Ho.

Ho, Magnate, wealthy silk merchant from Hu-chou, elder brother of Ho Liang-feng, tries to buy P'an Chin-lien after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, patronizes Wang Liu-erh in Lin-ch'ing and takes her and Han Tao-kuo back to Hu-chou where they inherit his property.

Ho, Magnate's daughter.

Ho the Ninth, elder brother of Ho the Tenth, head coroner's assistant of Ch'ing-ho who accepts a bribe from Hsi-men Ch'ing to cover up the murder of Wu Chih.

Ho, Old Man, father of Ho Ch'un-ch'üan, aged physician in Ch'ing-ho.

Ho Pu-wei, clerk on the staff of the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho, Li Ch'ang-ch'i, who assists his son Li Kung-pi in his courtship of Meng Yü-lou.

Ho the Tenth, younger brother of Ho the Ninth, let off the hook by Hsi-men Ch'ing when he is accused of fencing stolen goods.

Ho Yung-fu, nephew of Ho Hsin, younger brother of Ho Yung-shou.

Ho Yung-shou, nephew of Ho Hsin, elder brother of Ho Yung-fu, appointed to Hsi-men Ch'ing's former post as assistant judicial commissioner in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission as a reward for Ho Hsin's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan, niece of Lan Ts'ung-hsi.

Hou Lin, Flying Demon, beggar boss in Ch'ing-ho who helps out Ch'en Ching-chi when he is reduced to beggary in return for his sexual favors.

Hou Meng (1054-1121), grand coordinator of Shantung, promoted to the post of chief minister of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Hsi-erh, page boy in the household of Chou Hsiu.

Hsi-men An. See Tai-an.

Hsi-men Ching-liang, Hsi-men Ch'ing's grandfather.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, principal male protagonist of the novel, father of Hsi-men Ta-chieh by his deceased first wife, née Ch'en, father of Hsi-men Kuan-ko by Li P'ing-erh, father of Hsi-men Hsiao-ko by Wu Yüeh-niang, decadent scion of a merchant family of some wealth from which he inherits a wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen of Ch'ing-ho, climbs in social status by means of a succession of corrupt sexual, economic, and political conquests only to die of sexual excess at the age of thirty-three.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter. See Hsi-men Ta-chieh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's first wife, née Ch'en, deceased mother of Hsi-men Ta-chieh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's father. See Hsi-men Ta.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's grandfather. See Hsi-men Ching-liang.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's grandmother, née Li.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's mother, née Hsia.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's reincarnation. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko and Shen Yüeh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's sons. See Hsi-men Kuan-ko and Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.

Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, posthumous son of Hsi-men Ch'ing by Wu Yüeh-niang, born at the very moment of his death, betrothed while still a babe in arms to Yün Li-shou's daughter, claimed by the Buddhist monk P'u-ching to be the reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing and spirited away by him at the end of the novel to become a celibate monk with the religious name Ming-wu.

Hsi-men Kuan-ko, son of Hsi-men Ch'ing by Li P'ing-erh, given the religious name Wu Ying-yüan by the Taoist priest Wu Tsung-che, betrothed while still a babe in arms to Ch'iao Chang-chieh, murdered by P'an Chin-lien out of jealousy of Li P'ing-erh.

Hsi-men Kuan-ko's reincarnation. See Wang family of Cheng-chou.

Hsi-men Ta, deceased father of Hsi-men Ch'ing whose business took him to many parts of China.

Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Mistress Ch'en, Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter by his deceased first wife, née Ch'en, wife of Ch'en Ching-chi, so neglected and abused by her husband that she commits suicide.

Hsi-men Ta-chieh's reincarnation. See Chung Kuei.

Hsi-t'ung, page boy in the household of Wang Hsüan.

Hsiao-ko. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.

Hsia Ch'eng-en, son of Hsia Yen-ling, achieves status of military selectee by hiring a standin to take the qualifying examination for him.

Hsia-hua, junior maidservant of Li Chiao-erh who is caught trying to steal a gold bracelet.

Hsia Kung-chi, docket officer on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.

Hsia Shou, servant in the household of Hsia Yen-ling.

Hsia Yen-ling, judicial commissioner in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, colleague, superior, and rival of Hsi-men Ch'ing in his official career.

Hsia Yen-ling's son. See Hsia Ch'eng-en.

Hsia Yen-ling's wife.

Hsiang the Elder, deceased distaff relative of the imperial family through Empress Hsiang, consort of Emperor Shen-tsung (r. 1067–85), elder brother of Hsiang the fifth.

Hsiang, Empress, (1046–1101), consort of Emperor Shen-tsung (r. 1067–85).

Hsiang the Fifth, distaff relative of the imperial family through Empress Hsiang, consort of Emperor Shen-tsung (r. 1067–85), younger brother of Hsiang the Elder, sells part of his country estate outside Ch'ing-ho to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsiao Chang-hsien. See Chang Hsiao-hsien.

Hsiao Ch'eng, resident of Oxhide Street and neighborhood head of the fourth neighborhood of the first subprecinct of Ch'ing-ho.

Hsiao-ko. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.

Hsiao-luan, junior maidservant of Meng Yü-lou.

Hsiao-yü, Little Jade, junior maidservant of Wu Yüeh-niang, married to Tai-an after Wu Yüeh-niang discovers them in flagrante delicto.

Hsiao-yüeh, Abbot, head priest of the Water Moon Monastery outside the south gate of Ch'ing-ho.

Hsieh En, assistant judicial commissioner of the Huai-ch'ing office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.

Hsieh, Fatty. See Hsieh the Third.

Hsieh Hsi-ta, Tagalong Hsieh, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten.

Hsieh Hsi-ta's father, deceased hereditary battalion commander in the Ch'ing-ho Guard.

Hsieh Hsi-ta's mother.

Hsieh Hsi-ta's wife, née Liu.

Hsieh Ju-huang, What a Whopper, acquaintance of Han Tao-kuo who punctures his balloon when he inflates his own importance.

Hsieh, Tagalong. See Hsieh Hsi-ta.

Hsieh the Third, Fatty Hsieh, manager of the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Hsin Hsing-tsung (fl. early 12th century), commander-general of the Honan region who leads the forces of Chang-te against the Chin invaders.

Hsiu-ch'un, junior maidservant of Li P'ing-erh and later of Li Chiao-erh, finally becoming a novice nun under the tutelage of Nun Wang.

Hsiung Wang, husband of Chang Ju-i, soldier forced by his lack of means to sell his wife to Hsi-men Ch'ing as a wet nurse for Kuan-ko.

Hsiung Wang's son by Chang Ju-i.

Hsü, Assistant Administration Commissioner, of Yen-chou in Shantung.

Hsü-chou, old woman from, in whose house Han Ai-chieh encounters Han the Second.

Hsü, Eunuch Director, wealthy eunuch speculator and moneylender, resident of Halfside Street in the northern quarter of Ch'ing-ho, landlord of Crooked-head Sun and Aunt Yang, patron of Li Ming, original owner of Hsia Yen-ling's residential compound, major rival of Hsi-men Ch'ing in the social world of Ch'ing-ho whose niece marries Chang Mao-te's son.

Hsü, Eunuch Director's niece, marries Chang Mao-te's son.

Hsü Feng, prefect of Yen-chou in Chekiang who exposes Meng Yü-lou's and Li Kung-pi's attempt to frame Ch'en Ching-chi.

Hsü Feng's trusted henchman who disguises himself as a convict in order to elicit information from Ch'en Ching-chi.

Hsü Feng-hsiang, supervisor of the State Farm Battalion of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, one of the officials who comes to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to offer a sacrifice to the soul of Li P'ing-erh after her death.

Hsü the Fourth, shopkeeper outside the city wall of Ch'ing-ho who borrows money from Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsü Hsiang, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Hsü, Master, yin-yang master of Ch'ing-ho.

Hsü Nan-ch'i, military officer in Ch'ing-ho promoted to the post of commander of the Hsin-p'ing Stockade.

Hsü, Prefect, prefect of Ch'ing-chou, patron of Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mout T'ai.

Hsü, Prefect's daughter.

Hsü, Prefect's son.

Hsü, Prefect's wife.

Hsü Pu-yü, Reneger Hsü, moneylender in Ch'ing-ho from whom Wang Ts'ai tries to borrow three hundred taels of silver in order to purchase a position in the Military School.

Hsü, Reneger. See Hsü Pu-yü.

Hsü Shun, professional actor of Hai-yen style drama.

Hsü Sung, prefect of Tung-ch'ang in Shantung.

Hsü Sung's concubine.

Hsü Sung's concubine's father.

Hsü, Tailor, artisan with a shop across the street from Han Tao-kuo residence on Lion Street in Ch'ing-ho.

Hsü the Third, seller of date cakes in front of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.

Hsü Tsung-shun, junior disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing.

Hsüeh, Auntie, go-between in Ch'ing-ho who also peddles costume jewelry, mother of Hsüeh Chi, sells P'ang Ch'un-mei into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, represents Hsi-men Ch'ing in the betrothal of his daughter Hsi-men Ta-chieh to Ch'en Ching-chi, proposes his match with Meng Yü-lou, arranges resale of P'ang Ch'un-mei to Chou Hsiu after she is forced to leave the Hsi-men household by Wu Yüeh-niang, arranges match between Ch'en Ching-chi and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing after Hsi-men Ta-chieh's suicide.

Hsüeh, Auntie's husband.

Hsüeh Chi, son of Auntie Hsüeh, husband of Chin ta-chieh.

Hsüeh Chi's son by Chin Ta-chieh.

Hsüeh, Eunuch Director, supervisor of the imperial estates in the Ch'ing-ho region, despite his castration given to fondling and pinching the singing girls with whom he comes in contact.

Hsüeh Hsien-chung, official rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Hsüeh, Nun, widow of a peddler of steamed wheat cakes living across the street from the Kuang-ch'eng Monastery in Ch'ing-ho who takes the ton-sure after the death of her husband and becomes abbess of the Ksitigarbha Nunnery, defrocked for her complicity in the death of Juan the Third, later rector of the Lotus Blossom Nunnery in the southern quarter of Ch'ing-ho who provides first Wu Yüeh-niang and then P'an Chin-lien with fertility potions, frequently invited to recite Buddhist "precious scrolls" to Wu Yüeh-niang and her guests.

Hsüeh, Nun's deceased husband, peddler of steamed wheat cakes living across the street from the Kuang-ch'eng Monastery in Ch'ing-ho.

Hsüeh-o. See Sun Hsüeh-o.

Hsüeh Ts'un-erh, unlicensed prostitute in Longfoot Wu's brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by P'ing-an after he absconds from the Hsi-men household with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop.

Hu, Dr., Old Man Hu, Hu the Quack, physician who lives in Eunuch Director Liu's house on East Street in Ch'ing-ho in the rear courtyard of which Hsi-men Ch'ing hides in order to evade Wu Sung, treats Hua Tzu-hsü, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Ch'ing without success, prescribes abortifacient for P'an Chin-lien when she becomes pregnant by Ch'en Ching-chi.

Hu, Dr.'s maidservant.

Hu the Fourth, impeached as a relative or adherent of Yang Chien.

Hu Hsiu, employee of Han Tao-kuo who spies on Hsi-men Ch'ing's love-making with Wang Liu-erh, accompanies his employer on his buying expeditions to the south, and tells him what he thinks about his private life in a drunken tirade in Yang-chou.

Hu, Old Man. See Hu, Dr.

Hu the Quack. See Hu, Dr.

Hu Shih-wen (fl. early 12th century), related to Ts'ai Ching by marriage, corrupt prefect of Tung-p'ing in Shantung who participates with Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling in getting Miao Ch'ing off the hook for murdering his master Miao T'ien-hsiu.

Hu Ts'ao, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing young male lead roles.

Hua the Elder. See Hua Tzu-yu.

Hua, Eunuch Director, uncle of Hua Tzu-yu, Hua Tzu-hsü, Hua Tzu-kuang, and Hua Tzu-hua and adoptive father of Hua Tzu-hsü, member of the Imperial Bodyguard and director of the Firewood Office in the Imperial Palace, later promoted to the position of grand defender of Kuang-nan from which post he retires on account of illness to take up residence in his native place, Ch'ing-ho; despite his castration engaged in pseudo-incestuous hanky-panky with his daughter-in-law, Li P'ing-erh.

Hua the Fourth. See Hua Tzu-hua.

Hua Ho-lu, assistant magistrate of Ch'ing-ho.

Hua, Mistress. See Li P'ing-erh.

Hua, Mrs. See Li P'ing-erh.

Hua, Nobody. See Hua Tzu-hsü.

Hua the Second. See Hua Tzu-hsü.

Hua the Third. See Hua Tzu-kuang.

Hua-t'ung, page boy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household sodomized by Wen Pi-ku.

Hua Tzu-hsü, Hua the Second, Nobody Hua, nephew and adopted son of Eunuch Director Hua, husband of Li P'ing-erh, next-door neighbor of Hsi-men Ch'ing and member of the brotherhood of ten, patron of Wu Yin-erh and Cheng Ai-hsiang; cuckolded by Li P'ing-erh, who turns over much of his property to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he loses the rest in a lawsuit and dies of chagrin.

Hua Tzu-hsü's reincarnation. See Cheng, Battalion Commander's family in the Eastern Capital.

Hua Tzu-hua, Hua the Fourth, nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, brother of Hua Tzu-hsü.

Hua Tzu-hua's wife.

Hua Tzu-kuang, Hua the Third, nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, brother of Hua Tzu-hsü.

Hua Tzu-kuang's wife.

Hua Tzu-yu, Hua the Elder, nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, brother of Hua Tzu-hsü.

Hua Tzu-yu's wife.

Huai River region, merchant from, who employs Wang Ch'ao.

Huai River region, merchant from, who patronizes Li Kuei-ch'ing.

Huang An, military commander involved with T'an Chen in defense of the northern frontier against the Chin army.

Huang, Buddhist Superior, monk of the Pao-en Temple in Ch'ing-ho.

Huang Chia, prefect of Teng-chou in Shantung.

Huang Ching-ch'en (d. 1126), defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, uncle of Wang Ts'ai's wife, née Huang, lavishly entertained by Hsi-men Ch'ing at the request of Sung Ch'iao-nien.

Huang Ching-ch'en's adopted son, granted the post of battalion commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Huang the Fourth, merchant contractor in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Li Chih, ends up in prison for misappropriation of funds.

Huang the Fourth's son.

Huang the Fourth's wife, née Sun, daughter of Sun Ch'ing.

Huang-lung Temple, abbot of, entertains Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ho Yung-shou en route to Ch'ing-ho from the Eastern Capital.

Huang, Master, fortune teller residing outside the Chen-wu Temple in the northern quarter of Ch'ing-ho.

Huang Mei, assistant prefect of K'ai-feng, maternal cousin of Miao T'ien-hsiu who invites him to visit him in the capital and appeals to Tseng Hsiao-hsü on his behalf after his murder.

Huang Ning, page boy in the household of Huang the Fourth.

Huang Pao-kuang (fl. early 12th century), secretary of the Ministry of Works in charge of the Imperial Brickyard in Ch'ing-ho, provincial graduate of the same year as Shang Hsiao-t'ang.

Huang, Perfect Man. See Huang Yüan-pai.

Huang Yü, foreman on the staff of Wang Fu.

Huang Yüan-pai, Perfect Man Huang, Taoist priest sent by the court to officiate at a seven-day rite of cosmic renewal on Mount T'ai, also officiates at a rite of purification for the salvation of the soul of Li P'ing-erh.

Hui-ch'ing, "The Beanpole," wife of Lai-chao, mother of Little Iron Rod.

Hui-hsiang, wife of Lai-pao, née Liu, mother of Seng-pao.

Hui-hsiang's elder sister.

Hui-hsiang's mother.

Hui-hsiang's younger brother. See Liu Ts'ang.

Hui-hsiu, wife of Lai-hsing, mother of Nien-erh and Ch'eng-erh.

Hui-lien. See Sung Hui-lien.

Hui-tsung, Emperor of the Sung dynasty (r. 1100–25), father of Emperor Ch'in-tsung in whose favor he abdicates in 1125, taken into captivity together with his son by the Chin invaders in 1127.

Hui-yüan, wife of Lai-chüeh.

Hung, Auntie, madam of the Hung Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.

Hung the Fourth, singing girl from the Hung Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.

Hung-hua Temple in Ch'ing-ho, monk from, whom Hsi-men Ch'ing frames and executes in place of Ho the Tenth.

Huo-pao, eleven-year-old country girl offered to P'ang Ch'un-mei as a maidservant but rejected for wetting her bed.

Huo-pao's parents.

Huo Ta-li, district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho who accepts Ch'en Ching-chi's bribe and lets him off the hook when accused of driving his wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, to suicide.

I Mien-tz'u, Ostensibly Benign, neighbor of Hsi-men Ch'ing who intercedes unsuccessfully on Lai-wang's behalf.

Imperial stables in Ch'ing-ho, eunuch director of, employer of Mohammedan Han.

Indian monk. See Monk, Indian.

Iron Fingernail. See Yang Kuang-yen.

Iron Rod. See Little Iron Rod.

Itinerant acrobat called in by Chou Hsiu to distract P'ang Ch'un-mei from her grief over the death of P'an Chin-lien.

Jade Flute. See Yü-hsiao.

Jade Lotus. See Pai Yü-lien.

Jen, Abbot, Taoist priest of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing to whom Wang Hsüan recommends Ch'en Ching-chi as a disciple; dies of shock when threatened with arrest in connection with the latter's whoremongering.

Jen, Abbot's acolyte.

Jen, Dr. See Jen Hou-ch'i.

Jen Hou-ch'i, Dr. Jen, physician in Ch'ing-ho who treats Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing without success, friend of Han Ming-ch'uan.

Jen T'ing-kuei, assistant magistrate of Ch'ing-ho.

Ju-i. See Chang Ju-i.

Juan the Third, dies of excitement in the act of making love to Miss Ch'en in the Ksitigarbha Nunnery during an assignation arranged by Nun Hsüeh.

Juan the Third's parents.

Jui-yün. See Pen Chang-chieh.

Jung Chiao-erh, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Wang Ts'ai.

Jung Hai, employee of Hsi-men Ch'ing who accompanies Ts'ui Pen on a buying trip to Hu-chou.

Kan Jun, resident of Stonebridge Alley in Ch'ing-ho, partner and manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's silk dry goods store.

Kan Jun's wife.

Kan Lai-hsing. See Lai-hsing.

K'ang, Prince of. See Kao-tsung, Emperor.

Kao An, secondary majordomo of Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital through whom Lai-pao gains access to Ts'ai Yu.

Kao Ch'iu (d. 1126), defender-in-chief of the Imperial Bodyguard, granted the title of grand guardian for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park; one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.

Kao family from outside the city wall of the Eastern Capital, family into which Chou I is reincarnated as a son named Kao Liu-chu.

Kao family of the Ta-hsing Guard, family into which Chang Sheng is reincarnated as a son.

Kao Lien, cousin of Kao Ch'iu, prefect of T'ai-an, brother-in-law of Yin T'ien-hsi.

Kao Lien's wife, née Yin, elder sister of Yin T'ien-hsi.

Kao Liu-chu, son of the Kao family from outside the city wall of the Eastern Capital, reincarnation of Chou I.

Kao-tsung, emperor of the Southern Sung dynasty (r. 1127–62), ninth son of Emperor Hui-tsung, Prince of K'ang; declares himself emperor in 1127 when the Chin invaders take emperors Hui-tsung and Ch'in-tsung into captivity; abdicates in favor of Emperor Hsiao-tsung in 1162.

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, wife of Ch'en Ching-chi in a marriage arranged by P'ang Ch'un-mei with whom he continues to carry on an intermittent affair; returns to her parents' family after Ch'en Ching-chi's death and the invasion by the Chin armies.

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's father, wealthy silk dry goods dealer in Ch'ing-ho.

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's mother.

Kou Tzu-hsiao, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing male lead roles.

Ku, Silversmith, jeweler in Ch'ing-ho patronized by Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing, employer of Lai-wang after he returns to Ch'ing-ho from exile in Hsü-chou.

Kuan, Busybody. See Kuan Shih-k'uan.

Kuan-ko. See Hsi-men Kuan-ko.

Kuan Shih-k'uan, Busybody Kuan, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.

Kuan-yin Nunnery, abbess of, superior of Nun Wang, frequent visitor in the Hsi-men household.

Kuang-yang, Commandery Prince of. See T'ung Kuan.

Kuei-chieh. See Li Kuei-chieh.

Kuei-ch'ing. See Li Kuei-ch'ing.

Kung Kuai (1057-1111), left provincial administration commissioner of Shantung.

K'ung, Auntie, go-between in Ch'ing-ho who represents Ch'iao Hung's family in arranging the betrothal of Ch'iao Chang-chieh to Hsi-men Kuan-ko.

K'ung family of the Eastern Capital, family into which P'ang Ch'un-mei is reincarnated as a daughter.

Kuo Shou-ch'ing, senior disciple of Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai.

Kuo Shou-li, junior disciple of Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai.

Kuo Yao-shih (d. after 1126), turncoat who accepts office under the Sung dynasty but goes over to the Chin side at a critical point and is instrumental in their conquest of North China.

La-mei, maidservant employed in the Wu Family Brothel in Ch'ing-ho.

Lai-an, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

Lai-chao, Liu Chao, head servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, husband of Hui-ch'ing, father of Little Iron Rod, helps Lai-wang to abscond with Sun Hsüeh-o.

Lai-chao's son. See Little Iron Rod.

Lai-chao's wife. See Hui-ch'ing.

Lai-chüeh, Lai-yu, husband of Hui-yüan, originally servant in the household of a distaff relative of the imperial family named Wang, loses his position on exposure of his wife's affair with her employer, recommended as a servant to Hsi-men Ch'ing by his friend Ying Pao, the son of Ying Po-chüeh.

Lai-chüeh's deceased parents.

Lai-chüeh's wife. See Hui-yüan.

Lai-hsing, Kan Lai-hsing, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, originally recruited by Hsi-men Ch'ing's father while traveling on business in Kan-chou, husband of Hui-hsiu, father of Nien-erh and Ch'eng-erh, helps to frame Lai-wang for attempted murder, married to Chang Ju-i after the death of Hui-hsiu.

Lai-pao, T'ang Pao, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household often relied upon for important missions to the capital, husband of Hui-hsiang, father of Seng-pao, appointed to the post of commandant on the staff of the Prince of Yün in return for his part in delivering birthday presents from Hsi-men Ch'ing to Ts'ai Ching, embezzles Hsi-men Ch'ing's property after his death and makes unsuccessful sexual advances to Wu Yüeh-niang, ends up in prison for misappropriation of funds.

Lai-pao's son. See Seng-pao.

Lai-pao's wife. See Hui-hsiang.

Lai-ting, page boy in the household of Hua Tzu-yu.

Lai-ting, page boy in the household of Huang the Fourth.

Lai-ting, page boy in the household of Wu K'ai.

Lai-wang, Cheng Wang, native of Hsü-chou, servant in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, husband of Sung Hui-lien, framed for attempted murder and driven out of the household in order to get him out of the way, carries on a clandestine affair with Sun Hsüeh-o before his exile and absconds with her when he returns to Ch'ing-ho after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death.

Lai-wang's first wife, dies of consumption.

Lai-wang's second wife. See Sung Hui-lien.

Lai-yu. See Lai-chüeh.

Lan-hsiang, senior maidservant of Meng Yü-lou.

Lan-hua, junior maidservant of P'ang Ch'un-mei after she becomes the wife of Chou Hsiu.

Lan-hua, elderly maidservant in the household of Wu K'ai.

Lan Ts'ung-hsi (fl. early 12th century), eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, uncle of Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan.

Lan Ts'ung-hsi's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice-commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Lan Ts'ung-hsi's niece. See Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan.

Lang, Buddhist Superior, monk of the Pao-en Temple in Ch'ing-ho.

Lei Ch'i-yüan, assistant commissioner of the Shantung Military Defense Circuit.

Li An, retainer in the household of Chou Hsiu who saves P'ang Ch'un-mei's life when she is threatened by Chang Sheng and resists her blandishments when she tries to seduce him.

Li An's father, deceased elder brother of Li Kuei.

Li An's mother, persuades Li An to avoid entanglement with P'ang Ch'un-mei by seeking refuge with his uncle Li Kuei in Ch'ing-chou.

Li, Barestick. See Li Kung-pi.

Li Ch'ang-ch'i, father of Li Kung-pi, district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho and later assistant prefect of Yen-chou in Chekiang.

Li Ch'ang-ch'i's wife, mother of Li Kung-pi.

Li Chiao-erh, Hsi-men Ch'ing's Second Lady, originally a singing girl from the Verdant Spring Bordello in Ch'ing-ho, aunt of Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh, enemy of P'an Chin-lien, tight-fisted manager of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household finances, engages in hanky-panky with Wu the Second, begins pilfering Hsi-men Ch'ing's property while his corpse is still warm, ends up as Chang Mao-te's Second Lady.

Li Chih, Li the Third, father of Li Huo, merchant contractor in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Huang the Fourth, ends up dying in prison for misappropriation of funds.

Li Chin, servant in the household of Li Chih.

Li Chung-yu, servant on the domestic staff of Ts'ai Ching.

Li, Eunuch Director. See Li Yen.

Li family of the Eastern Capital, family into which P'an Chin-lien is reincarnated as a daughter.

Li Huo, son of Li Chih.

Li Kang (1083-1140), minister of war under Emperor Ch'in-tsung who directs the defense against the Chin invaders.

Li Kuei, Shantung Yaksha, uncle of Li An, military instructor from Ch'ing-chou patronized by Li Kung-pi.

Li Kuei-chieh, Cassia, daughter of Auntie Li the Third, niece of Li Chiao-erh and Li Ming, younger sister of Li Kuei-ch'ing, singing girl from the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, deflowered by Hsi-men Ch'ing, who maintains her as his mistress for twenty taels a month, adopted daughter of Wu Yüeh-niang, betrays Hsi-men Ch'ing with Ting the Second, Wang Ts'ai, and others.

Li Kuei-chieh's fifth maternal aunt.

Li Kuei-ch'ing, daughter of Auntie Li the Third, niece of Li Chiao-erh and Li Ming, elder sister of Li Kuei-chieh, singing girl from the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the Licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.

Li K'uei, Black Whirlwind, bloodthirsty outlaw from Sung Chiang's band who massacres the household of Liang Shih-chieh and kills Yin T'ien-hsi.

Li Kung-pi, Bare Stick Li, only son of Li Ch'ang-ch'i, student at the Superior College of the National University, falls in love with Meng Yü-lou at first sight and arranges to marry her as his second wife, severely beaten by his father for his part in the abortive attempt to frame Ch'en Ching-chi, forced to return with his bride to his native place to resume his studies.

Li Kung-pi's deceased first wife.

Li Kung-pi's servant.

Li, Leaky. See Li Wai-ch'uan.

Li Ming, younger brother of Li Chiao-erh, uncle of Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh; actor and musician from the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho; employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing to teach Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Ying-ch'un, and Lan-hsiang to sing and play musical instruments; driven out of the house by Ch'un-mei for having the temerity to squeeze her hand during a lesson but allowed to return on many subsequent occasions; assists Li Chiao-erh, Li Kuei-ch'ing, and Li Kuei-chieh in despoiling Hsi-men Ch'ing's property after his death.

Li Pang-yen (d. 1130), minister of the right, grand academician of the Hall for Aid in Governance, and concurrently minister of rites, alters Hsi-men Ch'ing's name to Chia Lien on a bill of impeachment in return for a bribe of five hundred taels of silver, promoted to the ranks of pillar of state and grand preceptor of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.

Li P'ing-erh, Vase, Mrs. Hua, Mistress Hua, one of the three principal female protagonists of the novel, concubine of Liang Shih-chieh, wife of Hua Tzu-hsü, commits adultery with her husband's neighbor and sworn brother Hsi-men Ch'ing, wife of Dr. Chiang Chu-shan, Hsi-men Ch'ing's Sixth Lady, mother of Hsi-men Kuan-ko, dies of chronic hemorrhaging brought on by grief over the death of her son and Hsi-men Ch'ing's insistence on trying out his newly acquired aphrodisiac on her while she is in her menstrual period, commemorated in overly elaborate funeral observances that are prime examples of conspicuous consumption, haunts Hsi-men Ch'ing's dreams.

Li P'ing-erh's former incarnation. See Wang family of Pin-chou.

Li P'ing-erh's deceased parents.

Li P'ing-erh's reincarnation. See Yüan, Commander.

Li Ta-t'ien, district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho, relative of Chu Mien, appoints Wu Sung as police captain and later sends him to the Eastern Capital to stash his ill-gotten gains with his powerful relative, accepts Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribes to abuse the law in the cases of Wu Sung, Lai-wang, Sung Hui-lien, Miao T'ien-hsiu, and others.

Li the Third, seller of won-ton in front of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.

Li the Third. See Li Chih.

Li the Third, Auntie, madam of the Verdant Spring Bordello on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, mother of Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh, partially paralyzed, prototypical procuress who milks her customers for all she can get.

Li, Vice-Minister, employer of Licentiate Shui.

Li Wai-ch'uan, Leaky Li, influence peddling lictor on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho who is mistakenly killed by Wu Sung in his abortive attempt to wreak vengeance on Hsi-men Ch'ing for the murder of his elder brother Wu Chih.

Li Yen (d. 1126), Eunuch Director Li, entertains Miao Ch'ing in his residence behind the Forbidden City in the Eastern Capital, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.

Li Yen's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice-commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Liang, Privy Councillor. See Liang Shih-chieh.

Liang Shih-chieh, Privy Councillor Liang, regent of the Northern Capital at Ta-ming Prefecture in Hopei, son-in-law of Ts'ai Ching, first husband of Li P'ing-erh, forced to flee for his life when his entire household is slaughtered by Li K'uei.

Liang Shih-chieh's wife, née Ts'ai, daughter of Ts'ai Ching, extremely jealous woman who beats numbers of maidservants and concubines of her husband to death and buries them in the rear flower garden, forced to flee for her life when her entire household is slaughtered by Li K'uei.

Liang To, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Liang Ying-lung, commandant of security for the Eastern Capital.

Lin Ch'eng-hsün, judicial commissioner in the Huai-ch'ing office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.

Lin Hsiao-hung, younger sister of Lin Ts'ai-hung, singing girl in Yang-chou patronized by Lai-pao.

Lin, Lady, widow of Imperial Commissioner Wang I-hsüan, mother of Wang Ts'ai, former mistress of P'an Chin-lien who learns to play musical instruments and to sing as a servant in her household, carries on an adulterous affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing under the transparent pretext of asking him to superintend the morals of her profligate son.

Lin Ling-su (d. c. 1125), Perfect Man Lin, Taoist priest who gains an ascendancy over Emperor Hui-tsung for a time and is showered with high-sounding titles, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Lin, Perfect Man. See Lin Ling-su.

Lin Shu (d. c. 1126), minister of works rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Lin Ts'ai-hung, elder sister of Lin Hsiao-hung, singing girl in Yang-chou.

Ling, Master, fortune teller in Ch'ing-ho who interprets Meng Yü-lou's horoscope when she is about to marry Li Kung-pi.

Ling Yün-i, prefect of Yen-chou in Shantung.

Little Iron Rod, son of Lai-chao and his wife Hui-ch'ing.

Little Jade. See Hsiao-yü.

Little Whirlwind. See Ch'ai Chin.

Liu, Assistant Regional Commander, officer of the Hsi-hsia army who gives a horse to Chai Ch'ien, who in turn presents it to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Liu Chao. See Lai-chao.

Liu Chü-chai, Dr., physician from Fen-chou in Shansi, friend of Ho Yung-shou who recommends him to Hsi-men Ch'ing when he is in extremis but whose treatment exacerbates his condition.

Liu, Company Commander, younger brother of Eunuch Director Liu, indicted for illicit use of imperial lumber in constructing a villa on a newly purchased estate at Wu-li Tien outside Ch'ing-ho, let off the hook by Hsi-men Ch'ing in response to a bribe proffered by Eunuch Director Liu.

Liu, Consort (1088–1121), Consort An, a favorite consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, mother of Chao I.

Liu, Dame, Stargazer Liu's wife, medical practitioner and shamaness frequently called upon by the women of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

Liu, Eunuch Director, elder brother of Company Commander Liu, manager of the Imperial Brickyard in Ch'ing-ho, resides on an estate outside the south gate of the city, intervenes with Hsi-men Ch'ing to get his younger brother off the hook when indicted for misappropriation of imperial lumber but supplies Hsi-men Ch'ing with bricks from the Imperial Brickyard for construction of his country estate.

Liu, Eunuch Director, landlord of Dr. Hu's house on East Street in Ch'ing-ho.

Liu, Eunuch Director, resides near Wine Vinegar Gate on the North Side of Ch'ing-ho, patron of Li Ming.

Liu Hui-hsiang. See Hui-hsiang.

Liu Kao, commander of An-p'ing Stockade, friend of Shih En who gives Wu Sung a hundred taels of silver and a letter of recommendation to him when he is sent there in military exile.

Liu, Mr., official serving in Huai-an who passed the chin-shih examinations the same year as Sung Ch'iao-nien.

Liu Pao, servant employed as a cook in Hsi-men Ch'ing's silk dry goods store.

Liu, School Official, native of Hang-chou, educational official in Ch'ing-ho who borrows money from Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Liu the Second, Turf-protecting Tiger, brother-in-law of Chang Sheng, proprietor of My Own Tavern west of the bridge in Lin-ch'ing, pimp and racketeer, boss of unlicensed prostitution in Lin-ch'ing, beaten to death by Chou Hsiu at the behest of P'ang Ch'un-mei after Chang Sheng's murder of Ch'en Ching-chi.

Liu the Second, Little, seller of ready-cooked food in front of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.

Liu Sheng, foreman on the domestic staff of Yang Chien.

Liu, Stargazer, husband of Dame Liu, blind fortune teller and necromancer who interprets P'an Chin-lien's horoscope, teaches her a method for working black magic on Hsi-men Ch'ing, and treats Hsi-men Kuan-ko ineffectually.

Liu the Third, servant of Company Commander Liu.

Liu Ts'ang, younger brother of Hui-hsiang, brother-in-law of Lai-pao with whom he cooperates in surreptitiously making off with eight hundred taels worth of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property after his death and using it to open a general store.

Liu Yen-ch'ing (1068–1127), commander-general of the Shensi region who leads the forces of Yen-sui against the Chin invaders.

Lo, Mohammedan, one of the "ball clubbers" patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Lo Ts'un-erh, singing girl of Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hsiang the Fifth.

Lo Wan-hsiang, prefect of Tung-p'ing.

Love. See Chu Ai-ai.

Lu Ch'ang-t'ui, Longleg Lu, madam of the brothel on Butterfly Lane in Ch'ing-ho where Chin-erh and Sai-erh work.

Lu Ch'ang-t'ui's husband.

Lu, Duke of. See Ts'ai Ching.

Lu Hu, clerical subofficial on the staff of Yang Chien.

Lu Hua, Snake-in-the-grass, "knockabout" who, along with Chang Sheng, shakes down Dr. Chiang Chu-shan at the behest of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Lu, Longleg. See Lu Ch'ang-t'ui.

Lu Ping-i, Lu the Second, crony of Ch'en Ching-chi who suggests how he can recover his property from Yang Kuang-yen and goes into partnership with him as the manager of the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Lu the Second. See Lu Ping-i.

Lung-hsi, Duke of. See Wang Wei.

Lü Sai-erh, singing girl in Ch'ing-ho.

Ma Chen, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Ma, Mrs., next-door neighbor of Ying Po-chüeh.

Man-t'ang, maidservant in the household of Li Kung-pi.

Mao-te, Princess (fl. early 12th century), fifth daughter of Emperor Hui-tsung, married to Ts'ai Ching's fourth son, Ts'ai T'iao.

Meng Ch'angling (fl. early 12th century), eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Meng Ch'angling's adopted son, granted the post of battalion vice-commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard by yin privilege as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Meng-ch'ang, Little Lord. See Ch'ai Chin.

Meng the Elder, elder brother of Meng Yü-lou.

Meng the Elder's wife, Meng Yü-lou's sister-in-law.

Meng Jui, Meng the Second, younger brother of Meng Yü-lou, a traveling merchant constantly on the road.

Meng Jui's wife, Meng Yü-lou's sister-in-law.

Meng the Second. See Meng Jui.

Meng the Third. See Meng Yü-lou.

Meng Yü-lou, Tower of Jade, Meng the Third, one of the female protagonists of the novel, widow of the textile merchant Yang Tsung-hsi, Hsi-men Ch'ing's Third Lady, confidante of P'an Chin-lien, marries Li Kung-pi after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, forced to return with her husband to his native place in Hopei after their abortive attempt to frame Ch'en Ching-chi, bears a son to Li Kung-pi at the age of forty and lives to the age of sixty-seven.

Meng Yü-lou's elder brother. See Meng the Elder.

Meng Yü-lou's elder sister. See Han Ming-ch'uan's wife, née Meng.

Meng Yü-lou's son by Li Kung-pi.

Meng Yü-lou's younger brother. See Meng Jui.

Miao Ch'ing, servant of Miao T'ien-hsiu who conspires with the boatmen Ch'en the Third and Weng the Eighth to murder his master on a trip to the Eastern Capital, bribes Hsi-men Ch'ing to get him off the hook, and returns to Yang-chou where he assumes his former master's position in society and maintains relations with his benefactor Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Miao-ch'ü, teenage disciple of Nun Hsüeh.

Miao-feng, teenage disciple of Nun Hsüeh.

Miao Hsiu, servant in the household of Miao Ch'ing.

Miao Shih, servant in the household of Miao Ch'ing.

Miao T'ien-hsiu, a wealthy merchant of Yang-chou who is murdered by his servant Miao Ch'ing on a trip to the Eastern Capital.

Miao T'ien-hsiu's concubine. See Tiao the Seventh.

Miao T'ien-hsiu's daughter.

Miao T'ien-hsiu's wife, née Li.

Ming-wu. See Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.

Mirror polisher, elderly itinerant artisan in Ch'ing-ho who polishes mirrors for P'an Chin-lien, Meng Yü-lou, and P'ang Ch'un-mei and elicits their sympathy with a sob story.

Mirror polisher's deceased first wife.

Mirror polisher's second wife.

Mirror polisher's son.

Monk, Indian, foreign monk presented as the personification of a penis whom Hsi-men Ch'ing encounters in the Temple of Eternal Felicity and from whom he obtains the aphrodisiac an overdose of which eventually kills him.

Moon Lady. See Wu Yüeh-niang.

Ni, Familiar. See Ni P'eng.

Ni, Licentiate. See Ni P'eng.

Ni P'eng, Familiar Ni, Licentiate Ni, tutor employed in the household of Hsia Yen-ling as a tutor for his son, Hsia Ch'eng-en, who recommends his fellow licentiate Wen Pi-ku to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Nieh Liang-hu, schoolmate of Shang Hsiao-t'ang employed in his household as a tutor for his son who writes two congratulatory scrolls for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Nieh, Tiptoe. See Nieh Yüeh.

Nieh Yüeh, Tiptoe Nieh, one of the "cribbers" in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.

Nieh Yüeh's wife.

Nien-erh, elder daughter of Lai-hsing by Hui-hsiu.

Nien-mo-ho. See Wan-yen Tsung-han.

Niu, Ms., singing girl in the Great Tavern on Lion Street who witnesses Wu Sung's fatal assault on Li Wai-ch'uan.

Old woman who tells the fortunes of Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Li P'ing-erh with the aid of a turtle.

Opportune Rain. See Sung Chiang.

Ostensibly Benign. See I Mien-tz'u.

Pai, Baldy. See Pai T'u-tzu.

Pai the Fifth, Moneybags Pai, father-in-law of Feng Huai, notorious local tyrant and fence for stolen goods in the area west of the Grand Canal.

Pai the Fourth, silversmith in Ch'ing-ho, acquaintance of Han Tao-kuo.

Pai Lai-ch'iang, Scrounger Pai, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten.

Pai Lai-ch'iang's wife.

Pai, Mohammedan. See Pai T'u-tzu.

Pai, Moneybags. See Pai the Fifth.

Pai, Scrounger. See Pai Lai-ch'iang.

Pai Shih-chung (d. 1127), right vice-minister of rites rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Pai T'u-tzu, Baldy Pai, Mohammedan Pai, "ball-clubber" in Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.

Pai Yü-lien, Jade Lotus, maidservant purchased by Mrs. Chang at the same time as P'an Chin-lien who dies shortly thereafter.

Palace foreman who plays the role of master of ceremonies at the imperial audience in the Hall for the Veneration of Governance.

Palefaced Gentleman. See Cheng T'ien-shou.

Pan-erh, unlicensed prostitute in Longfoot Wu's brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by P'ing-an after he absconds from the Hsi-men household with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop.

P'an Chi, one of the officials from the Ch'ing-ho Guard who comes to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to offer a sacrifice to the soul of Li P'ing-erh after her death.

P'an Chin-lien, Golden Lotus, P'an the Sixth, principal female protagonist of the novel, daughter of Tailor P'an from outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho who dies when she is only six years old; studies in a girls' school run by Licentiate Yü for three years where she learns to read and write; sold by her mother at the age of eight into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang and Lady Lin where she is taught to play musical instruments and to sing; resold in her mid-teens, after the death of her master, into the household of Mr. Chang who deflowers her and then gives her as a bride to his tenant, Wu Sung's elder brother, the dwarf Wu Chih; paramour of Hsi-men Ch'ing who collaborates with her in poisoning her husband and subsequently makes her his Fifth Lady; seduces her husband's page boy Ch'in-t'ung for which he is driven out of the household; carries on a running affair with her son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, which is consummated after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing; responsible, directly or indirectly, for the suicide of Sung Hui-lien, the death of Hsi-men Kuan-ko, and the demise of Hsi-men Ch'ing; aborts her son by Ch'en Ching-chi; is sold out of the household by Wu Yüeh-niang, purchased by Wu Sung, and disemboweled by the latter in revenge for the death of his elder brother Wu Chih.

P'an Chin-lien's cat, Coal in the Snow, Snow Lion, Snow Bandit, longhaired white cat with a black streak on its forehead that P'an Chin-lien trains to attack Hsi-men Kuan-ko with fatal consequences.

P'an Chin-lien's father. See P'an, Tailor.

P'an Chin-lien's maternal aunt, younger sister of old Mrs. P'an.

P'an Chin-lien's maternal aunt's daughter, adopted by old Mrs. P'an to look after her in her old age.

P'an Chin-lien's mother. See P'an, old Mrs.

P'an Chin-lien's reincarnation. See Li Family of the Eastern Capital.

P'an, Demon-catcher. See P'an, Taoist Master.

P'an family prostitution ring operating out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing, madam of.

P'an the fifth, white slaver, masquerading as a cotton merchant from Shantung, who operates a prostitution ring out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing, buys Sun Hsüeh-o from Auntie Hsüeh, and forces her to become a singing girl.

P'an the Fifth's deceased first wife.

P'an the Fifth's mother.

P'an, old Mrs., widow of Tailor P'an, mother of P'an Chin-lien, sends her daughter to Licentiate Yü's girls' school for three years, sells her into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang and Lady Lin at the age of eight, resells her in her mid-teens into the household of Mr. Chang, frequent visitor in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household where she is maltreated by P'an Chin-lien who is ashamed of her low social status, adopts her younger sister's daughter to look after her in her old age, dies not long after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

P'an the Sixth. See P'an Chin-lien.

P'an, Tailor, father of P'an Chin-lien, artisan from outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho who dies when P'an Chin-lien is only six years old.

P'an, Taoist Master, Demon-catcher P'an, Taoist exorcist from the Temple of the Five Peaks outside Ch'ing-ho who performs various rituals on Li P'ing-erh's behalf but concludes that nothing can save her.

P'an, Taoist Master's acolyte.

P'ang Ch'un-mei, Spring Plum Blossom, one of the three principal female protagonists of the novel, originally purchased by Hsi-men Ch'ing from Auntie Hsüeh for sixteen taels of silver as a maidservant for Wu Yüeh-niang, reassigned as senior maidservant to P'an Chin-lien when she enters the household, becomes her chief ally and confidante; from the time that her mistress allows her to share the sexual favors of Hsi-men Ch'ing she remains loyal to her right up to and even after her death; after the demise of Hsi-men Ch'ing aids and abets P'an Chin-lien's affair with Ch'en Ching-chi, the discovery of which leads to her dismissal from the household; purchased as a concubine by Chou Hsiu, she bears him a son and is promoted to the status of principal wife, thereby rising higher in social status than any of the ladies she had formerly served as maidservant; comes to Wu Yüeh-niang's assistance when she is threatened by Wu Tien-en and condescends to pay a visit to her former mistress and to witness at first hand the signs of her relative decline; carries on an intermittent affair with Ch'en Ching-chi under her husband's nose and, after Chou Hsiu's death, dies in the act of sexual intercourse with his servant Chou I.

P'ang Ch'un-mei's deceased father who dies while Ch'un-mei is still a child.

P'ang Ch'un-mei's deceased mother who dies a year after Ch'un-mei's birth.

P'ang Ch'un-mei's reincarnation. See K'ung family of the Eastern Capital.

P'ang Ch'un-mei's son. See Chou Chin-ko.

P'ang Hsüan, clerical subofficial on the staff of Yang Chien.

Pao, Dr., pediatric physician in Ch'ing-ho called in to treat Hsi-men Kuan-ko who declares the case to be hopeless.

Pao-en Temple in the Eastern Capital, monk from, tries unsuccessfully to warn Miao T'ien-hsiu against leaving home before his fatal trip to the Eastern Capital.

Pao, Ms., singing girl in the Great Tavern on Lion Street who witnesses Wu Sung's fatal assault on Li Wai-ch'uan.

Pen Chang-chieh, Jui-yün, daughter of Pen Ti-ch'uan and Yeh the Fifth, concubine of Hsia Yen-ling.

Pen the Fourth. See Pen Ti-ch'uan.

Pen, Scurry-about. See Pen Ti-ch'uan.

Pen Ti-ch'uan, Scurry-about Pen, Pen the Fourth, husband of Yeh the Fifth, father of Pen Chang-chieh, manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing in various capacities, member of the brotherhood of ten in which he replaces Hua Tzu-hsü after his death.

Pen Ti-ch'uan's daughter. See Pen Chang-chieh.

Pen Ti-ch'uan's wife. See Yeh the Fifth.

Pin-yang, Commandery Prince of. See Wang Ching-ch'ung.

P'ing-an, page boy in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, absconds with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, is caught, and allows himself to be coerced by the police chief Wu Tien-en into giving false testimony that Wu Yüeh-niang has been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an.

P'ing-erh. See Li P'ing-erh.

Prison guard on Chou Hsiu's staff.

Pu Chih-tao, No-account Pu, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten whose place is taken after his death by Hua Tzu-hsü.

Pu, No-account. See Pu Chih-tao.

P'u-ching, Ch'an Master Snow Cave, mysterious Buddhist monk who provides Wu Yüeh-niang with a refuge in Snow Stream Cave on Mount T'ai when she is escaping attempted rape by Yin T'ien-hsi; at the end of the novel he conjures up a phantasmagoria in which all of the major protagonists describe themselves as being reborn in approximately the same social strata they had occupied in their previous incarnations; convinces Wu Yüeh-niang that her son Hsiao-ko is a reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing and spirits him away into a life of Buddhist celibacy as his disciple.

Sai-erh, singing girl in Longleg Lu's brothel on Butterfly Lane in Ch'ing-ho.

Sauce and Scallions. See Chiang Ts'ung.

Second Lady. See Li Chiao-erh.

Seng-pao, son of Lai-pao and Hui-hsiang, betrothed to Wang Liu-erh's niece, the daughter of Butcher Wang and Sow Wang.

Servant from the household of Chou Hsiu who is sent to fetch P'ang Ch'un-mei with a lantern.

Servant in the inn at the foot of Mount T'ai where Wu Yüeh-niang and Wu K'ai spend the night on their pilgrimage.

Servant from the Verdant Spring Bordello who runs errands for Li Kuei-chieh.

Sha San, Yokel Sha, one of the "cribbers" and "ball clubbers" in Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.

Sha, Yokel. See Sha San.

Shamaness brought to the Hsi-men household by Dame Liu to burn paper money and perform a shamanistic dance on behalf of the sick Hsi-men Kuan-ko.

Shang Hsiao-t'ang, Provincial Graduate Shang, son of Shang Liu-t'ang, widower in Ch'ing-ho whom Chang Lung proposes unsuccessfully as a match for Meng Yü-lou, provincial graduate of the same year as Huang Pao-kuang, assisted by Hsi-men Ch'ing when he sets out for the Eastern Capital to compete in the chin-shih examinations.

Shang Hsiao-t'ang's second wife.

Shang Hsiao-t'ang's son.

Shang Liu-t'ang, Prefectural Judge Shang, father of Shang Hsiao-t'ang, formerly served as district magistrate of Huang Pao-kuang's district and prefectural judge of Ch'eng-tu in Szechwan, resident of Main Street in Ch'ing-ho from whom both Li P'ing-erh's and Hsi-men Ch'ing's coffins are purchased.

Shang Liu-t'ang's deceased wife, mother of Shang Hsiao-t'ang.

Shang, Prefectural Judge. See Shang Liu-t'ang.

Shang, Provincial Graduate. See Shang Hsiao-t'ang.

Shantung Yaksha. See Li Kuei.

Shao Ch'ien, boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Shen, Brother-in-law, Mr. Shen, husband of Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister.

Shen Ching, resident of the Eastern Capital, father of Shen Shou-shan.

Shen, Mr. See Shen, Brother-in-law.

Shen, Second Sister, blind professional singer in Ch'ing-ho recommended to Hsi-men Ch'ing by Wang Liu-erh but driven out of his household by P'ang Ch'un-mei when she refuses to sing for her.

Shen Shou-shan, second son of Shen Ching, reincarnation of Chou Hsiu.

Shen Ting, servant in the household of Brother-in-law Shen.

Shen T'ung, wealthy resident of the Eastern Capital, father of Shen Yüeh.

Shen Yüeh, second son of Shen T'ung, reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Sheng-chin, ten-year-old country girl offered to P'ang Ch'un-mei as a maidservant but rejected for befouling her bed.

Sheng-chin's parents.

Shih Cho-kuei, Plastrancer Shih, shaman in Ch'ing-ho who prognosticates about the sick Hsi-men Kuan-ko through interpreting the cracks produced by applying heat to notches on the surface of the plastron of a tortoise shell.

Shih En, son of the warden of the prison camp at Meng-chou who befriends the exiled Wu Sung, obtains his assistance in his struggle with Chiang Men-shen for control of the Happy Forest Tavern, and gives him a hundred taels of silver and a letter of recommendation to Liu Kao when he is transferred to the An-p'ing Stockade.

Shih, Plastrancer. See Shih Cho-kuei.

Shih Po-ts'ai, corrupt Taoist head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai.

Short-legged Tiger. See Wang Ying.

Shu-t'ung, Little Chang Sung, native of Su-chou, page boy catamite and transvestite presented to Hsi-men Ch'ing by Li Ta-t'ien, placed in charge of Hsi-men Ch'ing's studio where he handles his correspondence and caters to his polymorphous sexual tastes, becomes intimate with Yü-hsiao and when discovered in flagrante delicto by P'an Chin-lien purloins enough of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property to make good his escape to his native place.

 Shui, Licentiate, scholar of problematic morals unsuccessfully recommended to Hsi-men Ch'ing as a social secretary by Ying Po-chüeh; after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death he is engaged by the remaining members of the brotherhood of ten to compose a funeral eulogy for Hsi-men Ch'ing in which he compares him to the male genitalia.
 Shui, Licentiate's father, friend of Ying Po-chüeh's father.
 Shui, Licentiate's grandfather, friend of Ying Po-chüeh's grandfather.
 Shui, Licentiate's two sons, die of smallpox.
 Shui, Licentiate's wife, elopes to the Eastern Capital with her lover.
 Sick beggar whom Ch'en Ching-chi keeps alive with the warmth of his body when he is working as a night watchman.
 Silver. See Wu Yin-erh.
 Singing boys, two boy singers sent under escort all the way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's home in Ch'ing-ho by his host, Miao Ch'ing, after he expresses admiration for their singing at a banquet in the residence of Li Yen in the Eastern Capital.
 Six Traitors, Ts'ai Ching, T'ung Kuan, Li Pang-yen, Chu Mien, Kao Ch'iu, and Li Yen.
 Sixth Lady. See Li P'ing-erh.
 Snake-in-the-grass. See Lu Hua.
 Snow Bandit. See P'an Chin-lien's cat.
 Snow Cave, Ch'an Master. See P'u-ching.
 Snow Lion. See P'an Chin-lien's cat.
 Snow Moth. See Sun Hsüeh-o.
 Southerner who deflowers Cheng Ai-yüeh.
 Spring Plum Blossom. See P'ang Ch'un-mei.
 Ssu Feng-i, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.
 Stand-hard. See Tao-chien.
 Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho, cook from.
 Storehouseman in charge of the local storehouse in Yen-chou Prefecture in Chekiang.
 Street-skulking Rat. See Chang Sheng.
 Sun, Blabbermouth. See Sun T'ien-hua.
 Sun Chi, next-door neighbor of Ch'en Ching-chi.
 Sun Ch'ing, father-in-law of Huang the Fourth, father of Sun Wen-hsiang, employer of Feng the Second, merchant in Ch'ing-ho engaged in the cotton trade.
 Sun Ch'ing's daughter. See Huang the Fourth's wife, née Sun.
 Sun Ch'ing's son. See Sun Wen-hsiang.
 Sun, Crooked-head, deceased husband of Aunt Yang.
 Sun Erh-niang, concubine of Chou Hsiu, mother of Chou Yü-chieh.
 Sun Erh-niang's maidservant.
 Sun Erh-niang's maidservant's father.
 Sun Hsüeh-o, Snow Moth, originally maidservant of Hsi-men Ch'ing's deceased first wife, née Ch'en, who enters his household as part of her dowry; Hsi-men Ch'ing's Fourth Lady but a second-class citizen among his womenfolk whose responsibility is the kitchen; enemy of P'an Chin-lien and P'ang Ch'un-mei; carries on a clandestine affair with Lai-wang with whom she absconds when he returns to Ch'ing-ho after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death; apprehended by the authorities and sold into Chou Hsiu's household at the behest of P'ang Ch'un-mei who abuses her, beats her, and sells her into prostitution in order to get her out of the way when she wishes to pass off Ch'en Ching-chi as her cousin; renamed as the singing girl, Yü-erh, working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing, she becomes the kept mistress of Chang Sheng until his death when she commits suicide.
 Sun Hsüeh-o's reincarnation. See Yao family from outside the Eastern Capital.
 Sun Jung, commandant of justice for the two townships of the Eastern Capital.
 Sun Kua-tsui. See Sun T'ien-hua.
 Sun T'ien-hua, Sun Kua-tsui, Blabbermouth Sun, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten, plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter.
 Sun T'ien-hua's wife.
 Sun Wen-hsiang, son of Sun Ch'ing, brother-in-law of Huang the Fourth, involved in an affray with Feng Huai who dies of his injuries half a month later.
 Sung Chiang (fl. 1117-21), Opportune Rain, chivalrous bandit chieftan, leader of a band of thirty-six outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh whose slogan is to "Carry out the Way on Heaven's behalf," slayer of Yen P'o-hsi, rescues Wu Yüeh-niang when she is captured by the bandits of Ch'ing-feng Stronghold and Wang Ying wants to make her his wife, eventually surrenders to Chang Shu-yeh and accepts the offer of a government amnesty.
 Sung Ch'iao-nien (1047-1113), father-in-law of Ts'ai Yu, father of Sung Sheng-ch'ung, protégé of Ts'ai Ching, appointed regional investigating censor of Shantung to replace Tseng Hsiao-hsü, entertained by Hsi-men Ch'ing who presents him periodically with lavish bribes in return for which he gets Miao Ch'ing off the hook and does him numerous other illicit favors, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Sung Hui-lien, Chin-lien, daughter of Sung Jen, formerly maidservant in the household of Assistant Prefect Ts'ai who takes sexual advantage of her; sacked for colluding with her mistress in a case of adultery; marries the cook Chiang Ts'ung who is stabbed to death in a brawl; second wife of Lai-wang; carries on a clandestine affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing that soon becomes public knowledge; after Lai-wang is framed for attempted murder and driven out of the household she suffers from remorse and commits suicide.

Sung Hui-lien's reincarnation. See Chu family of the Eastern Capital.

Sung Hui-lien's maternal aunt.

Sung Jen, father of Sung Hui-lien, coffin seller in Ch'ing-ho who accuses Hsi-men Ch'ing of driving his daughter to suicide but is given such a beating by the corrupt magistrate Li Ta-t'ien that he dies of his wounds.

Sung Sheng-ch'ung (fl. early 12th century), son of Sung Ch'iao-nien, elder brother of Ts'ai Yu's wife, née Sung, regional investigating censor of Shensi suborned into traducing Tseng Hsiao-hsü by Ts'ai Ching.

Sung Te, commits adultery with Ms. Chou, the widowed second wife of his father-in-law, for which Hsi-men Ch'ing sentences them both to death by strangulation.

Sung Te's father-in-law, deceased husband of Ms. Chou.

Sung Te's mother-in-law, deceased mother of Sung Te's wife.

Sung Te's wife.

Sung T'ui, eunuch rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Ta T'ien-tao, prefect of Tung-ch'ang.

Tai-an, Hsi-men An, favorite page boy of Hsi-men Ch'ing and his sedulous understudy in the arts of roguery and dissimulation; manages to stay on the right side of everyone with the exception of Wu Yüeh-niang who periodically berates him for his duplicity; married to Hsiao-yü after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing when Wu Yüeh-niang discovers them in flagrante delicto; remains with Wu Yüeh-niang and supports her in her old age in return for which he is given the name Hsi-men An and inherits what is left of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property and social position.

T'ai-tsung, emperor of the Chin dynasty (r. 1123–35).

T'an Chen (fl. early 12th century), eunuch military commander with the concurrent rank of censor-in-chief, appointed to replace T'ung Kuan in command of the defense of the northern frontier against the Chin army.

T'ang Pao. See Lai-pao.

Tao-chien, Stand-hard, abbot of the Temple of Eternal Felicity at Wu-li Yüan outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho.

T'ao, Crud-crawler, an elderly resident of Ch'ing-ho who is renowned for having sexually molested all three of his daughters-in-law.

T'ao-hua, maidservant in the Star of Joy Bordello in Ch'ing-ho.

T'ao, Old Mother, licensed go-between in Ch'ing-ho who represents Li Kung-pi in his courtship of Meng Yü-lou.

Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the East Gate of Ch'ing-ho, lector of.

Teng, Midwife, called in by Ying Po-chüeh when his concubine, Ch'un-hua, bears him a son.

Third Lady. See Cho Tiu-erh and Meng Yü-lou.

Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin. See Wu Chih.

Ti Ssu-pin, Turbid Ti, vice-magistrate of Yang-ku district who locates the corpse of Miao T'ien-hsiu after his murder by Miao Ch'ing.

Ti, Turbid. See Ti Ssu-pin.

Tiao the Seventh, concubine of Miao T'ien-hsiu, formerly a singing girl from a brothel on the Yang-chou docks, carries on an affair with her husband's servant, Miao Ch'ing, the discovery of which leads to the beating of Miao Ch'ing and the murder of Miao T'ien-hsiu in revenge.

T'ien Chiu-kao, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

T'ien-fu. See Ch'in-t'ung.

T'ien-hsi, senior page boy in the household of Hua Tzu-hsü and Li P'ing-erh who absconds with five taels of silver when his master takes to his sickbed and vanishes without a trace.

T'ien Hu, bandit chieftan active in the Hopei area.

Ting, Director, Wu K'ai's predecessor as director of the State Farm Battalion in Ch'ing-ho, cashiered for corruption by Hou Meng.

Ting, Mr., father of Ting the Second, silk merchant from Hang-chou.

Ting the Second, Ting Shuang-ch'iao, son of Mr. Ting, friend of Ch'en Liang-huai, a silk merchant from Hang-chou who patronizes Li Kuei-chieh while on a visit to Ch'ing-ho and hides under the bed when Hsi-men Ch'ing discovers their liaison and smashes up the Verdant Spring Bordello.

Ting Shuang-ch'iao. See Ting the Second.

Ting the Southerner, wine merchant in Ch'ing-ho from whom Hsi-men Ch'ing buys forty jugs of Ho-ch'ing wine on credit.

Tou Chien (d. 1127), superintendent of the Capital Training Divisions and capital security commissioner.

Tower of Jade. See Meng Yü-lou.

Ts'ai, Assistant Prefect, resident of Ch'ing-ho from whose household Sung Hui-lien is expelled for colluding with her mistress in a case of adultery.

Ts'ai, Assistant Prefect's wife.

Ts'ai Ching (1046–1126), father of Ts'ai Yu, Ts'ai T'iao, Ts'ai T'ao, and Ts'ai Hsiu, father-in-law of Liang Shih-chieh, left grand councilor, grand academician of the Hall for Veneration of Governance, grand preceptor, minister of personnel, Duke of Lu, most powerful minister at the court of Emperor Hui-tsung, impeached by Yü-wen Hsü-chung, patron and adoptive father of Ts'ai Yün and Hsi-men Ch'ing, first of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.

Ts'ai Ching's mansion in the Eastern Capital, gatekeepers of.

Ts'ai Ching's mansion in the Eastern Capital, page boy in.

Ts'ai Ching's wife.

Ts'ai family of Yen-chou in Shantung, family of which Hsi-men Hsiao-ko is alleged to have been a son in his previous incarnation.

Ts'ai Hsing (fl. early 12th century), son of Ts'ai Yu, appointed director of the Palace Administration as a reward for his father's part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Ts'ai Hsiu, ninth son of Ts'ai Ching, prefect of Chiu-chiang.

Ts'ai, Midwife, presides over the deliveries of Li P'ing-erh's son, Hsi-men Kuan-ko, and Wu Yüeh-niang's son, Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.

Ts'ai T'ao (d. after 1147), fifth son of Ts'ai Ching.

Ts'ai T'iao (d. after 1137), fourth son of Ts'ai Ching, consort of Princess Mao-te.

Ts'ai Yu (1077–1126), eldest son of Ts'ai Ching, son-in-law of Sung Ch'iao-nien, brother-in-law of Sung Sheng-ch'ung, father of Ts'ai Hsing, academician of the Hall of Auspicious Harmony, minister of rites, superintendent of the Temple of Supreme Unity, rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park, executed by order of Emperor Ch'in-tsung after the fall of Ts'ai Ching and his faction.

Ts'ai Yu's son. See Ts'ai Hsing.

Ts'ai Yu's wife, née Sung, daughter of Sung Ch'iao-nien, younger sister of Sung Sheng-ch'ung.

Ts'ai Yün, awarded first place in the chin-shih examinations in place of An Ch'en when the latter is displaced for being the younger brother of the proscribed An Tun, becomes a protégé and adopted son of Ts'ai Ching, appointed proofreader in the Palace Library, is patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing; after being impeached by Ts'ao Ho he is appointed salt-control censor of the Liang-Huai region where his illicit favors to Hsi-men Ch'ing abet his profitable speculations in the salt trade.

Ts'ai Yün's mother.

Tsang Pu-hsi, docket officer on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho.

Ts'ao Ho, censor who impeaches Ts'ai Yün and thirteen others from the Historiography Institute who had passed the chin-shih examinations in the same year.

Tseng Hsiao-hsü (1049–1127), son of Tseng Pu, regional investigating censor of Shantung, reopens the case of Miao T'ien-hsiu's murder at the request of Huang Mei and arrives at the truth only to have his memorial suppressed when Hsi-men Ch'ing and Hsia Yen-ling bribe Ts'ai Ching to intervene; submits a memorial to the throne criticizing the policies of Ts'ai Ching that so enrages the prime minister that he suborns his daughter-in-law's brother, Sung Sheng-ch'ung, into framing him on trumped up charges as a result of which he is deprived of his office and banished to the furthest southern extremity of the country.

Tseng Pu (1036–1107), father of Tseng Hsiao-hsü.

Tso Shun, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Ts'ui-erh, maidservant of Sun Hsüeh-o.

Ts'ui-hua, junior maidservant of P'ang Ch'un-mei after she becomes the wife of Chou Hsiu.

Ts'ui Pen, nephew of Ch'iao Hung, husband of Big Sister Tuan, employee, manager, and partner in several of Hsi-men Ch'ing's enterprises.

Ts'ui Pen's mother, Ch'iao Hung's elder sister.

Ts'ui, Privy Councilor. See Ts'ui Shou-yü.

Ts'ui Shou-yü, Privy Councilor Ts'ui, relative of Hsia Yen-ling with whom he stays on his visit to the Eastern Capital.

Tsung-mei. See Ch'en Ching-chi.

Tsung-ming. See Chin Tsung-ming.

Tsung Tse (1059–1128), general-in-chief of the Southern Sung armies who retakes parts of Shantung and Hopei from the Chin invaders on behalf of Emperor Kao-tsung.

Tu the Third, maternal cousin of Ying Po-chüeh.

Tu the Third's page boy.

Tu the Third's wife.

Tu Tzu-ch'un, privy councilor under a previous reign living in retirement in the northern quarter of Ch'ing-ho, engaged by Hsi-men Ch'ing to indite the inscription on Li P'ing-erh's funeral banderole.

Tuan, Big Sister, wife of Ts'ui Pen.

Tuan, Big Sister's father.

Tuan, Consort. See Feng, Consort.

Tuan, Half-baked. See Tuan Mien.

Tuan Mien, Half-baked Tuan, one of the "cribbers" in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Tuan, Old Mother, waiting woman in Lady Lin's household whose residence in the rear of the compound is used as a rendezvous by her lovers.

Tung the Cat. See Tung Chin-erh.

Tung Chiao-erh, singing girl from the Tung Family Brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho who spends the night with Ts'ai Yün at Hsi-men Ch'ing's behest.

Tung Chin-erh, Tung the Cat, singing girl from the Tung Family Brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho, patronized by Chang Mao-te.

Tung Sheng, clerical subofficial on the staff of Wang Fu.

Tung Yü-hsien, singing girl from the Tung Family Brothel on Second Street in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.

T'ung Kuan (1054–1126), eunuch military officer beaten up by Wu Sung in a drunken brawl, uncle of T'ung T'ien-yin, military affairs commissioner, defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, Commandery Prince of Kuang-yang, one of the Six Traitors impeached by Ch'en Tung.

T'ung Kuan's nephew. See T'ung T'ien-yin.

T'ung, Prefectural Judge, prefectural judge of Tung-p'ing who conducts the preliminary hearing in the case of the affray between Feng Huai and Sun Wen-hsiang.

T'ung T'ien-yin, nephew of T'ung Kuan, commander of the guard, director of the Office of Herds in the Inner and Outer Imperial Demesnes of the Court of the Imperial Stud.

Turf-protecting Tiger. See Liu the Second.

Tutor employed in the household of Miao Ch'ing.

Tz'u-hui Temple, abbot of, recovers the corpse of the murdered Miao T'ien-hsiu and buries it on the bank of the river west of Ch'ing-ho where it is discovered by Ti Ssu-pin.

Vase. See Li P'ing-erh.

Waiter in My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Wan-yen Tsung-han (1079–1136), Nien-mo-ho, nephew of Emperor T'ai-tsu (r. 1115–23) the founder of the Chin dynasty, commander of the Chin army that occupies K'ai-feng and takes Retired Emperor Hui-tsung and Emperor Ch'in-tsung into captivity.

Wan-yen Tsung-wang (d. 1127), Wo-li-pu, second son of Emperor T'ai-tsu (r. 1115–23) the founder of the Chin dynasty, associate commander of the Chin army that occupies K'ai-feng and takes Retired Emperor Hui-tsung and Emperor Ch'in-tsung into captivity, kills Chou Hsiu with an arrow through the throat.

Wang, Attendant, official on the staff of the Prince of Yün to whom Han Tao-kuo appeals through Hsi-men Ch'ing and Jen Hou-ch'i to be allowed to commute his hereditary corvée labor obligation to payments in money or goods.

Wang, Butcher, elder brother of Wang Liu-erh, husband of Sow Wang whose daughter is betrothed to Seng-pao.

Wang Ch'ao, son of Dame Wang, apprenticed to a merchant from the Huai River region from whom he steals a hundred taels entrusted to him for the purchase of stock, returns to Ch'ing-ho, and uses it as capital to buy two donkeys and set up a flour mill, becomes a casual lover of P'an Chin-lien while she is in Dame Wang's house awaiting purchase as a concubine.

Wang Chen, second son of Wang Hsüan, government student in the prefectural school.

Wang Ch'ien, eldest son of Wang Hsüan, hereditary battalion commander of the local Horse Pasturage Battalion of the Court of the Imperial Stud.

Wang Chin-ch'ing. See Wang Shen.

Wang Ching, younger brother of Wang Liu-erh, page boy employed in the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing as a replacement for Shu-t'ung after he absconds, sodomized by Hsi-men Ch'ing during his visit to the Eastern Capital, expelled from the household by Wu Yüeh-niang after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Wang Ching-ch'ung (d. 949), military commissioner of T'ai-yüan, Commandery Prince of Pin-yang, ancestor of Wang I-hsüan.

Wang Ch'ing, bandit chieftan active in the Huai-hsi area.

Wang Chu, elder brother of Wang Hsiang, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Wang, Consort (d. 1117), a consort of Emperor Hui-tsung, mother of Chao K'ai, the Prince of Yün, related to Wang the Second.

Wang, Dame, mother of Wang Ch'ao, proprietress of a teahouse next door to Wu Chih's house on Amythest Street on the west side of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho who is also active as a go-between and procuress; go-between who proposes the match between Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang; inventor of the elaborate scheme by which Hsi-men Ch'ing seduces P'an Chin-lien; suggests the poisoning of her next-door neighbor Wu Chih and helps P'an Chin-lien carry it out; intervenes on behalf of Ho the Tenth when he is accused of fencing stolen goods with the result that Hsi-men Ch'ing gets him off the hook and executes an innocent monk in his stead; after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, when Wu Yüeh-niang discovers P'an Chin-lien's affair with Ch'en Ching-chi, she expels her from the household and consigns her to Dame Wang, who entertains bids from Magnate Ho, Chang Mao-te, Ch'en Ching-chi, and Chou Hsiu before finally selling her to Wu Sung for a hundred taels of silver plus a five-tael brokerage fee; that same night she is decapitated by Wu Sung after he has disemboweled P'an Chin-lien.

Wang, Dame's deceased husband, father of Wang Ch'ao, dies when she is thirty-five.

Wang, Dame's son. See Wang Ch'ao.

Wang, distaff relative of the imperial family. See Wang the Second.

Wang family of Cheng-chou, family into which Hsi-men Kuan-ko is reincarnated as a son.

Wang family of the Eastern Capital, family into which Ch'en Ching-chi is reincarnated as a son.

Wang family of Pin-chou, family in which Li P'ing-erh is alleged to have been formerly incarnated as a son.

Wang the First, Auntie, madam of the Wang Family Brothel in Yang-chou.

Wang Fu (1079–1126), minister of war impeached by Yü-wen Hsü-chung.

Wang Fu's wife and children.

Wang Hai-feng. See Wang Ssu-feng.

Wang Han, servant in the household of Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.

Wang Hsiang, younger brother of Wang Chu, professional boy actor in Ch'ing-ho.

Wang Hsien, employee of Hsi-men Ch'ing who accompanies Lai-pao on a buying trip to Nan-ching.

Wang Hsüan, Layman of Apricot Hermitage, father of Wang Ch'ien and Wang Chen, friend of Ch'en Hung, retired philanthropist who provides aid to Ch'en Ching-chi three times after he is reduced to beggary and who recommends him to Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing.

Wang Hsüan's manager, in charge of a pawnshop on the street front of his residence.

Wang Huan (fl. early 12th century), commander-general of the Hopei region who leads the forces of Wei-po against the Chin invaders.

Wang I-hsüan, Imperial Commissioner Wang, descendant of Wang Ching-ch'ung, deceased husband of Lady Lin, father of Wang Ts'ai.

Wang I-hsüan's wife. See Lady Lin.

Wang I-hsüan's son. See Wang Ts'ai.

Wang, Imperial Commissioner. See Wang I-hsüan.

Wang K'uan, head of the mutual security unit for Ch'en Ching-chi's residence in Ch'ing-ho.

Wang Lien, henchman on the domestic staff of Wang Fu.

Wang Liu-erh, Wang the Sixth, one of the female protagonists of the novel, younger sister of Butcher Wang, elder sister of Wang Ching, wife of Han Tao-kuo, mother of Han Ai-chieh; paramour of her brother-in-law, Han the Second, whom she marries after her husband's death, of Hsi-men Ch'ing, to whose death from sexual exhaustion she is a major contributor, and of Magnate Ho, whose property in Hu-chou she inherits.

Wang Liu-erh's niece, daughter of Butcher Wang and Sow Wang, betrothed to Seng-pao, the son of Lai-pao and Hui-hsiang.

Wang Luan, proprietor of the Great Tavern on Lion Street in Ch'ing-ho who witnesses Wu Sung's fatal attack on Li Wai-ch'uan.

Wang, Nun, Buddhist nun from the Kuan-yin Nunnery in Ch'ing-ho which is patronized by Wu Yüeh-niang, frequently invited to recite Buddhist "precious scrolls" to Wu Yüeh-niang and her guests, recommends Nun Hsüeh to Wu Yüeh-niang who takes her fertility potion and conceives Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, later quarrels with Nun Hsüeh over the division of alms from Li P'ing-erh and Wu Yüeh-niang.

Wang, old Mrs., neighbor of Yün Li-shou in Chi-nan who appears in Wu Yüeh-niang's nightmare.

Wang, Old Sister, singing girl working out of My Own Tavern in Lin-ch'ing.

Wang Ping (d. 1126), commander-general of the Kuan-tung region who leads the forces of Fen-chiang against the Chin invaders.

Wang Po-ju, proprietor of an inn on the docks in Yang-chou recommended to Han Tao-kuo, Lai-pao, and Ts'ui Pen by Hsi-men Ch'ing as a good place to stay.

Wang Po-ju's father, friend of Hsi-men Ch'ing's father, Hsi-men Ta.

Wang Po-yen (1069–1141), right assistant administration commissioner of Shantung.

Wang the Second, distaff relative of the imperial family through Consort Wang, landlord of Wu Chih's residence on the west side of Amythest Street in Ch'ing-ho, purchaser of Eunuch Director Hua's mansion on Main Street in An-ch'ing ward of Ch'ing-ho, maintains a private troupe of twenty actors that he sometimes lends to Hsi-men Ch'ing to entertain his guests.

Wang Shen (c. 1048–c. 1103), Wang Chin-ch'ing, commandant-escort and director of the Court of the Imperial Clan, consort of the second daughter of Emperor Ying-tsung (r. 1063–67).

Wang Shih-ch'i, prefect of Ch'ing-chou in Shantung.

Wang the Sixth. See Wang Liu-erh.

Wang, Sow, wife of Butcher Wang whose daughter is betrothed to Seng-pao.

Wang Ssu-feng, Wang Hai-feng, salt merchant from Yang-chou who is set free from prison in Ts'ang-chou by Hou Meng, the grand coordinator of Shantung, as a result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's intervention with Ts'ai Ching.

Wang the Third. See Wang Ts'ai.

Wang Ts'ai (1078–1118), Wang the Third, feckless and dissolute third son of Wang I-hsüan and Lady Lin, married to the niece of Huang Ching-ch'en, tries unsuccessfully to borrow three hundred taels of silver from Hsü Pu-yü to purchase a position in the Military School, pawns his wife's possessions to pursue various singing girls in the licensed quarter including those patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing, tricked into becoming the adopted son of Hsi-men Ch'ing during his intrigue with Lady Lin, continues his affair with Li Kuei-chieh after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Wang Ts'ai's wife, née Huang, niece of Huang Ching-ch'en.

Wang Tsu-tao (d. 1108), minister of personnel.

Wang Tung-ch'iao, traveling merchant entertained by Han Tao-kuo in Yang-chou.

Wang, Usher, official in the Court of State Ceremonial who offers the sixteen-year-old wife of his runaway retainer for sale as a maidservant through Old Mother Feng.

Wang, Usher's runaway retainer.

Wang, Usher's runaway retainer's wife.

Wang Wei, supreme commander of the Capital Training Divisions, Duke of Lung-hsi, granted the title of grand mentor for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Wang Ying, Short-legged Tiger, second outlaw leader of the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold on Ch'ing-feng Mountain who wants to make Wu Yüeh-niang his wife when she is captured by his band but is prevented from doing so by Sung Chiang.

Wang Yu, commander of a training division rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Wang Yü, subofficial functionary on the domestic staff of Ts'ai Ching deputed by Chai Ch'ien to carry a message of condolence to Hsi-men Ch'ing and a personal letter from Han Ai-chieh to Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh.

Wang Yü-chih, singing girl from the Wang Family Brothel in Yang-chou patronized by Han Tao-kuo.

Wei Ch'eng-hsün, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Wei Ts'ung-erh, a taciturn chair-bearer in Ch'ing-ho, partner of Chang Ch'uan-erh.

Wen, Auntie, mother of Wen T'ang, go-between in Ch'ing-ho who represents Ch'en Ching-chi's family at the time of his betrothal to Hsi-men Ta-chieh, resident of Wang Family Alley on the South Side of town, active in promoting pilgrimages to Mount T'ai, patronized by Lady Lin for whom she acts as a procuress in her adulterous affairs including that with Hsi-men Ch'ing, involved with Auntie Hsüeh in arranging the betrothal between Chang Mao-te's son and Eunuch Director Hsü's niece.

Wen Ch'en, one of the officials from the Ch'ing-ho Guard who comes to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to offer a sacrifice to the soul of Li P'ing-erh after her death.

Wen Hsi, military director-in-chief of Yen-chou in Shantung.

Wen, Licentiate. See Wen Pi-ku.

Wen, Pedant. See Wen Pi-ku.

Wen Pi-ku, Warm-buttocks Wen, Pedant Wen, Licentiate Wen, pederast recommended to Hsi-men Ch'ing by his fellow licentiate Ni P'eng to be his social secretary, housed across the street from Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence in the property formerly belonging to Ch'iao Hung, divulges Hsi-men Ch'ing's private correspondence to Ni P'eng who shares it with Hsia Yen-ling, sodomizes Hua-t'ung against his will and is expelled from the Hsi-men household when his indiscretions are exposed.

Wen Pi-ku's mother-in-law.

Wen Pi-ku's wife.

Wen T'ang, son of Auntie Wen.

Wen T'ang's wife.

Wen, Warm-buttocks. See Wen Pi-ku.

Weng the Eighth, criminal boatman who, along with his partner Ch'en the Third, murders Miao T'ien-hsiu.

What a Whopper. See Hsieh Ju-huang.

Wo-li-pu. See Wan-yen Tsung-wang.

Wu, Abbot. See Wu Tsung-che.

Wu, Battalion Commander, father of Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, and Wu Yüeh-niang, hereditary battalion commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard.

Wu, Captain. See Wu Sung.

Wu Ch'ang-chiao, Longfoot Wu, madam of the brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter of Ch'ing-ho patronized by P'ing-an after he absconds from the Hsi-men household with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop.

Wu Ch'ang-chiao's husband.

Wu Chih, Wu the Elder, Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin, elder brother of Wu Sung, father of Ying-erh by his deceased first wife, husband of P'an Chin-lien, simple-minded dwarf, native of Yang-ku district in Shantung who moves to the district town of Ch'ing-ho because of a famine and makes his living by peddling steamed wheat cakes on the street, cuckolded by P'an Chin-lien with his landlord, Mr. Chang, and then with Hsi-men Ch'ing, catches P'an Chin-lien and Hsi-men Ch'ing in flagrante delicto in Dame Wang's teahouse but suffers a near-fatal injury when Hsi-men Ch'ing kicks him in the solar plexus, poisoned by P'an Chin-lien with arsenic supplied by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Wu Chih's daughter. See Ying-erh.

Wu Chih's deceased first wife, mother of Ying-erh.

Wu Chih's second wife. See P'an Chin-lien.

Wu the Elder. See Wu Chih.

Wu the Fourth, Auntie, madam of the Wu Family Bordello on the back alley in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.

Wu, Heartless. See Wu Tien-en.

Wu Hsün, secretary of the Bureau of Irrigation and Transportation in the Ministry of Works, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Wu Hui, younger brother of Wu Yin-erh, actor and musician from the Wu Family Bordello on the back alley in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho.

Wu, Immortal. See Wu Shih.

Wu K'ai, eldest son of Battalion Commander Wu, elder brother of Wu the Second, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, and Wu Yüeh-niang, father of Wu Shun-ch'en, brother-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing, inherits the position of battalion commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard upon the death of his father, deputed to repair the local Charity Granary, promoted to the rank of assistant commander of the Ch'ing-ho Guard in charge of the local State Farm Battalion as a result of Hsi-men Ch'ing's influence with Sung Ch'iao-nien, accompanies Wu Yüeh-niang on her pilgrimage to Mount T'ai after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing and is instrumental in rescuing her from attempted rape by Yin T'ien-hsi.

Wu K'ai's son. See Wu Shun-ch'en.

Wu K'ai's wife, Sister-in-law Wu, mother of Wu Shun-ch'en, sister-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing and a frequent guest in his household.

Wu, Longfoot. See Wu Ch'ang-chiao.

Wu the Second, second son of Battalion Commander Wu, younger brother of Wu K'ai, second elder brother of Wu Yüeh-niang, brother-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing and manager of his silk store on Lion Street; engages in hanky-panky with Li Chiao-erh for which he is denied access to the household by Wu Yüeh-niang when it is discovered after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing although he continues to manage the silk store and later, along with Tai-an, the wholesale pharmaceutical business; accompanies Wu Yüeh-niang, Tai-an, Hsiao-yü, and Hsi-men Hsiao-ko when they flee the invading Chin armies to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou in Chi-nan; ten days after the climactic encounter with P'u-ching in the Temple of Eternal Felicity and Wu Yüeh-niang's relinquishment of Hsi-men Hsiao-ko to a life of Buddhist celibacy he accompanies Wu Yüeh-niang, Tai-an, and Hsiao-yü back to their now truncated household in Ch'ing-ho.

Wu the Second. See Wu Sung.

Wu the Second's wife, wife of Wu Yüeh-niang's second elder brother.

Wu Shih, Immortal Wu, Taoist physiognomist introduced to Hsi-men Ch'ing by Chou Hsiu who accurately foretells his fortune and those of his wife and concubines as well as Hsi-men Ta-chieh and P'ang Ch'un-mei; when Hsi-men Ch'ing is on his deathbed he is called in again and reports that there is no hope for him.

Wu Shih's servant boy.

Wu Shun-ch'en, son of Wu K'ai, husband of Third Sister Cheng.

Wu, Sister-in-law. See Wu K'ai's wife.

Wu Sung, Wu the Second, Captain Wu, younger brother of Wu Chih, brother-in-law of P'an Chin-lien; impulsive and implacable exponent of the code of honor; becomes a fugitive from the law for beating up T'ung Kuan in a drunken brawl; slays a tiger in single-handed combat while on his way to visit his brother and is made police captain in Ch'ing-ho for this feat; rejects attempted seduction by P'an Chin-lien and tells her off in no uncertain terms; delivers Li Ta-t'ien's illicit gains from his magistracy to the safe keeping of Chu Mien in the Eastern Capital; returns to Ch'ing-ho and mistakenly kills Li Wai-ch'uan while seeking to avenge the murder of his brother; is sentenced to military exile in Meng-chou where he is befriended by Shih En and helps him in his struggle with Chiang Men-shen for control of the Happy Forest Tavern; is framed by Military Director-in-chief Chang with the help of his concubine, Chiang Yü-lan, the younger sister of Chiang Men-shen, in revenge for which he murders his two guards and the entire households of Military Director-in-chief Chang and Chiang Men-shen; sets out for An-p'ing Stockade with a hundred taels of silver and a letter of recommendation from Shih En but is enabled by a general amnesty to return to Ch'ing-ho where he buys P'an Chin-lien from Dame Wang for a hundred taels of silver and disembowels her to avenge the death of his brother; once more a fugitive he disguises himself as a Buddhist ascetic with the help of the criminal innkeepers Chang Ch'ing and his wife and goes to join Sung Chiang's band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh.

Wu-t'ai, Mount, monk from, who solicits alms from Wu Yüeh-niang for the repair of his temple.

Wu Tien-en, Heartless Wu, originally a Yin-yang master on the staff of the district yamen in Ch'ing-ho who has been removed from his post for cause; makes his living by hanging around in front of the yamen and acting as a guarantor for loans to local officials and functionaries; crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing; member of the brotherhood of ten; manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing in various of his enterprises; misrepresents himself as Hsi-men Ch'ing's brother-in-law and is appointed to the post of station master of the Ch'ing-ho Postal Relay Station in return for his part in delivering birthday presents from Hsi-men Ch'ing to Ts'ai Ching; receives an interest-free loan of one hundred taels from Hsi-men Ch'ing to help cover the expenses of assuming office; promoted to the position of police chief of a suburb of Ch'ing-ho after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing he apprehends the runaway P'ing-an and coerces him into giving false testimony that Wu Yüeh-niang has been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an, but when Wu Yüeh-niang appeals to P'ang Ch'un-mei he is dragged before Chou Hsiu's higher court and thoroughly humiliated.

Wu Tsung-che, Abbot Wu, head priest of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the East Gate of Ch'ing-ho, presides over the elaborate Taoist ceremony at which Hsi-men Kuan-ko is made an infant Taoist priest with the religious name Wu Ying-yüan, later officiates at funeral observances for Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Wu Yin-erh, Silver, elder sister of Wu Hui, singing girl from the Wu Family Bordello on the back alley of the licensed quarter in Ch'ing-ho, sweetheart of Hua Tzu-hsü, adopted daughter of Li P'ing-erh.

Wu Ying-yüan. See Hsi-men Kuan-ko.

Wu Yüeh-niang, Moon Lady, one of the female protagonists of the novel, daughter of Battalion Commander Wu, younger sister of Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, and an elder sister; second wife and First Lady of Hsi-men Ch'ing who marries her after the death of his first wife, née Ch'en, in a match proposed by Dame Wang; stepmother of Hsi-men Ta-chieh, mother of Hsi-men Hsiao-ko; a pious, credulous, and conventional Buddhist laywoman who constantly invites Nun Wang and Nun Hsüeh to the household to recite "precious scrolls" on the themes of salvation, retribution, and reincarnation, who has good intentions but is generally ineffectual at household management and is not a good judge of character; colludes with Hsi-men Ch'ing in taking secret possession of Li P'ing-erh's ill-gotten property but quarrels with him over admitting her to the household; suffers a miscarriage but later takes Nun Hsüeh's fertility potion and conceives Hsi-men Hsiao-ko who is born at the very moment of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death; thoughtlessly betroths both Kuan-ko and Hsiao-ko to inappropriate partners while they are still babes in arms; makes a pilgrimage to Mount T'ai after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death and narrowly escapes an attempted rape by Yin T'ien-hsi and capture by the bandits on Ch'ing-feng Mountain; expels P'an Chin-lien, P'ang Ch'un-mei, and Ch'en Ching-chi from the household when she belatedly discovers their perfidy but is unable to cope effectively with the declining fortunes of the family; forced to seek the assistance of P'ang Ch'un-mei when she is threatened by Wu Tien-en she has no alternative but to accept the condescension of her former maidservant; while fleeing from the invading Chin armies to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou in Chi-nan she encounters P'u-ching and spends the night in the Temple of Eternal Felicity where she dreams that Yün Li-shou threatens her with rape if she refuses to marry him; still traumatized by this nightmare, she allows P'u-ching to persuade her that Hsiao-ko is the reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing and relinquishes her teenage son to a life of Buddhist celibacy without so much as asking his opinion; on returning safely to Ch'ing-ho she adopts Tai-an as her husband's heir, renaming him Hsi-men An, and lives in reduced circumstances, presiding over a truncated household, until dying a natural death at the age of sixty-nine.

Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, wife of Brother-in-law Shen.

Yang, Aunt, widow of Crooked-head Sun, paternal aunt of Yang Tsung-hsi and Yang Tsung-pao, forceful advocate of Meng Yü-lou's remarriage to Hsi-men Ch'ing after the latter offers her a hundred taels of silver for her support, quarrels with Chang Lung when he tries to prevent this match.

Yang Chien (d. 1121), Commander Yang, eunuch military officer related to Ch'en Hung by marriage, commander in chief of the Imperial Guard in the Eastern Capital, bribed by Hsi-men Ch'ing to intervene on his behalf against Wu Sung and in favor of Hua Tzu-hsü, impeached by Yü-wen Hsü-chung, reported in a letter from Chai Ch'ien to Hsi-men Ch'ing to have died in prison in 1117.

Yang, Commander. See Yang Chien.

Yang the Elder. See Yang Kuang-yen.

Yang Erh-feng, second son of Yang Pu-lai and his wife, née Pai, younger brother of Yang Kuang-yen, a gambler and tough guy who scares off Ch'en Ching-chi when he tries to recover the half shipload of property that Yang Kuang-yen had stolen from him.

Yang Kuang-yen, Yang the Elder, Iron Fingernail, native of Nobottom ward in Carryoff village of Makebelieve district in Nonesuch subprefecture, son of Yang Pu-lai and his wife, née Pai, disciple of the Barefaced Adept from whom he acquires the art of lying, husband of Miss Died-of-fright, con man employed by Ch'en Ching-chi who absconds with half a shipload of his property while he is in Yen-chou trying to shake down Meng Yü-lou and invests it in the Hsieh Family Tavern in Lin-ch'ing only to lose everything when Ch'en Ching-chi sues him with the backing of Chou Hsiu and takes over ownership of the tavern.

Yang Kuang-yen's father. See Yang Pu-lai.

Yang Kuang-yen's mother, née Pai.

Yang Kuang-yen's page boy.

Yang Kuang-yen's wife. See Died-of-fright, Miss.

Yang, Poor-parent. See Yang Pu-lai.

Yang, Prefect. See Yang Shih.

Yang Pu-lai, Poor-parent Yang, father of Yang Kuang-yen and Yang Erh-feng, brother-in-law of Yao the Second.

Yang Sheng, factotum on the domestic staff of Yang Chien.

Yang Shih (1053-1135), Prefect Yang, prefect of K'ai-feng, protégé of Ts'ai Ching, agrees under pressure from Ts'ai Ching and Yang Chien to treat Hua Tzu-hsü leniently when he is sued over the division of Eunuch Director Hua's property by his brothers Hua Tzu-yu, Hua Tzu-kuang, and Hua Tzu-hua.

Yang T'ing-p'ei, battalion commander rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Yang Tsung-hsi, deceased first husband of Meng Yü-lou, elder brother of Yang Tsung-pao, nephew on his father's side of Aunt Yang and on his mother's side of Chang Lung, textile merchant residing on Stinkwater Lane outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho.

Yang Tsung-hsi's maternal uncle. See Chang Lung.

Yang Tsung-hsi's mother. See Chang Lung's elder sister.

Yang Tsung-hsi's paternal aunt. See Yang, Aunt.

Yang Tsung-pao, younger brother of Yang Tsung-hsi, nephew on his father's side of Aunt Yang and on his mother's side of Chang Lung, brother-in-law of Meng Yü-lou.

Yang Wei-chung (1067-1132), commander-general of the Shansi region who leads the forces of Tse-lu against the Chin invaders.

Yao family from outside the Eastern Capital, poor family into which Sun Hsüeh-o is reincarnated as a daughter.

Yao the Second, brother-in-law of Yang Pu-lai, neighbor of Wu Chih to whom Wu Sung entrusts his orphaned niece Ying-erh when he is condemned to military exile in Meng-chou; gives Ying-erh back to Wu Sung when he returns to Ch'ing-ho five years later only to repossess her after the inquest on P'an Chin-lien's murder when Wu Sung once more becomes a fugitive; later arranges for her marriage.

Yeh the Ascetic, one-eyed illiterate Buddhist ascetic employed as a cook by Abbot Hsiao-yüeh of the Water Moon Monastery outside the South Gate of Ch'ing-ho, physiognomizes Ch'en Ching-chi when he is reduced to penury and working nearby as a day laborer.

Yeh Ch'ien, prefect of Lai-chou in Shantung.

Yeh the Fifth, wife of Pen Ti-ch'uan, mother of Pen Chang-chieh, originally a wet nurse who elopes with her fellow employee Pen Ti-ch'uan, carries on an intermittent affair with Tai-an while at the same time complaisantly accepting the sexual favors of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Yen the Fourth, neighbor of Han Tao-kuo who informs him of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death when their boats pass each other on the Grand Canal at Lin-ch'ing.

Yen P'o-hsi, singing girl slain by Sung Chiang.

Yen Shun, Brocade Tiger, outlaw chieftan of the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold on Ch'ing-feng Mountain who is persuaded by Sung Chiang to let the captured Wu Yüeh-niang go rather than allowing Wang Ying to make her his wife.

Yin Chih, Good Deed, chief clerk in charge of the files in the Ch'ing-ho office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission who recognizes that Lai-wang has been framed by Hsi-men Ch'ing and manages to get his sentence reduced and to have him treated more leniently.

Yin Ching, vice-minister of the Ministry of Personnel.

Yin Ta-liang, regional investigating censor of Liang-che, rewarded for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Yin T'ien-hsi, Year Star Yin, younger brother of Kao Lien's wife, née Yin, dissolute wastrel who takes advantage of his official connections to lord it over the Mount T'ai area with a gang of followers at his disposal, colludes with Shih Po-ts'ai, the corrupt head priest of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds on the summit of Mount T'ai, in attempting to rape Wu Yüeh-niang when she visits the temple on a pilgrimage after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing; later killed at Sung Chiang's behest by the outlaw, Li K'uei.

Yin, Year Star. See Yin T'ien-hsi.

Ying, Beggar. See Ying Po-chüeh.

Ying-ch'un, disciple of Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the East Gate of Ch'ing-ho.

Ying-ch'un, senior maidservant of Li P'ing-erh who after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing agrees to be sent to the household of Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital and is raped by Lai-pao on the way.

Ying the Elder, eldest son of the deceased silk merchant Master Ying, elder brother of Ying Po-chüeh, continues to operate his father's silk business in Ch'ing-ho.

Ying the Elder's wife.

Ying-erh, daughter of Wu Chih by his deceased first wife, niece of Wu Sung, much abused stepdaughter of P'an Chin-lien who turns her over to Dame Wang when she marries Hsi-men Ch'ing; repossessed by Wu Sung when he returns from the Eastern Capital after the death of her father; consigned to the care of his neighbor Yao the Second when he is condemned to military exile in Meng-chou after his first abortive attempt to avenge the murder of her father; taken back by Wu Sung on his return to Ch'ing-ho five years later and forced to witness his disembowelment of P'an Chin-lien and decapitation of Dame Wang; repossessed by Yao the Second after the inquest and provided by him with a husband.

Ying, Master, father of Ying the Elder and Ying Po-chüeh, deceased silk merchant of Ch'ing-ho.

Ying Pao, eldest son of Ying Po-chüeh, recommends his friend Lai-yu to Hsi-men Ch'ing who employs him as a servant and changes his name to Lai-chüeh.

Ying Po-chüeh, Ying the Second, Sponger Ying, Beggar Ying, son of the deceased silk merchant Master Ying, younger brother of Ying the Elder, father of Ying Pao and two daughters by his wife, née Tu, and a younger son by his concubine Ch'un-hua; having squandered his patrimony and fallen on hard times he has been reduced to squiring wealthy young rakes about the licensed quarters and living by his wits; boon companion and favorite crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten; a clever and amusing sycophant and opportunist he has the art to openly impose on Hsi-men Ch'ing and make him like it while he is alive and the gall to double-cross him without compunction as soon as he is dead.

Ying Po-chüeh's concubine. See Ch'un-hua.

Ying Po-chüeh's elder daughter, married with the financial assistance of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ying Po-chüeh's grandfather, friend of Licentiate Shui's grandfather.

Ying Po-chüeh's second daughter, after the death of her father she is proposed by Auntie Hsüeh as a match for Ch'en Ching-chi but turned down by P'ang Ch'un-mei for lack of a dowry.

Ying Po-chüeh's son by his concubine Ch'un-hua.

Ying Po-chüeh's wife, née Tu, mother of Ying Pao and two daughters.

Ying the Second. See Ying Po-chüeh.

Ying, Sponger. See Ying Po-chüeh.

Yu, Loafer. See Yu Shou.

Yu Shou, Loafer Yu, a dissolute young scamp upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system.

Yung-ting, page boy in the household of Wang Ts'ai.

Yü, Big Sister, blind professional singer in Ch'ing-ho frequently invited into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household to entertain his womenfolk and their guests.

Yü Ch'un, Stupid Yü, one of the "cribbers" in the licensed quarter of Ch'ing-ho who plays the tout to Wang Ts'ai on his visits to the licensed quarter and upon whom Hsi-men Ch'ing turns the tables by abusing the judicial system at the behest of Lady Lin.

Yü-erh. See Sun Hsüeh-o.

Yü-hsiao, Jade Flute, senior maidservant of Wu Yüeh-niang, carries on an affair with Shu-t'ung the discovery of which by P'an Chin-lien leads him to abscond and return to his native Su-chou; after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing agrees to be sent to the household of Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital and is raped by Lai-pao on the way.

Yü, Licentiate, master of a girls' school in his home in Ch'ing-ho where P'an Chin-lien studies for three years as a child.

Yü-lou. See Meng Yü-lou.

Yü Shen (d. 1132), minister of war who suppresses Tseng Hsiao-hsü's memorial impeaching Hsia Yen-ling and Hsi-men Ch'ing for malfeasance in the case of Miao Ch'ing, rewarded with the title grand guardian of the heir apparent for his part in facilitating the notorious Flower and Rock Convoys and the construction of the Mount Ken Imperial Park.

Yü, Stupid. See Yü Ch'un.

Yü-t'ang, employed in Chou Hsiu's household as a wet nurse for Chou Chin-ko.

Yü-tsan, concubine of Li Kung-pi, originally maidservant of his deceased first wife, who enters his household as part of her dowry, reacts jealously to his marriage with Meng Yü-lou and is beaten by him and sold out of the household.

Yü-wen, Censor. See Yü-wen Hsü-chung.

Yü-wen Hsü-chung (1079-1146), Censor Yü-wen, supervising secretary of the Office of Scrutiny for War who submits a memorial to the throne impeaching Ts'ai Ching, Wang Fu, and Yang Chien.

Yüan, Commander, resident of Potter's Alley in the Eastern Capital into whose family Li P'ing-erh is reincarnated as a daughter.

Yüan-hsiao, senior maidservant of Li Chiao-erh who is transferred to the service of Hsi-men Ta-chieh at the request of Ch'en Ching-chi after her former mistress leaves the household, accompanies her new mistress through her many vicissitudes while also putting up with the capricious treatment of Ch'en Ching-chi in whose service she dies after he is reduced to penury.

Yüan Yen, professional actor from Su-chou who specializes in playing subsidiary female roles.

Yüeh Ho-an, vice-magistrate of Ch'ing-ho.

Yüeh-kuei, concubine of Chou Hsiu much abused by P'ang Ch'un-mei.

Yüeh-niang. See Wu Yüeh-niang.

Yüeh the Third, next-door neighbor of Han Tao-kuo on Lion Street who fences Miao Ch'ing's stolen goods and suggests that he approach Hsi-men Ch'ing through Wang Liu-erh to get him off the hook for the murder of Miao T'ien-hsiu.

Yüeh the Third's wife, close friend of Wang Liu-erh who acts as an intermediary in Miao Ch'ing's approach to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Yün, Assistant Regional Commander, elder brother of Yün Li-shou, hereditary military officer who dies at his post on the frontier.

Yün-ko. See Ch'iao Yün-ko.

Yün Li-shou, Welsher Yün, Yün the Second, younger brother of Assistant Regional Commander Yün, crony of Hsi-men Ch'ing, member of the brotherhood of ten, manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing in various of his enterprises, upon the death of his elder brother succeeds to his rank and the substantive post of vice-commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard, later appointed stockade commander of Ling-pi Stockade at Chinan where Wu Yüeh-niang seeks refuge with him from the invading Chin armies but dreams that he attempts to rape her.

Yün Li-shou's daughter, betrothed while still a babe in arms to Hsi-men Hsiao-ko.

Yün Li-shou's wife, née Su, proposes a marriage alliance to Wu Yüeh-niang while they are both pregnant and formally betroths her daughter to Hsi-men Hsiao-ko after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Yün, Little. See Ch'iao Yün-ko.

Yün, Prince of. See Chao K'ai.

Yün the Second. See Yün Li-shou.

Yün, Welsher. See Yün Li-shou.

There is a vile place, reached through side roads,
Where there are heaps of deer and pigs;
It is not made beautiful by the fair and clean,
But is the resort of the filthy and impure....
[Here] the Three Chin concocted their alliances
And Cheng and Wei¹⁹ spread their disorder....
That is why violence ran loose within families
And poisoned hate sprang up between husband and wife.
These people still had boundless desires to do bad:
How could it be long before they gave vent to them? ...
With its back to the mountains, facing the waters,
The region was filthy, full of egotism,
So that in the small quarters and border towns
No one would deny the bad things said of it....
Arrogant menials from small towns Lived here.
The waterways lead, by the quickest route,
To Lake Tung-t'ing and to the state of Ch'u,
And they carry [southern] influences [to Tung-p'ing],
Directly to it, and to its entire domain.
Thus they inherited [southern] customs
And were without rules, without models:
Not barbarians, they still followed no laws,
And came to do harm.
... in their cooperative ventures, each vaunts his own power;
They turn away from reason and towards debauchery.
Extolling the passions and chasing after profit,
The only thing they respect is excess.²⁰

PREFACE TO THE *CHIN P'ING MEI TZ'U-HUA*¹

I VENTURE to observe that in writing the Chin P'ing Mei chuan (The story of the plum in the golden vase) the Scoffing Scholar of Lan-ling² has focused his attention on the manners of the age, about which he has something significant to say. Of the seven feelings natural to mankind,³ melancholy is the most intractable. For such men of superior wisdom as may occasionally appear in the natural course of evolution, the fogs and ice that melancholy engenders disperse and splinter of their own accord, so there is no need to speak of such as these. Even those of lesser endowment know how to dispel melancholy with the aid of reason so that it may be prevented from encumbering them. Among the many who fall short of this, however, who have been unable to achieve enlightenment in their hearts, and who do not have access to the riches of the classic tradition to alleviate their melancholy, those who escape its infection are few.

It is in consideration of this fact that my friend, the Scoffing Scholar, has poured the accumulated wisdom of a lifetime into the composition of this work, consisting of one hundred chapters in all. Its striking rhetoric, which appeals to every taste,⁴ is designed to illuminate the cardinal human relationships, to discourage sexual promiscuity, to distinguish between the pure and the impure, to edify both the good and the ungood, and to expound the secrets of flourishing and decay, failure and success, through the inexorable working of karmic cause and effect, in such a way that they lie utterly revealed before the reader's eyes. From its beginning to its end the strands of the plot are as intricately articulated as the conduits of the circulatory system⁵ and are like a myriad skeins of silk that flutter in the wind without ever becoming entangled. So enticingly are these effects accomplished that the reader may, perhaps, be beguiled into forgetting his melancholy with a smile.

It is scarcely to be denied that in this work the language encroaches on the vulgar and the atmosphere is redolent of rouge and powder.⁶ But I would assert that such allegations miss the point. The first song in the Shih-ching (The book of songs)⁷ has been characterized by Confucius as expressing "Pleasure that does not extend to wantonness and sorrow that does not lead to injury."⁸ "Wealth and distinction are things that man desires,"⁹ but few are able to attain them without resort to wantonness. Sorrow and resentment are sentiments that man dislikes, but few are able to experience them without injury to themselves.

I have surveyed such productions of fabulists of earlier times as Lu Ching-hui's Chien-teng hsin-hua (New wick-trimming tales),¹⁰ Yüan Chen's Ying-ying chuan (Story of Ying-ying),¹¹ Chao Pi's Hsiao-p'in chi (Emulative frowns collection),¹² Lo Kuan-chung's Shui-hu chuan (Outlaws of the marsh),¹³ Ch'in Chün's Chung-ch'ing li-chi (A pleasing tale of passion),¹⁴ Lu Mei-hu's Huai-ch'un ya-chi (Elegant vignettes of spring yearning),¹⁵ and Chou Li's Ping-chu ch'ing-t'an (Pure conversations by candlelight),¹⁶ as well as such later works as the Ju-i chuan (The story of Lord As You Like It)¹⁷ and the Yü-hu chi (Tale of Chang Yü-hu).¹⁸ Their diction is so demanding that readers are often unable to enjoy them and discard them before reaching the end.

As for this story, although it may be couched in the everyday language of the marketplace or the idle chatter of the boudoir, even a three-foot-tall lad can derive as much pleasure from it as he would if he were enabled to suck the nectar of Heaven or pluck the tusk of leviathan,¹⁹ so easy is it for him to understand. Although it may not be the equal of the works of former days, its purport and its rhetoric are outstanding enough to make it worthy of consideration. In addition, with regard to the moral reformation of the age, the reproof of vice and encouragement of virtue, the purification of the mind and cleansing of the heart,²⁰ it cannot fail to make a small contribution.²¹

As for those events that take place in the bedchamber, everyone feels attracted to them, on the one hand, and repulsed by them, on the other. Of those who are not sages or worthies like Yao and Shun,²² there are few who escape entanglement. It is on this account that even the best of those who have attained wealth and distinction allow their hearts to be swayed and their intentions to be deflected. Behold: how secluded are the high halls and spacious structures,²³ the cloudy windows and misty chambers;²⁴ how magnificent are the golden screens and embroidered bedding; how enticing are the clouds of hair tumbling in disarray,²⁵ the creamy texture of swelling breasts; how assiduous are the cavortings of the cock phoenix and his mates; how extravagant are the brocade garments and the rare repasts;²⁶ how devoted are the women of beauty and men of talent²⁷ as they descant upon the breeze and apostrophize the moon;²⁸ how abandoned are the fragrant tongues as the jadelike drops of saliva commingle; how reckless are the pair of jade wrists, tugging and retugging at the ropes, and the pair of golden lotuses, tossing and retossing on the swing.²⁹

Surely this is happiness. Yet, when joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow.³⁰ Occasions for separation will occur, bringing haggard countenances in their wake, for this is inevitable. The need to "Pluck a sprig of plum blossoms to entrust to a courier,"³¹ or resort to a square of silk to be conveyed by a fish,³² cannot then be avoided. Calamitous missteps and disruptive dislocations³³ will become inescapable. Sacrifice of life to blade and sword can no longer be prevented. For in the world of light there is the imperial law, in the world of darkness there are ghosts and spirits,³⁴ that cannot be evaded.³⁵ And as for the propositions that if you defile the wife and children of another your own wife and children will be defiled,³⁶ or that calamity is the result of accumulated misdeeds and good fortune the reward of virtue,³⁷ they may all be subsumed under the rubric of the workings of the cycle of retribution.

Thus, "Heaven has its spring, summer, autumn, and winter,"³⁸ just as "Man has his sorrows and joys, partings and reunions.”³⁹ There is no reason to be surprised that this is so. As for those who act in accord with Heaven’s seasons, in the long term their descendants will continue to prosper, and in the short term they will serenely enjoy their allotted days. As for those who act in defiance of Heaven’s seasons, they will sacrifice life and reputation, for calamity will strike before they can turn on their heels.⁴⁰ Since no man in this world can escape the periodic revolutions of the times,⁴¹ those who remain unscathed by cruel fate and untainted by disgrace are fortunate indeed. That is why I have observed that the Scoffing Scholar in writing this story has something significant to say.

Written by the Master of Delight⁴² in his studio in Bright Worthy Village

PREFACE TO THE CHIN P'ING MEI

THE Chin P'ing Mei is an obscene book. In praising it as highly as he did, Yüan Hung-tao was merely giving indirect expression to his own discontent, not bestowing his approbation on the Chin P'ing Mei.¹ Nevertheless, the author did have intentions of his own that were admonitory rather than hortatory. For example, many women play a role in the story, but the fact that the author chose to emphasize only the names of P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, and Ch'un-mei by including them in his title is an instance of the type of historiography exemplified by the T'ao-wu of the State of Ch'u.² Thus, Chin-lien dies for her adultery, P'ing-erh dies for her burden of sins, and Ch'un-mei dies for her licentiousness, each of them coming to a more horrendous end than any of the other women. The author has availed himself of Hsi-men Ch'ing to depict the great villains of the world. He has availed himself of Ying Po-chüeh to depict the petty clowns³ of the world. He has availed himself of all these wanton women to depict the female clowns and villains of the world. So effective is his delineation that we cannot but break into a sweat as we read. Thus, his intentions are admonitory rather than hortatory.

I have remarked that "He who reads the Chin P'ing Mei and responds with a feeling of compassion is a Bodhisattva; he who responds with a feeling of apprehension is a superior man; he who responds with a feeling of enjoyment is a petty person; and he who responds with a feeling of emulation is no better than a beast."

My friend Ch'u Hsiao-hsiu⁴ once accompanied a young man to a banquet at which live entertainment was provided. When the point came in the play at which the Hegemon-King feasted at night the young man drooled with admiration, saying, "How can the life of a real man be anything but this?"

"The fact is," responded Hsiao-hsiu, "that it is only by way of contrast with the denouement at Wu-chiang that the dramatist has inserted this scene."⁵

Those present who overheard this remark sighed at the prescience of his comment. Only those who grasp the significance of this statement should be permitted to read the Chin P'ing Mei. Otherwise, Yüan Hung-tao may be accused of having been a flagrant instigator of venery. The people of this world must be exhorted not to follow in the footsteps of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

*Casually indited en route to Su-chou by
The Pearl-juggler of Eastern Wu⁶
Last month of winter, 1617-18⁷*

COLOPHON

THE STORY of the Plum in the Golden Vase* is a fable created by a prominent figure of the Chia-ching reign period¹ whose satirical shafts were directed at contemporary targets. But is not the explicitness with which he exposes the uglier aspects of human life also consistent with the purpose of our former teacher, Confucius, in not deleting the airs of Cheng and Wei from the Book of Songs?² The way that, in incident after incident, he has taken pains to sow the seeds of karmic cause and effect shows that the author was also a man of great compassion.

Those who help to disseminate this book in the future will earn immeasurable merit. The ignorant go so far as to regard this as an obscene book. In so doing not only do they fail to comprehend the author's purpose but they also unjustly repudiate the intentions of those who would disseminate it. It is the purpose of this colophon to make this clear.

*Written by Nien-kung*³

TRANSLATIONS OF SUPPLEMENTARY MATERIAL

1. Song suite beginning with the tune “Flowers in Brocade,” the first line of which is “The fair weather is balmy.” See chapter 15, note 20. This song suite is performed twice in the Chin P'ing Mei tz'u-hua, vol. 1, ch. 15, p. 9a, ll. 1–2; and vol. 4, ch. 78, p. 20a, l. 3. It is preserved in Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 2:618–23; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts'e 12, pp. 57a–59a. The following translation is based on the text as given in Tz'u-lin chai-yen.

TO THE TUNE “FLOWERS IN BROCADE” (NORTHERN STYLE): The fair weather is balmy, Spring is at its most beautiful.
Now lightly warm, now lightly cool, It reveals itself in flowering branches.
Deep in secluded courtyards,
The swallows suddenly return.
On purple roads and fragrant streets, Fine steeds with golden bridles neigh.
Parks and woods are bright with silks, Peach and apricot blossoms vie in fragrance.
The sounds of imperial music,
Drift across the Dragon Pool.
Fragrant verdure gradually blends into the green mist.
Truly, on such a fine day,
One revels joyously in the beautiful scene.

TO THE TUNE “GOLD LAMÉ CURTAINS” (SOUTHERN STYLE): The lingering cold is chilly;
Layers of emerald curtains are drawn.
Throughout the imperial capital, spring has returned.
The east wind grows more importunate.
The scene is at its most beautiful; Bright with silks and jewels.
Having moistened the flowers, the rain has cleared.
The rain has cleared,
And the flowering branches reach to the ground.
The smell of flowers permeates the fragrant streets; Subtly invading the sleeves of the passersby.
On Bronze Camel Street, they have roamed everywhere.
They have roamed everywhere,
In love with the long days and genial sun.

TO THE TUNE “PLUCKING THE CASSIA” (NORTHERN STYLE): On the roads of the pleasure quarter lissome willows are trailing;
On the banks of the Wei River the genial sun lingers.
Reds and purples exude fragrance; Plum branches lose their powdery blooms; Peach trees venture into flower;
Crab apples and pears vie with their snowy blossoms.
Blowing the willow catkins
the fragrant breeze is gentle;
Embracing the roving wheels
the emerald grass is luxuriant.
Let carnelian goblets overflow;
Exchange songs and lyrics.
Meeting with times of peace and glorious days;
In every place they celebrate the season of the flowers.

TO THE TUNE “RIVER WATER” (SOUTHERN STYLE): Spring colors live up to the revelers' desires; The fragrant breeze penetrates their silks.
See how they compete to display flowery lanterns; How the light of the moon shines refulgently; And how, clustering on the branches of fiery trees, Tens of thousands of candles envelop them.
The silver river and pearly dipper grow dim.
This festive day, the fifteenth of the first month, Surpasses the revels at the Jasper Pool.
Bright lotus lamps illuminate the hills of lanterns, Truly, they are magnificent.
Crowds surge about vermilion wheels, traffic on the celestial streets is slow.
Reining in their jeweled horses are the imperial guards by their ten thousands, Watching until the shadows of the trees fall east and the moon sinks west.

TO THE BINARY TUNES “WILD GEESE ALIGHT” AND “VICTORY SONG” (NORTHERN STYLE): Arabesques of incense float from jeweled censers; The oriole's song shatters the silence of dawn.
Spring breezes waft the fragrance of flowery plants; Lingering sunlight enhances rivers and mountains.
Frowning-eyebrow willow leaves expand their greens; Rain-drenched crab apple blossoms drip in threads.
Village mummers and country folk enjoy themselves; At the Lustration Festival wine cups are set afloat.
Everyone must know,
The myriad nations are now all at peace; Upon prescribed topics,
One must compose poetry on phoenix notepaper.

TO THE BINARY TUNES “REITERATIVE BROCADE” AND “INTOXICATED IN THE EAST WIND” (SOUTHERN STYLE): Our only fear is that greens darken the alleyways, And spring will soon depart.
Our only fear is that greens darken the alleyways, And spring will soon depart.
The cuckoo cries,
Only causing the flowers to fall and the willow catkins to fly.
The effects of the east wind permeate everything; On these fine days when spring is in its glory, Half the flowers have already fallen, Leaving only a few branches of peony behind.
Outside the painted pavilions,
One is surrounded by misty peaks and emerald waves.
Behold: swings kick into view behind the walls, Revealing pearls and kingfisher feather ornaments, Which set off to perfection golden bridle trappings.
Our only fear is that greens darken the alleyways, And spring will soon depart.
Climbing high towers, leaning on all the balustrades,

On the eve of the spring festival, fires are prohibited, one eats cold food.
 Windblown red petals stick to the picnic mats.
 In the I-ch'un Park there is banqueting.
 Begrudging what remains of spring, One lies intoxicated in the slanting sunlight.
 In the shadow of the weeping willow trees, The calls of auspicious birds awaken the slumberer.
 As one traverses the twenty-four divisions of the flowering cycle,
 One can calculate how much of the glorious season has already gone by.

TO THE BINARY TUNES “RIVER-BOBBED OARS” AND “SEVEN BROTHERS” (NORTHERN STYLE): Traversing willow paths, Crossing peach tree streams,
 Skimming the clear waves,
 Pairs of swallows fly.
 Fragrant verdure grows wild and luxuriant; Fallen willow catkins lie soiled in mud.
 Cuckoos cry incessantly,
 But cannot call a halt to spring's wending way.
 Only the myriad willow fronds impede its progress.
 The beautiful scene basks in genial sunlight.
 Truly: as greens darken reds dwindle.
 The most touching element is a pair of orioles, Warbling to the humans, Harmonizing with the notes of pipe and song.
 As the sun moves, flower shadows traverse hanging painted screens.
 Truly: Chinese and barbarians alike share in the enjoyment of these years of peace.

TO THE TUNE “WAVE-BOBBING OARS” (SOUTHERN STYLE): The realm of luxury,
 Is apparent in the picturelike towers and terraces.
 Beside the dance floors, swallows kick blossoms into flight.
 Performing new music, the mandola and psaltery are tuned to a low pitch.
 As though calling to the revelers, orioles compete in song.

TO THE BINARY TUNES “PLUM BLOSSOM WINE” AND “ENJOYING THE SOUTH” (NORTHERN STYLE): See how in spring pools, Brocadelike carp leap.
 Hear how in green trees,
 Yellow orioles warble.
 Everything conveys the idea of spring.
 Each is content;
 Each is happy.
 The east wind blows the willow catkins, Skidding over the green verdure,
 As far as the horizon.
 They cannot be restrained,
 Seeing spring on its way,
 Alighting on the fallen blossoms, Entangled in floating gossamer.
 Outside the ornate mansion,
 West of the little bridge,
 The new plums are like beans,
 The willow leaves like eyebrows.
 Remember mid-spring in the Southern Park, homeward bound, treading the green; After doing a stint on the swing, showing off one's silken garments.
 Slowly singing “Golden Threads” and toasting with golden goblets;
 Idly apostrophizing the peonies and appreciating the yellow roses.
 Truly: an auspicious festival in a glorious season, Thanks to the unification of the Great Ming, favoring Chinese and barbarian alike.

CODA: Of all the beauteous seasons of the year, one must remember, Throughout the human world, the glory of spring is most enjoyable.
 May the good fortune and long life of our Sage Sovereign equal Heaven.

2. Song suite to the tune “Thirty Melodies,” the first line of which is “How happy this auspicious day.” See chapter 16, note 19. This song suite is performed twice in the Chin P'ing Mei tz'u-hua, vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 11a, l. 9; and vol. 2, ch. 31. p. 15a, l. 5. It is preserved in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, pp. 513–14; Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 1:235–37; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts'e 16, pp. 8a–9a. The following translation is based on the text as given in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng.

TO THE TUNE “THIRTY MELODIES”: How happy this auspicious day;
 The planet Venus has appeared, dimly discernible amid variegated clouds.
 See how the jade tree before the reception hall, Has once again put forth a magic sprout.
 Having been invited to attend the feast, We offer a curved kingfisher feather with a sharp quill,
 And a round gold embroidery frame of paltry diameter,
 As tokens of esteem for this lovely new face; And in the hope that you will remain a happy pair, And continue to live harmoniously together for a hundred years.
 Five hundred years ago your destiny was sealed,
 Only to be fulfilled today.
 Here in your magistrate's tribunal, on the occasion of this birthday, We offer a toast to your long life.
 As pure as jade,
 As captivating as a flower,
 This is the flawless jewel of the age.
 At this feast to celebrate the bathing of the child, On this auspicious day,
 The whole household is happy as can be.
 Necklaces and bracelets hold in place the mermaid silk.
 Our only wish is that,
 Your longevity be that of a mountain, Your good fortune as deep as the sea, And that you share glorious success.
 The happy hubbub at this elegant feast is not inconsiderable.
 Truly: the Queen Mother of the Western Pool has temporarily abandoned paradise; Immortal lads amid the clouds proffer the peaches of immortality.
 With her patent of nobility she is entitled to a coach and four,
 The phoenix headdress and cloud-patterned cape.
 Surrounded by attendant beauties, Entitled to golden insignia and purple seal-ribbons, He has returned to his old home,
 Where, dressed in motley, he can join his family in enjoying the season.
 If the proper rites are not observed it may give rise to resentment;
 Human nature is such that one must be chary of too intimate relationships.
 We are happy to live in an era of good government when the people are not disturbed, And wish the nation to be at peace and the wind and rain harmonious.
 A jade ch'i-lin has fulfilled the bear's portent of a noble birth.
 So now that famous beauty, the elder Ch'iao, is as lucky as her little sister, And with a baby to boot,
 To bring glory to its ancestors,
 And continue the family tradition of wearing gold and sable.
 Tortoise and crane portend good fortune, sporting in pool and pavilion;
 Pine and cypress intertwine their branches, intimating endurance.
 Grain grows in double ears; phoenixes alight in respect.
 They are like birds that fly only in pairs, like mating phoenixes.
 Shadows of flowers tumble and toss on the screen; The sound of singing resounds in the air.

The dancers with willowy waists like Hsiao-man's are danced out;
 The tune "Rainbow Skirts and Feathered Garments" is finally over;
 As they turn their heads, cloud-shaped palace head ornaments fall out.
 The ornate halls are deep,
 The gardens and courtyards secluded.
 The incense floating from jeweled censers is curling upwards.
 Roll up the embroidered curtains and beaded portieres;
 Let the swallows come and nest
 if they will.
 We are confronted with crimson peaches, seemingly afire,
 Just as they should be.
 We see butterflies, one pair after another, flying around us.
 At this auspicious feast, this festival of flowers,
 The small zither and great zither are in harmony.
 Let us enjoy the music of pipes and woodwinds;
 Unbutton our collars,
 Open our mouths in laughter;
 Give way to drunkenness, empty
 the golden flagons;
 And leave the red apricot blossoms to revel on their branch tips.
 May your wealth and distinction flourish like the three months of spring,
 And may the voice of the cuckoo never be heard to portend their end.

CODA: May the incense of your sacrifices never cease, your flowers never grow old;
 May your good fortune be deep as the Eastern Sea, your longevity ever increase;
 May you fulfill your days with mutual respect and enjoy your life together.

3. Song suite beginning with the tune "Clever Improvisation," the first line of which is "How pleased we are by your success." See chapter 20, note 28. This song suite is performed and partially quoted in the Chin P'ing Mei tz'u-hua, vol. 1, ch. 20, p. 10b, ll. 2–4. It is preserved in Ts'ai-lou chi, scene 20, p. 69, ll. 3–11; Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, pp. 418–20; Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 2:1272–75; Yung-hsi yieh-fu, ts'e 16, pp. 32b–33b; and Ch'ün-yin lei-hsüan, 3:1971–73. The following translation is based on the text as given in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng.

TO THE TUNE "CLEVER IMPROVISATION": How pleased we are by your success, You have been doubly favored.
 Heaven has made this perfect match; Like male and female phoenix are husband and wife.
 Wearing golden seal and purple ribbon, marks of glory and distinction,
 Today we thank our parents,
 Profoundly grateful for their loving care.
 Chorus:
 How happy we are to meet again,
 How happy we are to meet again.
 In the decorated hall ranks of pearls and head ornaments are arrayed.
 The happy hubbub of feasting and music is graced with a spring breeze.
 This day we will renew our marriage vows, Enjoying the pleasures of connubial bliss, Like fish sporting in the water.

TO THE TUNE "FLIRTATIOUS LAUGHTER": Gayly laughing we celebrate this happy occasion, By raising our phoenix goblets on high.
 To the sound of ivory clappers, silver psaltery, and jade flute,
 Let them bring on in cups and platters, The fruits of sea and land to grace the auspicious feast.
 The name of the winner of top honors is emblazoned on the tiger placard.
 Behold: in perfumed hall and painted chamber we feast from brazen vessels.
 May they live happily together as husband and wife for ever and ever.

TO THE TUNE "CONGRUENT WAYS": Formerly we feared the shame of public exposure;
 Our temporary anger was only a pretense.
 We did not anticipate that you would reject us;
 At that time we had no way of keeping you.
 But now that we have arrived at the present day, Let us enjoy ourselves and endeavor to get drunk.
 Endeavor to get drunk,
 But never forget the role played in the past by the gaily colored ball.

TO THE TUNE "THE DOLL": How joyous our delight as tortoiseshell mats are spread for the feast.
 In the fine haze, incense curls from golden lion-shaped censers.
 We are surrounded by red, encircled by emerald, like piles of embroidered brocade.
 Hear how the musicians play in perfect unison; Truly: it is a model occasion.

TO THE TUNE "IMPOSTER'S SONG": In spring we enjoy this famous park; the flowers are like silks;
 The scene is most remarkable.
 Amid ten li of lotus blossoms oars move lightly;
 Everything is perfect.
 In the decorated hall, day after day, fine feasts are spread.
 Do not fail to take advantage of such auspicious occasions,
 Such auspicious occasions;
 But give others cause to celebrate the story of The Gaily Colored Tower.

TO THE TUNE "SACRED BHAIŠAJYA-RĀJA": The notes are harmonious,
 The melodies entrancing;
 Happily we celebrate the occasion by providing this feast.
 Never parted for a moment,
 Following in each other's steps; In such a good marriage, truly,
 we will never separate,
 But enjoy forever the pleasures of connubial bliss.

TO THE TUNE "PLUM BLOSSOM WINE": At every festival, in every season, May our wishes be granted, our moods happy.
 Let fragrant breezes sweep courtyards gay with the sound of song.
 Pour frothing bumpers,
 Float golden wine cups.

Chorus:

In decorated halls let happy laughter reign.

Who is as lucky as you and I,

Sharing the delights of the nuptial chamber, Able to spend the rest of our lives with branches entwined?

Crimson curtains and embroidered hangings, Hide fairy caverns, the realms of the blessed.

It is just like stumbling on the Peach Blossom Spring.

Such glory and distinction,

Are unmatched in this world.

Chorus:

In decorated halls let happy laughter reign.

Who is as lucky as you and I,

Sharing the delights of the nuptial chamber, Able to spend the rest of our lives with branches entwined?

CODA: It seems we must have been united in a former life;

How happy we are to have met again in this incarnation.

Father and mother, husband and wife, Are reunited and all wish them well.

1. Song suite in the southern style beginning with the tune “Pomegranate Blossoms,” the first line of which is “It was the night of their assignation.” See chap. 21, n. 29. It is preserved in [Hsin-pien] Nan chiu-kung tz’u, chiian 3, pp. 4a–4b; Nan-kung tz’u-chi, vol. 1, chiian 1, pp. 38–39; Ch’ün-yin leihsian, 4:2067–69; and Wu-yü ts’ui-ya, 12:287–89. The following translation is based on the text as given in Nan-kung tz’u-chi.

TO THE TUNE “POMEGRANATE BLOSSOMS”

It was the night of their assignation,
Which had been planned for this evening.
People were silent;
The moon was high.
He had been instructed not to knock at the gate,
But ever-so-gently to sway the flowering branches,
So that their shadows would appear on the silken window,
And she would know that her lover had arrived.
What was the need for butterfly messengers or bee go-betweens?
The tryst would take place between the phoenix lovers.

TO THE SAME TUNE

“Who could have known my fickle lover would fail me on this fine night?
My bedchamber is silent,
As I endure my solitude.
The shadows of the wind-blown bamboos move fitfully on the latticework; With the result that my dreams are interrupted, my soul is troubled.
I sigh that we spend more time apart than together.
When I gaze back toward the Radiant Terrace of Ch’u,¹ mountains and barriers intervene.
For want of clouds and rain, my eyebrows have faded,
 my fragrance has dissipated.
Unhappily the road to the Blue Bridge is blocked.”²

TO THE TUNE “FISHERMAN’S PRIDE, WITH A VARIATION”

“Late at night I get up and trim the silver lamp to look for him, But my shadow is solitary and my image lone.
Who could have anticipated that the pleasure of last evening, And the even greater pleasure expected tonight, Should end up, after we separated, without further communication?
All day long it has been preoccupying me.
Perhaps he is drunk and his feelings are topsy-turvy; Perhaps he is performing on his zither for other ears; Perhaps he has taken up with some other flower by the wayside; Perhaps he has what it takes to get started, but he won’t carry through.”

TO THE SAME TUNE

“All on his account I am neglecting my toilet;
Too tired to paint my eyebrows.
All on his account I no longer enjoy tea or food;
My thoughts are too disturbed.
All on his account my good feelings have turned to vexation.
All on his account my heart is sore and I suffer from boredom.
How can I dispel these feelings at separation?
I’ll end up as prematurely gray as P’an Yüeh, as emaciated as Shen Yüeh.”³

TO THE SAME TUNE

“He has suddenly forgotten our vows beneath the moon and stars.
He has suddenly forgotten our singing and laughter.
He has suddenly forgotten the poems he indited on my mermaid silk handkerchief.
He has suddenly forgotten the tiny shoe
I gave him as a keepsake.
He has suddenly forgotten the deft needlework with which I fashioned his spring gown.
He has completely forgotten that we burned incense together to solemnize our union.
He has suddenly forgotten the peach-red stain on the fragrant silk handkerchief.”

TO THE SAME TUNE

“As for my lovesickness,
How can I quickly dispel it?
Will the debt created by our intertwining branches ever be paid?
Truly, the fallen blossom would like to float with the current, But the heartless current is too turbulent to bear it along.
Concluding that this anguish may be something I am fated to endure, I secretly cast my lot with coins, but get no clear answer.
I would appeal to Heaven itself, but Heaven is too high.”

Coda

If she were ever to see him again,
How could she ever forgive him?
Her only regret was that she was not able to devastate him with a single tirade.
But once they were reunited, they got along just as well as before.

2. Song suite beginning with the tune “Spring in the Metropolis,” the first line of which is “A cold wind has overspread the land.” See chap. 21, n. 43. It is preserved in Tz’u-lin chai-yen, 2:867–72; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts’e 16, pp. 51b–53b. The following translation is based on the text as given in Tz’u-lin chai-yen.

TO THE TUNE “SPRING IN THE METROPOLIS” (SOUTHERN STYLE) A cold wind has overspread the land.

The frost-braving branches of the golden larch retain their coin-like leaves.
The oranges are green and the tangerines yellow.
The trees on the embankment are bare, but the maple leaves are red.
The movements of the hands on the jade clepsydra are faintly audible; Somewhat enhancing the effect of the new frost in the frozen night.

It is time to clear the stackyards, bring in the harvest,
Drill the troops, and practice archery.

TO THE TUNE "THE LEAVES OF THE PHOENIX TREE" (NORTHERN STYLE) The southward returning geese,

The crows resting at night,
Perch in the trees and alight on the flat strand.
When one surveys the vista it is worthy of a painting.
During Indian summer there are still plants in flower;
Several verdant peach blossoms have been spared.
Travelers halt their steeds to admire the scene.

TO THE TUNE "SHEEP ON THE MOUNTAIN SLOPE" (SOUTHERN STYLE) In painted chambers beaded portieres have just been lowered.

Wintry hues oppress the distant mountains.
Beside the brazier wine is poured and portions of savory meat are divided.
Three passages are played on the drums.
Icy strings stretch over bridges ranged like wild geese.
Golden braziers are replenished, burning incense redolent of orchid and musk.
The shivery effect of the cold gradually becomes more intense.
"Let us imbibe 'sunset clouds,'
And feast on 'jade peaches' in fabled love nests,
As, everywhere in the capital,
Pipes and voices resound in a myriad houses."

TO THE TUNE "DANCERS' ENSEMBLE" (SOUTHERN STYLE) In several places flute-players in moon-viewing kiosks are heard.

Wine is amply decanted, poems are slowly indited.
There is no helping the fact that the chill has somewhat increased.
For a time the curtains have been let down half way.
The winter solstice is at hand, after which we will welcome the lengthening days.

TO THE TUNE "GOLD CHRYSANTHEMUM'S FRAGRANCE" (NORTHERN STYLE) The ashes of reed pith have been blown from all six yin pitch-pipes.

The sun's shadow has moved across the line on the sundial.
Like translucent jade, morning frost covers the turquoise tiles; Like glistening alabaster, water congeals into ice crystals.
"Let us raise jade goblets and decant 'sunset clouds.' "

TO THE TUNE "GOURD OF VINEGAR" (NORTHERN STYLE) The cold-weather plants gradually begin to bud;

The mountain plum is about to burst into bloom.
In frosty courtyards the p'i-p'a is plucked in time to the dance.
The fragrance fades from garden and wood as the year winds to an end.
In several places monks pause in reading their sacred texts,
To observe that in the distant sky the force of the wind is blowing the geese out of line.

TO THE TUNE "WEN-CHOU SONG" (SOUTHERN STYLE)

The dark clouds obscuring it,
Blown off by the evening wind,
The image of the moon traversing the void illuminates the snow.
Its single hue of alabaster is truly bright, obscuring the open country.
It falls densely on the sing-song houses, and flutters into monkish abodes.⁴
Wavering before "silver seas,"

its dazzle creates a blur.⁵
In no time at all it has half covered the whitewashed wall.

TO THE TUNE "INTERLACED JADE BRANCHES" (SOUTHERN STYLE) As we idly climb to a lofty kiosk, Moonlight gleams on white jade girdle pendants, and shines on white horses.
In the evening the view over the river is resplendent; A solitary rain-caped fisherman returns home, worthy of a painting.
The tiles of golden gates and jade structures are frozen in white.
Brushing windows and infiltrating blinds, the snow continues to flutter down, An auspicious omen, presaging an era of universal peace.

TO THE TUNE "THE FLOWER IN THE REAR COURTYARD" (NORTHERN STYLE) The rivers and mountains present an imposing vista.
Psaltery and mandola are called for to celebrate the season.
Superior wine is served within curtains of gold lamé;
Enhanced by clear breezes, phoenix tablet tea is sipped.
Donning crane's-down cloaks we search for plum blossoms, Emulate Wang Hui-chih's abortive visit to Tai K'uei on a snowy night,⁶
And show off our poetic effusions by the bridge at Pa-ling.⁷
The jasper terraces in the bright moonlight resemble,
The Celestial Emperor's abode in the Isles of the Blest.

TO THE TUNE "THE JADE GIRDLE" (SOUTHERN STYLE) A subtle fragrance suffuses the air; Taking advantage of the mild weather, the early plum has burst into bloom.
Its white beauty is pure and perfect.
Gracing moonlit terraces and breezy kiosks,
It stoops over low fences and thatched cottages.
Its jade bones and icy flesh are cleansed of makeup.
Interspersed with bamboo and pine it inspires poetic fancy.

TO THE TUNE "BLACK SILK ROBE" (SOUTHERN STYLE) As in the past, its quintessential nature is resplendent.
Its glossy flesh, tinged with powder, adorns shallow waters and flat strands.
Its sparse branches encage the moon, casting their shadows aslant.
Last night it bloomed amid the snow in the nearby village; But under Lo-fu Mountain in the south,
It lends its presence to the wineshops.
Its aura of purity is truly astonishing;
Its white decor is beauteous and elegant.
Illuminated by moonlight, set off by bamboo, what more could one ask?

TO THE TUNE "THE GREENHORN" (NORTHERN STYLE) Beside glowing braziers, the banquet spread, the banquet spread is just over.
Lifting golden cups, toasts are exchanged, toasts are exchanged in "sunset clouds."
Snow is swept together and ice broken up with which to brew fine tea.
Inserted into silver vases, several sprigs of plum blossoms are displayed.
On the festival of the eighth day of the twelfth month,
The populace celebrates boisterously,
Effigies of Śākyamuni Buddha are bathed,
And public devotions proceed unhindered.
The year is drawing to an end; and once spring arrives, spring wind and spring light will fill the world, Just as the sage emperor governs the myriad states, and ensures peace in the realm.

TO THE TUNE "PLAYING THE OLD CRONE" (SOUTHERN STYLE) Welcoming the new spring, we gradually perceive that the cold is receding.

En route to festive feasts, we ride in perfumed carriages.
Carefully we decant the apotropaic T'u-su wine,
And set off firecrackers on New Year's Eve.
New peachwood talismans are exchanged for the old.
When spring arrives, the wicks in jade lamps shed their ashes.

Fires are lit, illuminating the frosty tiles;
To the beat of drums the exorcistic No rites are performed; As, troupe by troupe, the dancers put on a noisy show.
Portraits of the demon queller Chung K'uei are hung up.⁸
At midnight New Year's toasts are everywhere exchanged.
Pepper-flavored wine is served and its praises sung.
Rowdy friends disturb their stabled horses;
Rows of torches scatter the roosting crows.⁹

CODA (SOUTHERN STYLE) The sage ruler of the Great Ming dynasty has pacified the realm.

He has brought peace and contentment to natives and foreigners alike.
Within the four seas all is tranquil and the populace is happy.

3. Song suite by Ch'en To (fl. early 16th century) beginning with the tune "Powdery Butterflies," the first line of which is "Three Variations on the Plum Blossom." See chap. 22, n. 14. This song suite is performed twice in the Chin P'ing Mei tz'u-hua, vol. 2, chapter 22, p. 5a, 1. 10; and vol. 4, ch. 68, p. 9b, 1. 4. It is also mentioned in vol. 4, ch. 73, p. 7a, 11. 9–10. It is preserved in Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 1:383–86; Yung-hsi yieh-fu, ts'e 6, pp. 97a–98a; Ch'ün-yin leihsian, 4:2300–2303; Pei-kung tz'u-chi, 4:650–51; and Ch'ü-pi yieh-fu, vol. 1, pp. 11b–13a. The following translation is based on the text as given in Pei-kung tz'u-chi.

TO THE TUNE "POWDERY BUTTERFLIES" (NORTHERN STYLE) "Three Variations on the Plum Blossom";¹⁰

In the frontier watchtower the bugle has finished playing it.
The wheel of the moon shines aslant on the gauze window.
Supporting her fragrant cheek on her hand,
Her eyes overflow with tears.
Beneath the shaded lamp,
She tosses and sighs.
The words he had whispered in her ear have turned out to be nothing but empty talk.

TO THE TUNE "GRIEVING FOR YEN HUI" (SOUTHERN STYLE) "My fickle lover is too inconstant.

This playfulness of his is something out of the ordinary.
He went out the door easily enough,
And now he's at the sea's rim or the sky's edge.
He was supposed to return late last year,
But, in no time at all, spring and summer have passed.
When he left, the frost had already aged the lotus blossoms, And now, once again, the water is chilling the reeds."

TO THE TUNE "POMEGRANATE BLOSSOMS" (NORTHERN STYLE) "I have dissipated the best years of my life beside the green gauze windows.

For a long time now, I have not bothered to put on any makeup.
My bowels, which are wrenched nine times a day,
are ever more constricted.
It is nearly enough to kill me;
On top of which I suffer from spectral visitations.

Sometimes I entrust my fate to azure Heaven by consulting the tortoise oracle; But I am quite unable to interpret the conflicting results.

All of a sudden, I happen to pick up a fragrant silk handkerchief, Only to find that it is aptly embroidered with a double-headed flower.”

TO THE TUNE “GRIEVING FOR YEN HUI” (SOUTHERN STYLE) “The slippery villain,

His heart is impossible to fathom.
He is always deceiving people with his clever tongue,
While he floats about restlessly,
Just like willow catkins in the wind.
The more I think about it the clearer it is,
Your lustful daring has ever been as big as the sky.
You have devoted yourself to pilfering jade and purloining perfume,¹¹
In order to violate the mansions and offices of the rich and powerful.”

TO THE TUNE “FIGHTING QUAILS” (NORTHERN STYLE) “This hateful separation seems to go on for year after year; It is not to be compared to a brief space or a short time.

Vexation has worn away the twin arcs of my eyebrows;
And so emaciated my waist that it is only a handful.
Here I am, yearning for him every morning and every night, But when does he ever bother to remember me?
Unable to mount to the azure firmament aboard a phoenix, He has tethered his horse to the willow tree at some girl’s house.”

TO THE TUNE “MOTH FLYING INTO THE LAMP” (SOUTHERN STYLE) “Hungering for love is like grasping sand;

This lonely suffering is like chewing wax.
Who knows where he is, cuddling up to some smiling face, While I’m putting up with all this anxiety for no good reason?
And there’s no way for me to get any news of him.
In the end the day will come when he returns home.
I’ll enumerate the entire gamut of his peccadillos,
And take him to task for each and every one of them.”

TO THE TUNE “MOUNTING THE LITTLE TOWER” (NORTHERN STYLE) “I have always remained completely unblemished,

And he has always known the rules of propriety.
Yet, for no good reason, I have had to suffer
all this desolation; Put up with all this loneliness;
And endure all this ill treatment.
It is obvious that the bronze-dragon spouts on the clepsydra have run dry; The horse-shaped iron chimes on the eaves sound in vain;
The incense in the duck-shaped metal burner is burnt out.
The hardest time to endure is this remnant of the twelfth month at the end of winter.”

TO THE TUNE “MOTH FLYING INTO THE LAMP” (SOUTHERN STYLE) The wind soughs wildly, sou-sou,

The snow falls densely, fen-fen,
Ch’i-ch’i, the phoenix pillow is desolate,
Ch’en-ch’en, the mandarin duck curtains are porous and thin, She-she, the brocade coverlet lies cold,

Cho-cho, the silver lamp flares violently,
Wu-wu, the nomad flute wails on the ramparts, Tung-tung, the last night watch is sounded,
Ya-ya, the crows on the trees scatter at dawn.

CODA

Once again Cho Wen-chün must elope in her perfumed carriage.
Her sole fear, that she has misconstrued the zither's message, And will only join Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju to become a topic of scandal.¹²

4. Song suite beginning with the tune “Cries of the Wild Geese in Flight,” the first line of which is, “The Red Emperor holds sway, ablaze in the Great Void.” See chap. 27, n. 32. It is preserved in Sung Yüan hsi-wen chi-i, pp. 116–17; Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, p. 552; Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 1:264–65; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts'e 3, pp. 61b–62a. The following translation is based on the text as given in Sung Yüan hsi-wen chi-i.

TO THE TUNE “CRIES OF THE WILD GEESE IN FLIGHT”

The Red Emperor holds sway, ablaze
in the Great Void.
There is not a trace of fragrant breeze from the south.
Even sucking ice and nibbling snow would be of no avail.
Though fans are kept in constant motion,
Beads of perspiration hang like pearls,
Serving to enervate jade bones and icy flesh.
Moving to the verdant hillside,
Boys are ordered to shake the bamboos to attract a breeze, And thereby momentarily alleviate the oppressive heat.

TO THE SAME TUNE WITH A MODIFIED OPENING

“The long days are exhausting,
Powder becomes damp and perfume sticky.
Though fans move over ice to cool one off,
it is impossible to sleep.
Late at night,
The two of us,
Move where the pure fragrance of the lotus blossoms is most pervasive, In the hope that by that time the power of the heat will have abated.
In waterside pavilions we can join voices to sing
‘Golden Threads,’¹³
Submerge red plums and float green melons as we drain a few cups together.”

TO THE TUNE “WINDBLOWN SAND”

As they lean against the carved balustrade
the sun sets in the west.
While they watch the mandarin ducks playing amid the ripples, Before they know it, the evening chill creeps into their sleeves.
In the gaps between the duckweed they see the moon invade the water, Sending gilded waves sailing into the clumps of blue-green lotus.
With visages illuminated by the evening light,
Showing off their loveliness to best advantage,
They contemplate a double-headed lotus blossom.

Its fragrant heart, unfortunately, is not able to speak.
For whom does it wait there in its frozen beauty?

TO THE SAME TUNE

“The incense burner diffuses the scent of aloeswood throughout the courtyard.
In such an attractive setting,
The spirits are invigorated,
And the feelings are relaxed.
Sticking jasmine blossoms in our hair,
Reciting newly composed poems,
How many can experience scenes such as this?
What need is there for pillows and mats or bedsteads with gauze netting?”

TO THE TUNE “A BUNDLE OF OARS”

The clear night is short,
With flagon at hand it is meet to pass the cup.
When days are long,
How is one to combat the cruel heat?
One hopes that on the watchtower,
The bronze clepsydra will slow its pace.
After two or three cups of wine,
What does it matter if one is late getting to sleep?

CODA

“The milky way still turns,
The jade clepsydra drips;
We'd better catch a little rest by the southern window.
Tomorrow night we can come to cool off again in the same place.”

5. Song suite beginning with the tune “A Single Missive,” the first line of which is “Everyone fears the days of summer.” See chap. 30, n. 36. It is preserved in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, pp. 531–32; Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 1:206–207; Chiu-pien nan chiu-kung p'u, pp. 76–77; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts'e 4, pp. 68a–68b; and ts'e 16, pp. 45b–46b. The following translation is based on the text as given in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng.

TO THE TUNE “A SINGLE MISSIVE”

“Everyone fears the days of summer,
But I love the glory of burning days and summer heat.
Wherever one looks there are things to celebrate.
Bamboo shoots become stalks, sunflowers burst into bloom; Clouds soar into strangely shaped peaks by the thousands and ten thousands; Pomegranates produce clusters of three or four red-capped blossoms; The cicadas are clamorous,
The rain has just stopped,
From the green grass around the pond, frogs are heard everywhere.
With nothing on our minds,
Who is our equal?
From time to time we glimpse a pair of swallows darting about the curtains.”

CHORUS

“In this cool pavilion, you and I,
Alternately pour out ‘sunset clouds,’
and exchange mutual toasts.”

TO THE TUNE “BLACK SILK ROBE”

“In the twinkling of an eye it is the Dragon Boat Festival.
Because of the genial weather, one is not too aware of the summer heat.

When it is appropriate to sing lustily, one should sing lustily, Don't let the fine days and lovely scenery go unappreciated.
Having just experienced the joys of the nuptial chamber,
We try tugging together on the gaudy ropes of the swing.
Enjoying calamus wine and festival tsung-tzu,¹⁴
We feast and drink together.
There is no reason one should not choose to pick the fruit from the branches."

CHORUS

"In this cool pavilion, you and I,
Alternately pour out 'sunset clouds,'
and exchange mutual toasts."

TO THE TUNE "A SPLENDID CALABASH"

"All of a sudden we perceive the scent of hidden blossoms.
A fragrant breeze ruffles the lotuses in the pond.
We watch the mandarin ducks sport in the water, their necks entwined.
Coming this way and going that way,
They startle the frolicking fish into surfacing in the azure waves.
From the vantage point of a waterside retreat,
We observe the lotus gatherers singing their lotus-gathering songs."

CHORUS

"In this cool pavilion, you and I,
Alternately pour out 'sunset clouds,'
and exchange mutual toasts."

TO THE TUNE "MUSIC CALMS THE SPIRIT"

"In the evening, having bathed,
We enjoy the breeze, gaze at the moon,
and lightly pluck the p'i-p'a.
Beauties can be heard laughing responsively behind gauze windows.
From time to time, one can hear their whispered endearments.
The word is that it will be a fine night,
Much cooler than the night before.
We might as well enjoy the pleasures of connubial bliss.
Inebriated among the flowers,
The taste of the wine is alluring.
What need is there for punkahs with flagon at hand?"

CHORUS

"In this cool pavilion, you and I,
Alternately pour out 'sunset clouds,'
and exchange mutual toasts."

CODA

"Laughing, we enter the bedstead with gauze netting.
In this breezy compartment and cool chamber,
let us linger.
Where jade bones and icy flesh are concerned, anything goes."

6. Song suite by Lü Chih-an (14th century) beginning with the tune "A Gathering of Worthy Guests," the first line of which is "Alas! This floating life of ours is like a dream." See chap. 31, n. 57. It is preserved in Ch'üan Yüan san-ch'ü, 2:1130-32; Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, pp. 466-67; Tz'u-lin chai-yen, 2:914-18; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts'e 14, pp. 26a-27b. The following translation is based on the text as given in Ch'üan Yüan san-ch'ü.

TO THE TUNE "A GATHERING OF WORTHY GUESTS"

"Alas! This floating life of ours is like a dream.
The events of the past have already come to naught.
In a snap of the fingers, the red disk sinks in the west; In a trice, dust rises from what was once a wide blue sea.
The youngster's glossy black hair has turned to gray; The red-cheeked youth's head is white, his eyebrows bushy.
In a turn of the head we will all be ghosts under the Pei-mang Mountains.
Merely to mention the subject is enough to induce sorrowful reflection.
We might as well let wine soak the sleeves of our gowns, And flowers weigh down the brims of our hats."¹⁵

TO THE TUNE "FREE AND EASY WANDERING"

"Without any entanglements,
I might just as well rest
at my ease.
I can sleep until the sun is three rods high¹⁶ without getting up.
I amuse myself with poetry, wine,
zither, and chess,
And am able to be united with my children and my rustic wife.
Wealth and distinction, success and fame,
are external affairs.
I am tired of striving for them and being driven by others.
I would rather relax and give free rein to my fancy,
Indulge my natural feelings,
Extend my horizons and unknit my brow."

TO THE TUNE "THE LEAVES OF THE PHOENIX TREE"

"Why strive for fame and fortune?
Why differentiate you from me?
In the twinkling of an eye our old friends are few and far between.
Gradually our red-cheeked countenances become altered; Before we know it white hairs encroach upon us.
To mention the subject induces sorrowful reflection.
The fact is, we cannot prevent time from flying like a white horse galloping past a crack."¹⁷

TO THE TUNE "THE FLOWER IN THE REAR COURTYARD"

"Alas! Time passes like a dream.
The fullness of youth flows away like water.
One can only observe the endless affairs of the world,
While draining the finite cups this life affords.
Do not become deluded.
Resolutely reverse course while the current is swift.¹⁸
By the banks of P'an Stream the fish are lovely as ever.¹⁹
On Shou-yang Mountain the ferns are full-grown.²⁰
The peaks of Mount Hua in the west remain striking.²¹
On the Tung-t'ing Lake the breezes are still gentle."²²

TO THE TUNE "A PAIR OF WILD GESE"

“It is better to learn the wisdom of returning home as early as possible, Where one can enjoy the leisure to study ultimate principles.
There one will not be encumbered by disgrace or glory.
One can live in honest poverty and avoid controversy, Distance oneself from the red dust and practice the Tao.”

TO THE TUNE “GOURD OF VINEGAR”

“When spring comes, one listens to the oriole singing on the branch.
One hears the call of the cuckoo beneath the flowers,
Repeating with every cry the message,
‘why not go home?’
As for the money in your wallet, I urge you not to begrudge it.
You might as well sober up when drunk, the better to get drunk once more.
The shadows of the flowers move across the mat even as you feast.”²³

TO THE SAME TUNE

“When summer comes, one observes the rippling light on the surface of the lake.
The fragrant breeze is gentle everywhere,
Flapping one’s lapels and loosening one’s hair,
on the willow-shaded embankment.
A day gained, is a day lived through,
and one day the less.
Why strive for fame or fortune?
In this life, from of old, those who live to seventy are few.”²⁴

TO THE SAME TUNE

“When autumn comes, one watches the chrysanthemum by the hedge blossom into gold.
One enjoys the watery moon in the distant sky.
Truly, the river reflects the autumn landscape as wild geese take flight.”²⁵
It pleases the heart to laugh and talk while sharing cups of wine.
When able to do so with a soul mate,
One returns home with yellow blossoms stuck all over one’s head.”

TO THE SAME TUNE

“When winter comes, alabaster flakes come swirling down.
Eddies of shredded goosedown start to fly.
Shadows of plum blossoms by the wattled fence are projected across the window.
In one’s humble parlor one fills cup after cup of wine to the brim.
Once inebriated one can take a nap,
And let the red dust billow back and forth wherever it will.”

CODA

“Do not seek the snail’s tentacle of fame;
Do not covet a fly’s head worth of profit.
The crane’s legs are long, the duck’s legs short,²⁶
they cannot be equalized.
In the end, who can say who is in the right?
The best course for me is to conceal myself amid the vulgar herd, And let someone else carry the gourd from now on.”

7. Song to the tune “A Sprig of Flowers,” the first line of which is “Though I am not one of the eight ministers entitled to wear the purple sash.” See chap. 31, n. 58. It is the first song in a long dramatic suite that is preserved in Yüan-ch’ü hsiian, 4:1460–65; Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, pp. 293–96; Tz’u-lin chai-yen, 2:1053–60; and Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts’e 9, pp. 43a–45b. The following translation is based on the text as given in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng.

TO THE TUNE “A SPRIG OF FLOWERS”

“Though I am not one of the eight ministers entitled to wear the purple sash; I command the denizens of the six palaces with their golden hairpins.
When I hear the purple whip crack,
To bring the civil and military ranks to attention,
I observe the raising of the purple curtain as His Imperial Majesty comes in.
Though I may not be fit material to be a general or a minister, I attend the imperial equipage and enjoy the ruler’s regard.
At the behest of the consorts and empress in the various palaces, I supervise a lighthearted bevy of eight hundred beauties, And command the charming company of three thousand palace women.”

8. Song to the tune “Eight Beats of a Kan-chou Song,” the first line of which is “Concealed amid clusters of turquoise hair ornaments.” See chap. 32, n. 10. It is the first song in a long dramatic suite that is preserved in Yüan-ch’ü hsiian, 3:1093–95; Sheng-shih hsin-sheng, pp. 137–39; Tz’u-lin chai-yen, 1:481–85; Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts’e 4, pp. 47b–49a; and Ch’ün-yin leihsian, 3:1895–98. The following translation is based on the text as given in Sheng-shih hsin-sheng.

TO THE TUNE “EIGHT BEATS OF A KAN-CHOU SONG”

Concealed amid clusters of turquoise hair ornaments,
And a hazy nimbus of incense like sunset clouds,
By the wavering glare of red candlelight,
Under moon-shaped rafters and cloudlike beams, Enclosed within twelve latticework partitions held up with golden hooks, In the gilded chamber, standing screens surround a feast on tortoiseshell mats.
Where fragrant foam floats on the contents of white jade goblets, An aura of exhilaration pervades the breast, As faces are suffused with the air of spring.

9. Song to the tune “The Water Nymphs,” the first line of which is “With his tiger-head tally minted out of horse-hoof gold.” See chap. 32, n. 16. This song is the second of a set of four anonymous songs to the same tune that are included in Yung-hsi yüeh-fu, ts’e 18, pp. 45a–45b.

TO THE TUNE “THE WATER NYMPHS”

With his tiger-head tally minted out of horse-hoof gold, With his duck green, velvet lined, tortoiseshell armor, His mutton-fat jade belt plaque with its lion and barbarian king, He is fit material to be an imperial general or minister.
May His Excellency and his lady remain true till their heads are white; May His Excellency’s ancestors be enfeoffed three generations back; May His Excellency’s fame be broadcast throughout the four seas; May His Excellency daily advance up the golden ladder of success.

FOUR LYRICS TO THE TUNE “BURNING INCENSE”¹

ONE

Gardens of Paradise, Isles of the Blest, The storied towers of Golden Valley,²
Are scarcely equal to a thatched cottage for pure seclusion.
Where wildflowers embroider the ground, Is that not also elegant?
Appropriate to spring,
Appropriate to summer,
Appropriate to autumn.

Wine is mature, ready for straining, Guests arrive, fit for retaining.
Here is no glory, here no disgrace, here no sorrow.
Step back and relax.
What reason for that?
Only, when tired to sleep, When thirsty to drink,
When drunk to sing.

TWO

A short angled wall,
Low roughhewn windows,
A tiny pond, no bigger than a pimple.
Amid serried peaks,
By green waters,
There is a little wind,
There is a little moonlight, There is a little coolness.

Life's ordinary needs fulfilled, By bamboo table, on rattan couch, Look to what lies before the eyes, the water's hue, the mountain's light.
If guests appear and there's no wine, What's wrong with plain conversation?
Just, carefully brew the tea, Gently warm the cup, Fastidiously pour the water.

THREE

Situated amid water and bamboo, I love my cottage.³
Rocks lie clear beneath the stream, like randomly placed steps.
The design of my retreat is personal, Along lines delicately wrought.
It is secluded,
It is elegant,
It is comfortable.

At ease, without restraint, What is this like?
Leaning on the railing, I gaze into the water and watch the fish.
From breeze and blossoms, snow and moonlight, I have wrested the freedom, To burn some incense,
Make some comments,
Read some books.

FOUR

Sweep away the dust,
Conserve the moss,
Before the door, let the red leaves cover the steps.
The scene might be depicted in a painting, But that it still continues to surprise, With only a few boles of pine, Few stalks of bamboo, Few sprigs of plum.

Flowers and trees are so cultivated, That they come into bloom one after another.
As for the events of the morrow, leave them to Heaven.
Let wealth and distinction, Come when they will.
I'll simply go where I please, Abide by my lot,
Unbutton my collar.

LYRICS ON THE FOUR VICES⁴ TO THE TUNE “PARTRIDGE SKY”

DRUNKENNESS

Wine depletes the spiritual resources and destroys the home;
It causes speech to become incoherent, makes conduct riotous.
Estrangement from family, loss of friends, derive therefrom;
Deeds of injustice and ingratitude are all its doing.

One ought not to imbibe, From the flowing cup.
If you are able to obey this injunction, you cannot go wrong.
The foundering of all your undertakings may be traced to this.
From now on, when you entertain guests, serve them tea.

LUST

Do not become enamored of glossy black hair and beautiful complexions; Cease to hanker after crimson powder and halcyon-feathered ornaments.
What ravages man's body and shortens his life are those bewitching figures; Beauties capable of toppling kingdoms and cities are more alluring still.

Be not beguiled,

Husband your cinnabar fields.⁵

Those who are able to diminish their desires live longer years.

From this time on, abandon all thought of casual amours;

Within paper curtains decorated with plum blossoms sleep by yourself.⁶

AVARICE

Money and silk, gold and pearls, may pile up in your coffers; But, unless they are gotten legitimately, forgo their greedy acquisition.
Family and friends, honesty and integrity, are often forfeited for gain; Even the feelings that bind father and son are sometimes sacrificed for profit.

Pull back your hand,

Restrain yourself,

Lest body and mind be fraught with care, both day and night.

Your descendants, of course, will have the fortunes that befit them; On their behalf, you can spare yourself anticipatory worry.⁷

ANGER

Do not resort to violence or endeavor to show off your prowess; By brandishing fists, rolling up sleeves, or displaying your spirit.

Once you let the flames of your temper escape your control;

You will subsequently stew with anxiety at the calamitous results.

Don't go overboard,

Avoid catastrophe;

Be advised, the best policy is to be tolerant in all things.

When it is appropriate to let things go, you should let them go;

When you can make allowances for people, you should make allowances.⁸

Chapter 1

WU SUNG FIGHTS A TIGER ON CHING-YANG RIDGE; P'AN CHIN-LIEN DISDAINS HER MATE AND PLAYS THE COQUETTE

PROLOGUE¹

THESE IS a lyric to the tune “Pleasing Eyes”² that goes: The hero grips his “Hook of Wu,”

Eager to cut off ten thousand heads.
How is it that a heart forged out of iron and stone,
Can yet be melted by a flower?

Just take a look at Hsiang Yü and Liu Pang:³
Both cases are equally distressing.
They had only to meet with Yü-chi⁴ and Lady Ch'ü,⁵
For all their valor to come to naught.⁶

The subject of this lyric is the words passion and beauty, two concepts that are related to each other as substance is to function. Thus, when beauty bedazzles the eye, passion is born in the heart. Passion and beauty evoke each other; the heart and the eye are interdependent. This is a fact that, from ancient times until the present day, gentlemen of moral cultivation ought never to forget. As two men of the Chin dynasty once said, “It is people just like ourselves who are most affected by passion”;⁷ and “Beauty is like the lodestone which exerts its unseen pull on the needle even when obstacles intervene. If this be true even for nonsentient objects, how much the more must it be so for man, who must spend his days striving to survive in the realm of passion and beauty?”⁸

“The hero grips his ‘Hook of Wu.’ ” Hook of Wu is the name of an ancient sword. In those days there were swords with names such as Kan-chiang, Mo-yeh, T'ai-o, Hook of Wu, Fish Gut, and Death's-head.⁹ The lyric speaks of heroes with temperaments of iron and stone and the sort of heroic prowess that vaults across the heavens like a rainbow, who yet did not escape the fate of allowing their ambitions to be blunted by women. It then goes on to refer to the Hegemon-King of Western Ch'u, whose name was Hsiang Chi, or Hsiang Yü. Because the First Emperor of the Ch'in dynasty¹⁰ was so lacking in virtue that he: Garrisoned the Five Ranges to the south,

Built the Great Wall to the north,
Filled in the sea to the east,
Constructed the O-pang Palace¹¹ in the west, Swallowed up the Six States, Buried the scholars alive, and Burned the books,¹²

Hsiang Yü rose up in rebellion against him and was joined by the King of Han, whose name was Liu Chi, or Liu Pang. Liu Pang rolled up like a mat the territory in which the capital of the First Emperor had been located and thus put an end to the Ch'in dynasty. Later he and Hsiang Yü agreed to make the Hung Canal¹³ a boundary line between their territories and divided the empire between them.

Now, in the course of their conflict, Hsiang Yü was able, with the help of plans provided by Fan Tseng,¹⁴ to defeat the King of Han in seventy-two military engagements. But he was so infatuated with his favorite, Yü-chi, who possessed the kind of beauty that can topple kingdoms, that he took her with him on his campaigns so they could be together day and night. The result of this was that he was finally defeated by Liu Pang's general, Han Hsin,¹⁵ and had to flee by night as far as Yin-ling, where the enemy troops caught up with him. Although Hsiang Yü was defeated, he might have sought help from the area east of the Yangtze River, but he could not bear to part with Yü-chi. Hearing the armies that surrounded him on all sides singing the songs of his homeland, the region of Ch'u, he realized that his situation was hopeless and expressed his sorrow in song: My strength can uproot mountains,

My valor knows no peer;
But the times are against me,
And my steed will run no more.
My steed will run no more,
So what can I do?
Oh, Yü-chi, Yü-chi,
What is to be done?¹⁶

When he finished singing his face was streaked with tears.

“Your highness must be sacrificing important military considerations on my account,” Yü-chi said to him.

“Not really,” the Hegemon-King replied. “It's just that we can't bear to give each other up. Moreover, you're such a beauty that Liu Pang, who is a ruler addicted to wine and women, is sure to take you for himself if he should see you.”

“I would rather die in an honest cause than compromise myself in order to save my life,” Yü-chi wept.

Then, asking Hsiang Yü for his sword, she slit her throat and died. The Hegemon-King was so moved by her act that, when the time came, he followed suit by cutting his own throat.

A historian has composed a poem to commemorate this event:

Gone was the strength that could uproot mountains,
the dream of hegemony destroyed;
Laying aside his sword, he merely sang that his steed would run no more.
As bright moonlight flooded the encampment beneath the liquescent sky;
How could he bear to turn back his head and bid Yü-chi farewell?¹⁷

Now the King of Han, Liu Pang, was originally no more than a neighborhood head in Ssu-shui. Yet, with his three-foot sword in hand, he slew the white snake¹⁸ and rose in righteous revolt in the mountainous area between the districts of Mang and Tang. Three years later he destroyed the Ch'in dynasty, and in the fifth year of his reign destroyed the Ch'u, thereby winning the empire for himself and establishing the Han dynasty.¹⁹ But he became infatuated with a woman whose maiden name was Ch'i.

Lady Ch'i gave birth to a son whose title was Prince Ju-i of Chao.²⁰ Because Empress Lü²¹ was jealous of her and wished her no good, Lady Ch'i was extremely uneasy. One day when Emperor Kao-tsu²² was ill and lay with his head in her lap, Lady Ch'i began to weep, saying, "After you have fulfilled your ten thousand years, on whom shall my son and I be able to rely?"

"That shouldn't be a problem," the emperor said. "When I hold court tomorrow I'll depose the heir apparent and set up your son in his stead. How would that be?"

Lady Ch'i dried her tears and thanked him for his favor.

When Empress Lü heard about this she summoned her husband's chief adviser, Chang Liang,²³ for a secret consultation. Chang Liang recommended that the Four Graybeards of Mount Shang be induced to come out of retirement and lend their support to the heir apparent.

One day the Four Graybeards appeared in court with the heir apparent. When Emperor Kao-tsu saw these four men with their snow-white hair and beards and imposing caps and gowns, he asked them who they were. They identified themselves as Master Tung-yüan, Ch'i-li Chi, Master Hsia-huang, and Master Lu-li. Greatly astonished, the emperor asked, "Why did you not choose to come when We offered you employment in the past, only to appear today in the company of our son?"

"The heir apparent is destined to be the preserver of what Your Majesty has established," the Four Graybeards replied.

Upon hearing this Emperor Kao-tsu felt dejected and upset. As the Four Graybeards were on their way out of the palace he summoned Lady Ch'i into his presence, pointed them out to her, and said, "I would have liked to replace the heir apparent, but these four men have lent him their support. Now that his wings are full-grown his position will prove difficult to shake."

Lady Ch'i wept inconsolably and the emperor extemporized a song to explain the situation:

The great swan soars aloft,
A thousand li in one flight.
Once his pinions are complete,
He can range the Four Seas.
He can range the Four Seas,
So what can we do?
Of what avail are stringed arrows,
Against a target that lies beyond their reach?²⁴

The emperor finished his song and, in the end, did not make the Prince of Chao his heir apparent.

After the death of Emperor Kao-tsu, to rid herself of her apprehensions, Empress Lü had Prince Ju-i of Chao put to death with poisoned wine and so mutilated Lady Ch'i as to turn her into a "human pig."²⁵

Poets have remarked, on reaching this point in their evaluations of these two rulers, that Liu Pang and Hsiang Yü were certainly heroes of their day and yet did not escape the fate of suffering their ambitions to be blunted by these two women.

Although the position of wife is superior to that of concubine, the calamity that befell Lady Ch'i was even crueler than that which befell Yü-chi. Thus it is that the way of a wife or concubine who wishes to serve her husband faithfully and yet keep her head and neck intact within her own windows is hard. With regard to these two rulers, is it not true that: They had only to meet with Yü-chi and Lady Ch'i,

For all their valor to come to naught?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The favorites of Liu Pang and Hsiang Yü are much to be pitied;

These heroes proved powerless to protect their beauties.
Yet even the site of Lady Ch'i's burial remains unknown;
She was less fortunate than Yü-chi, who has a tomb.²⁶

Now why do you suppose your narrator is so preoccupied with explicating the two words passion and beauty?²⁷ It is because "Gentlemen who presume on their talents are lacking in virtue, and women who flaunt their beauty are dissolute. If only they were able to maintain the fullness of their gifts while taking care to avoid the overflow of excess, they could be upright men and virtuous women."²⁸ What need would they have then to fear the calamity of unnatural death?

This has always been so, in ancient as in modern times;

It is as true for the exalted as for the humble.

Now this book is an instance of a beautiful woman who is embodied in a tiger and engenders a tale of the passions. In it a licentious woman commits adultery with a decadent man-about-town: Every evening devoted to the pursuit of pleasure;

Every morning an occasion for deluded dalliance.

But in the end she does not escape the fate of:

A corpse prostrate beneath the blade,

A bloodstained carcass in the Yellow Springs;²⁹

Never again to don silk or satin,

No longer able to apply rouge or powder.

If we pause to reflect on these events, from whence do they arise?³⁰ And moreover, what does the death of such a woman matter anyway?

He who coveted her sent to perdition his imposing six-foot body;

He who loved her squandered wealth enough to splash against the sky.³¹

The prefecture of Tung-p'ing was dumbfounded;

The district of Ch'ing-ho was greatly disturbed.

If, in fact, you don't know to whose family this woman belonged, whose wife she was, by whom she was subsequently usurped, or at whose hands she died, truly: The telling of this tale is enough to knock the peak of Mount Hua askew;

Its revelation is sufficient to make the Yellow River flow backward.³²

.

The story goes that during the years of the Cheng-ho reign period³³ of Emperor Hui-tsung³⁴ of the Sung dynasty,³⁵ the emperor bestowed his trust and favor upon the four wicked ministers, Kao Ch'iu,³⁶ Yang Chien,³⁷ T'ung Kuan,³⁸ and Ts'ai Ching,³⁹ with the result that the empire was thrown into great disorder. The people were unable to pursue their vocations and the populace was in dire straits. On all sides bandits arose in swarms and baleful stars descended to earth to be incarnated in human form.⁴⁰ The glittering facade presented by the empire of the Great Sung dynasty was disrupted, and in four different places great bandit chieftains arose.

Who were these four great bandit chieftains?

In Shantung there was Sung Chiang,⁴¹

In Huai-hsi there was Wang Ch'ing.

In Hopei there was T'ien Hu.⁴²

In Chiang-nan there was Fang La.⁴³

All of them:

Disrupted subprefectures and pillaged districts,

Setting fires and killing people;

Assuming royal titles for themselves.

Among them Sung Chiang alone:

Carried out the Way on Heaven's behalf,⁴⁴ and Devoted himself to the righting of injustice; endeavoring to slay all the:

Venial officials, corrupt functionaries,

Evil magnates, and delinquent commoners in the empire.

At that time, in Yang-ku district of Shantung Province, there was a man named Wu Chih who was the eldest sibling in his generation of the family. He had a younger brother, by the same mother, whose name was Wu Sung. This Wu Sung was: More than six feet in stature, and Broad-shouldered as they come.

From his youth he had cultivated his strength and become expert with the spear and quarterstaff. His brother, Wu the Elder, who was not quite three feet tall, was of a meek disposition and muddleheaded to a ridiculous degree. He was disposed to mind his own business and did not pick quarrels with anyone. Because of the hardship created by a famine in the locality, he decided that he would have to let his younger brother fend for himself, sold the house they had inherited from their forebears, and moved to the district town of Ch'ing-ho.

Now at the time that this occurred Wu Sung, because he had beaten up the military affairs commissioner, T'ung Kuan, in a drunken brawl, found himself: Completely on his own.

He had been forced to become a fugitive and had sought refuge on the manor of the Little Whirlwind, Ch'ai Chin, which was located in the military prefecture of Heng-hai, in Ts'ang-chou. This Ch'ai Chin enjoyed patronizing the heroes and stout fellows of the world and was so: Chivalrous by nature and open-handed with his wealth, that people called him Little Lord Meng-ch'ang.⁴⁵ In fact, Master Ch'ai was a direct descendant of Ch'ai Jung, Emperor Shih-tsung of the Later Chou dynasty.⁴⁶

When Ch'ai Chin saw what a fine fellow Wu Sung was, he offered him a place to stay on his manor. But who could have anticipated that Wu Sung would come down with a case of malaria that required him to recuperate on the premises for more than a year? Upon his recovery he bethought himself of his brother, Wu the Elder, bade farewell to his host, and set out for home.

After spending several days on the road, Wu Sung arrived on the border between Yang-ku and Ch'ing-ho districts. At that time there was a ridge of hills on the border of Shantung Province called Ching-yang Ridge, and in these hills there was a bulging-eyed, white-browed tiger who had eaten so many people that travelers along that route were few. The authorities had ordered the licensed hunters of the locality, on pain of being beaten, to capture this tiger by a fixed deadline. There were public notices posted on either side of the road warning traveling merchants to form into bands and cross over only between the hours of 9:00 A.M. and 3:00 P.M., and prohibiting them from crossing the ridge at any other time.

When Wu Sung heard about this he laughed out loud and stopped at an inn by the side of the road for a few bowls of wine to bolster his courage. Then, with his quarterstaff at the ready, he staggered off, proceeding straight up the ridge in large strides. Before he had gone so far as half a li he saw another public notice, stamped with an official seal, posted on the gate of a temple to the tutelary god of the mountain. When Wu Sung looked at this notice he saw that the message read as follows: There is a tiger on Ching-yang Ridge that has recently attacked many people. At present the responsible persons of the relevant subdistricts and the licensed hunters of the locality have been ordered to capture it by a fixed deadline, and the authorities have offered a reward of thirty taels of silver for its capture. If there should be any traveling merchants who wish to use this route, they should first form into bands and cross the ridge only between the hours of 9:00 A.M. and 3:00 P.M. Passage over the ridge is prohibited at all other times, and unaccompanied travelers are forbidden to cross even during daylight hours. Be it known that anyone who disregards these instructions proceeds at his own risk. With a loud voice Wu Sung proclaimed, "What the hell is there to be afraid of anyway! I'll just go on up the ridge and see what kind of a tiger this is."

Wu Sung tucked his quarterstaff under his arm and proceeded to stride up the ridge. He looked back and saw that the sun was slowly setting behind the mountains. It was the tenth month when the days were short and the nights long, so it got dark early.

Wu Sung continued on his way for a while when he began to feel the effects of the wine. Looking into the distance he saw a tangled clump of trees. When he had made his way, at a fast clip, through this clump of trees he came upon a big, shiny, black rock, the shape of a reclining water buffalo. Propping his quarterstaff against the side of the rock, he laid himself down on top of it and prepared to take a nap.

Just at this juncture, out of the blue sky, a strong gust of wind suddenly arose. What was this wind like? Behold: Devoid of shape and form, it insinuates itself into men's breasts;

Throughout the four seasons, it has the power to blow things into life.
Touching the ground, it swirls away
the yellow leaves;
Entering the mountains, it pushes out the white clouds.⁴⁷

It so happens that:

Clouds arise in response to dragons;

Winds arise in response to tigers.⁴⁸

As this gust of wind passed by, the yellow leaves from the clump of tangled trees fell to the ground with a rustling noise and, with a sudden roar, out jumped a ferocious striped tiger, as big as a water buffalo, with bulging eyes and a white forehead.

When Wu Sung saw this he cried out, "Ai-ya!" rolled off the black rock, grabbed his quarterstaff, and made haste to put the rock between himself and his assailant. The tiger was both hungry and thirsty. Pawing the ground with its front claws, it stretched itself and gave first one lash and then another with its tail. Then it gave a roar, like a dry clap of thunder out of the blue, which made all the hills and ridges reverberate. Wu Sung's consternation had long since turned the wine in his stomach into cold sweat.

The telling is slow;

What happened was quick.

When Wu Sung saw the tiger pounce at him he dodged to one side so that the tiger overshot him.

It so happens that this ferocious tiger had a short neck so that it was not easy for it to turn its head and look behind itself. Planting its front paws on the ground, it stretched its trunk and made a swipe at Wu Sung with its hindquarters. Wu Sung managed to jump to one side. When the tiger saw that it had failed to sideswipe Wu Sung it gave a roar that shook the ridge. But Wu Sung once again evaded it by dodging to one side.

It so happens that when tigers attack people, if they fail to overcome them with a pounce, a sideswipe, or a lash of the tail, their powers are half exhausted. When Wu Sung saw that the tiger's strength was failing, he turned around, swung his quarterstaff aloft with both hands, and brought it down with all the strength at his command. But the only thing he heard was a loud report and a thrashing noise as the branch of a tree, with all its leaves, came tumbling down in front of him.

It so happens that he had not made contact with the tiger at all, but had hit the branch of a tree so hard that his quarterstaff had broken in two, and only half of it was left in his hand. Wu Sung was more than a little disconcerted by this. The tiger gave vent to its wrath with a roar and, lashing its tail back and forth in a show of might, pounced at Wu Sung once again. With one leap Wu Sung leapt back some ten paces. The tiger's pounce fell short and its forepaws came to rest right in front of him. Wu Sung threw what was left of his quarterstaff to one side and took advantage of the inertia of the tiger's leap by stepping forward, grabbing hold of the skin on the crown of the tiger's head with both hands, and pressing its head down with all his might.

The tiger tried to put up a fight but its strength was already failing. Wu Sung held on for all he was worth, not letting up to the slightest degree. Meanwhile, with his foot, he kicked viciously at the tiger's face and eyes. The tiger roared with pain and pawed so frantically that it heaped up two piles of brown dirt and dug a pit for itself. Wu Sung pressed its head down into the pit and, freeing his right hand, pummeled it with his fist, using all the strength at his command. In no time at all he had beaten the tiger to death. It lay on the ground like an embroidered bag, no longer able to move.

There is an ancient-style poem describing Wu Sung's fight with the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge that goes:

On top of Ching-yang Ridge the wind blows wildly;
For ten thousand li dark clouds obscure the sun's light.
Flaming above the length of the river, the crimson sun is red;
Spreading everywhere over the ground, the grass has all turned brown.
Catching the eye, a sunset glow hangs over the woods;
Assailing the inhabitants, a cold fog fills the firmament.
Suddenly the sound of a thunderclap is heard;
From the side of the hill out flies
the king of the beasts.
With head held high, flaunting its might,
it bares its teeth and claws;
The deer in the valley all flee out of its way.
The foxes and rabbits in the hills
keep out of sight;
The deer and gibbons by the stream are startled into panic.
If Pien Chuang⁴⁹ had seen it, his souls would have fled;
If Li Ts'un-hsiao⁵⁰ had met it, he would have lost heart.
The strongman of Ch'ing-ho while still in his cups,
Suddenly encounters it on the top of the ridge.
Searching high and low for its prey
the tiger is famished;
Chancing on Wu Sung it pounces at him with ferocity.
The tiger's pounce at the man is like the fall of a mountain;
The man's response to the tiger is like the collapse of a cliff.
The fall of his arm is like that of a cannonball;
Its claws and teeth gouge a pit out of the earth.
The blows of his fist and foot
descend like rain;

His two hands are splattered with fresh blood.
The stench of raw flesh suffuses
the forest;
Tufts of fur and whiskers lie scattered over the mountain.
Even close-up, its thousand-stone might appears intact;
Though, seen from afar, its eightfold majesty is diminished.
Its body lies in the underbrush, the pattern of its stripes faded;
Tightly closed, its two eyes will glitter
no more.⁵¹

In less time than it would take to eat a meal, Wu Sung had so beaten this ferocious tiger with his fists and his feet that it was no longer able to move. Panting hard, he let go of the tiger and went looking for his broken quarterstaff, which had fallen by the side of a pine tree. He was afraid the tiger might not really be dead, so he hit it another ten blows or so with his stick. But the tiger had already breathed its last.

Wu Sung thought to himself, "I might as well take advantage of this stroke of luck and drag the tiger down to the foot of the ridge." But when he approached the pool of blood in which it was lying and tugged at the tiger with both hands, he couldn't get it to budge. It so happens that he had exhausted his strength, with the result that his hands and feet had turned to jelly.

Just as Wu Sung was sitting on the rock, resting, he heard a rustling noise in the underbrush on the slope of the hill.

From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he was alarmed.

"It's already dark! If another tiger were to jump out at me, how could I hope to overcome it?"

Before he had finished speaking, lo and behold, two tigers emerged into view on the slope below. Wu Sung cried out in consternation, "Ai-ya! This time I'm done for!"

Before his very eyes, these two tigers stood up in front of him. When Wu Sung gave a closer look he saw that they were two men, clothed in tiger skins, who were wearing tiger skulls on their heads and carrying five-pronged spears in their hands. No sooner did they come up to Wu Sung than they bowed their heads in homage, saying, "Strongman, are you a human or a god? You must have eaten the heart of an alligator, the liver of a leopard, and the leg of a lion, or be made out of gall! Otherwise, all by yourself, in the waning light, and without a weapon, how could you possibly have slain this man-eating tiger? We've been on the lookout here for a long time. Tell us the truth, strongman, what is your name?"

Wu Sung replied:

"I neither alter my given name when abroad,

Nor change my surname when at home.

I am a man of Yang-ku district, Wu Sung by name, and the second sibling in my generation of the family." Then he went on to ask, "And who are the two of you?"

"There is no reason for us to deceive you," the two men replied. "We are licensed hunters from this locality. Ever since this tiger appeared on the ridge it has come out every night and attacked lots of people. We hunters alone have lost seven or eight of our number, and there is no telling how many travelers have suffered the same fate. His honor, the district magistrate, ordered us licensed hunters to capture it by a fixed deadline. He offered a reward of thirty taels of silver if it were captured beforehand, but promised us a beating if the deadline expired. Unfortunately, the damned creature is so powerful that no one has dared to go near it. We have been lying in wait for it here, along with several tens of corvée laborers from the subdistrict, and have set up spring-bows with poisoned arrows at a safe distance. Then we saw you come striding up the ridge, as cool as you please, take on the tiger and dispatch it, in no time at all, with three blows of your fist and two kicks of your foot. How could you be so strong! We will truss up the tiger for you and then invite you to come down to the foot of the ridge with us, to the district yamen, so you can meet the magistrate and claim the reward."

At this point the corvée laborers from the subdistrict and the licensed hunters, some seventy or eighty men in all, set off, bearing the dead tiger at the head of the procession and carrying Wu Sung in an open litter behind. They headed straight for the compound of a prominent householder in the neighborhood. This householder and the village head came out to meet them. The tiger was carried into the main room of the house where all the community elders came to see it. They asked Wu Sung his name and he related the story of his conquest of the tiger. Everyone said, "He really is a hero and a stout fellow!" The hunters provided game for a feast and toasted Wu Sung until he was quite drunk. Then a guest room was prepared for him and he retired for the night.

Early the following morning the community elders went to the district yamen to report what had happened. At the same time a litter was prepared for the tiger and a gaily decorated sedan chair for Wu Sung in which he was escorted to the yamen in appropriate state. The magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district sent runners out to usher him into the courtroom. The people of the whole district, on hearing that a strongman had killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge and was being given a formal welcome, all came out to see the show. The entire district was in an uproar.

When Wu Sung arrived at the courtroom he got out of the sedan chair and the tiger was carried in and laid down in front of him. The district magistrate looked Wu Sung over and thought to himself, "If he weren't such a hefty fellow, how could he have overcome this fierce tiger?" Then he summoned him to come forward and Wu Sung, after having paid his respects, related the story of his conquest of the tiger from start to finish. The functionaries standing to either side were stupefied with amazement.

The magistrate offered him several cups of wine right in the courtroom and then presented him with the reward of thirty taels of silver that had been contributed by the prominent families of the district.

Wu Sung said respectfully, "It is only owing to Your Honor's benevolent deeds that I have had the accidental good fortune to kill this tiger. It is due to no merit of mine. How could I accept this reward? These thirty taels of silver ought to go to the licensed hunters who have suffered so much at your hands on account of this beast. Why not divide up the reward among them as a demonstration of Your Honor's graciousness and of my own public spirit?"

"If that's what you want," the magistrate said, "you may do as you wish." There and then Wu Sung proceeded to distribute the thirty taels of reward money to the licensed hunters, who went their way.

When the magistrate saw that Wu Sung was a man of virtue and integrity, and a stout fellow to boot, it occurred to him that he might be able to do something for him, so he said, "Even though you come from the district of Yang-ku rather than Ch'ing-ho, they are right next to each other. If I were to appoint you to the post of police captain here in Ch'ing-ho, with the responsibility for maintaining law and order throughout the jurisdiction, what would you think?"

Wu Sung knelt down and thanked him, saying, "If Your Honor should deign to raise me up in this way, I would be grateful to you for the rest of my life."

The magistrate ordered his clerk to take care of the necessary paperwork immediately, and he appointed Wu Sung to the post of police captain that very day. All the village heads and prominent householders of the district came to offer him their congratulations, and the celebrations attendant upon his appointment lasted for three days.

Wu Sung had intended to look up his elder brother in Yang-ku district and could hardly have foreseen that he would end up being appointed a captain in Ch'ing-ho. He was so delighted he could scarcely contain himself. The news of this event spread throughout the two districts that comprised the prefecture of Tung-p'ing so that the name of Wu Sung was known to everyone. There is a poem that testifies to this: The martial prowess of the strongman hero was highly esteemed;

Risking his life he marched straight up
Ching-yang Ridge.
Even though drunk he slew the tiger
on the mountain;
From then on his renown spread to the four quarters.⁵²

Let us put aside the story of Wu Sung for a moment and return to that of Wu the Elder. After parting company with his younger brother because of the hardship created by a famine in the locality, he had moved to Ch'ing-ho district where he rented a house on Amethyst Street. When people observed his meek disposition and unsightly appearance they gave him the nickname Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin, in vulgar allusion to his coarse exterior and cramped features. There were many who did not scruple to take advantage of his weakness and naïveté, but Wu the Elder did not respond with anger, merely endeavoring to keep out of their way.

Gentle reader take note:

In this world the heart of man alone remains vile.⁵³

It despises the weak,
While fearing the wicked.
If it's too hard it's brittle;
If it's too soft it's no use.⁵⁴

A poet of yore has left us some words of admonition that express this very well:

To the tune "Moon on the West River"

Flexibility is the root of success;
Adamancy is the womb of misfortune.
Not to vie or contend is to show true worth;
If I lose out now and then, what's the harm?

History is but a succession of spring dreams,
Though the red dust spawns a profusion of talents.
There is no need to scheme or contrive;
It is those who abide by their lot who survive.⁵⁵

To resume our story, Wu the Elder made his living by shouldering his carrying pole and peddling steamed wheat cakes on the street all day. Unfortunately, his wife died, leaving behind a daughter, named Ying-erh, who was just eleven years old. Father and daughter lived together as best they could, but before half a year had gone by their resources were exhausted and they had to move into a storefront, on Main Street, belonging to a well-to-do merchant named Chang, where Wu the Elder continued to ply his trade.

The servants in Mr. Chang's household, seeing that Wu the Elder was an honest man, looked out for his interests and often patronized his steamed wheat cakes and sat around in his shop when they had nothing better to do. Wu the Elder was always so obliging that everyone was partial to him and spoke up vigorously on his behalf in the presence of their employer whenever the opportunity arose. As a result of these good offices Mr. Chang even went so far as to forgive him his rent.

Now this Mr. Chang had the equivalent of ten thousand strings of cash in capital and owned a hundred parcels of real estate. He was more than sixty years old and did not have so much as a foot or an inch's worth of progeny of either sex. His wife, whose maiden name was Yü, ruled the roost with an iron hand so that there was not so much as an attractive servant girl on the premises.

One day Mr. Chang struck himself ostentatiously on the breast and gave vent to a sigh.

"Your property and wealth are more than sufficient," his wife remarked. "Why on earth should you disturb your leisure with such a sigh?"

"Old as I am," her husband replied, "I still don't have any children. Even though I may be rich, what good does it do me?"

"If that's what's bothering you," said Mrs. Chang, "I'll have a go-between buy two servant girls for you. Once they've been taught to play and sing they ought to be able to look after you."

Mr. Chang was delighted by this and thanked his wife accordingly.⁵⁶

Some time later Mrs. Chang actually engaged a go-between to buy two servant girls, one of whom was called P'an Chin-lien and the other Pai Yü-lien.

This P'an Chin-lien was the daughter of Tailor P'an whose shop was located outside the South Gate. She was the sixth sibling in her generation of the family. Because she had always been good-looking and possessed a pair of very small bound feet she was called Chin-lien, or Golden Lotus.⁵⁷ After the death of her father her mother was unable to make ends meet, and so, when Chin-lien was only eight years old, she sold her into the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang,⁵⁸ where she was taught to play musical instruments and to sing. She was adept at: Painting her brows and making up her eyes,

Applying powder and putting on rouge,
Combing her hair into a chignon,
Wearing form-fitting gowns,
Putting on airs,
And making a spectacle of herself.⁵⁹

Moreover, she was quick and clever by nature. Before she was fourteen she could draw phoenix designs and execute them in embroidery and perform on woodwind and string instruments, her favorite among which was the p'i-p'a, or balloon guitar.

Sometime later Imperial Commissioner Wang died and Chin-lien's mother succeeded in extricating her from the Wang household only to resell her to the Changs for thirty taels of silver. She and Pai Yü-lien entered the household together where they continued to improve their skills as musicians and singers. Chin-lien concentrated on the p'i-p'a and Yü-lien on the cheng, or psaltery. Yü-lien was also just fifteen and was the daughter of a family registered as professional musicians. Because she had always had a fair complexion she was called Yü-lien, or Jade Lotus.

The two of them shared the same bedroom. Initially the mistress of the household, Mrs. Chang, treated them very well, not requiring them to work in the kitchen or do any housework, and giving them presents of gold and silver jewelry with which to adorn themselves. Later Pai Yü-lien died unexpectedly, leaving Chin-lien all by herself.

She was now seventeen years old and had developed into a slender and curvaceous beauty with:

Cheeks like peach blossoms, and Eyebrows like the crescent moon.

Mr. Chang had wished to take advantage of her for some time, but fear of his wife's temper had prevented him from making a move. One day when the mistress of the household was out of the way on a visit to a neighbor, Mr. Chang surreptitiously invited Chin-lien into his room and had his way with her. Truly: The beautiful unblemished jade will one day be destroyed.

How will the pearl ever regain its former perfection?

Once Mr. Chang had had his way with Chin-lien, before he knew it he found himself afflicted with four or five ailments. Truly, what five ailments were these?

No. 1: his loins began to ache.

No. 2: his eyes began to tear.

No. 3: his ears began to grow deaf.

No. 4: his nose began to run.⁶⁰

No. 5: his urine began to drip.

And there was still another ailment that doesn't even bear mentioning.

In broad daylight he dozed off, and

At night he couldn't stop sneezing.

When the mistress of the household got wind of what was going on behind her back she quarreled for several days with her husband and gave Chin-lien a terrible beating. Mr. Chang realized that he wouldn't be able to keep her any longer but determined, in spite of his wife, to provide her with a dowry and marry her off to an appropriate person. The servants in the household reminded him what an honorable man Wu the Elder was and pointed out that he was not only currently unmarried but also resided on the premises, which would make him a convenient choice. Mr. Chang had hopes of being able to continue his liaison with the young woman, and so, without demanding a candareen from Wu the Elder, he made him a present of her as his wife.

After Chin-lien and Wu the Elder were married, Mr. Chang made it a point to look after him. If he were short of capital for his trade in steamed wheat cakes, he would slip him five taels of silver to make up the deficiency. While Wu the Elder was out peddling his wares, Mr. Chang would wait until there was no one about and then steal into their room for an assignation with Chin-lien. Although Wu the Elder occasionally happened upon them in compromising circumstances, he did not dare to make a fuss about it.

Mornings and evenings succeeded one another, and this situation had prevailed for some time when Mr. Chang suddenly came down with a venereal chill and: Alas and alack, died. When the mistress of the household discovered what had been going on, without more ado she angrily ordered the servants to drive Chin-lien and Wu the Elder out of the house, so they no longer had a place to stay.

Scarcely aware of the implications of what had happened, Wu the Elder once more found a house on the west side of Amethyst Street, belonging to a distaff relative of the imperial family named Wang, in which he rented an inner and an outer room and continued to peddle his steamed wheat cakes as before.

It so happens that ever since Chin-lien had married Wu the Elder and had a chance to observe his guileless disposition and unsightly appearance she had taken a violent dislike to him and quarreled with him all the time. She resented what Mr. Chang had done to her and said to herself, "It's not as though there weren't another man in the whole wide world. Why did he have to marry me off to the likes of this?"

If you tug him he won't move;

If you hit him he pulls back.

The only thing he can be counted on to do every day is to guzzle his wine. When you get right down to it, you could jab him with an awl without arousing him. What did I ever do in a previous incarnation to deserve such a fate? It's really intolerable."

Whenever there was no one around she used to play a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this: How did it all begin?

I was mismatched to him.
I thought he was a real man.
Not that I want to boast,
But how can a crow be a match for a phoenix?
I'm like buried gold,
He's only bogus brass;
How can his luster compare with mine?
He's just a hunk of rough stone;
What right's he got to my mutton-fat jade body?
I'm like a magic mushroom growing out of the muck.⁶¹
But what can I do?
No matter what he does,
I'll never be satisfied.
Just listen to me:
How can a gold brick be laid
On such a mud foundation?

Gentle reader take note: Most of the women of this world, if they are blessed with good looks and natural intelligence, will turn out all right if they are only married to a decent man. But as for the likes of Wu the Elder, even the best woman in the world might find it hard to avoid repining. It has always been true that: Women of beauty and men of talent are seldom matched;

Just when you're in the market for gold you can never find a seller.

Every day Wu the Elder shouldered his load of steamed wheat cakes and went out to peddle his wares, not returning until evening. His wife had little to occupy her other than the preparation of three daily meals. After eating she would make herself up and stand behind the bamboo blind that hung over the front door. From that vantage point she was in the habit of: Provoking attention with her brows, and Sending messages with her eyes.

Now this fact was not lost on a number of dissolute young scamps in the neighborhood who were seldom up to any good. When they saw the way that Wu the Elder's wife was: Dolling herself up so slickly,

Engaging the breeze and disturbing the foliage, they began to make riddling allusions to her in public and even to engage her in badinage with remarks like: "How did a piece of fine mutton

End up in the mouth of such a dog?"⁶²

Everyone knew that Wu the Elder was a man of meek disposition but not many were aware that he had such a mismatched wife in his house, who was both romantically inclined and clever, in fact, good at everything, but particularly adultery. There is a poem that testifies to this: Chin-lien's beauty is certainly worthy of remark;

When she laughs her eyebrows rise up like spring peaks.
If she ever encounters a dashing
young gentleman,
She will make an assignation with him without more ado.⁶³

Every day, after she had seen Wu the Elder out the door, this woman would stand inside the blind, cracking melon seeds with her teeth, and revealing her tiny golden lotuses for all to see. Such conduct attracted the aforesaid young gentlemen, who gathered on her doorstep day after day, strumming guitars and ukuleles,⁶⁴ and giving voice to every indecent suggestion their fertile imaginations could invent. As a result, Wu the Elder came to feel that he could no longer continue to live on that part of Amethyst Street and wanted to move somewhere else.

When he raised this issue with his wife she said, "You lousy muddleheaded ignoramus! If you're content to rent such inadequate lodgings in somebody else's house, it's scarcely surprising that petty-minded people should abuse you. Why don't you get together a few taels of silver, look about for an appropriate place, and take out a mortgage on a house with at least a couple of rooms? If we lived in more presentable quarters nobody would take advantage of us. You're the man of the house, but you're always so much at a loss that I end up taking the brunt of things on your account."

"And where would I get the money for a mortgage?" Wu the Elder asked.

"Phooey!" his wife exclaimed. "What a nincompoop! You can sell my hairpins and combs to make up the sum. What's so difficult about that? They can always be replaced later on when we're better off than we are now."

Wu the Elder allowed himself to be persuaded by his wife. When he had scraped together something over ten taels of silver he took out a mortgage on a two-story house near the gate of the district yamen. It was quite cozy, with three rooms on the ground floor, an upstairs room in the front, and two little courtyards. After moving to this new address, on that part of Amethyst Street that ran along the west side of the district yamen,⁶⁵ Wu the Elder continued to peddle steamed wheat cakes as before.

One day as he was going along the street he heard the din of gongs and drums and noticed several contingents of soldiers with tasseled spears escorting a man in a gaily decorated sedan chair. Who should this turn out to be but his own younger brother, Wu Sung. Because Wu Sung had killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge the district magistrate had elevated him to the position of police captain, and the community elders were participating in the celebration of this event by accompanying him on the way to his lodgings.

When Wu the Elder caught sight of him he grasped hold of him with his hand and called out, "Younger Brother, now that you're a captain, haven't you any time for me?" Wu Sung turned around and saw that it was his elder brother.

Both of them were greatly delighted by their reunion, and Wu the Elder invited Wu Sung to his home where he ushered him to a seat in the upstairs room and called Chin-lien out to meet him. Then he said, "The man who killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge the other day is your brother-in-law. Now he has just been appointed to the post of police captain. He and I are brothers from the same womb."

The woman:

Stepping forward and saluting him with folded hands, said, "Many felicitations, Brother-in-law."

Wu Sung returned her salutation by kneeling down to kowtow, but the woman attempted to help him to his feet, saying, "Please rise, Brother-in-law. You'll be the death of me yet."

P'an Chin-lien Disdains Her Mate and Plays the Coquette

"Accept my salutation, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung. The two of them dickered politely for a while and ended up kowtowing to each other before getting to their feet.

After a brief interval Wu the Elder's daughter served tea to the two of them. Wu Sung saw that the woman was extremely seductive and merely lowered his head. Before long Wu the Elder took it upon himself to provide food and drink for Wu Sung's entertainment and, leaving the two of them to their conversation, went downstairs to buy the necessary provisions. The woman was left upstairs all by herself to keep Wu Sung company.

Chin-lien looked at Wu Sung and saw that:

His physique was awe-inspiring, and

His appearance was imposing.
His body seemed to be possessed of boundless strength. Were this not so, how could he have overcome the tiger?
“They are brothers, born of the same mother,” she thought to herself, “and yet one of them is so big and strong. If I’d been married to him I might have gotten by somehow or other. But look at that Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin of mine! He’s only: Three parts human, and

Seven parts ghou!.⁶⁶
I must have been so plague-stricken in a previous incarnation that I’m still suffering the ill effects to this day. Wu Sung certainly looks manly enough to me. Why don’t I see if I can get him to move in with us here? Who knows? This may turn out to be the very love-match I’ve been waiting for.”

Making herself all smiles, the woman asked, “Brother-in-law, where are you staying right now, and who’s looking after your meals?”

“I’ve just been appointed to the post of captain,” Wu Sung said, “so I have to be on duty every day to await the orders of my superiors. For the sake of convenience I’m making do with lodgings right in front of the district yamen. Two local recruits are detailed every day to act as my orderlies and take care of my meals.”

“Brother-in-law,” the woman said, “why don’t you move in with us here? It would save you the trouble of having to put up with the services of those orderlies from the yamen who probably aren’t any too sanitary where food is concerned. It’s more convenient if we all live under the same roof. Then, if you happen to want some soup or something, I can make it for you myself, and you’ll know it’s safe to eat.”

“Thank you very much, Sister-in-law,” said Wu Sung.

“You must have a wife somewhere,” the woman went on. “Why don’t you bring her along and introduce her to us?”

“I’ve never gotten married,” said Wu Sung.

“How old are you, Brother-in-law?” the woman asked.

“I’m twenty-seven,” said Wu Sung.

“It so happens that you’re just three years older than I am,” the woman said. “Where have you come from on this occasion, Brother-in-law?”

“I’ve been living in Ts’ang-chou for more than a year,” Wu Sung said. “I thought my brother was still living in our old house and had no idea he had moved here.”

“It’s a long story,”
the woman said. “Ever since I married your elder brother, people have taken advantage of his good-heartedness. That’s why we had to move here. If he were only a real man like you, Brother-in-law, who would dare to say him nay?”

“My brother has always minded his own business,” said Wu Sung. “He doesn’t allow himself to lose his temper the way I do.”

“You’ve got it all backward,” laughed the woman. “As the saying goes:

If you aren’t tough enough,

You will never be secure.”⁶⁷

I’ve always been quick-tempered myself, and could never abide the sort of person who:

If you hit him three times won’t turn around; but

If you hit him a fourth time goes into a spin.”⁶⁸

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Brother and sister-in-law happen to meet like floating duckweed;
With a seductive air she insists on flaunting her beauty.
In her heart she only wants him to make love to her;
With deceptive words she sets out to inveigle Wu Sung.⁶⁹

It so happens that this woman was the sort who is forever protesting her own virtue.

Wu Sung said, “My brother is not a troublemaker, so you have nothing to worry about, Sister-in-law.”

Before the two of them had finished speaking, Wu the Elder returned from his shopping expedition, laden with meat and vegetables, fruit and pastries. Putting these down in the kitchen he started up the stairs and called out, “My dear, why don’t you come downstairs and fix these things for us?”

“Just see what an ignoramus he is!” the woman responded. “Here you are, Brother-in-law, with no one to entertain you, and he wants me to go downstairs and abandon you.”

“Please don’t inconvenience yourself on my account, Sister-in-law,” said Wu Sung.

“Why don’t you go next door and ask Godmother Wang if she could help out?” the woman demanded. “Can’t you ever figure things out for yourself?” Wu the Elder did as he was bidden and Dame Wang prepared everything very nicely, bringing it upstairs and setting it out on the table for them. The fare consisted of fish and meat, fruit and vegetables, sweetmeats, and the like. As soon as the wine was heated, Wu the Elder asked his wife to play the role of host, with Wu Sung sitting across from her, while he took a seat to one side. When the three of them had sat down at their places Wu the Elder took up the wine and poured a little for each of them.

Picking up her winecup the woman said, “Brother-in-law, don’t take it amiss, but we’ve nothing to offer you. Please try a cup of this watery wine.”

“Thank you, Sister-in-law,” said Wu Sung. “Please don’t talk that way any more.”

Wu the Elder was so preoccupied with running up and down stairs to heat and pour the wine that he could hardly concern himself with what went on between them.

The woman gave Wu Sung:

Such a smile you could have plucked it off her face,⁷⁰
while her mouth was full of nothing but “Brother-in-law this and Brother-in-law that.” “Why don’t you help yourself to the meat, or some fruit?” she asked, and she picked out the best tidbits and put them on his plate with her own chopsticks.

Now Wu Sung was a man of straightforward temperament and took this to be no more than his sister-in-law’s cordiality. How could he have known that this woman had started her career as a serving maid and become adept at the art of playing up to others? He was quite unaware that in her heart she had designs on him. Wu the Elder, on the other hand, was too naïve to be any good at entertaining guests.

By the time the woman had downed a few cups of wine with Wu Sung she couldn’t take her eyes off him. Wu Sung was embarrassed by the way she looked at him and merely lowered his head without responding to her. After they had been drinking for a while the wine ran out and he got up to go. Wu the Elder said, “If you haven’t anything else to do, Brother, why not have another cup or two before you go?”

“I’ve troubled you enough,” said Wu Sung. “I’ll come and see you again, Brother and Sister-in-law.”

When they had seen him downstairs and out the door the woman said, “Brother-in-law, be sure you don’t forget to come and move in with us here. People will laugh at us if you don’t. After all, you’re blood brothers. It’s not as though you were anyone else. Besides, if you can stick up for us, you’ll actually be doing us a favor.”

“Since you’re so hospitable, Sister-in-law,” said Wu Sung, “I’ll get my things and move in this very evening.”

“Brother-in-law,” the woman said, “be sure you don’t forget. I’ll be waiting for you.” Truly: The natural beauty of the vista remains unseen;

In spring the peach blossoms bloom
all by themselves.⁷¹

There is a poem that testifies to this:

How reprehensible is Chin-lien whose schemes are deep;
She conceals her wanton intent though her desires are in a tumult.
Wu Sung is steadfast and true,
not easily tempted;
The shining integrity of his name is worth ten thousand pieces of gold.⁷²

That day the woman outdid herself in her efforts to please him.

To resume our story, Wu Sung returned to the inn in front of the district yamen where he had been staying, collected his luggage and bedroll, got his orderlies to carry them for him, and led the way to his brother’s house. When the woman saw him she was happier than she would have been if she had: Discovered a piece of gold or a precious stone.⁷³ Then she swept out a room and fixed it up nicely for him. Wu Sung sent the orderlies back to the yamen and slept that night at his brother’s house.

The next day he arose early and the woman also got up hastily and heated water for him so he could wash his face. Wu Sung washed, combed his hair, put on his turban, and headed out the door to make the morning roll call at the yamen.

“Brother-in-law,” the woman said, “after the roll call is over come back for something to eat as soon as you can. Don’t go anywhere else for your meals.”

Wu Sung assented and then went to the yamen to be in time for roll call. When he returned home after putting in a morning on duty he found that the woman had prepared a full-course meal. After the three of them had finished eating, the woman brought Wu Sung a cup of tea and served it to him with both hands.

“I’m really imposing on you, Sister-in-law,” said Wu Sung. “It makes me:

Too uncomfortable to sleep or eat in peace.⁷⁴

Tomorrow I’ll have the yamen send an orderly over to help out.”

“Brother-in-law,” the woman retorted, “how can you make so much of it? Our own flesh and blood! It’s not as though I were waiting on anyone else. It’s true we’ve got this little chit, Ying-erh, but when I see the way she: Picks up this and then picks up that,

Floundering about all over the place, there’s no way I can rely on her. And even if you arrange for an orderly, he won’t be any too sanitary where food is concerned. I really can’t abide people like that.”

“If that’s the way it is, Sister-in-law,” said Wu Sung, “I guess I’ll just have to impose on you.”

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Wu Sung’s demeanor is really awe-inspiring;
His sister-in-law’s wantonness can not be checked.
She inveigles him into coming to live
under the same roof;
In order to share the clouds and rain in a romantic affair.⁷⁵

To make a long story short, after moving into his brother's home Wu Sung took out some silver and gave it to Wu the Elder in order to buy pastries, tea, and fruit to entertain the neighbors on either side. The neighbors, on their part, clubbed together to return the treat, and Wu the Elder, in due course, reciprocated. But no more of this.

After several days had gone by, Wu Sung presented his sister-in-law with a bolt of variegated satin to make a dress for herself.

With an ingratiating smile the woman said, "Brother-in-law, this will never do. But since you've already given it to me, I can't very well refuse, can I? I guess I'll just have to accept." And she bowed to him, saying, "Many felicitations."

From this time on Wu Sung lived in his brother's home. Wu the Elder continued to shoulder his load and go out into the streets to sell his steamed wheat cakes as before. Wu Sung went to the yamen every day to report for duty and no matter whether he: Returned early or returned late, the woman would:

Cook some soup or cook a meal,
As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could make her happier.

This only had the effect of making Wu Sung feel more uncomfortable.

From time to time the woman would try to arouse him with a suggestive comment, but Wu Sung was an adamantly straightforward man and did not rise to the bait.

When there is a story to tell it is long;
When there is no story to tell it is short.

Before anyone knew it more than a month had gone by. It was now the eleventh month and a strong north wind began to blow, day after day. In every quarter what should appear but: Dense masses of dark clouds, and all of a sudden:

Fluttering and swirling,
A skyful of auspicious snow came flying down.

Behold:

To the tune "Immortal at the River"

For ten thousand li dark clouds are densely massed;

In midair the auspicious omen
ripples the blinds;

The petals of alabaster flowers dance before the eaves.
It was at just such a time,
on the Shan River,
That Wang Hui-chih's boat, was immersed. 76

In an instant the towers and terraces are weighted down;
Rivers and mountains are linked by an expanse of silver;

Flying salt and scattered powder fill the sky.

Such was the occasion when Lü Meng-cheng,
In his dilapidated kiln, bemoaned his penury.⁷⁷

The snow continued to fall that day until the first watch and made everything look like:

A world decorated with silver;
A universe carved out of jade.

The next day Wu Sung reported to the yamen in time for the morning roll call, as usual, and had not yet returned home at noon. Wu the Elder had long since allowed himself to be hustled out of the house by his wife to ply his trade. Now she asked Dame Wang, next door, to buy her some meat and wine, and then went into Wu Sung's room and lit a brazier of charcoal.

"Today I'll give his cinders a real stirring," she thought to herself. "Never fear, he's bound to catch fire."

Cold as it was, the woman stood inside the hanging blind at the door, all by herself, until she caught sight of Wu Sung: Trampling the scattered fragments of alabaster and jade, as he made his way homeward through the snow.

The woman raised the blind to let him in and said with a smile, "Brother-in-law, you must be cold."

"Thanks for your concern, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung.

He came in the door and took off his broad-brimmed felt hat. The woman reached out her hand to take it from him, but Wu Sung said, "Don't bother, Sister-in-law," and proceeded to brush off the snow and hang it on the wall himself. Then he unfastened his belt, took off his parrot-green silk jacket, and went into his room.

"I've been waiting for you all morning, Brother-in-law," the woman said. "Why didn't you come home for breakfast?"

"A friend of mine treated me to a meal this morning," said Wu Sung. "Just now another one invited me for a drink, but I couldn't be bothered, and came straight home."

"In that case, warm yourself at the fire, Brother-in-law," the woman said.

"That's just what I need," said Wu Sung, who proceeded to take off his waxed boots, change his socks, put on a pair of warm slippers, pull over a bench, and seat himself next to the brazier.

By this time the woman had already told Ying-erh to shut the front door and check to see that the back door was closed also. Then she put the wine on to heat, prepared a few dishes of food, brought them into his room, and laid them out on the table.

"Where is my brother?" Wu Sung asked.

"Your brother has gone out to peddle his wares as he does every day," said the woman, "but I'll share three cups with you, Brother-in-law."

"I'd just as soon wait till he gets home," said Wu Sung.

"Why should we wait for him?" the woman said.

Before she had finished speaking the little girl, Ying-erh, appeared with a flagon of warmed wine.

"You needn't have gone to so much trouble, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung. "Let me do the honors."

The woman also pulled over a bench and sat down next to the brazier. The table was already set. Picking up a cup of wine and holding it out to him in her hand, she looked at Wu Sung and said, "Bottoms up, Brother-in-law."

Wu Sung took the cup of wine and:

Drained it in one gulp.

The woman refilled it and said, "The weather's cold, Brother-in-law. Have another cup. It takes two to make a couple."

"Why don't you help yourself, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung, but he took the cup of wine and again:

Drained it in one gulp.

Wu Sung then poured a cupful of wine and offered it to the woman, who accepted and swallowed it. Picking up the flagon, she refilled the cup and put it in front of Wu Sung. Then and there: Her creamy breasts slightly exposed, and

Her cloudy locks half askew, the woman said to him with an ingratiating smile, "I've heard people say, Brother-in-law, that you're keeping a singing girl on the street in front of the district yamen. Is that true?"

"Sister-in-law, you shouldn't pay any attention to the nonsense people talk," said Wu Sung. "I've never been that sort of person."

"I don't believe you," the woman said. "I only fear that:

Your mouth is not in harmony with your heart."

"If you don't believe me, Sister-in-law," said Wu Sung, "just ask my brother and see what he says."

"Ai-ya!" the woman said, "why bring him into it? What does he know about anything? For him:

Life and death are but a drunken dream."⁷⁸

If he knew the score he wouldn't be peddling steamed wheat cakes. Brother-in-law, have another drink."

By the time a few more rounds had been poured and drunk the woman had reached that state in which:

Three cups of wine in the stomach

ignite the flames of desire.

How could she hope to repress the fire of lust in her heart?

But she merely continued her idle conversation.

Wu Sung was now 80 or 90 percent aware of what was going on, but he merely lowered his head without responding to her.

The woman got up and went to heat some more wine, leaving Wu Sung alone in the room. He picked up the fire tongs and started to poke up the fire in the brazier. After a while, when the wine had been heated, she came back into the room. Holding the flagon in one hand, she reached out with the other and gave Wu Sung a pinch on the shoulder, saying, "Brother-in-law, if that's all you've got on, you must be cold, aren't you?"

Wu Sung was already more than a little uncomfortable about the situation, but did not pay any attention to her. When the woman saw that he did not respond, she grabbed the fire tongs out of his hand and said, "Brother-in-law, you don't know how to stir up a flame. Let me show you how. It's got to be red-hot or it won't do any good."

Wu Sung had nearly reached the end of his fuse, but did not make any reply. Without noticing that he was upset, the woman dropped the fire-tongs and poured a cupful of wine. She took a sip from this herself, leaving the cup more than half full. Then, looking at Wu Sung, she said, "If you share my feelings, you'll drink the rest of my cup."

Wu Sung grabbed the cup away from her and threw its contents on the floor, saying, "Sister-in-law, how can you be so shameless!"

At the same time, he gave her a push with his hand that nearly knocked her over. Opening his eyes wide, Wu Sung said, "I'm the sort of man who: Stands erect between Heaven and Earth,⁷⁹

With teeth in his mouth and hair on his head.⁸⁰
I'm not the sort of pig or dog who:

Poses a threat to public morality,⁸¹
or violates the standards of human decency. Sister-in-law, this kind of shameless behavior must cease! From now on: If the wind so much as stirs a blade of grass,⁸²

My eyes may recognize you as my sister-in-law,
But my fists won't recognize you.⁸³
Let's have no more of this."

The woman's face turned bright red as she listened to this tirade. Calling in Ying-erh to clear the saucers, cups, and other utensils from the table, she muttered under her breath, "I was only kidding. It's hardly worth taking so seriously."

You wouldn't know a favor if you saw one."

As soon as the table was cleared she retired to the kitchen. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Chin-lien's disreputable schemes are all too wicked;
Wanton and shameless, she knows no behavioral norms.
Even at table she seeks the consolation of clouds and rain;
Only to find herself subjected to the captain's reprimand.⁸⁴

Not only did the woman discover that Wu Sung would not respond to her advances, but she got a good verbal drubbing for her pains.

Wu Sung remained in his room, still fuming, and thinking to himself. Before long it was five o'clock in the afternoon and Wu the Elder, with his carrying pole over his shoulder, made his way home through the snow. After pushing open the door and putting down his load he came into the room and saw that his wife's eyes were red with weeping.

"Who've you been quarreling with?" he asked.

"It's all your fault," the woman said. "You never stick up for yourself, and you allow other people to take advantage of me."

"Who would dare take advantage of you?" Wu the Elder demanded.

"You know perfectly well who it is," the woman replied. "It's really intolerable! That bastard, Wu the Second! When I saw him come home through the snow I went to the trouble of fixing some wine and food for him. Then, when he saw there was no one about, he tried to proposition me. Ying-erh saw it with her own eyes. I'm not making it up."

"My brother isn't that sort of person," stated Wu the Elder. "He's always been an honorable man. Keep your voice down! The neighbors will laugh at us if they hear you."

Leaving his wife where she was, Wu the Elder went into Wu Sung's room and said, "Brother, if you haven't had an afternoon snack yet, I'll have something to eat with you."

Wu Sung made no reply. Instead, after thinking for a while, he took off his silk slippers and pulled his waxed boots back onto his feet. Then he put on his jacket and his wide-brimmed felt hat, fastened his belt, and strode out the front door.

"Brother, where are you going?" Wu the Elder called after him, but Wu Sung made no reply and proceeded straight on his way.

Wu the Elder went back into the house to interrogate his wife. "He didn't even respond when I called to him," he said. "He just headed along the street toward the front gate of the district yamen. I really don't know what's the matter with him."

"You lousy muddleheaded worm!" his wife railed at him. "What's so hard to see about it? The bastard's so ashamed of himself he doesn't have the face to confront you, so he's walked out on you. I'll bet he sends someone to fetch his luggage and refuses to live here any longer. I wouldn't put it past you to urge him to stay!"

"If he moves out people will laugh at us," Wu the Elder said.

"You muddleheaded troll!" his wife cursed. "If he starts playing around with me, no one will laugh at us I suppose! Go stay with him, if that's what you want to do; but I'm not the kind of person to put up with this sort of thing. Just give me a writ of divorce and you can have him all to yourself!"

Wu the Elder scarcely dared open his mouth again in response to this tirade from his wife. The two of them were still going at it when who should appear but Wu Sung, with an orderly in tow, who walked right into the house with his carrying pole, picked up his luggage, and headed out the door.

Wu the Elder ran outside and called after him, "Brother, why are you moving out like this?"

"Don't ask, Brother," said Wu Sung. "If I tried to explain, it would only serve to publicize the problem. Just let me go my own way."

Wu the Elder didn't dare ask anything more about it and let Wu Sung do as he wished.

Inside the house his wife continued to rail away. "A fine thing it is, too! Just as they say:

It's not easy to collect a debt from a relative.

All anybody knows is that you've got a younger brother who's been made a captain, and everyone assumes that he's supporting his brother and sister-in-law in fine style. What they don't know is that he's just a sponger. In fact: He's a real quince:

Good to look at, but not fit to eat.⁸⁵

Now that he's moved out, all I can say is:

Thanks be to Heaven and Earth;

At long last my enemy has been removed from my sight."⁸⁶

When Wu the Elder heard his wife utter these imprecations he didn't know what to make of it, and remained in a state of mental perturbation. After Wu Sung moved back into his room in the inn in front of the district yamen, Wu the Elder continued to go out on the street and peddle his steamed wheat cakes as before. He wanted to look up his brother and have a talk with him, but his wife forbade him, in no uncertain terms, to have anything to do with him. For this reason Wu the Elder did not dare seek out Wu Sung.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Chin-lien's dream of clouds and rain
did not materialize;
Who would believe that this evoked hostility in her heart?
Thus did she contrive to get Wu Sung out of the way;

And sow enmity between brothers of the same flesh and blood.⁸⁷

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 2

BENEATH THE BLIND HSI-MEN CH'ING MEETS CHIN-LIEN; INSPIRED BY GREED DAME WANG SPEAKS OF ROMANCE

In making this match, the Old Man under the Moon¹ has made a mistake;
Displaying her talents, P'an Chin-lien flaunts her beauty.
Merely because she dreams of assignations
under the moon, beneath the stars;
She attracts the attentions of those beyond the door, outside the screen.
Tempted by greed, Dame Wang employs a crafty scheme;
Peddling his fruit, Y'ün-ko becomes the object of rancor.²
How can she foresee that a later day will bring domestic disaster;
That her blood will spatter the standing screen and make the whole floor red?

THE STORY GOES that Wu Sung had no sooner moved out of his elder brother's house than, in a snap of the fingers, the snow stopped and the weather cleared. This state of affairs prevailed for more than ten days.

To resume our story, two years and more had elapsed since the district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho assumed office, and during that time he had been able to put away a tidy sum in gold and silver. It now occurred to him that he should find a trustworthy person to deliver these valuables into the hands of a relative in the Eastern Capital³ for safekeeping. When he reported to the capital for an audience at the expiration of his three-year term they would come in handy in fixing things up with his superiors. The only problem was that the roads were infested with criminal elements so that he would have to find a fairly formidable person for the task. Suddenly he thought to himself, "That captain, Wu Sung, with his heroic combination of courage and strength, is the very man for the job."

The same day he called Wu Sung into the yamen to discuss this matter, saying, "I have a relative who is serving as an official in the Eastern Capital. His name is Chu Mien,⁴ and he holds the post of defender-in-chief in the Palace Command. I'd like to send a consignment of presents to him, along with a letter asking after his health, but I'm afraid that the roads may not be safe. You're the only person I can trust with such a responsibility, and I hope you won't refuse on account of the hardships involved. When you return, of course, I'll see that you are amply rewarded."

"Your Honor has already done so much for me," responded Wu Sung, "that I could hardly refuse. Since you have a mission for me to perform, I'll set off at once. Actually, I've never been to the Eastern Capital, so Your Honor is only doing me another favor by giving me this chance to take in the sights of the big city."

The district magistrate was delighted and rewarded Wu Sung with three cups of wine, along with ten taels of silver for his traveling expenses. But no more of this.

To resume our story, after Wu Sung had received his instructions from the district magistrate, he walked out the gate of the yamen and went by his lodging place to pick up an orderly. Then he stopped on the street to buy a bottle of wine and some groceries and proceeded straight to his brother's house. Wu the Elder happened to come home at about the same time and when he found Wu Sung waiting for him on the doorstep, he invited him inside and instructed the orderly to go into the kitchen and start fixing the food.

The smoldering feelings of the lady of the house had not been completely extinguished. When she saw Wu Sung arrive, with wine and food in hand, she thought to herself, "That bastard must not be able to get me off his mind, otherwise why should he come back like this? He may well have found me too much for him after all. I'll have to feel him out gradually."

Hurrying upstairs to:

Retouch her powdered face, and

Recomb her cloudy locks,

she changed into a more attractive outfit and proceeded to the doorway to welcome Wu Sung.

Bowing as she spoke, the woman said, "Brother-in-law, I don't know what sort of misunderstanding could have arisen to keep you from paying us a visit for such a long time. I've been at my wit's end over it. Every day I've told your brother to go to the yamen to look for you and try to make it up some way, but when he comes home he says you're nowhere to be found. I'm certainly glad you've stopped by again today, but what did you have to go and waste your money like that for?"

"There's something I particularly want to tell my brother," said Wu Sung.

"In that case," said the woman, "please come upstairs and sit down."

After the three of them had ascended the stairs, Wu Sung insisted that his elder brother and his wife take the seats of honor, while he pulled up a stool and sat to one side. The orderly served the wine and brought up a hot meal to go with it.

Wu Sung urged his brother and sister-in-law to eat. As they did so the woman kept glancing at Wu Sung, but he paid no attention to anything but his wine. After several rounds of drinks, Wu Sung asked Ying-erh to bring a set of pledge cups and then told the orderly to fill one of them with wine.

Taking this cup in his hand, he looked at Wu the Elder and said, "My respects to you, Elder Brother. Earlier today His Honor, the district magistrate, commissioned me to carry out some business for him in the Eastern Capital that will require me to set out tomorrow. At the most I should be away for two or three months, and at the least I should be back in a month. There is something I have come here especially to tell you. You have always been of a meek disposition, and I fear that while I am away people may try to take advantage of you. If you normally sell ten trays of steamed wheat cakes in a day, starting tomorrow, make only five trays. Go out late and come back early, and don't stop to have a drink with anyone. Take down the blind and close the door as soon as you get home. That ought to put a stop to any idle chatter. If someone does try to take advantage of you, don't make an issue of it, but wait until I get back and let me handle it for you. If you're willing to do as I suggest, Elder Brother, drink this cup to the bottom."

Accepting the cup, Wu the Elder said, "Your suggestions are good, Brother. I'll do just as you say," and drained it to the bottom.

Wu Sung then filled another cup and said to the woman, "You are a clever person, Sister-in-law, so there's no need for me to say more than a few words. My brother is ingenuous by nature, and totally dependent on you where decisions are concerned. As the saying goes: Outer strength is no match for inner strength.⁵ If my sister-in-law does a good job of managing the household, what will my brother have to worry about? You must be familiar with the old saying: If the fence is secure dogs won't get in."⁶

No sooner did the woman hear these words than:

A spot of red appeared beside each ear, and
In an instant her whole face was purple.

Pointing her finger at Wu the Elder, she launched into a tirade of vituperation. "You muddleheaded creature! If you had anything to complain about, why did you have to go and spill it to someone else so he could take such a high tone with me?

I may not wear a turban, but I'm a match for any man;
I may be only a woman, but I'm a real dingdong dame.
I can lift a man on my fist,
Carry a horse on my arm, and Trample on anyone else's face.⁷

I'm not the sort of:

Blood-sucking tick that buries itself in the skin
so you can't dig it out.⁸

Ever since I've been married to Wu the Elder not even an ant has dared to come into the house. What's all this about dogs getting in if the fence isn't secure? You'd better lay off that: Wild and nonsensical talk.

Every word of an accusation has got to have a basis in fact.

If you throw a brick into the air,
It will come down to earth every time."⁹

Wu Sung laughed and said, "If you take charge in that way, Sister-in-law, everything will be fine; just as long as: Your heart and your mouth are in agreement,¹⁰ but not if:

Your heart is not in harmony with your mouth.

In any case, if that's the way it is, Sister-in-law, I'll remember everything you've said. Please drain this cup."

Pushing the winecup aside with one hand, the woman jumped up and started to run downstairs, but before she had gotten half way down she stopped and said, "Since you're so smart you must know the saying that: An elder brother's wife is like a mother."¹¹

When I first married Wu the Elder I didn't hear anything about a brother-in-law. Where do you think you come off anyway: Acting like a relative whether you are one or not,¹² and demanding to play the role of head of the family? It's just my luck to run into this kind of crap!"

She then proceeded the rest of the way down the stairs, crying as she went. There is a poem that testifies to this: Good advice proves bitter to the taste, as do words of admonition;

Chin-lien resents him for this and throws a tantrum.
So mortified, herself, that she can scarcely remain at table;
She arouses the anger of the hero,
young Wu the Second.¹³

The woman succeeded in putting on quite a scene. Wu the Elder and Wu Sung felt so uncomfortable that after a few more cups of wine they came downstairs and bade each other farewell with tears in their eyes.

"After you've gone, Brother," said Wu the Elder, "come back and see me as soon as you can."

"Brother," said Wu Sung, "it would be just as well if you didn't do any business at all, but just sat at home. I could send someone to provide you with living expenses.”

And just before he left Wu Sung said to him again, “Brother, don’t forget what I’ve told you. Be careful not to let anyone into your house.”

“I understand,” said Wu the Elder.

Wu Sung took leave of his brother and returned to his lodgings in front of the district yamen where he got together his luggage and the weapons he would need to protect himself on the trip. The next day he took charge of the district magistrate’s consignment of presents, checked to see that the gold and silver were properly packed in saddlebags, obtained the waybill authorizing the shipment, and set off on his way to the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.

To resume our story, after Wu the Elder allowed himself to be admonished by his younger brother, Wu Sung, he had to put up with three or four days of unrelenting abuse from his wife. There was nothing he could do but: Swallow his anger and keep his own counsel,¹⁴ letting her curse herself out. Meanwhile, he followed his brother’s advice by making only half as many steamed wheat cakes as usual every day. After making his rounds he came home before evening and put down his carrying pole, took down the blind, and closed the front door behind him before proceeding any further into the house.

When his wife realized what he was doing she was furious and cursed him, saying, “You ignorant nincompoop! Who ever heard of: Locking the jailhouse door while the sun is high in the sky!

Our neighbors will laugh themselves silly over this futile attempt to keep out the ghosts. You’ll do anything your brother says. A lot of good your own cock and balls do you! Aren’t you ashamed to make such a laughingstock of yourself?”

“Let them laugh,” said Wu the Elder. “My brother’s advice is for our own good and ought to put a stop to any idle chatter.”

“Phooey!” the woman said, spitting right in his face, “you stupid clod! You call yourself a man, yet you can’t make up your mind about anything, but let yourself be manipulated by others.”

“So what?” said Wu the Elder with a negative wave of the hand. “As far as I’m concerned, my brother’s words are as immutable as if they were graven in bronze or stone.”

It so happens that from the time that Wu Sung left town Wu the Elder went out late, came back early, and closed the front door as soon as he got home. His wife was: So angry she scarcely cared whether she were dead or alive, and gave him a hard time about it more than once, but eventually she got used to it. From then on, around the time that Wu the Elder got home, she would take down the blind and close the front door herself. When Wu the Elder noticed this he was secretly pleased and thought to himself, “This way everything ought to be all right.”

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Careful as he is to lock the door and come home early;
There is so little love between them they are separated by peaks.

Once her desires are aroused they weave a tangled web;
Even if she were shut up in a cage
it would not avail.

Time flies like a white horse galloping past a crack;¹⁵
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.
No sooner has the flowering plum blossomed
at winter's end;

Than warmer weather proclaims the return of spring.

One day in the third month, when spring was at its most beautiful, Chin-lien dressed herself up alluringly and could hardly wait for Wu the Elder's departure before taking up her position behind the bamboo blind that hung over the front door. She had become accustomed to standing there until her husband was expected home and then taking down the blind and going inside to wait for him. But this particular day was one of those occasions on which: Something was destined to happen.

Just as she was about to take down the blind a certain person happened to walk by.

Without coincidences there would be no stories;¹⁶

It is those who are predestined to do so who meet.

The woman was in the very act of reaching up to take down the blind with a forked stick when a gust of wind dislodged it from her grip so that it fell, Neither correctly nor precisely, but right onto the hat of the passerby. As she hastened to put on an ingratiating smile she looked at him and saw that he was twenty-four or twenty-five years old and cut quite a dashing figure.

Beneath the Blind Hsi-men Ch'ing Meets Chin-lien

On his head he wears a tasseled hat,
 Gold openwork hairpins, and
 A pair of jade rings inlaid with gold;
 On his long torso, a green silk jacket;
 On his feet, fine-soled Ch'en-ch'iao¹⁷ shoes, and Pure cotton stockings;
 On his trouser legs, jet drawnwork kneepads.
 In his hand he sports a gold-flecked Szechwan fan,
 Enhancing a face as handsome as young Chang's,¹⁸
 A countenance as good-looking as P'an Yüeh's.¹⁹
 A man after my own heart,
 As romantic as can be,
 Beneath the screen he tips a wink at me.

This man, on whose head the forked stick had fallen, stopped in his tracks and was about to make trouble; but when he looked around to see who was responsible he found, to his surprise, that it was a beautiful and seductive woman. Behold, she has: Glossy, black, raven's feather tresses;

Dark, curved, new moon eyebrows;
Clear, cold, almond eyes;
Redolently fragrant cherry lips;
A straight, full, alabaster nose;
Thickly powdered red cheeks;
A handsome, silver salver face;
A light, lissome, flowerlike figure;
Slender, jade-white, scallion-shoot fingers;
A cuddlesome, willow waist;
A tender, pouting, dough-white tummy;
Tiny, turned-up, pointed feet;
Buxom breasts; and
Fresh, white legs.

And there is something else as well:

Tight and squeezey,
Red and wrinkly,
Pale and fresh,
Black and cushioned;
Who can tell what it might be?²⁰

The beauties of this woman were such that he could not look his fill. And how is she adorned? Behold: The glossy black chignon on her head is enclosed in a fret spangled with gold,

Setting off the fragrant clouds of her hair and studded all round with hairpins.
The spit curl at her temple is embellished with a double-headed flower;
A comb of aromatic wood holds her hair in place behind.
Her arched willow-leaf eyebrows would be hard to depict;
As would the pair of peach blossoms that grace her cheeks.

Her openwork pendant earrings are beyond praise;
A glimpse of her smooth creamy bosom is beyond price.
A pale blue homespun blouse, with wide sleeves and jacket to match, Complements the embossed silk of her beige skirt.

A figured handkerchief dangles from the mouth of her sleeve;
 A sachet of pomander hangs low at her waist.
 The rows of frogs on her bodice are neatly fastened;
 Her ankle leggings, concealed above, extend below.
 The upturned points of her tiny golden lotuses
 are just visible;
 With a pattern of mountain peaks embroidered on the tips of their toes,
 Her raven-hued shoes, with high white satin heels, are made to order for tripping the fragrant dust;
 Her red silk ankle leggings are figured with orioles among the flowers;
 Whether walking or sitting, the breeze parts her skirts and reveals what lies below.
 From her mouth the fragrance of orchid and musk is constantly wafted;
 When her cherry lips open in a smile her face breaks into bloom.
 The mere sight of her makes one's "ethereal and material souls take flight";
 Shown off to such advantage, she is a beautiful, if heartless, lover.

No sooner did the man catch sight of her than:

His starch began to melt, and

His anger flew to Java,²¹

as the irate look on his face changed into a broad smile.

The woman knew that she was in the wrong and, folding her hands in front of her, bowed deeply in his direction as she said, "The wind blew it right out of my hand, sir, and it happened to land on you. Please don't hold it against me."

Adjusting his hat with one hand, the man made such a low bow that he almost scraped the ground, saying as he did so, "It doesn't matter at all! Please make yourself easy, miss."

This scene happened to be witnessed by Dame Wang, whose teahouse was situated next door. Breaking into a laugh, the old lady said, "And whatever induced you to walk under these particular eaves, sir? It serves you right."

"It's really my fault," the man replied with a smile. "I've put you out, I'm afraid. Don't hold it against me, miss."

"I do hope you won't take offense, sir," the woman said.

"How could I dream of such a thing?" the man responded with a smile, and he made another low bow, during which his mischievous eyes: Long experienced in sizing up the flowers;

Adept at assessing romantic possibilities, never left the woman's body. As he made his departure he glanced back seven or eight times before proceeding to swagger on his way, concealing his face with his fan. There is a poem that testifies to this: In the cool breeze and genial weather he has sauntered out for a stroll;

 By chance, beneath the blind he encounters a seductive beauty.
 Merely because, "on the point of departure, she gives him a meaningful glance";²²
 His desires are so aroused that he cannot call it quits.²³

The woman, for her part, had had a good look at the man and thought to herself, "He's dashing and romantic as well as soft-spoken, and he seems to be rather taken with me; but I don't even know his name, or where he lives. If he didn't care for me he wouldn't have glanced back at me seven or eight times before going his way. Who knows? This may turn out to be the very love-match I've been waiting for."

She fixed her gaze upon the man until he was out of sight before taking down the blind, closing the front door, and going back inside.

Gentle reader take note: It is scarcely likely that such a person should not turn out to be a man of some property. It so happens that he was the decadent scion of a family of considerable wealth from whom he had inherited a wholesale pharmaceutical business located on the street that ran in front of the district yamen. He had been a dissolute young scamp since his youth and had acquired some skill in such martial arts as boxing and fencing with the quarterstaff. He also liked to gamble, and there was little he didn't know about backgammon, elephant chess, and the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts. Now that he had come into his inheritance and had money of his own to spend, he had gone into cahoots with the officials and functionaries in the district yamen where he played the role of influence peddler, intervening in public business on people's behalf, for a fee. For this reason everyone in the whole district was rather afraid of him.

This man bore the double surname, Hsi-men, and the single given name, Ch'ing. He was an only son, so people had been in the habit of calling him Master Hsi-men, but now that he had come into his inheritance and had money of his own to spend they referred to him as the Honorable Hsi-men. Both his father and his mother were dead, and he had no siblings.

His first wife had died some time ago, leaving behind her only a single daughter. Recently he had been formally remarried to the daughter of Battalion Commander Wu of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard, but he was not above availing himself of the four or five serving maids in his establishment. Moreover he had carried on an affair with a girl named Li Chiao-erh from the licensed quarter for some time, and he had just arranged to take her into his household. On top of this he had also been maintaining an unlicensed prostitute called Cho the Second on South Street. This girl's professional name was Cho Tiu-erh, or Toss-off Cho, and he had now moved her into his household as well.

In fact, Hsi-men Ch'ing was a past master at:

Toying with the breeze and dallying with the moonlight.

Whenever he established a liaison with a woman, even one of good family, he was wont to take her into his establishment; but if she should then fail to please him in any way, however slight, he would call in a go-between and dispose of her without more ado. It was said that he sometimes resorted to the services of such brokers as often as twenty times in a single month. As a result, no one dared cross him.

Now this Honorable Hsi-men, once he had caught sight of that woman beneath the blind, went home and thought to himself, "What a fine filly! I wonder how I could get hold of her."

Suddenly he bethought himself of Dame Wang, who kept the teahouse right next door to her home. "She can surely do: Thus and thus, and

So and so,

and help me to pull this affair off successfully. If it costs me a few taels of silver to reward her for her pains, what does it matter?"

Thereupon, without even waiting to eat, he sauntered out onto the street again, made straight for Dame Wang's teahouse, slipped in unobtrusively, and took a seat inside the beaded portiere.

"That certainly was a fat bow you took just now, sir," said Dame Wang with a laugh.

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "come here. There's something I want to ask you. Who does that filly next door belong to?"

"She is King Yama's²⁴ younger sister, the daughter of the General of the Five Ways,"²⁵ said Dame Wang. "What do you want to know about her for?"

"I'm serious," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Stop joking."

"How is it you don't recognize her, sir?" asked Dame Wang. "Her old man's the one who sells ready-cooked food in front of the district yamen."

"You don't mean to say she's the wife of Hsü the Third who sells date cakes!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Not him," said Dame Wang with a negative wave of her hand. "If it were him, they'd make a pair. Guess again, sir."

"She must be the wife of Li the Third who sells won-ton," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Not him," said Dame Wang with another wave of her hand. "If it were him, they'd be well matched."

"You don't mean to say she's the wife of Little Liu the Second with the tattooed arms, do you?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Dame Wang laughed uproariously and said, "Not him. If it were him, they'd make another pair. Guess again, sir."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the truth of the matter is I can't guess who it is."

"In that case," said Dame Wang with a sardonic smile, "I'll tell you, sir," and she burst out laughing again. "The man whose lot it is to cover her is Wu the Elder, who peddles steamed wheat cakes on the street."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he stamped his feet and laughed.

"You don't mean to say he's the Wu the Elder, whom everyone calls the Three-inch Mulberry-bark Manikin, do you?"

"That's the man," said Dame Wang.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he groaned and said:

"How did a piece of fine mutton End up in the mouth of such a dog?"

"It's the same old story," said Dame Wang. "It's always been true that:

The finest steed may be forced to carry an unworthy rider;

The loveliest wife must often share her bed with a clumsy clod.²⁶

That's just the way the Old Man under the Moon arranges things."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how much do I owe you in the way of tea money?"

"Not much," replied Dame Wang. "Let it go for a few days. It doesn't matter."

"Who is your son, Wang Ch'ao, working for these days?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I don't even want to talk about it," said Dame Wang. "He's gone off with a merchant from the Huai River region and hasn't come home to this day. I don't know whether he's dead or alive."

"Why doesn't he come and work for me?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He's a likely looking lad."

"If you saw fit to favor him in such a way, sir," said Dame Wang, "it would certainly be handsome of you."

"Wait till he gets home and we can talk about it again," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. When he had finished speaking he thanked her profusely, got up, and took his leave.

Before four hours had elapsed, however, he showed up again, slipping into a seat just inside the beaded portiere of Dame Wang's teahouse and directing his gaze at Wu the Elder's door. In a little while Dame Wang came out and said, "How about a damson punch, sir?"

"That would be great," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Make it good and sour."

Dame Wang prepared an order of damson punch and served it to him with both hands. When he had finished drinking it Hsi-men Ch'ing put the cup down and said, "Mother, you really know how to fix a damson. How many more have you got in the house?"

Dame Wang laughed. "I've been fixing up damsels all my life, but what would I want with one for myself?"

"It was damsons I asked about," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, laughing in turn, "but you're talking about damsels. There's quite a difference between the two."

"All I heard, sir, was something about fixing damsels," said Dame Wang, "so I thought you were talking about the way I fix them up."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you're as good as all that at making matches, how about fixing one up for me? If you come up with a good one, I'll see that you're amply rewarded."

"You've got to be kidding, sir," said Dame Wang. "If the lady of your house found out about it, I'm afraid my head's a bit too old to stand up to being boxed about the ears."

"My wife has a most accommodating disposition," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already got a number of bedmates at home. It's just that none of them really tickles my fancy. If you've got anything good to propose, there's no harm in bringing it up. Even someone who's been married before would be all right, as long as she tickles my fancy."

"There was one that looked pretty good just the other day," said Dame Wang, "but I'm afraid you wouldn't be interested, sir."

"If she's really a good prospect, and you can bring it off," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll reward you generously."

"She's as talented as she can be," said Dame Wang. "The only thing is she's a little along in years."

"It's always been true," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that:

A mature beauty makes a worthy mate.²⁷

Even if she's been around a year or two longer than one might wish, it doesn't matter. Just how old is she anyway?"

"The lady in question," said Dame Wang, "was born in the year of the pig, so, come New Year's Day, she'll be just ninety-two."

"What a crazy old crone you are," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The only thing you're really any good at is pulling people's legs." And when he was through laughing he got up and took his leave.

Gradually it grew dark, and Dame Wang had just lit her lamp and was about to close her door, when who should appear but Hsi-men Ch'ing. Once again he slipped inside the beaded portiere, pulled over a bench to sit on, and proceeded to gaze fixedly at Wu the Elder's door.

"How about a concord punch, sir?" asked Dame Wang.

"That would be great," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Make it good and sweet, Godmother."

Dame Wang promptly served him a cupful and Hsi-men Ch'ing drank it, but he continued sitting there until it was quite late before he stood up and said, "Put it on my bill, Godmother. I'll settle the whole account tomorrow."

"Don't worry about it," said Dame Wang. "Pray let the matter rest. Drop in again tomorrow and we can discuss it then."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and took his leave, but when he got home he was:

Too uncomfortable to sleep or eat in peace.

He couldn't get the woman off his mind. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

Early the following morning, when Dame Wang opened her door and looked outside, she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was already there, pacing back and forth in the street. "This sucker is certainly impatient enough," she thought to herself. "Just watch me: Stick some sugar candy on the tip of his nose

Where he can't quite get at it with his tongue.²⁸

That bastard is always presuming on his connections in the yamen to take advantage of people. Now that he's fallen into my hands I might as well make him pay for his fun by lining my nest with a few strings of cash."

It so happens that this Dame Wang, the proprietress of the teahouse, was not the sort to abide by her lot. In fact, for years she had:

Played the procuress,

Made a living as a matchmaker,

Peddled human flesh,

Been a broker,

Meddled in midwifery,

Acted as accoucheur, and Revealed a knack for every sort of knavery.

And she had yet another accomplishment that doesn't bear mentioning:

She could jab a needle through the chignon, and Inject solder into the cranial cavity.

Truly, this old lady's skills were such as to evade easy detection. Behold: When she starts to speak, she excels Lu Chia;²⁹

When she opens her mouth,

she surpasses Sui Ho.³⁰

She relies on the lethal lips that persuaded the Six States;³¹

She depends on the trenchant tongue that won the dominions of Ch'i.³²

The solitary male phoenix and its female counterpart,

Are in a trice transformed into a couple;

The lonely widow and bereft widower,
Are by a single speech induced to form a pair.
She knows how to inveigle the young lady locked behind triple gates,
Into a tryst with the immortal within his nine-tiered palace.
The Golden Lad who tends the incense within the halls of the Jade Emperor,³³
She can drag hither
by the arm;
The Jade Maiden who transmits messages in the palace of the Queen Mother of the West,³⁴

She can embrace around the waist.
 She has but to put in motion
 one of her crafty schemes,
 In order to induce an arhat to cosy up to a bhikshuni.
 She has but to resort to one of her devices,
 In order to cause Devarāja Li³⁵ to embrace Hārītī.³⁶
 Once exposed to her sweet suasions and inviting arguments,
 Even such a paragon as Feng Chih³⁷ would start to get ideas;
 When confronted with her winning words and beguiling promises,
 Even so chaste a goddess as Ma-ku³⁸ would find her equanimity disturbed.
 "Concealing the head of the matter while revealing the tail,"³⁹
 She incites even the Weaving Maid⁴⁰
 to thoughts of love;
 "Playing the role of intermediary in passion's heats and chills,"⁴¹
 She prevails upon Ch'ang-o⁴² herself to take a lover.⁴³
 Truly, this old lady was:
 Adept at manipulating the breeze and the moonlight to her own advantage;
 Constantly to be seen in the law courts
 as an instigator of quarrels.

The old lady had just opened for business and was engaged in getting her teakettles ready when she caught sight of Hsi-men Ch'ing. After pacing back and forth a few more times he slipped hurriedly inside the beaded portiere and proceeded to stare fixedly at the blind over Wu the Elder's door. Dame Wang pretended not to notice and continued to fan up the fire in her stove rather than coming out to take her customer's order.

"Godmother," called out Hsi-men Ch'ing, "make me two cups of tea."

"Oh, it's you, sir," responded Dame Wang. "Long time no see. Please have a seat."

In no time at all she brought two cups of strong tea and set them down on the table.

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "come have a cup of tea with me."

"I'm not the one you're after," said Dame Wang with a laugh. "Why should I have a cup of tea with you?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing also laughed a while and then asked, "Godmother, what do your neighbors have for sale?"

"Their stock in trade," replied Dame Wang, "is fried doughballs, cured coney, stuffed patty-cake, baked buns, noodles with cockle sauce, and hot Schlag in cider."⁴⁴

"Why you crazy old crone," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "all you can do is joke."

"It's no joke," Dame Wang laughed back at him, "she's got an old man of her own."

"I'm serious," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If her husband can make good steamed wheat cakes, I'd like to buy forty or fifty of them to take home with me."

"If all you want to do is buy wheat cakes," said Dame Wang, "he'll be back in a while and you can buy them then. What need is there to pay a formal call?"

"You're right, Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, who then drank his tea, sat a little longer, stood up, and took his leave.

Sometime later, as Dame Wang was tending her teashop, she looked out with a sardonic eye only to see another vision of Hsi-men Ch'ing. He was pacing back and forth in front of the door. First he would head east, then turn around and go west, only to repeat the process again and again. This happened seven or eight times in a row. Finally he came right into the teashop.

"This must be my lucky day, sir," said Dame Wang. "It seems like ages since I saw you last."

Hsi-men Ch'ing started to laugh and then fumbled for a tael of silver, which he handed to Dame Wang with the words, "Godmother, why don't you take this for the time being to cover my tea money?"

"Why so much?" asked Dame Wang with a smile.

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if it's too much, keep the difference."

"I've got him," the old lady thought to herself. "This is one sucker who's going to get what's coming to him. I might as well take his money. It'll come in handy to pay the rent."

Then she said out loud, "You look a little thirsty to me, sir. How about a well-steeped cup of tea?"

"How'd you guess what I wanted, Godmother?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"What's so hard to guess about that?" said the old lady. "It's always been true that: When someone comes in the door don't bother to ask how he's doing;

One look at his face will suffice to give you the answer.⁴⁵

I've guessed the answers to a lot of stranger things than that in my day."

"There is something I've got on my mind," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you can guess what it is, Godmother, I'll give you five taels of silver."

Dame Wang laughed. "There's no need for any:
Three conjectures and five guesses.

One conjecture will be quite enough for my guess to hit the bull's-eye. Come a little closer, sir, so I can whisper in your ear. The last two days: Your footsteps have been fidgety, and Your inquiries incessant.

Surely it's because you've got my next-door neighbor on your mind. How's that for a guess?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing began to laugh. "Godmother," he said, "truly:

In intelligence you rival Sui Ho;

In resourcefulness you outdo Lu Chia.

There's no reason for me to deceive you. I don't know why it is, but ever since I caught sight of her when she was taking down the blind the other day, it's been just as though she had stolen away my three ethereal and my seven material souls. Day and night I can't get her off my mind. When I'm at home I don't even feel like eating or drinking and am far too distracted to work. I wonder if there's anything you could do to help me out?"

Dame Wang gave a cynical laugh. "There's no reason for me to deceive you either, sir. I get a customer in my teashop about as often as the devil plays night watchman. Three years ago, when it snowed so heavily on the third day of the sixth month, I sold a cup of tea, but I haven't been able to make a go of it since. The only thing that keeps me going is the occasional odd job."

"And what, may I ask, do you mean, Godmother, by the occasional odd job?" demanded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Dame Wang laughed. "When I was only thirty-five my old man kicked off and left me with this youngster, but without any means of livelihood. At first I tried my hand at matchmaking. Then I went round collecting people's old clothes to sell. I offered my services as an accoucheur and then as a midwife. When the occasion arises I dabble in pandering and procuring. I can also perform acupuncture, moxabustion, and other medical services. And, lastly, I treat the 'proper tea' of every customer as though it were my own."⁴⁶

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he burst into laughter. "I had no idea you were as talented as all that, Godmother. If you can actually pull this affair off for me, I'll give you ten taels of silver toward the cost of your coffin. All I want you to do is to arrange a meeting between this filly and myself."

This proposal elicited a hearty laugh from Dame Wang. There is a poem that testifies to this: That wastrel, Hsi-men Ch'ing, had the wildest ideas;

He was willing to go to any lengths to get his way with a woman.
But it was the proprietress of the teahouse,
old Dame Wang;
Who engineered the tryst between the Goddess of Witches' Mountain and King Hsiang.⁴⁷

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 3

DAME WANG PROPOSES A TEN-PART PLAN FOR “GARNERING THE GLOW”; HSI-MEN CH’ING FLIRTS WITH CHIN-LIEN IN THE TEAHOUSE

Beauty does not delude people, they delude themselves;¹
But if they become deluded they will suffer the consequences.
Their vitality will be dissipated, their countenances grow pale;
The marrow in their bones will dry up and their strength will wane.
Those who engage in fornication find that their families will break up;

Once venereal disease is contracted it is difficult to cure.
As always, "A full stomach and warm body give rise to disorder";²
Those for whom disaster is imminent never seem to realize it.

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Dame Wang, "The only thing I'm interested in is a tryst with this filly."

"Godmother," he went on to say, "if you can really arrange this for me, I'll give you ten taels of silver."

"Listen to me, sir," said Dame Wang. "Generally speaking, the words 'garnering the glow' refer to a most difficult matter. Do you know what this term 'garnering the glow' means? It's just another way of referring to what is commonly known as an illicit affair. Now there are five prerequisites that must be possessed by anyone who wishes to consummate such an affair:

No. 1: He must have the looks of P'an Yüeh.

No. 2: He must have the member of a donkey.³

No. 3: He must have the wealth of Teng T'ung.⁴

No. 4: He must have youth, and the resilience of a 'needle in a wad of cotton.'⁵

No. 5: He must have leisure.

Dame Wang Proposes a Ten-part Plan for "Garnering the Glow"

Only if you possess all these prerequisites, which are known for short as 'looks, member, wealth, youth, and leisure,'⁶ can you hope to consummate such an affair."

"To tell you the truth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I happen to have all five. As for the first: although I may not be as handsome as P'an Yüeh, I can certainly pass muster. As for the second: in my younger days I frequented the streets and alleys of the licensed quarter and reared a 'turtle'⁷ of prodigious size. As for the third: I've got a few strings of cash laid away. Although I may not be in the same league as Teng T'ung, I've got more than enough to get by. As for the fourth: I've got the youth and resilience to take anything she can dish out. She could hit me four hundred times without my giving her a blow in return. As for the fifth: I've got leisure to spare. If I didn't, how could I spend so much time over here? Godmother, if you can pull this off for me, I'll make it worth your while."

Hsi-men Ch'ing had now made his intentions explicit.

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "you say you've got all five prerequisites. I understand that. But there's still another problem that might get in the way and make success unlikely."

"Tell me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what might get in the way?"

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "don't take it amiss if I speak bluntly. The hardest thing about this business of 'garnering the glow' is getting you to commit yourself to it 100 percent. Even if you're willing to spend whatever it takes to complete 99 percent of the task, something might still stand in the way of success. I know you've always been a bit tight, unwilling to fling your money about with abandon. This is the only problem that might get in the way."

"That's easy," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll just do whatever you tell me."

"If you're prepared to spend the money, sir," said Dame Wang, "I've got a splendid plan for getting you and this filly together. But I don't know if you'll be willing to go along with me or not."

"No matter what you say, I'll go along with it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What is this splendid plan of yours?"

Dame Wang laughed. "It's already getting late today. Why don't you go home for the time being. Come and see me again in half a year, or three months time, and we can talk about it then."

"Godmother," entreated Hsi-men Ch'ing, "stop joking. You've got to help me pull this off."

Your kindness will be amply rewarded."

Dame Wang broke into raucous laughter. "You're getting carried away again, sir. Although this plan of mine may not be worthy of commemoration in the Temple of Prince Wu-ch'eng, the God of War,⁸ it's certainly superior to that scheme of Sun Wu's which called for drilling the palace ladies.⁹ The odds are eight or nine to one that you shall have her."

"Let me give you the lowdown on this filly's background. Although she's only of humble origin she's as clever as can be. She's an excellent musician and singer. And as for needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments, the standard repertory of popular songs, backgammon and elephant chess, and so forth, there's very little she doesn't know about any of them. Her given name is Chin-lien and her maiden name is P'an. Her father was the Tailor P'an whose shop used to be located outside the South Gate. After his death she was sold into the household of Mr. Chang, the well-to-do merchant, where she learned to play musical instruments and sing. Later, because Mr. Chang was getting along in years, he released her from the terms of her contract and gave her to Wu the Elder as wife without demanding a candareen in return."

"That was several years ago. Now Wu the Elder is something of a simpleton. Every day he goes out early and comes home late and doesn't pay attention to anything but his business. Ordinarily this filly is not much given to gadding about. When I've got nothing better to do I often go over to her place to pass the time of day, and when she needs help with anything she asks me to take care of it for her. She addresses me as Godmother just as you do."

"The last few days Wu the Elder has been going out early. If you want to pursue this matter, sir, buy me a bolt of blue pongee and another of white, along with a bolt of white damask. I'll also need ten taels' worth of good-quality silk wadding. When you've brought all these things to me I'll go over and ask to borrow her calendar so I can get someone to pick out an auspicious day on which to engage a tailor to make them up for me. If she responds by picking out a lucky day but doesn't offer to do the work herself, then it'll be all over. But if she says, 'Let me do it for you':"

As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could

make her happier,

and doesn't want me to hire a tailor, then one-tenth of this glow-game will have been achieved."

"If I am successful in inviting her to come over to my place to do the work, then two-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved."

"If she does come over to my place to do the work, at noontime I'll prepare some wine and a snack and ask her to have lunch with me. If she says it's inconvenient and insists on taking the work home with her, then it'll be all over. But if she doesn't say anything and agrees to eat lunch with me, then three-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved."

"On the following day you mustn't show up. But on the third day, around noon, dress yourself up appropriately and cough outside my door as a signal. Then call out, 'It's been days since I've set eyes on you, Godmother Wang. I've come to buy a cup of tea.' I'll come out and invite you to come in and sit down while you drink your tea. If she gets up and retires to her own home when she sees you, I can't very well physically restrain her, can I? It'll be all over. But if she sees you come in and makes no effort to withdraw, then four-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved."

"When you sit down I'll say to the filly, 'This is the very gentleman who was kind enough to give these materials to me. I'm greatly indebted to him.' Then I'll proceed to sing your praises and you can wax extravagant on the subject of her needlework. If she pays no attention and refuses to respond, then it'll be all over. But if she responds by engaging you in conversation, then five-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved."

"Then I'll say, 'It's really kind of this young lady to have volunteered her services on my behalf. I'm greatly indebted to both of you benefactors; to one for providing the money and the other for providing her skills. If I hadn't:

Asked her a favor, as one trouper to another,¹⁰

there would scarcely be any reason for this young lady to grace us with her presence. Why don't you play the role of host, sir, and show this young lady how much her efforts are appreciated.' You then pull out some silver and ask me to buy whatever's needed. If she insists on leaving at this point, I can't very well physically restrain her, can I? It'll be all over. But if she makes no effort to withdraw, the situation will be promising, and six-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved."

"Then I'll accept your money and on my way out the door I'll say to her, 'Be so good as to keep the gentleman company for a few minutes, young lady.' If she refuses and gets up and goes home instead, I can scarcely do anything to prevent her, can I? It'll be all over. But if she doesn't budge, everything will be fine, and seven-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"When I've bought the things I'll put them on the table and say, 'Young lady, why don't you set your work aside for a minute and have a cup of wine? It's a rare treat this gentleman has provided for us.' If she refuses to drink at the same table with you and goes home instead, it'll be all over. But if she only talks about leaving and doesn't budge, everything will be going fine, and eight-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"After she's had enough wine to feel it, and the conversation has started to warm up, I'll say the wine has run out and suggest once again that you buy some. You pull out more silver and ask me to get it for you, along with some delicacies to go with it. I'll put the latch on the door so that the two of you are locked inside the room together. If she gets all hot and bothered and tries to run home, it'll be all over. But if she lets me put the latch on the door without getting hot and bothered, then nine-tenths of this glow-game will have been achieved.

"Only one-tenth will then remain, but this last step is the hardest. There in the room, sir, you'll have to move in with the sweet talk, but whatever you do, avoid any rough stuff that might wreck the whole affair. In such a case you'd be strictly on your own as far as I'm concerned. You might proceed by brushing a pair of chopsticks off the table with your sleeve and then giving her foot a pinch when you stoop down to pick them up. If she kicks up a fuss, I'll have to come to her rescue, and it'll be all over. That will be the end of the matter. But if she doesn't make a peep, the last tenth of this glow-game will have been achieved, for she will have given her consent to your conquest. If this glow-game is carried to a successful conclusion, how will you thank me?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had heard her out he was delighted and exclaimed, "Godmother, this plan of yours may not earn you a place in the Ling-yen Pavilion,¹¹ but it's certainly a splendid, first-class scheme!"

"Whatever you do," said Dame Wang, "don't forget those ten taels of silver you promised me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied:

"Whenever one gets so much as a
tangerine peel to eat;
One should never forget Tung-t'ing Lake¹²
from whence it came.¹³

Godmother, how soon can this plan of yours be put into operation?"

"I should have something to report this very evening," said Dame Wang. "I'll go over soon and ask to borrow her calendar, before Wu the Elder gets home, and then start to work on her as best I can. You'd better get cracking and send someone over with the pongee, damask, and silk wadding before it's too late."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you can pull this off, how could I ever let you down?"

Thereupon he took his leave of Dame Wang, walked out through the teahouse, and went to buy the three bolts of pongee and damask and ten taels' worth of the best-quality silk wadding. When he got home he instructed his young body servant, named Tai-an, to wrap them up in a bundle and deliver them to Dame Wang's house, where she was only too pleased to accept them and send the lad on his way. Truly:

Unless the clouds and rain come together on Witch's Mountain;
King Hsiang of Ch'u will have erected his terrace in vain.¹⁴

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The two of them feel an affinity as sweet as honey;
The way Dame Wang brings them together
is remarkable indeed.
She devises a ten-part plan for "garnering the glow";
To ensure that they will come together without fail.¹⁵

Dame Wang Insists on the Proposed Remuneration for Her Plan

When Dame Wang had received the pongee, damask, and silk wadding she opened her back door and went over to Wu the Elder's house. The woman greeted her, invited her upstairs, and offered her a seat.

"Young lady," said Dame Wang, "how is it you haven't been over to my place for a cup of tea the last few days?"

"It's just that I've been out of sorts lately," the woman replied, "and haven't felt like doing anything at all."

"If you've got a calendar in the house, young lady," said Dame Wang, "lend it to me so I can get someone to choose a good day for me to have some tailoring done."

"What sort of tailoring do you have in mind, Godmother?" the woman asked.

"It's just because I seem to be suffering from all:

Ten aches and nine pains," said Dame Wang. "I'm afraid I could end up:
High as the hills or deep as the sea, at any moment, and my son isn't even here to take care of things if anything should happen to me."

"Why haven't I seen Little Brother around for such a long time?" the woman inquired.

"That rascal is out on the road, traveling with a merchant," said Dame Wang, "and I never hear a word from him. I can't help worrying about him from one day to the next."

"How old is Little Brother this year?" the woman asked.

"That rascal's already sixteen," replied Dame Wang.

"Why don't you find him a wife, Godmother?" the woman said, "so she could lend you a hand?"

"It's just as you say," responded Dame Wang, "I've got nobody to help out. Sooner or later, someplace or other, I'll have to find him one all right. But I'm not going to worry about that till he gets home."

"Right now the problem is that, day and night, if I'm not coughing I'm short of breath; and I hurt all over, just as if I'd been beaten to pieces, so I can't even get any sleep. I've been wanting for some time now to prepare my burial garments, just in case. Fortunately a certain well-to-do gentleman who often drops into my place for a cup of tea—a man who has noticed how reliable I am as a medical practitioner, employment agent, and matchmaker, and insists on patronizing me in matters great and small—has made me a gift of all the materials I need for a complete set of burial garments, enough pongee and damask for both exterior and lining, along with a quantity of fine silk wadding. They've been sitting at home for over a year now without my having the time to get them made up."

"This year I really feel I may not be able to hang on much longer; and since it happens to be an intercalary month¹⁶ in which I've got a few days to spare, I thought I'd get this taken care of. But the tailor is giving me a hard time, claiming he's too busy right now to do it for me. I can't tell you what a hassle it's been."

On hearing this speech the woman smiled and said, "I don't know if I could do a satisfactory job, but if you're willing to risk it, I happen to have some spare time right now and could do it for you myself. What do you think, Godmother?"

When the old woman heard this she said with an ingratiating smile, "If you deign to do it with your own hands, young lady, I'll feel myself honored even in the grave. I've heard for a long time how good you are at needlework, but I haven't presumed to impose on you."

"It's nothing, Godmother," said the woman. "I've offered to do it, and I insist. Take the calendar along and get somebody to choose a lucky day so I can begin."

"Young lady," said Dame Wang, "there's no need to pretend with me. There can't be many words in the standard anthologies of poetry and drama that you can't read. What need is there to get someone else to consult the calendar?"

"I'm afraid I never received a proper education," demurred the woman with a faint smile.

"That's a fine way to talk!" said Dame Wang, as she picked up the calendar and handed it to her.

The woman took the calendar in her hand and examined it for a while. "Tomorrow is an unlucky day," she said, "and the day after tomorrow is bad too. The next good day for tailoring is not until the day after the day after tomorrow."

Dame Wang snatched the calendar away from her and hung it back on the wall, saying, "The fact that you're willing to do it for me, young lady, makes you my lucky star. What need is there to be particular about the date. I already asked someone to check for me and he reported that tomorrow is an unlucky day. But I, for one, see no reason to pay any attention to the taboo against doing tailoring on unlucky days."

"Actually," said the woman, "an unlucky day might be the most appropriate for making burial garments."

"As long as you're willing to do it," said Dame Wang, "I'll make so bold as to trouble you to come over to my place tomorrow."

"There's no need for that," said the woman. "It'll do just as well if you bring it over here for me to work on, won't it?"

"The fact of the matter is," said Dame Wang, "I want to see the way you go about it, but there's no one to tend the shop for me."

"In that case," said the woman, "I'll come over after breakfast tomorrow morning."

The old lady descended the stairs with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.

That evening she reported what had happened to Hsi-men Ch'ing and reiterated that he was not to turn up until the third day. Of the events of that night there is no more to tell.

The next day, bright and early, Dame Wang tidied up her room, laid out the necessary needles and thread, got the tea things ready, and sat down to wait for her visitor.

To resume our story, when Wu the Elder had eaten breakfast, shouldered his carrying pole, and gone off to work, the woman hung the bamboo blind over the door, told Ying-erh to look after the house, and went over to Dame Wang's place by the back door. The old lady, as pleased as could be, invited her in and offered her a seat. Then she poured her a cup of strong tea, flavored with walnuts and pine seeds, wiped the table clean, and got out the three bolts of pongee and damask. The woman took her measurements, cut up the material, and began to sew.

As the old lady looked on she kept up an unbroken stream of flattering commentary. "What exquisite skill! I've lived for sixty or seventy years without ever seeing needlework as fine as this."

The woman continued sewing until noon, when Dame Wang prepared some food and wine, along with a serving of noodles, and asked her to lunch. Afterward she continued sewing for a while, until late afternoon, when she put her work aside and returned home.

Wu the Elder happened to come home about the same time, and the woman put the latch on the door and took down the blind. When Wu the Elder came into the room he noticed that his wife's face was a little red and asked her, "Where've you been?"

"Just over at Godmother Wang's next door," the woman replied. "She asked me to make up a set of burial garments for her. At noontime she prepared some food and wine in the way of a snack and asked me to lunch."

"It would have been better not to accept her hospitality," said Wu the Elder. "We may need to call on her for help some time. Even though she asked you to make up these burial garments for her, you could just as easily have come home for a snack. It's not worth it, putting her to all that trouble. If you go back there to continue working tomorrow, take a little money along so you can buy some food and wine and return the treat. As the saying goes:

A distant relative is no match for a close neighbor.¹⁷

We mustn't fall behind in our social obligations. If she won't let you return the treat, bring the work home with you and give it back to her when you're done."

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The machinations of the old matron are deep indeed;
But Wu the Elder is too ingenious to catch their drift.
By supplying money to return the treat
he rewards her betrayal;
And by so doing gives his wife away to another man.¹⁸

The woman agreed to go along with Wu the Elder's suggestion. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, after breakfast, Wu the Elder had no sooner shouldered his carrying pole and gone out than Dame Wang slipped over to press her invitation. The woman accompanied her back to her room, got out the unfinished work, and continued to sew. Dame Wang hastened to pour the tea and had a cup with her. As it drew near midday the woman pulled three hundred cash out of her sleeve and said to Dame Wang, "Godmother, let me buy you a cup of wine."

"Ai-ya!" said Dame Wang. "Who ever heard of such a thing? I asked you here to do something as a favor to me, young lady. How could I consent to let you put up the money? I hope the fare I provided hasn't disagreed with you."

"It's just what my husband told me to do," said the woman. "He said that if you raised any objections I was to take the work home with me and return it to you when I was through."

When the old lady heard this she said, "Wu the Elder really knows how to do things right, doesn't he? If that's the way you want it, young lady, I guess I'll have to accept, at least for the time being."

The old lady was afraid of interrupting the proceedings. Adding some money of her own, she went out to buy food and wine of good quality, along with some unusual delicacies, and waited upon her assiduously.

Gentle reader take note: Nine out of ten of the women of this world, no matter how smart they are, prove susceptible to flattery.

The old lady prepared an enticing repast of food and wine and invited her guest to partake of it. Afterward the woman continued sewing for a while, until late afternoon, when she returned home with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.

To make a long story short, the third day, after breakfast, Dame Wang waited until she had seen Wu the Elder go out and then went to her back door and called out, "Young lady, may I make so bold?"

"I'm on my way," the woman responded from the second floor.

After they had greeted each other they repaired to Dame Wang's room, where she got out her work in order to go on with the sewing. Dame Wang made haste to pour the tea and they had a cup together, after which the woman continued to sew until it was nearly noon.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had hardly been able to wait for this day. Dressing himself up to befit the occasion, taking three or five taels of silver along with him, and sporting his gold-flecked Szechwan fan, he swaggered off in the direction of Amethyst Street.

When he arrived at the door of Dame Wang's teashop he coughed and called out, "Godmother Wang, why haven't I seen anything of you the last few days?"

Dame Wang caught on immediately and responded with the words, "Who is that calling after this old body?"

"It's me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The old lady bustled out to see who it was and then said, with a laugh, "I had no idea who it could be, but it turns out to be you, sir. You've arrived in the nick of time. Come into my room and see who's here."

Taking hold of Hsi-men Ch'ing by the sleeve, with one tug she pulled him into the room where, addressing herself to the woman, she said, "This is the very gentleman who was kind enough to give these materials to me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look at the woman.

Her cloudy locks rose up like serried hills;

Her fair countenance evoked an air of spring.

She was wearing a white linen blouse with a peach red skirt and a blue vest as she sat there in the room, working on her sewing. When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come in she lowered her head.

Hsi-men Ch'ing quickly stepped forward and made her a bow as he uttered a word of greeting. The woman put down her work and returned his salutation.

Dame Wang then said, "It was rare generosity on this gentleman's part to give me these bolts of pongee and damask. They've been sitting at home for over a year now without my having time to get them made up. I'm greatly indebted to this young lady, my next-door neighbor, who has volunteered her services in making them up for me. Her needlework is as regular as any turned out on a loom, it's so close and fine. Such a thing is rarely to be seen. Just come take a look at it, sir."

Hsi-men Ch'ing picked up the garments and made appreciative noises as he examined them.

"Where could this young lady have learned to do such needlework?" he exclaimed. "It looks just like the work of a goddess or immortal."

"Don't make fun of me, sir," the woman said with a smile.

Hsi-men Ch'ing deliberately proceeded to inquire of Dame Wang, "Godmother, I hardly dare ask, but whose household does this young lady belong to?"

"Make a guess, sir," said Dame Wang.

"How could I hope to guess correctly?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Dame Wang laughed out loud and said, "Please sit down, sir, and I'll tell you all about it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down across the table from the woman and Dame Wang said, "Let me tell you, sir. Remember what happened to you when you were walking under the eaves here the other day? Well it served you right, sir."

"You mean to tell me she's the one whose forked stick fell on my hairnet¹⁹ the other day as I passed by her door?" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I still have no idea whose household she belongs to."

"I'm afraid I may have unintentionally shaken you up a bit the other day, sir," said the woman. "Please don't hold it against me." As she said this she stood up and made him a bow.

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned her salutation with alacrity and said, "How could I dream of such a thing?"

"This same lady," said Dame Wang, "is the wife of Wu the Elder who lives next door."

"So you're Wu the Elder's wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I know your husband only as a hardworking family man who plies his trade in the streets. He has never given offense to anyone, high or low. He knows how to make a living and has a good disposition. Truly, men such as he are not easily come by."

"True enough," said Dame Wang. "Ever since the young lady has been married to Wu the Elder she's been:

Obedient to his every whim.

They really hit it off with each other."

"My husband is an utterly useless person," said the woman. "Don't make fun of me that way, sir."

"You're mistaken, young lady," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As the poet says:

Flexibility is the root of success;

Adamancy is the womb of misfortune.²⁰

When one has a husband as irreproachable as yours, who:

Though he possess ten thousand fathoms of water will not suffer a drop to escape;²¹

And strives throughout his entire lifetime to set an example of integrity, how could he be anything but an asset?"

For some time Dame Wang kept up a steady drumbeat of praise for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Turning to the woman she said, "Young lady, do you know who this gentleman is?"

"No I don't," she replied.

"This gentleman," said Dame Wang, "is one of the more substantial citizens of the locality. Even His Honor, the district magistrate, consorts with him, and addresses him as the Honorable Hsi-men. He disposes of property worth tens of thousands of strings of cash and owns the wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen. In his home:

The piles of money reach higher than the dipper,

The stores of rotting rice suggest a granary.

What is yellow is gold,

What is white is silver,

What are round are pearls,

What sparkle are jewels.²²

And he also possesses:

Horns off the rhinoceros's head, and Tusks out of the elephant's mouth.²³

In addition to which:

He lends money to officials, and

Is very well connected.

At the time of his present marriage I played the role of go-between. His wife is Battalion Commander Wu's daughter, who's just as clever as can be."

Then, turning to Hsi-men Ch'ing, she asked, "Sir, how is it you haven't dropped in to my place for a cup of tea for lo these many days?"

"It's all on account of my daughter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She's just been betrothed to someone and I've been tied up for some time."

"Who has your young lady been betrothed to?" asked Dame Wang. "And why didn't you employ me as go-between?"

"She's betrothed to Ch'en Ching-chi,"²⁴ said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the son of that Ch'en family that's related by marriage to Yang Chien, the commander in chief of the 800,000 imperial guards in the Eastern Capital. He's only sixteen years old and is still going to school. In any other circumstances we would have asked you to represent us, Godmother, but they took the initiative by sending a certain Auntie Wen to propose the match; so we countered by asking that Auntie Hsüeh who is constantly to be seen around our place peddling costume jewelry to be coguarantor, and we have consented to the terms. If you would like to come, Godmother, I'll send someone to invite you over, one day soon, when they present us with the ritual gift of tea."

The old lady laughed uproariously. "I was only kidding, sir. We go-betweens are a pretty bitchy bunch. When they were conducting the negotiations I was nowhere to be seen. Why should I be entitled to a share of the feast they have earned by their own efforts? As the saying goes:

Fellow professionals can't abide each other.

It will be more appropriate if I wait until the bride has been carried over the threshold and then go pay a call on the third-day or fifth-day celebrations, with a present in hand, in hopes of getting a bite to eat. There's no point in antagonizing people."

The two of them carried on an animated dialogue for some time, in which the old lady pulled out all the stops in her exaggerated praise of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Meanwhile, the woman merely lowered her head and continued to sew. There is a poem that testifies to this:

It has always been the nature of women to be like water;
Behind their husbands' backs they betray them with other men.
In her heart Chin-lien hankers after
Hsi-men Ch'ing;
Once her desires are aroused she can no longer control them.²⁵

Hsi-men Ch'ing sensed that Chin-lien was well-disposed toward him and could hardly wait to begin coupling with her. Dame Wang poured two cups of tea and served one to Hsi-men Ch'ing and one to the woman, saying, "Young lady, have a little tea with the gentleman."

By the time they had finished their tea they were already exchanging meaningful glances. Dame Wang looked at Hsi-men Ch'ing and stroked her cheek with a finger. Hsi-men Ch'ing understood that five-tenths of the glow-game had already been achieved. It's always been true that:

Romantic affairs are consummated over tea, and Wine is the go-between of lust.²⁶

"If you hadn't dropped by, sir," said Dame Wang, "I would not have presumed to visit your home in order to issue an invitation. In the first place:

This meeting was fated to occur;

and in the second place:

You've arrived in the nick of time.

As the saying goes:

One guest does not trouble two hosts.²⁷

You have provided the money, sir, and this young lady has provided her skills. I'm greatly indebted to both of you benefactors. If I hadn't:

Asked her a favor, as one troupier to another,
there would scarcely be any reason for this young lady to grace us with her presence. Why don't you play the role of host, sir, by coming up with the silver to buy some food and wine, in order to show this young lady how much her efforts are appreciated?"

"How stupid of me not to have thought of it myself," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've got some silver right here." He reached into his wallet, pulled out a lump of silver of about a tael's value, and gave it to Dame Wang to buy the food and wine with.

"There's no need to put the gentleman to all this trouble," said the woman, but, although she uttered the protest, she made no effort to withdraw.

Dame Wang accepted the money and on her way out the door said, "Be so good as to keep the gentleman company for a few minutes, young lady. I'll be right back."

"Don't bother, Godmother," said the woman, but she made no effort to withdraw.

By now both of them had the same idea in mind. Dame Wang went out the door, leaving them in the room together. Hsi-men Ch'ing couldn't take his eyes off the woman, and she, too, stole surreptitious glances at him. When she saw what a handsome figure he cut she was more than half inclined in his favor, but again she merely lowered her head and continued to sew.

Before long Dame Wang returned from her shopping expedition with a plump cooked goose, a roast duck, baked meats, salted fish, and other delicacies.

When she had put them out on platters and plates she arranged them on the table in her room and said to the woman, "Young lady, why don't you set your work aside for a minute and have a cup of wine?"

"You keep the gentleman company if you like," said the woman. "It's not proper for me to do so."

"But all this has been provided for the sole purpose of showing you how much your efforts are appreciated," the old lady protested. "How can you say such a thing?" And she proceeded to set the platters of food down right in front of her.

When the three of them had sat down at their places the wine was poured. Picking up a cup of wine and holding it out to her in his hand, Hsi-men Ch'ing addressed the woman with the words, "Please don't refuse me. Bottoms up."

The woman declined, saying, "You're very kind, sir, but I have so little capacity that I couldn't handle it."

"I know perfectly well you could swallow the ocean itself," said Dame Wang. "Please relax and have a cup or two."

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Since "Boys and girls are forbidden, to occupy the same mat";²⁸

Flaunting one's beauty and inviting seduction have perennial appeal.
Not only did Cho Wen-chün, once upon a time, elope with Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju;²⁹
But, even today, a Hsi-men Ch'ing may enjoy the favors of a Chin-lien.³⁰

The woman took the cup of wine and saluted each of the others in turn.

Hsi-men Ch'ing picked up his chopsticks and said, "Godmother, do me the favor of urging the young lady to have something to eat."

Dame Wang picked out the best tidbits and put them on the woman's plate. After the third round of drinks the old lady went to heat some more wine.

"I hardly dare ask," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how old you are, young lady?"

"I'm twenty-four," the woman responded. "I was born in the year of the dragon, on the ninth day of the first month, at two o'clock in the morning."

"You're the same age as my wife, then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was also born in the year wu-ch'en,³¹ the year of the dragon, but you're seven months older than she is. She was born on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, at midnight."

"How can you compare Heaven to Earth?" said the woman. "You'll be the death of me yet."

"This young lady is an intelligent person," interjected Dame Wang. "She's as clever as can be. It's no wonder her needlework's as good as it is. As for the works of the hundred schools, backgammon, elephant chess, and the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts, she's thoroughly versed in them all. She even writes a good hand."

"Where could one hope to find the like!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Wu the Elder is a lucky man, indeed, to have this young lady as his wife."

"I wouldn't want to make invidious comparisons, sir," said Dame Wang, "but you've got quite a few ladies in your own household, and which one of them is a match for this young lady?"

"That's no more than the truth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It's a long story.

I guess it's just my bad luck not to have found a good one yet."

"Your first wife was all right, wasn't she, sir?" said Dame Wang.

"Don't talk to me about my first wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If she were still alive, things wouldn't be the way they are.

When the family lacks a ruler,
The household is topsy-turvy.³²

I've got three, five, maybe seven bedmates around the place right now, but a lot of good it does me. All they can do is eat; none of them is willing to take charge of anything."

"If that's the way things are, sir," asked the woman, "how many years has it been since your first wife died?"

"I don't even like to talk about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "My first wife's maiden name was Ch'en. Although she was only of humble origin, she was as clever as could be. She was always able to act on my behalf whenever the occasion arose. But now, unfortunately, she's dead. It happened more than three years ago. Since my remarriage, my second wife has been sick so much of the time she hasn't been able to take charge. As a result, everything in the household is:

All at sevens and eights.³³

That's why I spend so much of my time out of the house. When I'm at home all I do is get upset."

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "don't take it amiss if I speak bluntly. Neither your first wife nor your present wife could match the needlework of Wu the Elder's lady, not to mention her looks."

"For that matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "my first wife also lacked the romantic air of Wu the Elder's lady."

The old lady laughed. "Sir, what about that mistress you've been maintaining—the one who lives on East Street—why haven't you had me over for a cup of tea?"

"You must mean the ballad singer, Chang Hsi-ch'un," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "When I realized she was nothing but a street musician I grew tired of her."

"Sir," said the old lady, "you've been carrying on with Li Chiao-erh, from the licensed quarter, for some time."

"As for her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've already taken her into my establishment. If she had been able to run the household, I would have made her my legitimate wife."

"You're on good terms with Cho the Second too," said Dame Wang.

"I've also taken Cho Tiu-erh into my establishment as my Number Three," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "But recently she's come down with an indisposition that she doesn't seem able to shake."

"If I ever came across anyone who might tickle your fancy to the extent that Wu the Elder's lady does," inquired Dame Wang, "would you have any objection if I paid you a call to broach the subject?"

"Both my father and my mother are dead," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so I'm my own master. Who would dare to say me nay?"

"I'm only joking," said Dame Wang. "Where could I ever find anyone who tickled your fancy to that extent?"

"It's not that there's none to be had," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's just that my meager matrimonial affinities have prevented me from encountering one."

The two of them had carried on an animated dialogue for some time when Dame Wang exclaimed, "Just when we're having such a good time, the wine has run out. Don't take it amiss, sir, if I seem to be ordering you about; but what would you think of buying another bottle of wine?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled out the three or four taels of loose silver remaining in his wallet and gave them to Dame Wang, saying, "You take these and use them to buy more if we run out of anything. If it's too much, keep the difference."

The old lady thanked him and got up to go. When she glanced at Chin-lien she saw that she had reached that state in which:

Three cups of wine in the stomach
ignite the flames of desire.

From the manner in which they were:

Talking back and forth,

it was obvious that by now both of them had the same idea in mind. The woman merely lowered her head, but didn't budge from her seat. Truly:

The natural beauty of the vista
remains unseen;
In spring the peach blossoms bloom
all by themselves.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The messages conveyed by her eyes and brows have never ceased;
The love match is about to be consummated with a romantic partner.
In her greed for reward Dame Wang possesses no other skill;
Than flowery words and a cleverly specious tongue.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 4

THE HUSSY COMMITS ADULTERY BEHIND WU THE ELDER'S BACK; YÜN-KO IN HIS ANGER RAISES A RUMPUS IN THE TEASHOP

Wine and beauty frequently occasion the ruination of the state;
From of old, good looks have been the undoing of the loyal and the true.
The royal house of King Chou came to an end because of Ta-chi;¹
The sacred altars of the state of Wu perished on account of Hsi-shih.²
Those who care only for the joys of youth, seeking pleasure where they may;

Remain oblivious to the disasters lurking beneath the powdered smile.³

Hsi-men Ch'ing allowed himself to become so enamored of Chin-lien's beauty;
That he abandoned the domestic doe to pursue the high-stepping hind.

THE STORY GOES that as Dame Wang started out the door with Hsi-men Ch'ing's money in hand she turned to the woman with an ingratiating smile and said, "I'm just popping out into the street to get a bottle of wine. Be so good as to keep the gentleman company for a few minutes, young lady. There's a little wine left in the pot, so if you run out you can pour another couple of cups and share them with the gentleman. I'm going to go all the way to East Street, where I can be sure of getting a bottle of the best quality, so I'll be gone quite a while."

On hearing this the woman said, "Godmother, don't go. I've already had enough wine. I don't need any more."

"Ai-ya!" Dame Wang exclaimed. "Young lady, it's not as though the gentleman were anyone else. If you haven't anything else to do, why not share a cup with him? What is there to be afraid of?"

Although the woman said, "I don't need any more," she sat where she was and didn't budge from her seat. Dame Wang put the latch on the door and fastened it with a piece of cord so that the two of them were locked inside the room together. Then she sat down on the curb and devoted herself to spinning thread in order to pass the time.

To resume our story, inside the room Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the woman.

 Her cloudy locks were half askew, and Her creamy breasts slightly exposed.

On her powdered face the colors red and white formed a pleasing contrast. Picking up the pot, he continued to ply the woman with wine.

After a while, pretending to be hot, he took off his green silk jacket and said, "I wonder, young lady, if you would hang this over the bedrail of Godmother's bed for me?"

Nothing loath, the woman took it in her hand and disposed of it as directed. Hsi-men Ch'ing then deliberately brushed a pair of chopsticks off the table with his sleeve so that they fell to the floor. It is clear that: This meeting was fated to occur, for the chopsticks came to rest right beside the woman's feet. Hsi-men Ch'ing quickly stooped down to pick them up. Behold: The up-turned points of her tiny golden lotuses,

 Barely three inches long,

 But half a span in length,

 Peeked out beside the chopsticks.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ignored the chopsticks but gave a gentle pinch to the embroidered tip of her shoe.

The woman laughed out loud. "There's no need to beat around the bush, sir.

 If you've got a mind to it,

 I've got the will.⁴

Are you actually trying to seduce me?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing got down on his knees with the plea, "Young lady, make a happy man of me."

The woman then embraced Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "My only fear is that Godmother may come back and catch us in the act."

"It doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "she's already in on it."

At this juncture, right there in Dame Wang's room, the two of them: Took off their clothes, undid their girdles, and Enjoyed each other on the same pillow.

Behold:

 Their necks entwined, the mandarin ducks sport in the water;

 Their heads together, the phoenixes thread the flowers.

The Hussy Commits Adultery behind Wu the Elder's Back

How joyous their delight as the growing branches intertwine;
How sweet their pleasure as the lover's knot is tied.
The one sticks tightly with his ruby lips;
The other clings closely with her powdered face.
Silk stockings in the air,

Two new moons rise above his shoulders;
Gold hairpins askew,
A black cloud piles up beside the pillow.
Swearing eternal fidelity,
He kneads her into a thousand shapes of compliance;
Bashful at the clouds and rain,
She submits with ten thousand forms of complaisance.
The pleasing cries of the oriole,
Are never absent from his ears;
Forever moist with sweet spittle,
She smiles as she sticks out her tongue.
Her willow waist droops with the weight of teeming spring;
Her cherry mouth is slightly split with panting breath.
As her starry eyes grow dim,
Tiny beads of sweat form on her fragrant jade body;
As her creamy breasts heave,
A stream of dewdrops drips into the heart of the peony.
Despite the fact that they are both well matched and compatible;
How true it is that "Stolen delights always taste the best."⁵

The two of them had just finished with the clouds and rain and were about to get dressed when they were interrupted by Dame Wang, who pushed open the door of the room and walked right in on them.

With a great show of consternation,
Clapping her hands and beating her palms, she said, "A fine thing the two of you have been up to!"

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Chin-lien were both caught by surprise. The old woman then addressed herself to the latter, saying, "Fine! Just fine! I asked you over here to do a job for me, not to do a job on a man. When Wu the Elder finds out, I'm going to be implicated. I might as well tell him about it before anyone else does." Having said which, she turned around and started out the door.

The woman was thrown into such a panic by this that she caught hold of her by the skirt and got down on her knees with the plea, "Godmother, forgive us!"

"You'll both have to agree to one condition if there's to be any hope of that," said Dame Wang.

"Don't talk about one condition," said the woman. "If you were to impose ten conditions, Godmother, I'd agree to them."

"Every day from now on," said Dame Wang, "you must agree to keep Wu the Elder in the dark and never to disappoint this gentleman, no matter whether he calls for you early or late. Then and only then will I agree to call it quits. If you refuse to come even once I'll tell Wu the Elder all about it."

"I'll do whatever you say," the woman replied.

Dame Wang then said, "As for you, sir, there's no need for me to remind you. All ten parts of this glow-game have been carried to a successful conclusion, so you can't very well renege on what you promised me. If you show bad faith by going away and not coming back again, I'll also tell Wu the Elder all about it."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can relax. I won't go back on my word."

"There's no way of holding the two of you to your word," said Dame Wang, "unless you exchange tokens of some kind as mementoes of your feelings."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then pulled a silver hairpin with a gold head out of his own hair and inserted it into the woman's cloudy locks. Fearing that Wu the Elder might suspect something if he saw it, she pulled it out and put it in her sleeve, from which she drew out a handkerchief which she gave to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who also put it away out of sight.

The three of them drank another few cups of wine together, by which time it was late afternoon. The woman then got up and said, "It's about time for that bastard, Wu the Elder, to be getting back. I'd better go home."

She then took her leave of Dame Wang and Hsi-men Ch'ing and slipped into her own house through the back door. Once there, she barely had time to take down the blind over the front door before Wu the Elder came in.

To resume our story, Dame Wang looked at Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "Now was that a good scheme, or wasn't it?"

"I'm greatly indebted to you, Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Truly: In intelligence you rival Sui Ho;

In resourcefulness you outdo Lu Chia.

Not one woman out of ten could escape your designs."

"And did this filly live up to your expectations?" asked Dame Wang.

"Why:

'She's two under full four words!'"⁶ replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"She got her start in life as a privately owned singing girl," said the old lady. "There isn't much she doesn't know about anything. And it was all my doing that has: Cast you in the roles of man and wife, and Contrived to make you a couple.

Whatever you do, don't forget what you promised me."

"You really outdid yourself, Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "When I get home I'll pick out an ingot of silver for you and bring it over myself.

Whenever I promise anything,
I never fail to deliver."

Dame Wang said:

"My eyes are on the lookout for the flag of victory,
My ears are always on the alert for good tidings."⁷

Just don't leave me in the predicament of:

Trying to collect the fee for the professional mourners after the coffin has already been interred."⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied:

"Whenever one gets so much as a
tangerine peel to eat;
One should never forget Tung-t'ing Lake from whence it came."

Then, after checking to see that the coast was clear, he put on his eye shades, laughed, and departed. But no more of this.

The next day he returned to Dame Wang's shop and called for some tea. Dame Wang offered him a seat and hastened to pour out a cup for him. When he had finished his tea Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled a ten-tael ingot of silver out of his sleeve and handed it to Dame Wang.

Generally speaking, nothing moves the people of this world so much as money.

When the old lady's black eyes caught sight of this "snowflake" silver⁹ she tucked it away: As though nothing in Heaven or Earth could make her happier,

and saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing with a double bow, saying, "Many thanks for your generosity, sir."

She then went on to say, "I haven't seen Wu the Elder go out yet. If you'll wait a minute, I'll step over there and ask to borrow a gourd dipper so I can see if he's still there."

And she proceeded to slip over to the woman's house by the back door. The woman was in the main room serving Wu the Elder his breakfast.

When she heard someone at the door she asked Ying-erh, "Who is it?"

"It's Granny Wang," Ying-erh replied. "She wants to borrow our gourd."

The woman hastened out to greet her, saying, "Godmother, the gourd's right here. You can have it whenever you want. Why don't you come in and sit down for a minute?"

"There's no one over there to tend the shop," said the old lady.

As she spoke she made a sign with her hand which the woman understood to mean that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come and was waiting for her.

As soon as her visitor had picked up the gourd dipper and gone out the door, the woman urged Wu the Elder to finish his breakfast, shoulder his carrying pole, and start on his way.

After going upstairs, redoing her makeup, and changing into an attractive new outfit, she said to Ying-erh, "I want you to look after the house for me. I'm just going over to your Granny Wang's place for a visit; I'll be back before long. If your daddy comes home, be sure to let me know. If you don't do as I say, you little wretch, I'll beat your bottom right off!"¹⁰

Ying-erh nodded her assent. But no more of this.

The woman went over to Dame Wang's teashop to keep her tryst with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Truly: The coupled halves of the peach stone serve to evoke a chuckle;

Because inside, it will be found, lie

yet another couple.¹¹

There is a poem composed of double meanings that testifies to this: This gourd's a gourd, the mouth of which is small,

the body large.

When young, up in its breezy arbor,

it's high-slung;

But when it grows bigger, it becomes hard enough to bite.

How could it have hung in there with Yen Hui, content with privation for principle's sake;¹²

When all it wanted to do was bob about on the water in the spring breeze?

When you really need it
it falls down on the job;
But whether you want it or not it's always hanging about;
Until you feel you simply have to take it in hand.

It contributes its stale share to the work of the stable;
And is not infrequently called upon in the teahouse.
You may not want it any more than Hsü Yu did,¹³
but can scarcely do without it;
And from its dark interior you never know what nostrum will come out.¹⁴

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the woman come in he felt:

Just as though she had fallen from Heaven.

The two of them sat down:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,
while Dame Wang served them a cup of tea.

"When you went home yesterday," the old lady inquired, "did Wu the Elder raise any questions?"

"He asked whether I had finished the work on your burial garments yet," the woman said. "I replied that the garments themselves were finished, but that I was still working on the shoes and stockings."

As soon as this problem had been disposed of the old lady made haste to provide some wine. She served it to them in her own room and they immediately fell to exchanging cups and enjoying themselves without restraint. Hsi-men Ch'ing examined the woman closely and she looked even more beautiful to him than the first time he had seen her. After a few drinks, the colors red and white formed a pleasing contrast on her powdered face, the temples of which were adorned with two long spit curls. Truly: She was the equal of any immortal, and Excelled even the goddess Ch'ang-o.

There is a song to the tune "Intoxicated in the East Wind" that testifies to this: How provocative are the red and white tints of her flesh;

How lovable is this delectable maid.
Trailing a silk skirt of halcyon hue,
Beneath the gathered sleeves of a gold-flecked blouse;
In her joyous abandon her chignon has fallen askew.
She is the very picture of Ch'ang-o come down from the moon;
The like of which you could not buy for a thousand pieces of gold.¹⁵

Hsi-men Ch'ing couldn't say enough in her praise. Taking her onto his lap, he lifted her skirt far enough to catch a glimpse of her pair of tiny feet, enclosed in black satin shoes, just half a span in length. His heart was filled with delight. The two of them passed the same cup of wine back and forth between them and laughed and joked with each other.

The woman then asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "How old are you?"

"I'm twenty-seven," he replied. "I was born in the year of the tiger on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month, at midnight."

"How many ladies do you have in your household?" the woman asked.

"Aside from my wife," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've got three or four other bedmates at home. It's just that none of them really tickles my fancy."

"And how many sons have you got?" the woman asked.

"All I have is a young daughter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who's about to get married. I don't have any other children."

After they had laughed and joked with each other for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing reached into his sleeve and pulled out a cylindrical silver pillbox that contained breath-sweetening lozenges¹⁶ flavored with osmanthus. One at a time he proceeded to put these into the woman's mouth on the tip of his tongue. The two of them then fell to: Hugging and embracing each other,

Like snakes darting out their tongues.

The sound of their sucking was audible.

Dame Wang was so preoccupied with serving food and pouring wine that she could hardly concern herself with what went on between them, and left them in her room to enjoy themselves as they pleased.

In a little while, when they had both had enough wine to: Ignite the flames of desire, Hsi-men Ch'ing's lustful thoughts got the better of him. Exposing the organ that lay between his loins, he induced the woman to manipulate it with her slender fingers.

It so happens that ever since his youth Hsi-men Ch'ing had frequented the streets and alleys of the licensed quarter and patronized the women who dwelt there. About the base of his member he wore a clasp that had been: Beaten out of silver, and Imbrued with drugs, which had the effect of making that organ both large and long. It was: Dark red, with black whiskers;

Straight standing, firm, and hard;
a fine object, indeed! There is a poem about its characteristics that testifies to this: There is an object that has always been about six inches long;

Sometimes it is soft and at other times
it is hard.
When soft, like a drunkard, it falls down either to the east or the west;
When hard, like a mad monk, it runs amok either above or below.

It makes it's living by traveling in and out of virgin territory;
It makes its home beneath the navel in the Province of the Loins.
It has two sons who always accompany it wherever it goes;
In how many skirmishes, with how many beauties, has it emerged the victor?

It was not long before the woman had taken off her clothes and Hsi-men Ch'ing discovered, by both visual and tactile means, that her mount of Venus had been depilated of its pubic hair. It was: Pale and fragrant,

Plump to bursting,
Soft and yielding,
Red and wrinkly,
Tight and squeezey;
Beloved of thousands,
Craved by tens of thousands;
Who could tell what it might be?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Warm and tight, fragrant and dry, it tastes better than lotus root;
It knows how to be soft and yielding and to make itself agreeable.
When happy, it sticks out its tongue, opens its mouth, and smiles;
When tired, it collapses lazily into itself and takes a nap.
The name of the place it makes its home is Crotch County;
Its old garden is to be found beside the sparsely wooded slopes.
If it should ever encounter a dashing
young gentleman;
It will engage him in battle, without a word,
on the slightest pretext.

To make a long story short, from that day on, the woman slipped over to Dame Wang's teashop every day to keep her tryst with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Their feelings for each other were like lacquer;
The love in their hearts was like glue.

It has always been true that:

Good deeds seldom become known beyond the gate; Bad deeds are quickly transmitted a thousand li.¹⁷

In less than half a month the whole neighborhood knew what was going on, with the sole exception of Wu the Elder, who remained in the dark. Truly: The only thing he knew was that it was his duty to abide by his lot;

What did he know about defending himself from deceit or foul play?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

As always, "Good deeds seldom become known beyond the gate";
Whereas bad deeds and evil talk are quickly noised abroad.
How pitiful it is that Wu the Elder's lawful wife;

Should surreptitiously become the consort of Hsi-men Ch'ing.¹⁸

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, there was in the same district a certain youngster who was just fourteen or fifteen years old and whose surname was Ch'iao. Because he had been born in Yün-chou, where his father was serving in the army at the time, people referred to him by the nickname Yün-ko, or Little Yün. The only remaining member of his family was his father, who was now well advanced in years. The lad was clever by nature and managed to scrape a living by peddling fresh fruits in the wineshops that were clustered near the front gate of the district yamen. Hsi-men Ch'ing was one of his patrons and often gave him a little extra to help with his expenses.

One day he set out to look for Hsi-men Ch'ing with a basket of snow pears for sale. As he was going his rounds a certain busybody said to him, "Yün-ko, if that's who you're looking for, I can tell you a place where you'll be sure to find him."

"Thanks, Uncle," said Yün-ko. "If you help me find him I can pick up thirty or fifty cash toward the expenses of keeping my old father alive. You'll be doing a good deed."

"Listen to me," said the busybody. "Hsi-men Ch'ing is carrying on an affair with the wife of Wu the Elder, who sells steamed wheat cakes. Every day he can be found sitting around in Dame Wang's teashop on Amethyst Street. He's almost certainly there at this very moment. You're still just a kid, so even if you walk right in on him it won't make any difference."

On hearing this Yün-ko said, "Thanks for your help, Uncle."

The little monkey then picked up his basket and headed straight for Dame Wang's teashop in Amethyst Street. When he got there he found Dame Wang sitting on a short bench, spinning hemp thread.

Yün-ko put his basket down and bowed to Dame Wang with the words, "Greetings to you, Godmother."

"What brings you here, Yün-ko?" asked the old lady.

"I'm looking for the gentleman in order to pick up thirty or fifty cash toward the expenses of keeping my old father alive," said Yün-ko.

"What gentleman is that?" asked the old lady.

"You know perfectly well who I mean," said Yün-ko. "That's the one."

"He may be a gentleman," said the old lady, "but even gentlemen have names."

"I mean the one who has two characters in his surname," said Yün-ko.

"And what two characters might they be?" inquired the old lady.

"All you ever do is joke, Godmother," said Yün-ko. "I want to have a word with the Honorable Hsi-men."

As he said these words he proceeded to walk in toward the interior of the shop. The old lady grabbed hold of him with one hand and said, "Little monkey, where do you think you're going!"

In every house there are areas that are private, and areas that are public."

"If you'll just let me into your room," said Yün-ko, "I'll find him for you soon enough."

"You cocksucking little monkey!" Dame Wang cursed at him. "What would the Honorable Hsi-men be doing in my room?"

"Godmother," said Yün-ko:

"Don't try to keep it all for yourself;
Spare me a mouthful of leftover gravy."¹⁹

Do you think I don't know what's going on?"

"You little monkey!" cursed the old lady. "What do you know about anything!"

Yün-ko said, "You don't give much away do you? Truly:

You do your chopping in a wooden ladle with a horseshoe blade."²⁰

Not one drop escapes;

Not even half a drop ever hits the floor.

If you make me tell the whole story, I fear our brother who sells steamed wheat cakes may kick up a fuss."

When the old lady heard these words, which struck her right on her sore spot, she was enraged and shouted, "You cocksucking little monkey! You think you can come farting around my place, do you!"

"If I'm a little monkey," said Yün-ko, "you're nothing but a procuress, a pandering old bitch!"

Yün-ko in His Anger Raises a Rumpus in the Teashop

The old lady tightened her grip on Yün-ko and gave him a couple of sharp raps on the head with her knuckles.

"Who do you think you're hitting!" Yün-ko yelled at her.

"You lousy mother-fucking little monkey!" the old lady cursed. "If you raise your voice again I'll drive you out of here with a couple of good boxes on the ear!"

"You lousy old bloodsucker!" responded Yün-ko. "You think you can start a fight with me over nothing, do you!"

Pushing him before her with one hand around his neck, and rapping him on the head as hard as she could with the knuckles of her other hand, the old lady drove him right out into the street and threw his basket of snow pears after him. The snow pears went rolling hither and yon all over the street.

The old lady had been too much for the little monkey to handle. Cursing and crying and scurrying all over the street after his pears, he pointed at Dame Wang's teashop and unleashed a flood of imprecation.

"Don't you worry, you old bloodsucker! Just wait and see whether I tell him what's up and blow this whole thing wide open or not! By the time I'm through your shop will be a shambles and you'll have no way to make a living!"

At this point the little monkey picked up his basket and ran off to search the streets for a certain person, but he couldn't find him. If Yün-ko should find this person, truly: Though Dame Wang's deeds were done in the past,

Today the chickens would come home to roost.²¹

As a result of this event:

The Spirit of the Perilous Paths²² would strip himself for action;

The little monkey's revelations would lead to disaster.²³

If you don't know who Yün-ko set out to look for, and

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 5

YÜN-KO LENDS A HAND BY CURSING DAME WANG; THE HUSSY ADMINISTERS POISON TO WU THE ELDER

If you ever apprehend the Ch'an enigma posed by the word "romance";
You'll find that good affinities often turn out to be bad affinities.¹
In the heat of passion, everyone becomes enamored of it; Looked at dispassionately, everyone comes to despise it.²
The flowers by the wayside ought not to be plucked;

Natural beauty and sound substance are safer by far.
A rustic wife, your own children,
and everyday fare;
Are unlikely to lead to either lovesickness or penury.³

THE STORY GOES that Yün-ko, after his rough treatment at the hands of Dame Wang, had no place to vent his spleen. When he picked up his basket and ran off to search the streets it was Wu the Elder that he was looking for. He hadn't gone more than two blocks when whom should he see but Wu the Elder, shouldering his load of steamed wheat cakes, coming along the very street he was on.

As soon as he saw him Yün-ko stopped in his tracks and said to Wu the Elder, "I haven't seen you for ages. You're really putting on the fat aren't you?"

Wu the Elder put down his carrying pole and said, "I'm just the same as I've always been. Since when am I putting on any fat?"

"The other day," said Yün-ko, "I wanted to buy some bran, but couldn't find any, no matter where I looked. Everyone said you had some at home."

"I don't raise geese or ducks," said Wu the Elder. "What would I want with bran?"

"You say you've no use for bran," said Yün-ko. "In that case, how did you get so overstuffed yourself? Even if I picked you up by the feet and put you in a pot to boil, you wouldn't let off any steam?"

"You cocksucking monkey!" said Wu the Elder. "That's a fine suggestion to make! My wife isn't playing at ducks and drakes with anyone, so why should you call me a 'duck'?"⁴

"If your wife isn't playing at ducks and drakes with anyone," said Yün-ko, "she's playing at drakes and ducks."

Wu the Elder grabbed hold of Yün-ko and said, "Tell me who it is then."

"You're laughable," said Yün-ko. "You may be brave enough to grab hold of me, but I'll bet you aren't brave enough to bite off his left one for him."

"Good Little Brother," said Wu the Elder, "Just tell me who it is and I'll give you ten steamed wheat cakes."

"Steamed wheat cakes alone won't do the trick," said Yün-ko. "But if you treat me to three cups of wine I'll tell you."

"I didn't know you could drink," said Wu the Elder. "Follow me."

Wu the Elder shouldered his carrying pole and led Yün-ko to a small wineshop. When they got there he put down his load, took along a few steamed wheat cakes, and then ordered up some meat and a jug of wine.

When Yün-ko had finished these off he said, "Don't bother with any more wine, but I could use a few more slices of meat."

"Good Little Brother," said Wu the Elder, "please! Tell me who it is."

"Don't worry," said Yün-ko, "I'll tell you as soon as I've finished eating. And don't get too upset. I'll help you to nab him."

When Wu the Elder had watched the monkey finish off the meat and wine he said, "Now, tell me who it is."

"If you want to know," said Yün-ko, "take your hand and feel these lumps on my head."

"Where did you ever get such lumps from?" asked Wu the Elder.

"I'll tell you," said Yün-ko. "Today I took this basket of snow pears and set out to look for the Honorable Hsi-men, in the hope of getting a little something out of him. But I couldn't find him anywhere I looked. Someone on the street told me, 'He's probably in Dame Wang's teashop. He's carrying on an affair with Wu the Elder's wife and hangs around there all the time.'"

"I had hoped that if I ran into him I could pick up thirty or fifty cash to spend, but that intolerable old pig and dog, Dame Wang, not only wouldn't let me into her room to look for him, but drove me out of her place with a couple of sharp raps on the head with her knuckles. So I set out especially to look for you. When I ran into you just now I needed you a few times, deliberately. If I hadn't needed you, you never would have asked anything about it."

"Really," said Wu the Elder.

"Can such things be?"⁵

"There you go again," said Yün-ko. "I was afraid you might be just such a fart of a fuck-off! The two of them are certainly having an easy time of it. All they have to do is wait until you're out of the way and then make out together in Dame Wang's room. And you ask me if it's true or if it's false! Do you think I'm just kidding you for the fun of it?"

When Wu the Elder heard this he said, "Brother, there's no reason for me to deceive you. That woman of mine has been going over to Dame Wang's place every day, allegedly to help her with some sewing of clothes, or shoes and stockings. When she comes home her face is red. My first wife left a daughter behind, and whenever that woman feels like it she:

Beats her in the morning and curses her at night,⁶ or doesn't give her any food to eat. Moreover, the last couple of days she's been acting rather peculiar, as if she wasn't any too happy to see me. In fact, I've been wondering what was wrong myself. What you've told me would explain it. Now then, I'd better leave my load in a safe place and go catch them in the act. What do you say?"

"For a man of your age," said Yün-ko, "you haven't any sense. That old bitch, Dame Wang, is not to be trifled with. If you have a run-in with her you're not likely to escape unscathed. Moreover, the three of them must have a prearranged signal, so if the old lady sees you come in to nab them, your wife will have time to hide. That Hsi-men Ch'ing is a pretty tough customer. He can handle twenty of the likes of you. If you fail to catch them in the act you may end up getting a good drubbing for your pains. On top of which, he's got both money and influence. If he were to lodge a complaint against you, and you were dragged into court without anyone to take your side, you could easily end up losing your life for nothing."

"Brother," said Wu the Elder, "everything you say is true; but how can I let off this head of steam?"

"I took a beating at Dame Wang's hands," said Yün-ko, "and I too have no place to vent my spleen. Let me suggest a move to you. Today, when you go home, don't kick up a fuss or say anything about it. Just act the same way you do every day. Tomorrow morning, make a smaller number of steamed wheat cakes than usual and come out to sell them. I'll be lying in wait at the mouth of the alley, and when I see Hsi-men Ch'ing go in I'll come and tell you. You can then shoulder your carrying pole and wait nearby while I go in and distract the old bitch, who's sure to pick a fight with me. At that point I'll throw my fruit basket out into the middle of the street as a signal for you to come charging in. I'll pin the old lady against the wall with my head while you dash into the room and raise the hue and cry. How's that for a plan?"

"If it goes as you say, Brother," said Wu the Elder, "I'll be greatly indebted to you. I've got several strings of cash here which I'll give you. Be sure to be there first thing in the morning to wait for me at the mouth of the alley on Amethyst Street."

Yün-ko collected his few strings of cash and some steamed wheat cakes and then went his way. Wu the Elder, for his part, paid the bill, shouldered his carrying pole, and made another round before heading for home.

It so happens that the woman, accustomed as she was to railing at Wu the Elder and abusing him in every way, had been sufficiently troubled in recent days by a bad conscience to go out of her way to be nice to him. That evening when Wu the Elder came home, shouldering his carrying pole, he acted just the way he always did and didn't bring anything up.

"Darling," said the woman, "how about a cup of wine?"

"I've just had three cups with another vendor," said Wu the Elder.

The woman then prepared supper and they ate it together. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, after breakfast, Wu the Elder made only two or three trays of steamed wheat cakes and loaded them on his carrying pole. The woman was too preoccupied with Hsi-men Ch'ing to notice how many wheat cakes he made. Wu the Elder shouldered his carrying pole and went out to ply his trade. The woman could hardly wait until he was out the door before slipping over to Dame Wang's teashop to wait for Hsi-men Ch'ing.

To resume our story, Wu the Elder shouldered his carrying pole and headed straight for the mouth of the alley on Amethyst Street, where he found Yün-ko already on the lookout, with his fruit basket in hand.

"Has anything happened?" asked Wu the Elder.

"It's early yet," said Yün-ko. "You might as well make one of your regular rounds. By the time you're through that bastard will probably have shown up. You just wait nearby, don't go too far away."

Like a cloud scudding before the wind, Wu the Elder completed one of his regular rounds and came back again.

"You just watch for my fruit basket," said Yün-ko. "When it comes flying out, you go charging in."

Wu the Elder stowed his load in a safe place. But no more of this.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Tigers deploy the revenants of their prey,⁷ birds are snared with decoys;
Victims remain in the dark until the trap is sprung, while predators do as they please.
Yün-ko exposes Hsi-men Ch'ing's crime for all to see;⁸
But Dame Wang's handling of the affair
is remarkable indeed.

To resume our story, Yün-ko picked up his basket and headed straight for the teashop, where he opened fire on Dame Wang with the words, "You old pig and dog! Just who did you think you were hitting yesterday?"

The old lady's character remained unaltered. Jumping to her feet, she shouted at him, "You little monkey! I've never had anything to do with you. What are you coming around here to abuse me again for?"

"If I curse you," replied Yün-ko, "for being a procuress and a pandering old bitch, it matters about as much as my prick!"

The old lady was enraged and, grabbing hold of Yün-ko, started to beat him with her fists.

With the shout, "You dare to strike me, do you!" Yün-ko threw the fruit basket in his hand out into the middle of the street.

The old lady tried to get a firmer grip on him, but the little monkey, with another cry of "You dare to strike me, do you!" put both arms around Dame Wang's waist, buried his head in the pit of her stomach, and pushed for all he was worth. He nearly knocked her over, but she backed into the wall, which prevented her from falling down. The monkey held her pinned against the wall with all his strength.

At this point Wu the Elder lifted up his clothes and came charging into the teashop in giant strides. When the old lady saw who it was and realized that he meant business, she tried to block his path, but the little monkey continued to hold her pinned against the wall with all his strength and wouldn't let her budge. All the old woman could do was to yell out, "Wu the Elder has come!"

Inside Dame Wang's room the woman, who was already entwined with Hsi-men Ch'ing, was barely able to extricate herself fast enough to rush to the door and hold it fast. Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, proceeded to dive under the bed.

Wu the Elder charged up to the door and gave it a shove, but he was unable to push it open and could only call out,

"That's a fine thing you're up to!"

The woman was in a state of panic. Continuing to hold the door shut she said, "You're always shooting off your fucking mouth, boasting about how good you are at the martial arts, but when it comes to the crunch you're no use at all! Even a paper tiger can scare you to death!"

The woman's words were clearly intended to get Hsi-men Ch'ing to confront Wu the Elder and fight his way out of the predicament. Hsi-men Ch'ing was still under the bed, but when he heard these words they had the effect of stimulating him to action.

Crawling out from his hiding place he said, "Lady, it's not that I don't have what it takes. It's just that, for the moment, I couldn't think what to do." Then, unbarring the door, he called out, "Come in, if you dare!"

Wu the Elder made a grab at him, but Hsi-men Ch'ing countered with a swift kick, and his assailant was so short that Hsi-men Ch'ing caught him squarely in the solar plexus with his foot and knocked him flat on his back.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Wu the Elder was down and out he took advantage of the confusion to beat a hasty retreat. Yün-ko also, seeing that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, abandoned Dame Wang and took to his heels. The neighbors in the area all knew that Hsi-men Ch'ing was a tough customer, and none of them wanted to interfere in the matter.

At this point Dame Wang attempted to get Wu the Elder back on his feet. When she saw that he was spitting blood and that his face had turned as sallow as wax, she called the woman out to fetch a bowl of water, with the help of which they succeeded in reviving him. Putting his arms over their shoulders, the two of them managed to help him through the back door and up to the second story room of his own house, where they put him to bed. Of the events of that night there is nothing more to tell.

The next day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing found out that nothing had come of the incident, he showed up at Dame Wang's place to keep his tryst with the woman as usual. Their only hope was that Wu the Elder would die.

The injuries he had sustained were serious enough to keep him from getting up or going out for five days. On top of which:

When he wanted soup, there was none to be had;

When he wanted water, there was none to be had.⁹

Every day he called on his wife for help, but she refused to respond. He had to lie there and watch as she dolled herself up before going out, and when she returned her face was red.

The woman even prohibited his daughter, Ying-erh, from coming to his aid, threatening her with the words, "You little wretch! If you give him so much as a cup of water to drink without telling me, you'd better look out."

Ying-erh was so intimidated by this that she didn't dare serve her father a mouthful of soup. On several occasions Wu the Elder fainted away from sheer indignation, but there was no one to pay any attention.

One day Wu the Elder told his wife he had something important to say to her and addressed her as follows: "As for what you've been up to, I caught you red-handed in the act of adultery, and you turned around and egged your lover into kicking me in the solar plexus, so that now:

Though I seek to live, I cannot live;

Though I seek to die, I cannot die,¹⁰

while all the time the two of you are off enjoying yourselves together. If I die it scarcely matters. I don't have the strength to contend with you any longer. But my younger brother, Wu the Second—you know what sort of a person he is—when he returns—as he will, sooner or later—he'll scarcely be willing to call it quits. If you consent to take pity on me, and help me to recover as soon as possible, when he comes back I won't say anything about it. But if you refuse to look after me, when he comes home he'll have something to say to you."

When the woman heard this speech she made no reply but slipped over to Dame Wang's place and repeated it, word for word, to the old woman and Hsi-men Ch'ing. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard what she had to say it was:

Just as though he had been dunked in a tub of ice water.¹¹

"That's bad!" he said. "I understand that Captain Wu who killed the tiger on Ching-yang Ridge is the number one stout fellow in Ch'ing-ho district. But right now:

Having been lovers for many a day;

Our feelings and thoughts are one,

We can never agree to be separated.¹²

If what you say is true, what are we to do? It's a bad situation all right!"

Dame Wang laughed sardonically and said, "I've never seen anything like it. You're the helmsman and I'm merely a sculler, but I'm not worried about it while you're in a state of panic."

"I may be a man," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but for all that, when it comes to situations like this, I don't know what to do. If you've got any ideas, please do whatever you can to protect us."

"If you want me to protect you," said Dame Wang, "I've got a plan that should do the trick. Do you want to be 'long-term man and wife' or 'short-term man and wife'?"

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what do you mean by 'long-term man and wife' and 'short-term man and wife'?"

"If you want to be 'short-term man and wife,' " said Dame Wang, "you should separate from each other this very day, wait until Wu the Elder has recovered, and offer him an apology. Then, when Wu the Second comes back, he won't say anything about it, and you can wait until he's sent away on another mission to get together again. That's what I mean by 'short term man and wife.' But if you want to be 'long-term man and wife,' to spend every day together without having to:

Anticipate surprise and suffer fear,¹³

I've got a splendid plan for you. The only thing is it's not an easy subject to broach."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "please help us out. The only thing we want is to be 'long-term man and wife.' "

"This plan," said Dame Wang, "requires something that no one else has got, but which you, sir:

As Heaven begets so Heaven disposes,¹⁴ happen to possess."

"Even if it were my eyes you wanted," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'd gouge them out and give them to you. What is this thing anyway?"

"Right now," said Dame Wang, "this 'knockabout'¹⁵ is in pretty bad shape. This presents you with the opportunity to take action against him while he's incapacitated. You, sir, should go home and pick up some arsenic from your pharmaceutical shop and then get the young lady to buy a dose of heart medicine, mix the arsenic in with it, and polish off this runt once and for all. If you cremate the body afterward you'll have gotten him completely out of the way, without leaving a trace behind. Then, even if Wu the Second comes back, what will he be able to do about it? It's always been the case that:

In one's first marriage one must obey one's parents;

In subsequent marriages one can suit oneself.¹⁶

Your brother-in-law will have nothing to say in the matter. You can continue to see each other clandestinely, and after half a year or a year the dust will have settled. Then, as soon as the mourning period for your husband expires, the gentleman can pop you into a sedan chair and take you into his household as a concubine. Then you can be 'long-term man and wife' and:

Live happily ever after.

How's that for a plan?"

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "this plan is splendid indeed. It's always been true that:

If one wants to be able to enjoy life,

One has to be prepared to risk death.¹⁷

Enough! Enough! Enough! One must either:

Refuse to do something;

Or not stop at anything."¹⁸

"That's the spirit," said Dame Wang. "This is a situation in which:

One must cut the weeds and pull up the roots,

So that new sprouts will not grow;

If one cuts the weeds without pulling up the roots,

When spring comes new sprouts will grow."¹⁹

The only problem remaining is how to proceed. You, sir, should go straight home and bring this ingredient as quickly as possible. I'll instruct the young lady on what she is to do. When the affair is accomplished I expect to be amply rewarded."

"Naturally," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that goes without saying."

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Obsessed with thoughts of clouds and rain,
the two of them are inseparable;
Yearning for beauty, hankering after flowers,
he will not call it quits.
In the final analysis, in this world such things do happen;
Wu the Elder will lose his life at the hands of a painted face.²⁰

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had not been gone for long when he returned with a packet of arsenic, which he handed over to Dame Wang, who put it away.

Turning her attention to the woman, she said, "Young lady, I'll tell you how to administer the medicine. Didn't Wu the Elder say to you, this very day, that he wanted you to help him recover? You must take advantage of this opening by playing up to him with every trick at your disposal. If he asks you for any medication, mix this arsenic in with some heart medicine before administering it to him. If he realizes that something is wrong and starts to struggle, just pour the rest of it down his throat before you jump off the bed. When the poison starts to take effect his stomach and intestines will burst and he may cry out. You must muffle his cries with a quilt so no one will hear, holding the quilt in place as tightly as you can. You must also heat a pan of hot water beforehand and put a rag to soak in it. When the poison takes effect there may be hemorrhaging from all his seven apertures as well as telltale marks where he has bitten his lips. After he stops breathing you must remove the quilt, take the rag that you have soaked in hot water, and wipe away any signs of blood. Then he can be popped into a coffin, carted out of town, and cremated. There's nothing to it."

"That's all very fine," said the woman, "but I'm afraid, when the time comes, I may lose my nerve and be unable to handle the corpse."

"That's no problem," said the old lady. "Just knock on the wall and I'll come over to help you."

"Do the best you can," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tomorrow morning at the fifth watch I'll come by to see what's happened." Having said which, he made his way home.

Dame Wang took the arsenic and rolled it between her fingers into a fine powder, after which she gave it to the woman to take home and hide away in a safe place. The woman went upstairs to see how Wu the Elder was and found him:

With barely two breaths left in his body,²¹ manifestly on the brink of death. The woman sat down on the side of the bed and pretended to weep.

"What are you weeping about?" asked Wu the Elder.

The woman wiped away her tears and said, "In a moment of weakness I let that Hsi-men Ch'ing take advantage of me, but I never expected he would end up kicking you in the solar plexus. I've heard of a place that has good prescriptions for sale, and I'd like to go buy one for you, but I'm afraid you might be suspicious, so I haven't ventured to go and get it."

"If you help me to recover," said Wu the Elder, "so I'm all right again, I'll:

Wipe the slate clean with a single stroke,²² and won't even hold a grudge against you. When Wu the Second comes back I won't say anything about it. Please go buy the medicine as quickly as possible and help me to recover."

The woman picked up some copper cash and went directly to Dame Wang's place, where she sat down and got the old lady to buy the medicine for her.

Then she took it back upstairs and showed it to Wu the Elder, saying, "This is a dose of heart medicine. The doctor said if you take it late in the evening and then get a good night's sleep, with a couple of quilts over you to make you sweat, you can be up and about tomorrow."

"That's wonderful," said Wu the Elder. "I'm putting you to a lot of trouble. If you're willing to sacrifice a little sleep tonight, you can stay up and fix it for me when the time comes."

"Just relax and try to get some sleep," said the woman. "I'll take care of everything for you."

Gradually darkness began to fall. In the house the woman lit a lamp and heated a large pan of hot water, into which she put a rag to soak. She listened for the sound of the drum that signaled the night watches and eventually heard the third watch struck. First the woman poured the arsenic into a cup and then she scooped up a bowl of boiling water and took them upstairs.

"Darling, where did you put the medicine?" she called out.

"It's under the bed mat, beside my pillow," said Wu the Elder. "Hurry up and fix it for me."

The woman lifted up the mat, shook the medicine into the cup, and set the packet aside. Then she poured the hot water into the cup and, pulling a silver hairpin out of her hair, used it to stir the contents until it was all dissolved. With her left hand she helped Wu the Elder sit up in bed while with her right hand she held the medicine to his mouth.

Wu the Elder swallowed a mouthful and said, "Darling, this medicine really tastes awful."

"As long as it cures what ails you," the woman said, "what difference does it make whether it tastes awful or not?"

While Wu the Elder was swallowing his second mouthful the woman took advantage of the situation to pour the entire contents of the cup down his throat in one gulp. Then she laid him back down and hastily jumped off the bed.

Wu the Elder gave a groan and said, "Darling, no sooner did I swallow the medicine than my stomach began to hurt. It's bad! It's bad! It's more than I can take."

The woman then proceeded to take two quilts from the foot of the bed and put them hugger-mugger over his head and face.

"I'm suffocating," called out Wu the Elder as loudly as he could.

"The doctor told me," the woman responded, "that if I really made you sweat you'd get better that much faster."

Wu the Elder tried to say something more, but the woman was afraid he might put up a struggle so she jumped onto the bed, sat astride Wu the Elder's body,²³ and pressed down on the edge of the quilt with all her might, not letting up to the slightest degree. Truly:

Hot grease sears his chest and lungs;
Flames scorch his liver and intestines.
His heart cavity is encroached upon by gleaming blades;

His entrails are rudely invaded by steely knives.
His whole body feels as cold as ice;
His seven apertures all begin to hemorrhage.
His teeth are tightly clenched;
His three ethereal souls flee to the City of the Unjustly Dead.
His throat is dry and parched;
His seven material souls head for the Terrace of Homeward Gazing Spirits.²⁴
The legions of Hell are further augmented by one poison-eating ghost;
The world of the living is diminished by one adulterer-seizing man.²⁵

At this point Wu the Elder groaned twice and panted for a little while. Then his stomach and intestines burst and:

Alas and alack,
he was no longer able to move.

When the woman removed the quilt and saw that Wu the Elder had been:

Grinding and gnashing his teeth,²⁶ and that he had hemorrhaged from all seven apertures, she was afraid. It was all she could do to jump off the bed and knock on the wall. When Dame Wang heard the knock she came over to the back door and gave a cough, at which the woman came downstairs to let her in.

“Is it all over or not?” asked Dame Wang.

“It’s all over all right,” said the woman, “but I’ve lost my nerve and can’t handle it.”

“What’s so hard about it?” said Dame Wang. “I’ll help you take care of everything.”

The old lady rolled up her sleeves, scooped up a bucketful of hot water, threw the rag into it, and lugged it upstairs. Then she rolled up the quilts, wiped away all traces of coagulated blood from around Wu the Elder’s lips and seven apertures, and placed his clothes on top of the body. The two of them then carried him downstairs, one step at a time, and laid him out on the leaf of an old door. Once there, they combed his hair, placed a turban on his head, dressed him, and put on his shoes and stockings. Then they stretched a strip of white damask over his face and covered the corpse with a clean quilt. After they had gone back upstairs and cleaned everything up, Dame Wang went home and the woman commenced the charade of loudly bewailing the loss of her provider.

The Hussy Administers Poison to Wu the Elder

Gentle reader take note: It so happens that, generally speaking, the women of this world have three ways of weeping. If there are tears as well as sound, it is called weeping. If there are tears but no sound, it is called sobbing. If there are no tears but there is sound, it is called howling.²⁷

The woman howled, without shedding a tear, for the remainder of the night.

The next morning at the fifth watch, before it was light, Hsi-men Ch'ing hurried over to find out what had happened. When Dame Wang had told him all the details he pulled out some silver and gave it to her to cover the cost of a coffin and the other funeral arrangements. Then they called the woman over for a conference.

When the woman arrived she said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Now that Wu the Elder is dead I'm completely dependent on you, sir. Don't put me in the position of:

The rings that hold your hairnet in place: always at the back of your head."²⁸

"What need is there for you to trouble yourself about that?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"And if you should betray me," the woman asked, "what then?"

"If I ever betray you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "may I suffer the same fate as your Wu the Elder."

"Sir," said Dame Wang, "that's enough idle chatter for the time being. Right now there's only one thing that's important. Later this morning the local constable must supervise the encoffining ceremony, and if the coroner's assistant notices anything suspicious, what will we do then? The head coroner's assistant, Ho the Ninth, doesn't miss a trick. My only fear is that he may not permit the encoffining."

"That's no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh. "I'll simply tell Ho the Ninth what to do. He wouldn't dare refuse a request from me."

"You'd better go speak to him immediately," said Dame Wang, "before it's too late."

Having turned the silver over to Dame Wang to buy the coffin, Hsi-men Ch'ing then went off to deal with Ho the Ninth. Truly:

The three luminaries cast shadows, but who can catch them;
The ten thousand things have no roots, they just arise of themselves.²⁹
Concealed by the snow, the presence of the egrets is not seen until they fly;
Hidden by the willows, the existence of the parrots is not known until they speak.³⁰

If you don't know what Hsi-men Ch'ing said to Ho the Ninth, and
If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 6

HSI-MEN CH'ING SUBORNS HO THE NINTH; DAME WANG FETCHES WINE AND ENCOUNTERS A DOWNPOUR

How reprehensible is the wanton fellow, enamored of the flowers by the wayside;
It is because of his insatiable lust that he brings troubles on his head.
His body will perish and his life be lost solely on this account;
His property will be destroyed and his family ruined for this reason alone.
Romantic passion lasts but a moment; what value does it have?
Its taste is quite ordinary; it is nothing to boast about.
One day "catastrophe will arise within the screen-wall of the house";¹
And it will owe its inception to the machinations of Dame Wang.²

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing went off to deal with Ho the Ninth.

To resume our story, Dame Wang took the silver and set out to buy a coffin and appropriate objects to bury with the dead. She also bought incense, candles, paper money, and so forth. After she had returned she consulted with the woman, and they lighted a vigil lamp and placed it before Wu the Elder's spirit tablet.

The neighbors from the locality all came to see what was going on, and the woman pretended to hide her painted face as she shed crocodile tears.

"What illness did Wu the Elder die of?" the neighbors asked.

"My husband suffered from severe pains in the region of the heart," the woman replied. "Who could have anticipated that they would grow worse and worse as the days went by, until it became apparent that he was unlikely to recover? Unfortunately last night, during the third watch, he died. It's really terrible!" And she commenced once more the charade of loud weeping and wailing.

The neighbors were perfectly well aware that the deceased had died under suspicious circumstances, but they did not venture to inquire into them any too closely. They all attempted to comfort her with the words, "The dead are dead. The living must get on as best they can. Try to control your grief, young lady. The weather's too hot for it."

The woman had no choice but to pretend to thank them all, and they went their separate ways.

When Dame Wang had supervised the delivery of the coffin she went out again to request the attendance of the head coroner's assistant, Ho the Ninth, and to buy everything that was required for the encoffining ceremony and other household needs. Then she went to the Pao-en Temple, or Temple of Kindness Requited, and engaged two Ch'an monks to come that evening to keep vigil and perform a mass for the dead. It was not long before Ho the Ninth sent a couple of coroner's assistants ahead of him to take care of the preliminaries.

To resume our story, at about 10:00 A.M. Ho the Ninth himself set forth at a leisurely pace. When he arrived at the mouth of the alley on Amethyst Street he encountered Hsi-men Ch'ing, who called out to him, "Ho the Ninth, where are you headed?"

"I'm just going down the street here," replied Ho the Ninth, "to encoffin the corpse of Wu the Elder, who sold steamed wheat cakes."

"Walk a few steps with me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've got something to say to you."

Ho the Ninth followed Hsi-men Ch'ing into a small wineshop on the corner, where they occupied a private booth.

"Old Ninth, please take the seat of honor," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Who am I," said Ho the Ninth, "to presume to sit down in your presence, sir?"

"Old Ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why be so standoffish? Please, have a seat."

The two of them dickered politely for a while and then sat down. Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered the waiter to bring a bottle of their best wine. The waiter set out an array of appetizers, nuts, and so forth, suitable to accompany a drinking party, and then heated the wine for them.

Ho the Ninth was somewhat apprehensive. "Hsi-men Ch'ing has never bothered to have a drink with me before," he thought to himself. "This cup of wine today is sure to have something funny behind it."

The two of them had been drinking together for some time when, lo and behold, Hsi-men Ch'ing fumbled in his sleeve, pulled out an ingot of "snowflake" silver, and placed it in front of him, saying, "Old Ninth, please don't despise this, insignificant though it may be. I'll give you a further expression of my gratitude another day."

Ho the Ninth folded his hands in front of him and said, "Having never done the slightest thing to deserve it, sir, how could I possibly accept this silver from you? But if you have a command, sir, I could scarcely presume to refuse."

Hsi-men Ch'ing Suborns Ho the Ninth

"Old Ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "don't be so standoffish. Please take it."

"Tell me what you have in mind, sir," said Ho the Ninth, "no matter what it is."

"It isn't anything much," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and in a little while the family will also give you something for your pains. The only thing is, right now, when you encoffin Wu the Elder's corpse, I'd be much obliged if you'd take care of everything, and: Draw an embroidered quilt over it,³ that's all. Need I say more?"

"I thought you were going to ask me to do something demanding," said Ho the Ninth. "What does a little thing like that matter? How could I possibly accept your silver for that, sir?"

"Old Ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you don't accept it, you'll be refusing me."

Ho the Ninth had always been rather afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing for his unscrupulousness and his influence in official quarters, so he felt that he had no recourse but to accept the proffered silver.

After they had finished another few cups of wine, Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned the waiter and said, "Put it on the tab and come to my shop to collect the money tomorrow."

The two of them then went downstairs and out the door of the wineshop.

As they were on the point of parting Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Old Ninth, be sure to remember. If you keep your mouth shut I'll reward you further on another day."

Having issued his instructions, he then went about his business.

Ho the Ninth was somewhat apprehensive. "It's my responsibility to encoffin Wu the Elder's corpse," he thought to himself. "Why should he give me these ten taels of silver? There's sure to be something funny about this business."

When he arrived at the door of Wu the Elder's house he found the pair of coroner's assistants that he had sent ahead waiting for him there. Dame Wang had also been waiting for a long time and had been questioning them about his whereabouts.

Ho the Ninth asked the coroner's assistants, "What illness did Wu the Elder die of?"

"His family says he died of heart trouble," said the coroner's assistants.

Ho the Ninth approached the door, pulled the hanging blind aside, and went inside.

Dame Wang greeted him with the words, "We've been waiting for you a long time. The Yin-yang Master's already been here half the day. Old Ninth, what's been keeping you so long?"

"Something came up that prevented me from getting here any sooner," said Ho the Ninth. "I'm afraid I'm a little late."

At this point he caught sight of the woman who came out from the interior of the house dressed in plain white clothes, with a white paper cap over her chignon, feigning tears.

"Try to control your grief, young lady," said Ho the Ninth. "Your husband is surely in Heaven by now."

The woman pretended to wipe away her tears, saying, "I can't tell you how terrible it is. My husband was stricken with heart trouble and in only a few days lost his life, just like that. It's really terrible to be so bereaved."

Ho the Ninth looked the woman over from top to toe and thought to himself, "Hitherto I've only heard tell of Wu the Elder's wife without ever having set eyes on her myself. So this is the sort of woman Wu the Elder managed to keep in his house. Hsi-men Ch'ing's ten taels of silver have not been spent for nothing."

Then he went over by the spirit tablet and prepared to examine Wu the Elder's corpse. As soon as the Yin-yang Master had finished reciting his text, Ho the Ninth lifted aside the funeral banderole and removed the strip of white damask that had been stretched over the face of the deceased. No sooner did he concentrate the gaze of those vigilant organs of his, with their: Five concentric rings,

Eight precious attributes, and

Two spots of magic liquid,⁴ than he perceived that Wu the Elder's:

Fingernails were black,

Lips were purple,

Face was sallow,

Eyes protruded,⁵

and knew he had been poisoned.

The two coroner's assistants who were standing to either side asked him, "Why is it that his face is purple, there are toothmarks on his lips, and signs of bleeding around his mouth?"

"Don't talk such nonsense!" said Ho the Ninth. "The weather's been extremely hot the last couple of days. A certain amount of deterioration is unavoidable under the circumstances."

He then proceeded, hugger-mugger,⁶ to go through the motions of a formal examination of the corpse, presided over the encoffining, and directed his subordinates to drive the two "longevity nails" into either side of the lid of the casket.

Dame Wang did her best to expedite the proceedings and when they were finished produced a string of cash for Ho the Ninth and his men and sent them on their way.

"When will the interment take place?" he asked.

"The lady of the house," replied Dame Wang, "wants the funeral procession to take place on the third day, after which the body will be cremated outside the city wall."

The coroner's assistants then went their separate ways.

That evening the woman laid on a feast and invited guests. The second day four monks were engaged to recite sutras. Early on the morning of the third day, during the fifth watch, the coroner's assistants came to carry the coffin. There were also a few neighbors from the locality who put on mourning and joined in the funeral procession.

The woman donned her mourning attire, sat in a sedan chair, and all along the way continued the charade of loudly bewailing the loss of her provider. When they arrived at the crematorium outside the city walls a fire was ignited, the coffin, along with Wu the Elder's corpse, was completely incinerated, and his bones were scattered in the pond provided for that purpose.

It so happens that the refreshments provided for the guests at the funeral ceremony that day were all paid for by Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When the woman returned home she set up a spirit tablet in the upstairs room on which were inscribed the words "Spirit Tablet of My Deceased Husband, Wu the Elder." In front of the spirit tablet she lit a glass lamp, hung up some gilded funeral streamers, and made offerings of paper money, imitation gold and silver ingots, and the like.

That day when Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman got together they sent Dame Wang back to her own home. The two of them then went upstairs and enjoyed themselves to their hearts' content. It was no longer the way it had been in Dame Wang's teashop when they had been confined to the furtive pleasures of: Snitching chickens and filching dogs.⁷ Now that Wu the Elder was dead there was no one in the house to hinder them and they were able to: Give free rein to their desires, and

Sleep together all night long.⁸

At the outset Hsi-men Ch'ing had been worried that the neighbors would realize what was going on, so he had always made a point of sitting around in Dame Wang's place for a while to keep up appearances. But now that Wu the Elder was dead he brought his body servant with him and went straight into the woman's house through the back door.

From this time on, he and the woman were inseparable.

Passion pervaded their breasts;

Their mutual love was like glue.⁹

He often stayed over with her for three or five nights in a row without going home. As a result, the members of his household, both high and low, were: All at sevens and eights, and became increasingly unhappy about the situation.

It so happens that the allure of feminine beauty ensnares men in such a way that: Where there is initial success,

There will be ultimate disaster.¹⁰

There is a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that testifies to this:

With lustful daring as big as the sky they can no longer control themselves;
Their passions deep, their love fast, the two are inseparable.¹¹
In their greed for pleasure they no longer care whether they live or die;
When infatuated who bothers to engage in self-cultivation?

As affection grows deeper,
The passions cloy;
The greater the love, the more long-lasting the resentment.
If one wished to dispel the enmity between the states of Wu and Yüeh;¹² Earth might age and Heaven waste away before it could be accomplished.

Light and darkness alternate swiftly;

The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

More than two months had now elapsed since Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman first consummated their affair. One day the Dragon Boat Festival, on the fifth day of the fifth month, rolled around. Behold: The swaying branches of the green willows hang like emerald threads;

The spots of color formed by the pomegranate blossoms are as red as rouge.

Ever so slightly, the breeze disturbs the curtains;

In whispering gusts, its coolness invades the doors.

Far and near, when the Dragon Boat Festival comes round;

In every house, goblets are raised in celebration.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was on his way back from a visit to the fair at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak¹³ when he stopped in at Dame Wang's teashop and sat down.

The old woman hastily poured out a cup of tea and asked, "Where are you coming from, sir; and why don't you go over and look in on the young lady?"

"I've been at the temple fair today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "On a festive occasion like this she's very much on my mind, so I thought I'd come pay her a visit."

"Her mother, old Mrs. P'an, is here today," said Dame Wang. "I doubt if she's left yet. I'll run over there for a look and then report back to you, sir."

When the old lady went over to her neighbor's house by way of the back door she found her drinking wine with old Mrs. P'an, just as she had expected.

As soon as the woman saw who it was she hastened to offer her a seat and said, with a smile, "Godmother, you've arrived in the nick of time. Keep my mother company, and: If you drink a cup of wine on entering the door,

You'll bear a bonny baby some day."¹⁴

"I haven't any old man," laughed the old lady, "so how could I produce a baby? But you're young and strong, perfectly fitted to produce one."

To which the woman replied, "As the saying goes:

Young flowers bear no fruit;

It's the old flowers that bear the fruit."

At this, Dame Wang turned to old Mrs. P'an and said, "Just look at the liberties your daughter takes with me. She's calling me an 'old beggar.'¹⁵ But she'll find a use for this 'old beggar' yet."

"She's been sharp-tongued like that ever since she was a child," said old Mrs. P'an. "You've got to make allowances for her, Godmother."

It so happens that Dame Wang, having brought Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman together, and enabled them to consummate their affair, devoted herself, early and late, to running errands for them, going out with the jug to buy wine, and so forth, and was dependent for her living on what she could make out of these transactions.

So she said to Chin-lien's mother, old Mrs. P'an, "This daughter of yours is just as clever as can be. She's a fine woman, make no mistake about it. I wonder what sort of man will have the luck to possess her in the future?"

"Godmother," said old Mrs. P'an, "since you're a matchmaker we must count entirely on you to bring that matter to a happy conclusion."

In the meantime the woman provided another place setting and poured out a cup of wine for her. Dame Wang drank a few cups with them until her face became bright red, but she was worried about keeping Hsi-men Ch'ing waiting too long, so she took the first opportunity to tip the woman a wink, said goodbye, and went home.

The woman realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come and did her best to expedite her mother's departure. Then she tidied up the room, lit some exotic incense, removed the remains of the repast she had been sharing with her mother, and prepared a brand new supply of wine and delicacies for the entertainment of Hsi-men Ch'ing. When that gentleman appeared on the terrace at the back of the house the woman came down the stairs to meet him, led him upstairs, greeted him with a bow, and offered him a seat.

It so happens that ever since Wu the Elder's death the woman had shown no inclination to wear mourning. She had put her husband's spirit tablet in a corner of the upstairs room and covered it with a sheet of white paper, and she neglected to set any offerings of soup or rice before it. Every day she dolled herself up, put on bright-colored clothing, made herself as attractive as possible, and enjoyed herself with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had not visited her for the last two days, so the woman started out by giving him a hard time. "You unfaithful scoundrel! What do you mean by abandoning me like that? You must have found another sweetheart somewhere to think you can just leave me in the cold and neglect to pay any further attention to me."

"One of my concubines died the other day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I've been busy with the funeral arrangements for the last two days. Today I went to the temple fair and bought some hair ornaments, jewelry, clothes, and the like for you."

The woman was delighted by this. Hsi-men Ch'ing called in his page boy, Tai-an, and then took the gifts out of the felt bag he had been carrying and showed them to her one at a time. Not until he was finished did the woman bow in thanks and put them away.

The woman had beaten her stepdaughter, Ying-erh, into such a state of terrified submission that she no longer felt it necessary to conceal anything from her and actually ordered her to serve tea to Hsi-men Ch'ing. The woman herself set the table in order to keep him company while he drank his tea.

"There's no need for you to bother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already given the money to Godmother to go out and buy wine, meat, appetizers, nuts, and so forth. On a festive occasion like this I wanted to spend a little time with you."

"This was originally prepared for my mother," said the woman, "but I saved enough of it to make a complete meal. If we wait until Godmother gets back it may be quite a while. Why don't we go ahead and start?"

The woman sat down next to Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Cheek to cheek,

Thigh to thigh, and Shoulder to shoulder, and they began to drink wine together.

To resume our story, Dame Wang had picked up a basket, taken along an eighteen-ounce steelyard, and gone out into the street to buy wine and meat.

It happened, at that time, to be early in the fifth month, when heavy rains were a frequent occurrence. Though the red sun might appear to dominate the sky, a thunderhead might appear at any moment and release a downpour like an overturned basin. Behold: Black clouds arise on all sides;

Dark fog immures the far heavens.

With a rushing sound,

It flies along, filling the heavens and blocking out the sun;

With pattering drops,

It beats a tattoo, as it strikes against the leaves of the plantain.

Assailed by a wild wind,

Skyscraping old cypresses are overturned;
Battered by thunderclaps,
The peaks of Mounts T'ai, Hua, Sung, and Ch'iao are shaken.
It quenches the flames and dispels the heat;
It moistens and nurtures the sprouts in the fields.
It quenches the flames and dispels the heat,
So that beauties are prone to appreciate it.
It moistens and nurtures the sprouts in the fields,
So that travelers are willing to forget the mud.

Truly:

The waters of the Yangtze, Huai, Yellow, and Chi rivers are newly augmented;
The emerald bamboo and the red pomegranate blossoms are rendered pristine.¹⁶

The old lady had picked up a bottle of wine, bought a basketful of fish, meat, chicken, goose, vegetables, fruit, nuts, and the like, and was returning along the street when she encountered this downpour. She ducked under the eaves of a house as quickly as she could and wrapped a kerchief around her head, but her clothes were completely soaked. She waited a while, until the rain let up a bit, and then raced for home like a cloud scudding before the wind.

Once inside the door, she put the provisions in the kitchen and then went upstairs, where she found the woman and Hsi-men Ch'ing drinking wine together.

"While you and the young lady have been living it up, sir," she said with an ingratiating smile, "just look at what's happened to my clothes. They're completely soaked. I'll have to ask you to replace them for me, sir."

"Just look at the old lady," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Did you ever see such an inveterate scrounger?"

Dame Wang Fetches Wine and Encounters a Downpour

"I'm no inveterate scrounger," said the old lady, "but at the very least, sir, you'll have to provide me with a bolt of aquamarine material."

"Godmother," said the woman, "what you need is some hot wine."

The old lady drank three cups with them and then said, "I'm going down to the kitchen to dry out my clothes."

After she had suited her actions to her words she cut up the chicken and goose, prepared the appetizers, put the fruit and nuts and so forth onto plates and saucers, and set them out in the upstairs room, together with some newly heated wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman:

Poured out some more of the superior wine,
Shared with each other the rare repast, and Fell to exchanging cups, thigh over thigh.

As he was drinking Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that there was a p'i-p'a, or balloon guitar, hanging on the wall, and said, "I've heard for some time what a fine musician you are. Today, whatever happens, you'll have to entertain me with a song while I drink my wine."

"I only picked up a few lines when I started to study music as a child," laughed the woman. "I'm really not very good. You mustn't laugh at me, sir."

Hsi-men Ch'ing took the p'i-p'a down from the wall, lifted the woman onto his lap, and watched her as she placed the instrument on her knees: Deftly extended her slender fingers,

Gently manipulated the icy strings, and played a languid accompaniment as she sang a song to the tune "Liang-t'ou nan": Without her headdress, too indolent to perform her toilet,

Her clouds of black silk coiled in a chignon and gleaming over her temples,
She fastens them in place with a slanting gold hairpin.
She calls out, "Maid servant,
Open the clothes chest for me,
So I can put on an outfit of plain white silk."
So attired, she rivals Hsi-shih herself in loveliness.
Emerging from her boudoir,
She calls out, "Maid servant,
Roll up the blind for me,
So I can burn a stick of evening incense."¹⁷

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he was so delighted he scarcely knew what to do with himself.

Putting an arm around her powdered neck, he gave her a kiss as he praised her performance, saying, "Darling, whoever would have thought you were as smart as all that? Not one of the singing girls I've known in the streets and alleys of the licensed quarter can play or sing as well as you do."

"After all you've done for me," laughed the woman, "I'm content, for the present, to be: Obedient to your every whim. Just be sure you don't forget me in the future."

Hsi-men Ch'ing pinched her cheeks and said, "How could I ever forget you, darling?"

The two of them were:

Entranced by the clouds and intoxicated by the rain,¹⁸
Laughing and joking at each other's expense.

After a while Hsi-men Ch'ing took off one of her embroidered shoes, held it in his hand while he put a little cup of wine in it, and then drank a "shoe cup"¹⁹ for the fun of it.

"My feet aren't as small as all that," said the woman. "Don't make fun of me, sir."

It wasn't long before the two of them began to feel the effects of the wine, whereupon they closed the door of the room, took off their clothes, got into bed, and began to play with each other.

Dame Wang put the crossbar on the front door and joined Ying-erh in the kitchen, where they made short work of the leftovers.

The two lovers in the upstairs room:

Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,²⁰
As inseparable as fish from water,²¹

as they gave themselves over completely to pleasure. The woman's mastery of the arts of the bedchamber was equal to that of any prostitute, and she pulled out all the stops in her endeavors to please her partner. Hsi-men Ch'ing, too, was on his mettle and eager to: Display his spearsmanship,²² to best advantage.

A woman of beauty and a man of talent,
Both of them were in the prime of life.

There is a poem that describes the picture they presented:

In the seclusion of the nuptial chamber the pillow and mat are cool;
The man of talent and woman of beauty approach the climax of their game.
No sooner have they embarked on "dipping the red candle upside down";²³ Than they suddenly switch to "punting the boat by night."²⁴ Rifling its fragrance, "the butterfly nibbles at the calyx of the flower";²⁵ Sporting with the water, "the dragonfly darts, now high, now low."
When pleasure reaches its height passions are intense, and feelings know no bounds;
As the mouth of the "divine turtle" disgorges its "silvery stream."²⁶

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing dallied in the woman's house until evening fell. As he was about to go home he left behind a few pieces of loose silver²⁷ to take care of her expenses. The woman did her best to keep him a while longer, but to no avail. Hsi-men Ch'ing put on his eye shades, walked out the door, and departed. After the woman had taken down the blind, closed the front door, and drunk a little more wine with Dame Wang, they went their separate ways. Truly: Linger at the door she saw young Master Liu upon his way;

Amid the misty waters and the peach blossoms he was soon lost to sight.²⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 7

AUNTIE HSÜEH PROPOSES A MATCH WITH MENG YÜ-LOU; AUNT YANG ANGRILY CURSES CHANG THE FOURTH

I play the role of matchmaker and am really rather good at it;
Entirely owing to the assiduity with which I ply my two legs.¹
My lethal lips are practiced at persuading widowers to remarry;
My trenchant tongue is capable of stirring the chaste widow's heart.
Lucky ribbons of festive red constantly adorn my head;
Party favors from wedding feasts are always present in my sleeves.
There is only one thing wrong with what I do;
Half my clients are helped but the other half are ruined.

THE STORY GOES that one day the same Auntie Hsüeh who was constantly to be seen around Hsi-men Ch'ing's household peddling costume jewelry set out with her box of trinkets and looked everywhere for Hsi-men Ch'ing but was unable to find him. Chancing to meet his page boy, Tai-an, she asked, "Where is your master?"

"Father's in the shop," replied Tai-an, "going over the accounts with Uncle Fu the Second."

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing's family were the proprietors of a wholesale pharmaceutical business, the hired manager of which was named Fu Ming. His courtesy name was Tzu-hsin, and he was the second sibling in his generation of the family, which is why he was referred to as Uncle Fu the Second.

Auntie Hsüeh went straight to the door of the shop, pulled the hanging blind aside, and saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was indeed inside, going over the accounts with his manager. She nodded to him and motioned for him to come outside. On seeing that it was Auntie Hsüeh, Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately abandoned his manager and came out to meet her, the two of them walking to a secluded spot where they could talk in private.

Auntie Hsüeh bowed to him with a word of greeting, and Hsi-men Ch'ing asked her what she had to say.

"I've come about a match that I'd like to propose to you, sir," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I guarantee she'll tickle your fancy, and she can take the place left by the death of your Third Lady. I've just been in the First Lady's quarters. She bought some of my trinkets and detained me for a cup of tea. I was there for an age, but I didn't dare bring up this subject. I thought it would be better if I found you first and broached it directly to you."

"The young lady in question is someone you probably already know about, sir. She's the legitimate widow of the owner of the Yang family's textile business outside the South Gate, and she's got a tidy sum of money at her disposal. She owns two Nanking beds, with retractable steps; four or five trunks full of clothing for all four seasons, figured gowns and so forth, packed so tightly you can't stick your hand into them; and pearl headbands and earrings, gold jewelry set with precious stones, and gold and silver bracelets and bangles, it goes without saying. In ready cash alone, she has more than a thousand taels of silver at her disposal. And she has two or three hundred bales of fine cotton drill² as well.

"Unfortunately, her husband died far away from home while he was out on the road selling textiles. She has been observing mourning for him for over a year now. She doesn't have any children of her own to worry about, only a young brother-in-law, who's just nine years old. There wouldn't be any point in maintaining her widowhood just for him. Her husband's paternal aunt is trying to persuade her to remarry."

"This year the young lady's no more than twenty-four or twenty-five. She's tall of stature and good-looking; in fact, when she's properly done up, she's as pretty as a figure on a decorative lantern. She's romantic and quick-witted, just as clever as can be, and as for the ability to take charge of a household, needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments, backgammon and elephant chess, and so forth, that goes without saying. There's no reason for me to deceive you, sir. Her maiden name is Meng, she's the third sibling in her generation, and she lives on Stinkwater Lane. Also, she's an expert performer on the moon guitar. If you consent to see her, sir, I guarantee you'll:

Hit the bull's-eye with the first arrow.³

How could anyone be as lucky as you, sir, to get all that dowry and a young lady to boot?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that the woman could play the moon guitar it struck a responsive note in his heart, so he asked Auntie Hsüeh, "How soon can I arrange to have a look at her?"

"I'll tell you what, sir," said Auntie Hsüeh, "having a look at her is not the first order of business. Right now the senior member of the Yang family is her husband's paternal aunt. There's also a maternal uncle of her husband, named Chang the Fourth, but since he's on the distaff side, he's:

Like the meat of the hickory nut: there's always a husk in between.⁴

This old lady was originally married to Crooked-head Sun and lives in a house belonging to Eunuch Director Hsü on Halfside Street in the northern quarter of the city. Since Crooked-head died, the old lady has maintained her widowhood for thirty or forty years. She doesn't have any children of either sex and depends on her nieces and nephews for support.

"It's too late to do anything about it today, but tomorrow I'll come meet you, sir, and we'll go dump the whole proposition in her lap.

If you appeal for help, appeal to Chang Liang;

If you appoint a general, appoint Han Hsin.⁵

"The only thing this old lady cares about is money. She knows perfectly well that her nephew's widow is well provided for. She doesn't really care whom she marries as long as she can make a few taels of silver out of it. Promise her a little extra silver, sir, and throw in a bolt of that thin satin you have so much of at home. Then, if you go talk it over with her in person, and present her with a bearer's load of appropriate gifts, you'll:

Knock her over with one blow.⁶

If anyone else raises any objections, as long as you've got this old lady behind you, there isn't much they'll dare do about it."

This single conversation with Auntie Hsüeh had such an effect on Hsi-men Ch'ing that:

Joy manifested itself about his temples

and between his brows;

Delight spread itself across his cheeks

and smiling face.⁷

Gentle reader take note: The matchmakers of this world are not really interested in anything but making money for themselves. What do they care whether their clients end up dead or alive? They will describe a marriage prospect who holds no office as an officeholder, and a position as concubine as though it were a position as legitimate wife. They are such inveterate liars they would attempt to deceive Heaven itself, and there is no truth whatever to be found in their asseverations. Truly:

Though the matchmaker did her utmost to promote the union;
Meng Yü-lou had already decided to marry a rich man.
Those with affinities will meet though separated by a thousand li;
Those without affinities will miss each other though face to face.⁸

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing agreed with Auntie Hsüeh that the next day would be a good time to buy some presents and go to the northern quarter of the city to pay a visit to Aunt Yang. When Auntie Hsüeh finished her spiel she picked up her box of trinkets and departed. Hsi-men Ch'ing went back into the shop and continued to go over the accounts with Manager Fu. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing rose early and dressed himself to befit the occasion. Then he picked out a bolt of material, bought four trays of preserved fruit, and hired a bearer to carry them. Hsi-men Ch'ing rode on horseback, accompanied by his page boy, and Auntie Hsüeh led the way straight to the door of Aunt Yang's dwelling in the house belonging to Eunuch Director Hsü on Halfside Street in the northern quarter of the city.

Auntie Hsüeh went in first to alert Aunt Yang to the fact that she had a visitor.

"A man of property from hereabouts," she told her, "is respectfully waiting outside your door. He is interested in discussing a match with the young lady. I told him that you were the senior member of the Yang family and suggested that he should pay you a visit and discuss the matter before I would presume to take him outside the gate to see the lady herself. I brought him along with me today, and he has already dismounted and is waiting outside your door at this very moment."

"Ai-ya!" the old lady exclaimed when she heard this. "Matchmaker, why didn't you let me know ahead of time?"

On the one hand, she ordered her maidservant to sweep the parlor, tidy it up, and brew some good tea, while on the other hand, she said, "Please, invite him to come in."

Auntie Hsüeh lost no time in taking charge of the proceedings. First she had the load of gifts brought in and properly displayed, and it was only after the bearer had been dispatched with his empty containers that she invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to come in.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was wearing a large palmetto hat, a long gown fastened at the waist with a sash, and white-soled black boots. When he entered the door and met the old lady he bowed to her four times. Leaning on her staff, the old lady made haste to return his salutation.

Hsi-men Ch'ing would not let her proceed, protesting again and again, "Aunt, please accept my salutation."

The two of them dickered politely for a while until the old lady agreed to accept a half kowtow from him. They then sat down in the positions appropriate for guest and host while Auntie Hsüeh took her place to one side.

"What is the gentleman's name?" the old lady asked.

"I just told you," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but you've already forgotten. This is the Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing, who is numbered among the most substantial men of property in Ch'ing-ho district. He owns the large wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen. He also engages in moneylending to both officials and functionaries. In his home:

The piles of money reach higher than the dipper,

The stores of rotting rice suggest a granary, but he lacks a wife with the ability to take charge of the household. On hearing that the young lady from your family who lives outside the South Gate wishes to remarry, he has come especially in order to discuss this match with you."

"As long as the two of you relatives-to-be are both here," Auntie Hsüeh continued:

"The holes in the water clock let it all spill out;⁹

If you have anything to say, now's the time to say it.

There's no call for you to complain about the lies of us matchmakers. Since you're the senior member of the family on the bride's side, if anyone who had anything to say didn't come talk to you first, Aunt, who else should they talk to?"

"If you wanted to discuss a match with my nephew's widow," the old lady said, "all you needed to do was drop by for a chat. What need was there to go to the trouble of buying all these presents? You put me in a position in which it would be:

Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept."

"Worthy Aunt," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'm afraid these presents are hardly worthy of the name."

The old lady bowed to him twice, expressed her gratitude, and had the presents put away, after which Auntie Hsüeh took the trays outside to where the bearer was waiting and then returned to keep them company.

Tea was served, and after they had finished drinking it, the old lady started the conversation by saying, "As far as I'm concerned:

Not to speak up when you ought to is to be a coward.¹⁰ When my nephew was alive he succeeded in amassing a considerable sum for himself, and now that he has, unfortunately, died it has all fallen into the hands of his widow. At the very least she is worth more than a thousand taels of silver. Whether it is your wish, sir, to make her your concubine or your legitimate wife is no concern of mine. All I care about is that a proper sutra-reading should be performed on my nephew's behalf. As his paternal aunt I am related to him by blood; it is not a distaff or marriage relationship. If you were to provide me with the cost of a coffin, it would not be as though I had made any exorbitant demands on you. In return, I'm prepared to hazard whatever face I've got left in this matter. I'll:

Cast myself in the role of a stinking rat,¹¹ for the benefit of that old dog, Chang the Fourth, and stick up for the two of you, come what may. After she has been carried over your threshold, sir, if you were to permit her to pay me a visit now and then on birthdays and such occasions, and acknowledge me as a poor relation, I would endeavor not to inflict my poverty upon you."

"Madam," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can relax on that score. I fully understand everything you've just said. Since you've broached the subject, madam, the cost of a single coffin is nothing to me. Even if it were ten coffins you wanted, I could afford it."

As he spoke, he reached inside the leg of his boot and drew out six ingots of five taels each, making a total of thirty taels of "snowflake" government silver.

Setting these down in front of her, he said, "This may not amount to much, madam, but I hope you will use it to buy a cup of tea. In the future, when the bride has been carried over my threshold, I will provide another seventy taels of silver and two bolts of satin toward your funeral expenses. You will always be a welcome guest in my home at any time of the year."

Gentle reader take note: In this world, money is like the brain and spinal cord of man in that it is the one indispensable thing that governs his every move.

When the black pupils of the old vixen's eyes saw the twenty or thirty taels of shiny government silver, she said with an ingratiating smile, "Worthy sir, I don't wish to be thought avaricious, but it has always been true that:

If the terms are settled at the outset,

Misunderstandings can be avoided later on."

"Madam," interjected Auntie Hsüeh from the side, "you're being more fastidious than you need to be. Such considerations are quite unnecessary in this case. The honorable gentleman is not that sort of person. After all he:

Sought to make your acquaintance with presents in hand.

You may not know it, madam, but even His Honor, the prefect, and His Honor, the district magistrate, consort with him. He is acquainted with people in many walks of life from all over the empire. You're not likely to make much of a dent in his resources."

This single conversation had such an effect on the old lady that she was ready to:

Fart ferociously and pee in her pants,¹² in her excitement. After she had entertained her guests a while longer and they had drunk a second serving of tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing indicated that he was ready to be on his way. The old lady politely endeavored to detain him, but to no avail.

Auntie Hsüeh said, "Since we've been able to see you today, Aunt, and discuss this matter, tomorrow we can proceed to go outside the South Gate and take a look at the young lady."

"There's no need for the gentleman to take the trouble to pay a call in order to size up my nephew's widow," said the old lady. "Matchmaker, just tell her that I said, 'If you don't marry a man like this, what manner of man are you going to marry?'"

Hsi-men Ch'ing said his farewells and got up to go.

"Sir," said the old lady, "I didn't know you were coming, and I was unable to make proper preparations on the spur of the moment. Please forgive me for not offering you anything better."

Leaning on her staff, she accompanied him out the door and saw him several steps along his way before Hsi-men Ch'ing succeeded in persuading her to go back inside. Auntie Hsüeh remained outside to see Hsi-men Ch'ing into his saddle.

"Wasn't I right to propose this way of going about it?" she said. "It's much better to have started out by dumping the whole proposition in the old lady's lap than it would have been to rely on the good offices of anyone else. You go on home, sir," she continued. "I'm going to stay here and have another word with her. We've already agreed to meet and go outside the South Gate together first thing tomorrow."

Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled out a tael's worth of silver and handed it to Auntie Hsüeh to cover the hire of a donkey. After she had accepted the money he got on his horse and went home, while she remained behind at Aunt Yang's house, chatting and drinking wine until dark, before going home herself.

To make a long story short, the next day Hsi-men Ch'ing dressed himself to befit the occasion, slipped his betrothal gifts into his sleeve, and mounted a large white horse. Then, accompanied by his two page boys, Tai-an and P'ing-an, and by Auntie Hsüeh, riding a donkey, he proceeded outside the South Gate to the door of the Yang family compound on Stinkwater Lane off Hogmarket Street. This establishment consisted of a twenty-four-foot-wide frontage opening onto the street and five interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis.

Hsi-men Ch'ing reined in his horse at the gate, and Auntie Hsüeh disappeared into the interior for some time before coming out to usher him in. After he had dismounted, the first thing he confronted was a two-story structure housing the main gate, which was situated on the south side of the street, facing north. Just inside the gate stood a gray screen-wall. Inside the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard the entrance was screened by a hedge of crape myrtle and a fence of woven bamboo splints. The courtyard itself was decorated with pomegranate trees and potted miniature plants. Along a raised platform there stood a row of indigo vats for dyeing and two benches for fulling cloth.

Auntie Hsüeh pushed open the red latticework doors of the eighteen-foot-wide, south-facing reception hall, on the center of the back wall of which there hung in the place of honor a scroll depicting the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin of the Water Moon, accompanied by her attendant, Sudhana.¹³ Landscape paintings by well-known artists hung on the other walls. There was also a marble standing screen, to either side of which stood tall, narrow-necked, bronze vases of the kind used in the game "pitch-pot."¹⁴ All in all:

The chairs and tables were shiny, and

The screens and lattices were posh.

Auntie Hsüeh invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to take one of the seats reserved for distinguished guests and then disappeared into the interior once again.

After a while she came out and whispered in Hsi-men Ch'ing's ear, "The young lady hasn't finished her toilet yet. Please have a seat and wait a little longer, sir."

At this juncture a young servant brought out a cup of tea flavored with fruit kernels, and after Hsi-men Ch'ing had drunk it, she took the cup and its raised saucer away again.

Auntie Hsüeh, after all, was a matchmaker by profession, so she kept up an animated monologue:

Gesticulating with both hands and feet,¹⁵ for Hsi-men Ch'ing's benefit.

"Aside from Aunt Yang," she said, "the most important person in this family is the young lady. Of course there is her husband's younger brother, but he's still a minor and doesn't understand anything. Originally, when her late husband was still running the enterprise, in a single day, not even counting the silver, they sold enough blue cotton cloth of the kind used for making shoes to take in two large basketfuls of copper cash. He used to charge thirty cash a foot for the stuff. I've seen with my own eyes that on a given day they often had to feed as many as twenty or thirty dyers, and everything was managed by the young lady.

"She has two maidservants and a page boy at her beck and call. The older one, who's fourteen, and already dresses her hair in adult fashion, is called Lan-hsiang. The younger one's just eleven and is called Hsiao-luan. In the future, when she's carried across your threshold, they'll all come with her.

"If I succeed in bringing off this match for you, sir, I hope to be able to take out a mortgage on a couple of rooms in a better location than that out-of-the-way corner in the northern quarter where I'm living now. It's not convenient for me to get to your place from there. When you bought Ch'un-mei last year, sir, you promised me several bolts of muslin that you still haven't given me. I'll forget about that when this is all over if you'll compensate me for both occasions at once.

"On your way in just now, sir," she continued, "you must have noticed those two cabinets for displaying cloth. When Mr. Yang was still alive, I don't know how much money he put into the improvement of the retail shop that opens onto the street. This compound must also be worth seven or eight hundred taels of silver. It contains five interior courtyards and extends all the way back to the street that runs behind it. When she gets married, I'm afraid she'll have to leave it all to her young brother-in-law."

Auntie Hsüeh was still talking when a maidservant came out to summon her. Some time passed and then, lo and behold:

To the tinkling of girdle pendants,

Amid the fragrance of orchid and musk, the woman herself appeared. She wore a kingfisher blue surcoat of figured silk, emblazoned with a mandarin square that featured an embroidered ch'i-lin,¹⁶ over a wide-cut gown of figured scarlet silk. On her head:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;

A phoenix hairpin was half askew.

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look at the woman. Behold:

She is tall and slender in build;

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.

Her figure is neither plump nor thin;
Her stature is neither short nor tall.
On her face, though barely visible,
Are several inconspicuous pockmarks,
That give her an air of natural beauty;
Hidden beneath her skirt,
Are a pair of tiny golden lotuses,
That are well-formed and attractive.
Two gold rings, set with pearls,
Hang low beneath her ears;
A pair of phoenix hairpins,
Juts aslant at either temple.
She has only to move,
In order to make her openwork jade pendants tinkle;
Wherever she sits,
The reek of orchid and musk assails the nostrils.
It is just as though Ch'ang-o has come down
from her palace in the moon;
She is exactly like the Goddess of Witches' Mountain descending her jasper steps.¹⁷

Hsi-men Ch'ing no sooner saw her than his heart was filled with delight. Auntie Hsüeh made haste to hold aside the portiere over the doorway in order to facilitate her entrance. The woman came in and:

Neither correctly nor precisely, bowed and uttered a word of greeting, after which she sat down in a seat directly across from that occupied by her visitor. Hsi-men Ch'ing scrutinized her from head to toe with such intensity that the woman lowered her head.

Then he opened the conversation by saying, "My wife has been dead for some time and I would like to make you my legitimate wife and put you in charge of the household. What do you think of this proposal?"

"How old are you, sir," the woman asked, "and how long has your wife been dead?"

"I'm twenty-seven," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I was born on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month, at midnight. Unfortunately my former wife has been dead now for more than a year. I hardly dare ask how old you are, young lady?"

"I'm twenty-nine," the woman replied.

"So you're two years older than I am," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Auntie Hsüeh interjected from the side:

"When the wife is two years older,
Yellow gold never molders;
When the wife is three years older,
Yellow gold piles up like boulders."¹⁸

As she was speaking, a young maidservant came in carrying three servings of tea flavored with candied kumquats in carved lacquer cups inlaid with silver and provided with silver teaspoons in the shape of apricot leaves. The woman got up, brushed away a few drops of water from the rim of the first cup with her slender fingers, and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing. As he took the proffered cup in his hand, she bowed to him and expressed her good wishes.

Auntie Hsüeh seized the opportunity to step forward and lift the woman's skirt with her hand, revealing:

The upturned points of her tiny golden lotuses,
Barely three inches long,
But half a span in length,
Peeking out beneath her skirt.

She was wearing scarlet shoes that had tips decorated with cloud patterns of gold brocade and high white satin heels. As he beheld this sight, Hsi-men Ch'ing's heart was filled with delight.

The woman took the second cup of tea and handed it to Auntie Hsüeh, after which she took the remaining cup for herself and sat down again to keep them company while they drank.

Auntie Hsüeh Proposes a Match with Meng Yü-lou

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered Tai-an to present the square box containing his betrothal gifts, which consisted of two embroidered handkerchiefs, a pair of jeweled hairpins, and six gold rings. When these had been transferred to a tray and taken inside, Auntie Hsüeh prompted the woman to express her gratitude to Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow.

"When are you planning to hold the ceremony, sir," the woman went on to ask, "so that I can make the necessary preparations?"

"Since you have deigned to accept my proposal," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll present you with some further insignificant gifts on the twenty-fourth day of this month, and hold the ceremony proper on the second day of the sixth month."

"If that's the way it's to be," the woman said, "I'll send someone tomorrow to inform my late husband's paternal aunt, who lives in the northern quarter of the city."

"Yesterday," said Auntie Hsüeh, "the gentleman paid her a call in order to discuss this matter."

"What did she say?" the woman asked.

"When she heard that the gentleman was interested in this match," Auntie Hsüeh replied, "she was as happy as could be, and suggested that I should bring him here so the two of you could meet. She said, 'If you don't marry a man like this, what manner of man are you going to marry? I'll support this match, come what may, and even undertake to act as guarantor.'"

"If that's really what Aunt said, everything will be fine," the woman said.

"My dear young lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "surely you don't mean to suggest that a matchmaker such as myself would dare to fabricate a speech like that, do you?"

When she had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing said his farewells and got up to go.

Auntie Hsüeh accompanied him as far as the mouth of Stinkwater Lane and said, "Now that you've seen the young lady, sir, what do you think?"

"Auntie Hsüeh," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I am indeed deeply indebted to you."

"You go ahead, sir," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I want to have another word with the young lady before I leave."

Hsi-men Ch'ing mounted his horse and headed back into the city, but Auntie Hsüeh turned around and went inside again, where she said to the woman, "Young lady, with a husband like that you'll never have anything to worry about."

"Does Hsi-men Ch'ing have any women in his household or not?" the woman asked. "And what does he do for a living?"

"My dear lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "even if he does have a few women about the place, none of them amount to anything. If what I say isn't true, when you get there you'll find out for yourself. His reputation is known to everyone. He is numbered among the most substantial men of property in Ch'ing-ho district, and he is renowned as the Honorable Hsi-men who owns a wholesale pharmaceutical business and lends money to both officials and functionaries. Even the district magistrate and the prefect consort with him. And recently he has become related to Commander Yang of the Eastern Capital, who recognizes him as a kinsman by marriage at four removes. No one dares to cross him."

The woman entertained Auntie Hsüeh with wine and a meal. Just as they were enjoying this repast together, who should turn up but Aunt Yang's page boy, An-t'ung, bearing a gift box containing sweetmeats that came from the country, including four slices of date cake made of glutinous millet flour, two pieces of candy, and several sugar dumplings made of glutinous rice flour.

"I've been sent to ask whether you've accepted that person's betrothal gifts or not," he reported. "My mistress says, 'If you don't marry a man like this, what manner of man are you going to marry?'"

"Please thank your mistress for her concern on my behalf," the woman said. "I have in fact already accepted his betrothal gifts."

"My Heavens!" said Auntie Hsüeh. "How lucky it is we matchmakers never tell anything but the truth. And now the good lady has sent her servant to confirm it."

The woman took the date cake and other sweetmeats out of the gift box and refilled it with a full complement of appetizers and cured meat. Then she gave it to An-t'ung along with fifty or sixty cash for himself and said, "When you get home, give my compliments to your mistress, and tell her that the other party has decided to make the formal presentation of his gifts on the twenty-fourth day of this month and to hold the wedding ceremony on the second day of the next month."

When the page boy had left Auntie Hsüeh said, "How about giving me a little something of whatever the lady sent you to wrap up and take home with me for the children?"

The woman gave her a piece of candy and ten sugar dumplings and she went out the door with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand

expressions of gratitude.

But no more of this.

To resume our story, Chang the Fourth, the maternal uncle of Meng Yü-lou's deceased husband, had hopes of being able to exploit his relationship with his young nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, as a means of laying his hands on some of her property. He had a candidate of his own as a matrimonial prospect for her, for whom he was prepared to act both as advocate and guarantor. This was the widower Provincial Graduate Shang, the son of Prefectural Judge Shang who lived on Main Street. If someone else of no particular distinction had been proposed as a rival candidate he would have had a case to make; but when he heard, unexpectedly, that she was betrothed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, the owner of the wholesale pharmaceutical business in front of the district yamen, whom he knew to be possessed of clout in official circles, he felt himself to be stymied. After devoting much thought to the problem he decided that:

Of the thousand schemes and hundred plans,

The best plan is a frontal assault.

Chang the Fourth, therefore, paid the woman a visit and said to her, "Young lady, you really oughtn't to have accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's betrothal gifts but should have gone along with my suggestion and married the son of Prefectural Judge Shang, the provincial graduate. He comes from a cultivated family that not only values poetry and propriety, but also possesses enough landed property for you to live on quite comfortably.

"He would certainly be preferable to Hsi-men Ch'ing. That bastard has been throwing his weight around in official circles for years. He's a tough customer. Moreover, he's already got a legitimate wife who's the daughter of Battalion Commander Wu. You're used to being a legitimate wife, and if you marry him you'll only be a concubine; won't that be quite a comedown for you? Moreover, he's already got three or four other bedmates about the place as well as maidservants who aren't old enough to put their hair up yet. If you enter his household, as the saying goes:

When people are many, mouths are many,
and you're likely to have a hard time of it."

"It's always been true," the woman said, "that:

A multitude of boats need not clog the channel.¹⁹

If there's already a First Lady in his household, I'm willing to acknowledge her seniority and be a younger sister to her. Even if he does have a few other bedmates about the place, if my husband takes a fancy to me, do you think I'll try to keep him to myself? And if he doesn't take a fancy to me, I can't very well physically restrain him, can I? I'm not afraid; even if there are a hundred people to contend with, I can scull my own boat. To say nothing of the wealthy and prominent, among whom there is hardly a household without four or five concubines, when you get right down to it, even the beggars in the streets:

With boys in hand and girls in arms, often have three or four concubines tagging along at their heels. You're really making much ado about nothing. When I enter his household I'll know how to handle the situation so it won't be a problem for me."

"Young lady," said Chang the Fourth, "I've heard that this man is given to trading in human flesh and is an old hand at:

Beating his women and abusing his wives.

Whenever one of them fails to please him in any way, however slight, he calls in a go-between and disposes of her without more ado. Are you willing to expose yourself to this temper of his?"

"Old Fourth," the woman said, "you're mistaken. No matter how rough a man may be, he won't beat a wife who is diligent and knows what she's about. As a member of his household, if I manage to run a tight ship, so that:

Words spoken inside do not get out, and Words spoken outside do not get in,²⁰

what can he do to me? If a wife:

Likes to eat but hates to work,

Has a big mouth and a long tongue, and Devotes herself to stirring up trouble,

then:

If her husband doesn't beat her,

Should he beat the dog instead?"²¹

"But that's not all," said Chang the Fourth. "I've also heard he has a thirteen-year-old daughter at home who isn't married yet. I'm really afraid that if you enter his household you'll end up having to:

Make three nests where there's only room for two."²²

Just remember that:

When people are many, mouths are many.

How will you ever be able to handle it?"

"Old Fourth," the woman said, "you don't know what you're talking about. As a member of his household I'll remember that:

Seniors are senior, and Juniors are junior;

and that:

The state of the river depends on what comes downstream from the source."²³

If I treat his children well, there's no reason to fear that my husband will think ill of me, or that his children will be disrespectful. To say nothing of a single child, even if there were ten of them, it wouldn't be a problem for me."

"As I see it," said Chang the Fourth, "this is the sort of man whose:

Conduct is lacking in rectitude.

He's always away from home:

Sleeping among the flowers and lolling

beneath the willows."²⁴

Moreover, he's:

Solid without, but hollow within, and is up to his neck in debt. I'm only afraid he'll be the ruination of you."

"Old Fourth," the woman said, "you're mistaken again. Even if he does, sometimes, go out on the town and:

Careen about rather recklessly,²⁵

as a woman:

I can only concern myself with what goes on within the triple gates;

I can't concern myself with whatever may happen without the triple gates.

You don't really expect me to follow him about all day long, do you? As the saying goes:

Money, in this world, is but a sometime thing;²⁶

Where is the family that is long rich or forever poor?²⁷

In fact, when you get right down to it, even His Majesty the Emperor himself, when he suffers from a temporary shortage of cash, has been known to appropriate the funds realized by the sale of brood mares from the Court of the Imperial Stud.²⁸ To say nothing of merchants, which of whom would ever be content to let his money sit idly at home, or scruple to:

Depend upon his wife's connections for his daily bread,²⁹
if the need should arise? There's really no need for you to be so concerned about me."

Chang the Fourth saw that the only effect his arguments were having on the woman was to bring down her counter criticisms on his own head. Feeling that he had lost face, he finished his second cup of plain tea, got up, and departed. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Chang the Fourth, in uttering his hurtful words, was only wasting his breath;
Marriage affinities, whatever one may think,
are predetermined.
The woman of beauty felt herself predisposed in favor of Hsi-men Ch'ing;
Though he had talked himself hoarse
it would have been to no avail.

Chang the Fourth went home in a state of mortification and discussed the situation with his wife. They decided that the only thing to do was to wait until the day when the woman's trousseau was to be delivered to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household in advance of the wedding and then, making a pretext of protecting the interests of their nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, attempt to appropriate whatever they could of the woman's belongings.

To make a long story short, on the twenty-fourth day of the fifth month, Hsi-men Ch'ing arranged for the "presentation of the gifts." He invited his sister-in-law, who was married to his wife's eldest brother, to ride in the sedan chair and take charge of the gift-bearing procession. What with clothing and jewelry, formal gowns for all four seasons, preserved fruit, tea and pastries, bolts of cotton and silk, supplies of pongee and silk floss, the procession included more than twenty loads of gifts. On Meng Yü-lou's side, she invited Aunt Yang and her own elder sister to accept the gifts formally on her behalf and help to entertain the visitors, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

On the twenty-sixth, Meng Yü-lou engaged twelve Buddhist monks of high repute to recite a sutra and perform a "land and water" mass for the benefit of her deceased husband, after which his spirit tablet was burned. It was Aunt Yang who insisted on these observances.

As the day approached on which the trousseau was to be delivered to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, Chang the Fourth recruited a number of neighbors from the locality to join him in coming to have a word with the woman. That day Auntie Hsüeh showed up with a few idlers who had been hired for the purpose by Hsi-men Ch'ing and ten or twenty soldiers that he had borrowed from the commandant's yamen.

As they started inside to move the woman's beds and curtains and the trunks in which her trousseau was packed, Chang the Fourth intercepted them and said, "Matchmaker, don't carry them away yet. I've got something to say about it."

After he had invited the neighbors to come inside and sit down, Chang the Fourth opened the parley by saying, "Distinguished neighbors, listen to me. The young lady is here, and I, Chang Lung, oughtn't to have to say it, but your husband, Yang Tsung-hsi, and your young brother-in-law, Yang Tsung-pao, are both my nephews, my elder sister's sons. Now, unfortunately, your husband is dead, but he succeeded in amassing a considerable sum for himself while he was alive. There are people who are trying to tell you what to do in this situation, and I, as a relative on the distaff side of the family, am not in a position to interfere in your affairs. Enough said. Nevertheless, my second nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, is a young karmic encumbrance, the weight of which will fall entirely on my shoulders. He and your husband were born of the same womb. Do you mean to maintain that he is not entitled to a portion of the family property?"

"Now that all these distinguished neighbors are here today to act as witnesses—and, after all, whether you've got a tidy sum of money in your hands or not, there's no way I can prevent you from marrying someone if you want to—just open up your trunks and let everyone see for themselves what you've got in there, before letting them be carried off the premises. I'm not interested in taking anything away from you, but only in clarifying the situation. Young lady, what do you say?"

When the woman heard these words she started to cry and said, "Neighbors, listen to me. You are mistaken, sir. It's not as though I plotted with evil intent to murder my husband. Isn't it enough today that I have to bear the opprobrium for entering into another marriage? Whether or not my husband was successful in making money is public knowledge. But what few taels of silver he accumulated were all plowed back into this house. And the house I'm not taking with me. I'm leaving it all to my young brother-in-law. All the furnishings are being left absolutely intact. In fact, there are three or four hundred taels worth of outstanding debts, the papers for which have already been turned over to you to collect as they become due. Since when has there been any excess of silver over and above the expenditures required to maintain the establishment?"

"If you haven't any silver, then that's all there is to it," said Chang the Fourth. "All I'm asking you to do, now, is to open up your trunks in front of these witnesses so they can see for themselves whether you do indeed have any or not. Then you can carry it all off as you like. I'm not interested in taking anything away from you."

"No doubt you want to have a look at my shoes and footbindings too!" the woman said.

Just as they were beginning to wrangle, who should emerge from the rear of the house, leaning on her staff, but Aunt Yang.

"Aunt Yang is here," everyone said with one voice as they bowed to her in greeting.

After Aunt Yang had returned their salutation and sat down to keep them company, she addressed them as follows, "Distinguished neighbors: As the paternal aunt, I am related by blood; this is not a distaff or marriage relationship. Would anyone suggest that I have no say in this matter? The one who is dead was my nephew; the one who is alive is also my nephew.

Every one of the ten fingers,

Hurts equally if bitten.³⁰

Quite aside from the fact that her husband really didn't have any money laid by; even if he had a hundred thousand taels of silver, you wouldn't be entitled to do anything more than take a look at it. She has no children and is still:

A young and delicate lass.

If you interfere and try to prevent her from remarrying, just what do you want to keep her around for, may I ask?"

In a chorus of loud voices the neighbors responded, "What Aunt Yang says makes sense."

"You don't mean to retain what she brought with her by way of a dowry from her own family, do you?" demanded the old lady. "She hasn't given me a thing behind anybody's back, yet you suggest that I'm being partial to her. Let's be fair about it. There's no reason for me to deceive any of you. This nephew of mine was so kind and just in everything he did that his loss is hard for me to bear. He was always so considerate to me. If that were not the case I wouldn't bother to concern myself about the matter."

Chang the Fourth eyed the old lady from one side and said, "Are you out of your mind?"

The phoenix doesn't deign to alight where there's no treasure to be had."

These words struck the old lady right on her sore spot. In an instant her face became purple with rage. Grabbing hold of Chang the Fourth, she started to curse him in earnest.

"Chang the Fourth," she said, "you'd better lay off that:

Wild and nonsensical talk.

I may be neither able nor talented, but at least I'm a certifiable member of the Yang family. You old oily mouth! What Yang family prick were you sired by?"

"I may have a different surname," said Chang the Fourth, "but my two nephews are the offspring of my own elder sister. You old bloodsucker! Don't you know that:

A girl faces outward from the moment she's born?³¹

You're engaged in:

Setting fires with one hand, and Pouring water on them with the other."³²

"You lousy, shameless, old dog-bone!" retorted Aunt Yang. "She's still:

A young and delicate lass.

Just what do you have in mind in wanting to keep her at home, may I ask? If you aren't hoping to slake your lust with her you must be plotting to fatten yourself at her expense."

"I'm not out for anybody's money," said Chang the Fourth. "But my nephew is my own sister's child, and if anything goes wrong, it's going to be me that's out of pocket, not you. You old gallows bird! You're out to:

Snatch the big, and Snitch the little.

You may be a brown cat, but you've got a black tail."³³

"Chang the Fourth!" Aunt Yang retorted. "You old beggar! You old slave! You old mealymouth! If you keep on talking such rot with your:

Deceitful mouth and duplicitous tongue, you'll die so poor your family won't be able to afford the rope to hoist your coffin with!"

"You waggle-tongued old whore!" replied Chang the Fourth. "You've had to work so hard for your money you've burnt out your tail. No wonder you don't have any children."

This sally really got under Aunt Yang's skin. "Chang the Fourth, you louse!" she cursed at him. "You whoreson old dog! I may have no children, but I'm still better than your mother. She divides her time between Buddhist and Taoist temples, humping the bonzes and fucking the priests, while you're:

Still asleep in dreamland!"

At this point the two of them would have come to blows if the neighbors had not intervened, saying, "Old Fourth, let the lady have her say."

Meantime, Auntie Hsüeh, who had noticed that the two of them were preoccupied with their quarrel, took advantage of the confusion by placing herself at the head of Hsi-men Ch'ing's servants and hired hands, along with the soldiers who had been sent from the yamen. At her direction, they swooped down, hugger-mugger, on the woman's beds and curtains and the trunks containing her trousseau and carried them all off, any which way, like a gust of wind.

When Chang the Fourth realized what had happened his eyes swelled with rage, but:

Though he dared to be angry,

He dared not speak.³⁴

The neighbors, for their part, seeing that there was nothing further to be done, attempted to smooth things over for a while and then went their separate ways.

On the second day of the sixth month Hsi-men Ch'ing dispatched a large sedan chair and four pairs of red silk lanterns to fetch the bride. Her elder sister, Mrs. Han, acted as her escort, and she was also accompanied by her young brother-in-law, Yang Tsung-pao, who had his hair done up in a topknot, wore a long green gown, and rode on horseback as he escorted his sister-in-law on her way to the wedding ceremony. Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded him with a bolt of satin brocade and a jade belt buckle. The bride was accompanied by her two maidservants, Lan-hsiang and Hsiao-luan, whose job it was to:

Make the beds and fold the quilts.

She also brought along to wait on her the page boy, Ch'in-t'ung, who was just fourteen years old.

On the third day Aunt Yang and the woman's two sisters-in-law, the wives of her brothers, Meng the Elder and Meng the Second, came to participate in the "third-day celebrations." Hsi-men Ch'ing presented Aunt Yang with seventy taels of silver and two bolts of satin, and from that time on the families enjoyed uninterrupted relations.

Hsi-men Ch'ing prepared three rooms on the western side of the rear courtyard to serve as his new bride's living quarters. She was designated as the Third Lady in the hierarchy of his wife and concubines and bore the appellation Yü-lou, or Tower of Jade. Hsi-men Ch'ing gave orders that all the members of his household, from top to bottom, should address her as Third Lady.

Beginning with the evening of the wedding day he spent three successive nights in her room. Truly:

Aunt Yang Angrily Curses Chang the Fourth

Within the bed-curtains of gold lamé,
 Two new partners performed their perennial roles;
 Beneath the quilt of red brocade,
 Two used objects were brought into play.³⁵
 There is a poem that testifies to this:

To encounter close up such a paragon of feeling and romance;
 Is a consummation that: "Without good fortune one cannot enjoy."³⁶

Wherever has Lieh-tzu allowed the wind to carry him;³⁷
When night after night the beauty of the moon shines in the willow branches?³⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 8

ALL NIGHT LONG P'AN CHIN-LIEN YEARNS FOR HSI-MEN CH'ING; DURING THE TABLET-BURNING MONKS OVERHEAR SOUNDS OF VENERY

In the silent bedchamber, all by herself,
she wonders;
The mandarin ducks are separated, no news of him has come.
Before the fragrance of her powder has vanished from his arm;
The p'i-p'a at the head of her bed is covered with dust.
Her face has grown so thin it scarcely registers in the phoenix mirror;
Her clouds of hair are so loose the jade hairpins are falling out.
His mettlesome steed does not come; her gazing eyes are tired;
All alone with her mandarin duck pillow, tears flood her cheeks.

THE STORY GOES that from the time that Hsi-men Ch'ing took Meng Yü-lou into his household he: Enjoyed himself with his new wife.¹

They were:

Like glue and like lacquer.²

Moreover, the Ch'en family sent Auntie Wen to announce that they would like to have his daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, carried across their threshold in marriage on the twelfth day of the sixth month. Hsi-men Ch'ing found himself so: Pushed and pressured, that he was unable to procure a bed for his daughter's trousseau in time for the occasion and had to supply her with one of the gilt lacquer Nanking beds with retractable steps that had formed part of Meng Yü-lou's dowry. What with the "third-day celebrations" and "ninth-day celebrations" attendant on this event, he was kept busy for more than a month and was unable to pay a visit to P'an Chin-lien.

As a consequence of this, every day found her:

Leaning against one doorjamb after another,

Wearing out her eyes with constant gazing.

She twice sent Dame Wang to inquire about Hsi-men Ch'ing, but the servants at his gate, who were familiar enough with the old lady and knew that she had been sent by P'an Chin-lien, paid scant attention, merely reporting that their master was busy.

The woman was frantic with longing. When the old lady reported the results of her mission, the woman vented her wrath on her stepdaughter, driving her out into the street, in her turn, to look for him. How could that little chit have dared to penetrate his: Vast courtyards and secluded mansions?

All she did was to lurk in the vicinity of his gate a couple of times without catching sight of Hsi-men Ch'ing. When she returned home her stepmother spat in her face, slapped her, and abused her for being of no use. She even made her kneel on the floor until noon without giving her anything to eat.

At that time the summer solstice had already passed and the weather was extremely hot. The house was so uncomfortable the woman could hardly bear it and ordered Ying-erh to heat some water and prepare the tub so she could take a bath. She also put a tray of meat dumplings into the steamer so she would have something to offer him if Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to show up.

Wearing nothing but a short shift of thin floss silk, she sat on a low stool longing in vain for Hsi-men Ch'ing to come. Pouting with her lips, she cursed him a couple of times for a fickle scoundrel.

Bereft of thought or feeling,

Depressed and silent, with her slender fingers she took off her two red embroidered shoes and used them to cast a "love hexagram"³ in the hope of ascertaining whether Hsi-men Ch'ing would come or not. Truly: In front of others she is reluctant to declare herself too loudly;

Secretly she casts her lot with coins inquiring after her distant lover.⁴

There are two songs to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testify to this: Clad in "wave-tripping" silk stockings,

Looking almost natural,
Divested of their red-tipped shoes, which now form a "love diagram,"

All Night Long P'an Chin-lien Yearns for Hsi-men Ch'ing

They are like lotus roots that have begun to sprout, Like lotus pods that have shed their blossoms.
 How were they ever bound tightly enough to make them so very tiny?
 Measured with a willow wand, they are but half a span in length.
 As for him,
 He doesn't think of me;
 As for me,
 I think longingly of him.

Quietly taking down the bamboo blind,
 Leaving the door to creak,
 All I can do is lie underneath my quilt, cursing his name.

How can you care so much for "misty willows,"
That you won't come to my place anymore?
"My eyebrows have lost their color; who will repaint them for me?"⁵
Before whose house has he tethered his horse to the green willows?
As for him,
He is unfaithful to me;
As for me,
I am yearning for him.⁶

At that time, after the woman had tried casting "love diagrams" for a while and realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not going to show up, she felt herself overcome by drowsiness, stretched out on her bed, and dozed off. When she woke up, about two hours later, she was not in the best of moods.

"I've heated the water, Mother," Ying-erh said. "Are you going to take a bath or not?"

"The dumplings must be done by now," the woman said. "Bring them in here so I can have a look."

Ying-erh hastened to obey and brought them into the bedroom. The woman counted them off, one by one, with her slender fingers. She had made a full tray of thirty dumplings, but now, though she counted them back and forth a number of times, she could only count twenty-nine. There was one dumpling missing.

"What could have happened to it?" she asked.

"I haven't any idea," said Ying-erh. "You must have counted wrong, Mother."

"I counted them myself, twice," the woman said. "I made thirty dumplings so I'd have something to offer your father if he comes by. Why did you have to go and snitch one? You're spoiled rotten, you wanton little slave! I suppose you were suffering from such: Acute consumption or avid craving, that you simply couldn't help eating this particular dumpling, while the rice I feed you: Whether in large bowl or in small, you can barely manage to choke down. What I'm going to do next is intended to teach you a lesson."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation, she stripped the clothing off the little chit's body and picking up a riding crop proceeded to give her twenty or thirty strokes with it. She whipped the girl until she: Howled like a stuck pig.

"If you don't confess," she threatened, "I'll certainly give you a hundred strokes."

When the girl could stand the beating no longer she cried out, "Don't whip me any more, Mother. I was desperately hungry and took one of them to eat."

"If you took it," the woman said, "why did you claim that I had counted wrong? You're nothing but a confirmed, mischief-making little whore! When that cuckold was still alive you may have gotten away with: Telling tales and embroidering on the facts; but where is he now? You think you can continue to be:

Up to your preternatural pranks, right under my nose, do you? You mischief-making little whore! I'm going to beat your bottom right off for you!"

The woman whipped her a while longer and pulled her drawers back on before letting her up. Then she ordered her to stand beside her and cool her with a fan.

After she had fanned her for a while the woman said to her, "You lousy little whore! Stick your face over here, so I can give your cheeks a good scratching!"

Ying-erh really did stick her face out, and the woman gouged two bloody scratches in her cheeks with her sharp fingernails before letting her off.

After a while Chin-lien went over to her mirror stand to get dressed and put on some new makeup and then came out and stood inside the blind in the doorway. It just so happened that: As providence would have it, what should she see but Hsi-men Ch'ing's page boy, Tai-an, who was riding past her door on horseback with a package wrapped in felt tucked under his arm.

The woman called him to a halt and asked, "Where are you going?"

Now this page boy had always been glib with his tongue and had often accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing when he visited the woman's house. She was in the habit of tipping him generously and always spoke up on his behalf when he was in hot water with Hsi-men Ch'ing. For this reason he was already on easy terms with the woman.

Dismounting from his horse, he said, "Father sent me to deliver a gift to the commandant's yamen."

The woman invited him inside and asked, "What's your father been up to at home? Why hasn't he come to see me or given me so much as a glimpse of his shadow for so long? It must be that he's found another sweetheart somewhere and put me in the position of: The rings that hold his hairnet in place: always at the back of his head."

"Father hasn't taken up with any sweetheart," said Tai-an. "It's just that the last few days he's had so much to do at home that he hasn't been able to get away and come to see you."

"Even if he has been busy at home," the woman said, "that's no reason to neglect me for half a month at a time without sending me so much as a word of news. It's obvious that I haven't been very much on his mind. Just what is it that's keeping him so busy, anyway?" she demanded of Tai-an. "Tell me all about it."

The page boy giggled but wouldn't tell her anything.

"There's been something to preoccupy him, that's all," he said. "Why do you insist on: Blowing aside the hairs only to look for trouble?"⁷

"My dear little oily mouth," the woman said, "if you don't tell me I'll never forgive you."

"If I tell you," the page boy said, "you mustn't tell Father that it was I who told you."

"I won't tell him, that's all," the woman said.

Tai-an then proceeded, thus and so, to give a full account, from beginning to end, of how Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken Meng Yü-lou into his household. Nothing might have happened if the woman had not heard about this, but having heard about it, she could not prevent the teardrops in her eyes from coursing down across her fragrant cheeks.

Tai-an was thrown into a panic by this response, and said, "It's precisely because you're so sensitive that I didn't want to tell you about it, and now that I have, look at the way you're carrying on."

The woman leaned against the doorjamb and gave a long sigh, saying, "Tai-an, you don't know how much love I've lavished on him, from the first day we met, and now, how can he just abandon me like this?"

As she spoke she was unable to prevent a copious fall of tears.

"Why should you torment yourself so?" said Tai-an. "At home, Mother doesn't even try to keep him in hand."

"Tai-an," the woman said, "listen to my plaint." There is another song to the previous tune that testifies to this: My naughty lover is fickle;

He hasn't come for a month.
I've been alone beneath the mandarin duck quilt for thirty nights.
His feckless affections are otherwise engaged,
While I remain an infatuated fool.
I never should have allowed myself to become so involved.
"What is easily acquired is easily relinquished."⁸
As for him,
His passion has cooled;
As for me,
It's just my luck.⁹

No sooner was she done than she started to cry all over again.

"Don't cry," said Tai-an. "I shouldn't wonder if Father turned up during the next couple of days, on his birthday. If you write a few words to him, I'll make sure that Father sees them, and he's certain to come."

"I'll really be beholden to you," the woman said. "If you can induce him to come, I'll make a pair of nice shoes for you to wear. I'll wait for him here in order to offer my birthday congratulations. If he doesn't come, I'll hold you accountable, you little oily mouth. And if he asks you what you were doing here, how will you answer him?"

"If Father asks me," said Tai-an, "I'll say that I was watering the horse in the street when you sent Granny Wang to ask me over and gave me this note, along with the injunction to tell him how much you wanted to see him."

"You little oily mouth," the woman laughed, "you're really:

A second Hung-niang: always able to bring people together."¹⁰

When she had finished speaking she ordered Ying-erh to serve Tai-an a plateful of the steamed dumplings on the table, along with some tea. While this was being done she went inside, fetched a sheet of flowered notepaper, and: Lightly grasping the jade tube, and

Gently toying with the sheep's hair brush, dashed off a lyric to the tune "Mistletoe," which read as follows:

I'm taking my heartfelt words and Sending them to you on this flowered notepaper.
I remember the time I first cut off a lock of my black tresses for you.
I leaned against one doorjamb after another and took down the bamboo blind,
Anticipating surprise and suffering fear for you, trivial though they may have been.
And now you're actually betraying
my love.
If you're not going to come, return my fragrant silk handkerchief.¹¹

When she had finished composing her note she folded it into a lozenge-shaped lover's knot, sealed it, and gave it to Tai-an with the words, "Be sure to tell him, whatever he does, to come pay me a visit on his birthday. I'll be here waiting for him."

When Tai-an had finished eating his snack the woman also gave him several tens of cash.

As he was about to go outside and mount his horse she said to him, "When you get home and see your father, tell him, 'She really cursed you out.' And if he refuses to come, tell him, 'She's threatening to get into a sedan chair one of these days and come to pay you a visit herself.'"

Tai-an replied, "I feel just like:

A clapper-sounding southern salesman who runs into a dung-cake peddler and exclaims:
'Don't bother to run through your inventory;
it only gives me the creeps!'
You'd crack melon seeds astride the wooden mule¹² en route to your own execution:

 How superfluous can you get?"
 When he had finished speaking he mounted his horse and departed.
 Every day the woman spent her time:
 Waiting for long periods as well as short,
 but it was just as though he were:
 A stone sunk in the vast sea.¹³
 She never caught so much as a glimpse of Hsi-men Ch'ing's shadow.
 Seven days went by in this way until, finally, it was the day of his birthday. To the woman: Each day was like three months of autumn;
 Each night seemed like half a summer.¹⁴
 She:
 Waited all day,
 Without any news of him;
 Watched for a long time,
 But caught not a glimpse of him.
 Before she became aware of it she began to:
 Silently gnash her silvery teeth, as Tears overflowed her starry eyes.
 When evening came she invited Dame Wang over, plied her with food and wine, and then pulled a silver hairpin with a gold head out of her hair and gave it to her, entreating her to go to Hsi-men Ch'ing's house on her behalf and press her invitation.
 "If I show up this late in the day," said Dame Wang, "he'll already be:
 Anticipating tea or recovering from wine, and will certainly not consent to come. I'd do better to wait until first thing tomorrow morning to go to the gentleman's mansion and extend your invitation."
 "Godmother," the woman said, "be sure you don't forget."
 "Since when," the old lady asked, "have I ever undertaken anything for you without carrying it through?"
 At this juncture the old lady, who was the sort who:
 Wouldn't do anything except for money,¹⁵ having accepted the hairpin for her pains and drunk until her face was bright red, proceeded to make her way home.
 It so happens that, in her bedroom, the woman:
 Perfumed with incense the mandarin duck quilt, and Deftly trimmed the silver lamp's wick, but could not get to sleep. Giving vent to:
 Long sighs as well as short,
 she:
 Tossed first this way and then that.
 Truly, it is a case of:
 She who is wont to diligently strum her p'î-p'a
 late into the night;
 When all alone in her deserted chamber can scarcely bear to play it.¹⁶
 At this juncture, accompanying herself on the p'î-p'a, she sang a suite of four songs to the tune "Making Silk Floss," which testifies to this: In the beginning I loved you for being so romantic;
 We exchanged locks of our hair and burned incense together.
 When we sported with the clouds and rain
 we were perfectly suited;
 Behind my husband's back I carried on an affair with you.
 What did I care when people said, "Spilt water can never be recovered?"¹⁷
 If you are really betraying
 my true love,
 You're: "Climbing a tree in search of fish,"¹⁸ and deserve whatever you get.
 Who would have thought you'd have found another sweetheart?
 It makes me so mad I'm:
 "Half drunk and half crazy."
 Leaning against the standing screen, I try to figure it out;
 I don't understand it, how could you abandon me this way?
 Though I: "Send letters and post notes,"
 you still refuse to come.
 If you are really betraying,
 my affections,
 If no one else gets to you first,
 Heaven will destroy you.

I certainly never loved you just for your money;
I loved you because I found you such an appealing lover.
You knew just how to handle me;
you were always so clever.
I was a lovely flower that had just blossomed in the garden;
But once the butterfly had supped its fill it did not return.
Love of the kind that we once felt for each other,
Must have been predestined in a former life to be fulfilled in this.

I turn things over in my troubled heart until I'm depressed.
As the sayings go, "Women are easily infatuated," And, "Lovers alone are never satisfied."
The affair I had with you
was my first;
It was a fresh flower I brought you;
how could you give it up?
Now that you've found yourself
another soul mate;
In the Temple of the God of the Sea¹⁹
I'll bring an action against you.²⁰

It so happens that all night long the woman:
Tossed first this way and then that,
but could not get to sleep.

The next morning she said to Ying-erh, "Go next door and see if Granny Wang has gone to invite your father or not."

Ying-erh did as she was told and, before long, came back and reported, "Granny Wang left a long time ago."

To resume our story, the old lady got up early in the morning and set out as soon as she had combed her hair and washed her face.

When she arrived at Hsi-men Ch'ing's gate she asked the servants on duty, "Is the gentleman at home?" but they all said, "We don't know," so she went over and waited by the wall across the street.

Before long, Manager Fu showed up to open the shop. The old lady went up to him, bowed and uttered a word of greeting, and then said, "May I trouble you with a question? Is the gentleman at home?"

"What do you want with him," said Manager Fu, "that you should be asking me so early in the morning? If you had asked anyone else, they wouldn't have known, but I'll tell you. Yesterday was the gentleman's birthday, and he spent the day entertaining guests in his home. They had been drinking all day long, and when evening came he took his friends off to the licensed quarter, where they must have made a night of it because he hasn't come home yet. That's where you ought to look if you want to find him."

After the old lady had bowed in gratitude and bade him farewell, she crossed the square in front of the district yamen and started along East Street in the direction of the lane that led into the licensed quarter. At this point, what should she see in the distance but Hsi-men Ch'ing coming toward her on horseback. He was accompanied by two page boys and was sufficiently the worse for wear so that: His eyes were bleary with drink, and he was:

Rocking backward and forward, in the saddle.

"Sir!" the old lady hailed him in a loud voice. "Why don't you have a little less to drink?"

As she spoke, she stepped forward and brought him to a halt by taking hold of the horse's bit with her hand.

"You're Godmother Wang, aren't you?" Hsi-men Ch'ing inquired drunkenly. "What have you got to say for yourself?"

The old lady had whispered no more than a few words in his ear when Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "The page boy gave me the message when he got home. I know she must be angry with me. I'll go to her place right now."

Hsi-men Ch'ing followed the old lady, and the two of them carried on an animated dialogue all the way to their destination.

When they got to the woman's door, Dame Wang went in first and reported, "Young lady, I've got good news for you. Thanks to my efforts, in less than an hour I've succeeded in bringing the gentleman here with me."

When the woman heard that he had come, she hastily ordered Ying-erh to tidy up the room and then went out to welcome him. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was still: More than a little addled with wine, swaggered right in, fanning himself as he came, and bowed to the woman as he uttered a word of greeting.

The woman returned his salutation and said, "Sir:

The more eminent you are, the harder you are to see."²¹

How could you simply drop me like this, without giving me so much as a glimpse of your shadow for so long? No doubt, with your new bride to keep you company at home, you're: Like glue and like lacquer, and scarcely have any reason to think of me. How can you still claim, sir, that you haven't had a change of heart?"

"You shouldn't pay any attention to the nonsense people talk," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What would I want with a new bride anyway? It's only because my young daughter got married that I was kept busy for a few days and didn't have the time to pay you a visit. That's all there is to it."

"You think you can pull the wool over my eyes, do you?" the woman said. "If you haven't: Become enamored of the new and abandoned the old, or found yourself a new sweetheart somewhere, you'll have to swear an oath on that all too vigorous body of yours before I'll believe you."

"If I ever betray you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "may I be afflicted with:

Boils as big as bowls,

Three to five years of jaundice,²² and A bite on the balls by a centipede as big as a carrying pole."

"You lousy two-timer," the woman said, "what does:

A bite on the balls by a centipede

as big as a carrying pole,

have to do with you?"

As she spoke she reached out with her hand, snatched the hat off his head, and threw it on the floor. Dame Wang saw that it was a brand-new, tasseled, "tile-ridge" hat, shaped like the roof of a pavilion with flaring eaves,²³ and hastily picked it up and put it on the table for him.

"Young lady," she said, "you've been complaining about my failure to invite the gentleman here for you; and now look how you're treating him! If you don't put his hat back on for him he'll catch cold."

"Fat chance!" said the woman. "If that fickle ruffian died of a venereal chill, I wouldn't care."

As she spoke she pulled a pin out of his hair and held it in her hand while she examined it. It was a polished gold hairpin with two rows of characters engraved on it that said: The horse with the golden bridle neighs amidst the fragrant verdure;

The visitor to the jade tower is drunk

at apricot blossom time.²⁴

It had been given to him by Meng Yü-lou, but the woman assumed that it was a gift from some singing girl, so she put it in her sleeve and refused to return it, saying, "And you claim not to have had a change of heart! Where did the hairpin I gave you get to, that you should be wearing this one from someone else?"

"As for that hairpin of yours," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the other day I got drunk and fell off my horse, so hard that my hat was knocked off and my hair came undone. When I looked for your pin I couldn't find it."

"You wouldn't fool a two-year-old child with that story," the woman said. "You mean to tell me you were so befuddled with drink that you couldn't even see a hairpin when it fell on the ground?"

"Young lady," interjected Dame Wang from one side, "you can't hold the gentleman to blame.

He can detect a bee defecating forty li outside the city,

But trips over a mangy elephant on his own doorstep:

He can see things at a distance,

But not close to home."

"It's bad enough to have her giving me a hard time," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "without your joining in the fun."

The woman saw that he held in his hand a fine gold-flecked Szechwan fan, with red slats and a gold hinge-joint,²⁵ and proceeded to snatch it away from him and hold it up to the light.

It so happens that the woman was an old hand where anything about the relations between the sexes was concerned. When she saw that there were traces of tooth-marks all over the fan, confirming her suspicion that it had been given to him by some light-of-love: Without permitting any further explanation, she broke it in two. By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing attempted to rescue it, it had already been torn to tatters.

"That fan was given to me by a friend named Pu Chih-tao,"²⁶ he protested. "I've only had it for three days, and you've torn it to tatters."

The woman had been harassing him for some time when Ying-erh came in with a cup of tea. Her stepmother told her to put it down and kowtow to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You've been nagging away for half the day already," said Dame Wang. "Enough is enough. Don't let yourselves miss the boat. I'll go downstairs and see to things in the kitchen."

The woman told Ying-erh to set up the table in the room where they were. In no time at all the wine and delicacies that had been prepared in advance for the celebration of Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday, including, as might be expected, roast chicken, cooked goose, fresh fish, potted meat, fruits, and the like, were gotten ready, brought into the room, and set out on the table.

The woman opened a trunk and took out the things she had prepared for Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday. She then arranged these on a tray and set it down in front of him, so he could see what she was giving him. There were: a pair of jet satin shoes; a pair of scent bags with the drawnwork inscription: In secret tryst a lover's vow,

I'll follow you where'er you go;

a pair of russet satin kneepads, the borders of which were decorated with a motif of pines, bamboos, and plum blossoms, the "three cold-weather friends"; a sand-green waistband of Lu-chou pongee, decorated with the motifs of auspicious clouds and the symbolic representations of the "eight treasures," lined with watered-silk, fastened with purple cords, and enclosing a pocket filled with aromatic lysimachia and rose petals; and a hairpin in the shape of a double-headed lotus blossom, engraved with a pentasyllabic quatrain that read: I have a lotus blossom with two heads;

To help keep your topknot in place.

As they grow from the same stem on your head,

So may we never abandon each other.

No sooner did Hsi-men Ch'ing see her gifts than his heart was filled with delight.

He pulled her into an embrace with one arm and gave her a kiss, saying, "Who would have thought you were as clever as this? Such skills are a rare thing."

The woman told Ying-erh to hold the winepot and pour a cup of wine for Hsi-men Ch'ing. Then: Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze,

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, she kowtowed to him four times. Hsi-men Ch'ing hastened to pull her to her feet and the two of them: Sat down shoulder to shoulder,

Exchanging cups as they drank.

Dame Wang took several cups of wine with them, until her face became bright red, and then said good-bye and went home, leaving the two of them to enjoy themselves as they pleased. After Ying-erh had seen Dame Wang on her way she locked the front door and went in to sit in the kitchen. The woman continued drinking wine with Hsi-men Ch'ing for some time.

Little by little evening began to fall. Behold:

Dense clouds obscure the evening peaks;

Dark mists streak the distant heavens.

Hosts of stars vie with the white moon

in their brilliance;

Green waters contend with the blue sky in shades of aquamarine.

Monks make their way toward old temples;

Where, deep in the woods, they elicit

the cawing of crows.

Travelers head for desolate villages;

Where, among the lanes, they arouse the barking of dogs.

Perched on his branch, the cuckoo cries

at the night moon;

Within the garden, the powdered butterfly

flirts with the flowers.²⁷

At this point Hsi-men Ch'ing told his page boys to take the horse and go home since he had decided to spend the night at the woman's house. That evening the two of them were: Just like cavorting sparrow hawks;

Exhausting themselves to please each other,

Indulging their lusts without restraint.

As the saying goes:

When joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow;

When prosperity is at its height, adversity follows.²⁸

Light and darkness alternate swiftly.

Let us now return to the story of Wu Sung. After taking charge of the district magistrate's letter and the consignment of presents, he set out from the district of Ch'ing-ho and escorted the shipment all the way to Defender-in-chief Chu Mien's establishment in the Eastern Capital. Once there, he duly turned over the consignment and engaged in several days of idle sightseeing; after which, having obtained a reply, he set out with his companions once again on the highway that led back to Shantung.

He had started out on his journey during the third or fourth month, but by now, on his return trip, the heat of summer had diminished and it was already early autumn. It rained continuously along the way, and the delays that this occasioned prevented him from returning in the expected time. What with one thing and another, the round trip was going to end up taking him more than three months. Held up as he was by the rains and flooding along the route, his spirit was troubled and he felt uneasy in mind and body.

Anxious to hurry back as fast as he could in order to see his elder brother, he dispatched one of the local recruits in his party to travel ahead and inform the district magistrate of their situation. He also privately entrusted him with a family letter for his brother, Wu the Elder, in which he said he would be home before long, no later than sometime in the eighth month.

The local recruit delivered his report to the district magistrate and then set out to look for Wu the Elder's house. It just so happened that: As providence would have it, Dame Wang was in the front of her shop at the time.

When the local recruit saw that the door of Wu the Elder's house was shut, he was about to call for someone to open up when the old lady asked him, "Who are you looking for?"

"I've been sent by Captain Wu," replied the local recruit, "to deliver a letter to his elder brother."

"Wu the Elder's not at home," the old lady said. "They've all gone out to pay a visit to the family graves. If you've got a letter for him, you might as well give it to me. As soon as he comes home I'll see that he gets it. It's all the same whether he gets it from you or from me."

Bowing to her with an expression of gratitude, the local recruit pulled out the family letter and handed it over to Dame Wang; after which he hurriedly leapt onto his horse and flew on his way.

Dame Wang took the letter and went over to the woman's house by way of the back door, which Ying-erh opened to let the old lady in. It so happened that the woman and Hsi-men Ch'ing had been at it for half the night and were sleeping late. It was almost lunchtime, but they weren't up yet.

"Sir! And young lady!" Dame Wang called out to them. "Get up! There's something urgent I need to tell you about." She then proceeded: Thus and thus, and

So and so,
to relate what had happened. "Wu the Second has sent a local recruit to deliver a letter to his elder brother, saying that he'll arrive back before long. I accepted the letter on his behalf and managed to fob off the messenger with a few words. This matter will brook no delay. You must decide on the best thing to do as soon as possible."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard about this, nothing might have happened, but having heard these words, truly, it was just as though: The eight-boned structure of his skull had been split asunder;

Only to have poured into it half a bucketful of icy snow.²⁹

As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman had gotten up and put on their clothes, they invited Dame Wang into the room and offered her a seat. She took out the letter and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to read. Wu Sung said in the letter that he would arrive home no later than the Mid-autumn Festival, on the fifteenth day of the eighth month. This threw both of them into a panic.

"What are we going to do about this?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Godmother, please do whatever you can to protect us.

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

We will never dare to forget it.

Right now:

Our mutual passions are as deep as the sea;

We can't bear to be parted from each other.

But when that bastard, Wu the Second, comes back we'll have to separate. What can we do?"

"Sir," said the old lady, "what's so hard about that? As I pointed out to you once before: In one's first marriage one must obey one's parents;

In subsequent marriages one can suit oneself.

It's always been the case that:

Brothers and sisters-in-law do not ask after each other.³⁰

Right now, Wu the Elder's 'hundredth day' is about to come up, and the young lady should engage a few Buddhist monks to preside over the burning of his spirit tablet. As soon as that ceremony is completed, and before Wu the Second gets back, you can pop her into a sedan chair, sir, and take her into your household as a concubine. Then, when that bastard, Wu the Second, arrives back, I'll explain the situation to him and he won't have anything to say in the matter. From then on the two of you can: Live happily ever after, and the whole damn business will come to nothing."

"Godmother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're absolutely right. Truly:

If you aren't tough enough,

You will never be secure."

That day, by the time Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman had finished eating breakfast, they had decided that on the sixth day of the eighth month, which was Wu the Elder's "hundredth day," they would engage monks to perform the Buddhist rites and burn the spirit tablet of the deceased; and that on the evening of the eighth day Hsi-men Ch'ing would send a sedan chair to carry the woman across his threshold. Not long after the three of them had completed their deliberations, Tai-an came back with the horse to take Hsi-men Ch'ing home. But no more of this.

Days and nights speed by like arrows;

The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

Before long it was the sixth day of the eighth month. Hsi-men Ch'ing had brought several taels of loose silver and two pecks of polished rice to the woman's house to defray the expenses of the religious observances. He sent Dame Wang to the Pao-en Temple to engage the services of six Buddhist monks, who were to come to the house and perform a "land and water" mass for the benefit of Wu the Elder, and then preside over the burning of his spirit tablet the same evening.

The foreman of the lay workers from the temple arrived early in the morning, at the fifth watch, bearing with him the sutras that would be used in the liturgy. He prepared the consecrated space in which the ceremony would be held and hung up Buddhist effigies. Dame Wang, in the kitchen, supervised the cook who had been engaged to prepare the vegetarian offerings that would be required for the occasion. Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the preceding night at the woman's house.

Before long the monks arrived and started to sound their hand-chimes and strike their drums and cymbals as they embarked upon their declamatory recitations. The liturgy included excerpts from the *Lotus Sutra*³¹ and the Litanies of Emperor Wu of the Liang Dynasty.³² That morning they dispatched petitions inviting the representatives of the Three Jewels, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, to confer efficacy upon the ceremony by authenticating the covenant. These sacred beings were then invited to partake of the offerings presented to them. At noon the souls of the departed, on both land and water, were summoned to partake of the sustenance provided for their benefit, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

To resume our story, how could P'an Chin-lien bring herself to observe the appropriate abstentions? She remained in bed with Hsi-men Ch'ing and, though the sun was already high in the sky, they had not yet arisen. It was only when the monks requested the presence of the ordainer of the rites to burn incense, sign the petitions, authenticate the covenant, and worship Buddha that she got up, washed her face and combed her hair, made a specious show of putting on mourning, and came out to pay her respects before the Buddhist effigies.

When the company of monks caught sight of Wu the Elder's wife:

Each and every one of them became oblivious to his Buddha nature and his meditative mind;
Each and every one of them lost control of "the monkey of his mind and the horse of his will."³³
All at sevens and eights,
They melted into a heap.

Behold:

The rector becomes flippant;
In reciting the Buddhas' names
he gets them backward.
The precentor becomes confused;
In chanting the words of the sutras his intonation goes astray.
The incense-burning acolyte,
Knocks over the flower vase.
The candle-bearing ascetic,
Picks up the incense case instead.
The lector who declaims the covenant,
Reads the "Great Sung Empire"
as the "Great T'ang."
The teacher who enacts the rite of repentance, Reads "Wu the Elder"
as "Grandfather Wu."
The abbot is so flustered;
He grabs the hand of an acolyte
instead of his drumstick.
The novice is so carried away;
He hammers on the pate of an old monk instead of the bronze chime.
All the merit of their former austerities comes to nothing in a moment;

Even a myriad guardian deities could not reduce them to order.³⁴

As soon as the woman had burned incense before the effigies, signed the petitions, and paid homage to Buddha, she returned to her room to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company as before. A feast of wine and meat was laid on, and they gave themselves over to pleasure.

"If anything should come up," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Dame Wang, "just take care of it yourself. Don't let them come around and pester the lady of the house."

"You can relax, sir," the old lady said with a laugh. "Just leave those shaven-pated bastards to me. The two of you might as well enjoy yourselves."

Gentle reader take note: In this world Buddhist monks of such high virtue and attainments that they can remain: Impervious to the temptations of the flesh,³⁵ are few. A man of old has said:

In one word they are "bonzes,"
In two words they are "Buddhist monks,"
In three words they are "purveyors of demonic music,"
In four words they are "sex-starved hungry ghosts."³⁶

Moreover, as Su Shih³⁷ has said: The untensured are not vicious,

The unvicious are not tonsured,
The vicious are most likely to be tonsured,
The tonsured are most likely to be vicious.³⁸

The subject of this disquisition is how hard it is for monks to keep their vows. Living as they do in their high halls and spacious structures, occupying their sanctuaries and dormitories, supported by the alms of their benefactors so that they can count on three meals a day without having to plant or to plow, and without a worry in the world to occupy their minds, they are able to devote all their attention to lust. Laymen, on the other hand, no matter whether they be scholars, farmers, artisans, or merchants, and even though they be wealthy, distinguished, respected, and well-favored, are often so preoccupied with the pursuit of fame and profit or the demands of social intercourse that even though they have beautiful wives or young concubines at their disposal, the sudden recollection of some besetting problem, or the discovery that the rice-jar is empty and the woodshed short of fuel, is enough to make them lose all interest in such things. This is an arena in which they are no match for the monks.³⁹ There is a poem that testifies to this: Sex-starved hungry ghosts, they are like long-haired monkeys among the beasts;

Disregarding their vows in the pursuit of lust,
they sully the way of the patriarchs.
These creatures are only fit to be seen in their natural habitat;
They should never be invited into the decorated halls of one's home.⁴⁰

That morning when the company of monks beheld the spectacle presented by Wu the Elder's wife, it made an indelible impression on them. When they came back from the temple, to which they had returned for their midday repast and a rest from their labors, the woman was in her room drinking wine and enjoying herself with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

It so happens that the woman's bedroom was right next to the consecrated space that had been set aside for the performance of the Buddhist ceremony. There was only the single thickness of a board wall between them. One of the monks, who had arrived before the rest, went up to the basin outside the woman's bedroom window to wash his hands. Suddenly he overheard the woman: In a trembling voice and melting tones,

Sighing and moaning,
Panting and groaning, just as though she were engaged in the act of sexual intercourse with someone in her room. At this the monk, pretending to wash his hands, stood there eavesdropping for quite a while.

He overheard the woman appealing in a soft voice to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Daddy, how long are you going to keep on banging away like that? I'm afraid the monks may come back and hear something. Let me off for now and come as quickly as you can."

"There's no need to get so excited," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. I still haven't burnt the moxa on the top of your mons."⁴¹

Who would have thought that everything they said to each other was so clearly overheard by that shaven-pated rascal that he might well have ejaculated: "Is it not delightful?"⁴²

After a while, when the whole company of monks had reassembled and they resumed their performance of the liturgy, the word passed from mouth to mouth until they all knew that the woman was carrying on with a man in her room. Imperceptibly they began to reenact the imagined scene: Miming it with their hands, and

Dancing it with their feet.⁴³

By the time the Buddhist ceremony was nearing its completion that evening and the celebrants had moved outside to send the spirit of the departed on its way and burn the paper money that it would need in the other world, the woman had long since divested herself of her mourning and changed into a more colorful outfit. She and Hsi-men Ch'ing stood, shoulder to shoulder, just inside the hanging blind in the doorway, and watched the monks as they prepared to burn Wu the Elder's spirit tablet. Dame Wang brought out a bucket of water, a torch was lit, and in no time at all the spirit tablet and the Buddhist effigies were consumed by the flames.

The shaven-pated rascals with their cold eyes perceived the silhouettes of the man and the woman standing shoulder to shoulder inside the screen and were reminded of the goings-on they had overheard during the day. With one accord they fell to beating their drums and banging their cymbals as if their souls depended on it. A gust of wind blew the abbot's Vairocana hat onto the ground, exposing a bluish, finely polished, shiny pate. No one picked it up, but they all continued banging their cymbals, beating their drums, and: Falling into a heap with laughter.

During the Tablet-burning Monks Overhear Sounds of Venery

"Reverend sir," called out Dame Wang, "the paper money has already been burnt. Why do you keep on banging away like that?"

"We still haven't burnt the incense on the top of the furnace,"⁴⁴ replied the monk.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he told Dame Wang to distribute the fee for their services as quickly as possible.

“Won’t the lady who ordained the rites come out so we can thank her?” asked the abbot.
“Dame Wang,” the woman said, “tell them I’d prefer to be excused.”
“We’d better let her off for now,” the monks replied, and went their way convulsed with laughter.

Truly:

If one’s real work had ever found favor in the eyes of one’s contemporaries;
One would not have had to spend money on rouge in order to paint peonies.⁴⁵

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Even while burning the spirit tablet
the wanton woman is dissatisfied;
Listening by the wall-side eavesdropping monks get an earful.

If Buddhism or Taoism were really capable of absolving her of her sins;
Even the dead, on hearing of such things,
would be dispirited.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 9

HSI-MEN CH'ING CONSPIRES TO MARRY P'AN CHIN-LIEN; CAPTAIN WU MISTAKENLY ASSAULTS LI WAI-CH'UAN

THESE IS a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that goes: With lustful daring as big as the sky they can no longer control themselves;

Their passions deep, their love fast, the two are inseparable.
Preoccupied with the present and the pleasures that they share;
How can they anticipate what future dangers lurk within their screen-walls?

Greedy for delight,
They set their fancies free;
But the stouthearted hero, for his part,
is bent on revenge.
The Lord of Heaven has his own way of disposing such affairs;
Victory and defeat, success and failure, never cease to alternate.¹

The story goes that by the time Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien were finished with the burning of Wu the Elder's spirit tablet they had already exchanged their mourning for more colorful garments. That evening they prepared a feast to which they invited Dame Wang in order to bid her farewell.

Chin-lien turned Ying-erh over to Dame Wang to look after and they then instructed her as follows: "When Wu the Second comes back, just say that the young lady had no way to support herself, and her mother urged her to take steps for the future, so she married a merchant from another town and went off with him."

The woman's trunks had already been dispatched to Hsi-men Ch'ing's house the day before. The broken-down furniture and old clothes that remained were all bequeathed to Dame Wang. Hsi-men Ch'ing also rewarded her for her exertions with a tael of silver.

The next day, in a single sedan chair, accompanied by four lanterns and escorted by Dame Wang and Tai-an, he had the woman carried off to his home. There was no one who lived on that street, whether far or near, who did not know about this affair, but they were all afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was not above resorting to strong-arm tactics and possessed both money and influence, so who would have dared to interfere?

Someone who lived in the locality composed a doggerel quatrain in commemoration of this event that sums it up very well: Hsi-men Ch'ing's lack of shame is truly laughable;

"First seducing and then marrying,"² his ill fame is notorious.
Inside the sedan chair there sits a wanton whore;
While tagging at her heels there follows an old procuress.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing took the woman into his household he had the three ground-floor rooms of the two-storied belvedere in his garden made ready to serve as her living quarters. She had a little courtyard all to herself, to which the only entrance was a postern gate, and flowers and potted miniature plants had been provided for decoration. It was an extremely secluded place where people seldom came even during the daytime. One of the rooms served as her living room and another as her bedroom.

Hsi-men Ch'ing subsequently laid out sixteen taels of silver to buy her a black lacquer bedstead, elaborately adorned with gold tracery, bed curtains of scarlet silk with gold roundels, a dressing case ornamented with floral rosettes, and a complete complement of tables, chairs, and porcelain taborets embossed with patterns of ornamental brocade.

Wu Yüeh-niang, the First Lady of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, employed two maidservants in her quarters, one of whom was named Ch'un-mei, or Spring Plum Blossom, and the other Yü-hsiao, or Jade Flute. Hsi-men Ch'ing reassigned Ch'un-mei to Chin-lien's quarters, directing her to serve her new mistress diligently and address her as Mother. He then laid out five taels of silver to buy another young maidservant, named Hsiao-yü, or Little Jade, to wait on Yüeh-niang, and a further six taels of silver to buy a scullery maid for Chin-lien, whose name was Ch'iu-chü, or Autumn Chrysanthemum.

P'an Chin-lien was designated as the Fifth Lady in the hierarchy of Hsi-men Ch'ing's wife and concubines. There was a former maidservant, named Sun Hsüeh-o, or Snow Moth, who had come into his household as part of the dowry of his deceased wife, née Ch'en. She was about nineteen years old, petite in stature, and good-looking. Hsi-men Ch'ing had already granted her the right to wear the fret on her chignon that was a mark of nonservile status and had designated her as his Fourth Lady. That is why Chin-lien was designated as the Fifth Lady. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Conspires to Marry P'an Chin-lien

No sooner had this woman been brought across the threshold than the members of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, both high and low, became unhappy about the situation.

Gentle reader take note: In this world, women with fire in their eyes are extremely numerous. No matter how worthy and intelligent a wife may be, or how much she may protest that she will not be annoyed if her husband should take a concubine, when she is actually confronted with the situation and sees her husband going off to someone else's room to enjoy the pleasure of: Sharing the same bed and a single pillow, though she be ever so fine by nature, to a greater or lesser extent:

Her countenance will sour and her heart be ill-disposed.

Truly:

What a pity that, in its perfect fullness,
the moon of this night;
Should shed its pure radiance on other gardens,
so near and yet so far.³

That evening Hsi-men Ch'ing slept in Chin-lien's chambers.

Like fish sporting in the water;⁴
Their pleasure could not be exceeded.

The next day the woman combed her hair and made herself up, put on her most attractive outfit, directed Ch'un-mei to accompany her with the ceremonial tea, and set out for the quarters of the First Lady, Wu Yüeh-niang, which were located in the rear of the residential compound. The purpose of this visit was to pay her respects to the ladies of the household and to present the First Lady with the customary pair of "presentation shoes," which had been made by her own hand.

From her seated position Yüeh-niang carefully scrutinized her visitor. She saw that the woman was no more than twenty-four or twenty-five years old and was very good-looking. Behold: Her eyebrows are shaped like willow leaves in early spring;

Forever conveying a sense of longing for the clouds and rain.
Her face is like peach blossoms
in the third month;

Covertly suggesting thoughts
of breezes and moonlight.
Her slender waist is lissome;
So constricted as to render her an idle swallow or languid oriole.
Her sandalwood mouth is dainty;
Attractive enough to drive bees to distraction
and butterflies to madness.
Her jade countenance is alluring,
 a flower that can also speak;
Her fragrant visage is enticing,
 a jade that exudes its own bouquet.⁵

As Wu Yüeh-niang:

Scanned her from head to foot,
Her glamour ran downward apace;
Surveyed her from foot to head,
Her glamour flowed up with her gaze.⁶
If one were to describe her glamour;
It is like a shining pearl rolling on a crystal plate.
If one were to speak of her demeanor;
It is like a red apricot on a branch-tip caught in the morning sun.⁷

When Yüeh-niang had looked her over for a while:

From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she thought to herself,

“When the servants came home they used to talk a lot about Wu the Elder’s wife, but I had never set eyes on her. Now I can see that she really is as good-looking as they say. No wonder that ruffian of mine is so enamored of her!”

Chin-lien first kowtowed to Yüeh-niang and presented her with the customary pair of shoes. Yüeh-niang allowed her to kowtow to her four times. After this Chin-lien also paid her respects to Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and Sun Hsüeh-o, with whom she exchanged salutations on an equal footing as sisters. When these formalities were completed she stood to one side until Yüeh-niang ordered a maidservant to bring her a seat and had her sit down. Yüeh-niang directed the maidservants and other serving women in the household to address her as Fifth Lady.

The woman sat to one side and devoted her undivided attention to sizing up her new companions. She observed that Wu Yüeh-niang was about twenty-six years old and learned that she was called Yüeh-niang, or Moon Lady, because she had been born on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, the day of the Moon Festival. She had: A face like a silver salver;

Eyes like apricots;
Was gentle in her movements;
Sedate, and of few words.

The Second Lady, Li Chiao-erh, had been a singing girl in the licensed quarter. She was pleasingly plump, rather heavy in build, and had the habit of merely giving a little cough when she was introduced to people. Although she was well versed in all the techniques that might be used to please a patron in bed, as might be expected of a well-known courtesan, she was no match for Chin-lien at the game of breeze and moonlight.

The Third Lady was Meng Yü-lou, who was the most recent addition to the household. She was about twenty-nine years old and had: A pear-blossom complexion;

A willowy waist;
A tall stature;
And a melon-seed face,
With the addition of a few barely perceptible pockmarks.

She was possessed of a natural beauty, to be sure, but the golden lotuses that peeked out from underneath her skirt were neither all that big nor all that small.

The Fourth Lady, Sun Hsüeh-o, had entered the household as a personal maid. She was: Petite in stature;

Dainty in demeanor;
Adept at making bouillabaisse;
And could do a pretty pirouette upon the emerald disk.⁸

Chin-lien was able to size them all up in her mind with one sweep of her eyes.

After the “third-day celebrations” were over she got up early every morning and came to Yüeh-niang’s quarters, where she kept her company in doing needlework or making shoes. She always insisted on: Fetching things, whether they were wanted or not; and

Doing things, whether they were called for or not.⁹

In giving orders to the maids and addressing Yüeh-niang, the words “First Lady” were seldom out of her mouth.

She didn’t have to play up to her with every trick at her disposal very often before Yüeh-niang was so delighted she scarcely knew what to do with herself. Yüeh-niang started to address her as Sister Six because she was the sixth sibling in her generation of the family, presented her with some of her favorite articles of clothing and jewelry, and invited her to eat her meals and drink tea at the same table with her.

When Li Chiao-erh and the others saw the misguided favor that Yüeh-niang showered upon her they were not happy about it.

“We’ve been here a lot longer than she has,” they grumbled, “but who pays any attention to us? How long has she been here, anyway, that she should be pampered so? Our elder sister doesn’t know what she’s doing.”

Truly:

Though the preceding carriages have overturned by the thousands;
The carriages that follow continue to overturn
in the same way.
No matter how clearly one may point out
the safest route;
One's honest words are misconstrued
as ill-meant advice.¹⁰

To resume our story, once Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken P'an Chin-lien into his household she found herself dwelling in: Vast courtyards and secluded mansions, and was provided with clothing and jewelry to match.

A woman of beauty and a man of talent,
Both of them were in the prime of life.

In everything they were:

Like glue and like lacquer;

She was:

Obedient to his every whim.

And as for their lewd desires, no day went by on which they were not gratified. But let us put this aside for a moment and say no more about it.

Let us now return to the story of Wu Sung. He arrived back in Ch'ing-ho district before the first ten days of the eighth month were over, reported immediately to the district yamen, and handed over the reply he had brought back from the capital. On reading it the district magistrate was very pleased to learn that his consignment of gold and other valuables had reached its destination safely. He rewarded Wu Sung with ten taels of silver and treated him to wine and food, but there is no need to describe all this.

Wu Sung then returned to his lodgings, changed his clothes and shoes, put on a new hat, locked the door of his room, and headed straight for Amethyst Street. When the neighbors who lived to either side saw that Wu Sung had come back, they felt so apprehensive they broke into a sweat.

“This is one of those times when:

Catastrophe will arise within the screen-wall of the house," they said to themselves. "Once this wrathful god has returned he'll never be willing to call it quits. Something dire is bound to happen."

Wu Sung strode up to his elder brother's front door, pulled aside the bamboo blind, and poked his head inside. Catching sight of no one but the young girl, Ying-erh, who was twisting thread in the hallway under the stairs, he said to himself, "My eyes must be deceiving me?" He called out, "Sister-in-law," but there was no reply. He called out, "Elder Brother," but, again, there was no reply. "My ears must be playing tricks on me," he thought. "Why is it that I don't hear any response from my elder brother or my sister-in-law?"

He went up to the young girl, Ying-erh, to ask what was going on, but when she saw that it was her uncle who had come back she was too frightened to say anything.

"Where have your father and mother gone?" Wu Sung demanded, but Ying-erh only started to cry and made no reply.

As he continued to press his inquiry Dame Wang, next door, overheard him and realized that it was Wu the Second who had returned. Fearful lest the cat be let out of the bag, she hurried over to help Ying-erh cover up the situation as best she could.

When Wu the Second saw that it was Dame Wang from next door he made her a bow and asked, "Where has my elder brother gone? And why is my sister-in-law nowhere to be seen?"

"Brother Two," the old lady said, "have a seat and I'll tell you all about it. After you left town, sometime in the fourth month, your elder brother came down with an awkward illness and died."

"When in the fourth month did my brother die?" Wu the Second demanded to know. "What kind of an illness was it? And whose medicine did he take?"

"It was on the twentieth day of the fourth month," said Dame Wang, "that your elder brother suddenly came down with an acute case of heart trouble. He was sick for eight or nine days.

The gods were besought and diviners consulted.¹¹
Every kind of medical prescription was tried, but nothing availed, and so he died."

"My elder brother never suffered from such an ailment before," said Wu the Second. "How could he get heart trouble and die, just like that?"

"Captain," said Dame Wang, "how can you talk that way?

Weather is characterized by unexpected storms;

Man is subject to unpredictable vicissitudes.¹²

When you take off your shoes and socks today;

Who knows whether you will put them on tomorrow?¹³

Who can be sure that nothing will ever happen to him?"¹⁴

"Where is my elder brother buried at the present time?" Wu the Second demanded to know.

"By the time your elder brother breathed his last," said Dame Wang, "there wasn't a candareen left in the house. Your sister-in-law, after all, is like a legless crab. Where could she go to look for a grave site or anything like that? Fortunately a wealthy man in the neighborhood who was barely acquainted with Wu the Elder saw fit to help out by providing a coffin. There was nothing for it. After the body had lain in state for three days, it was carried outside the town and cremated."

"Where has my sister-in-law gone to now?" Wu the Second asked.

"She's still:

A young and delicate lass,"

said Dame Wang, "and had no means of support. She managed, somehow or other, to get through her hundred days of mourning, after which her mother urged her to take steps for the future. So, last month, she married a merchant from another town and went off with him. She left this karmic encumbrance of a step-daughter behind and asked me to look after her until you came back. Now that you're here, I can turn her over to you and thus fulfill my responsibilities in the matter."

When Wu the Second had heard her out, he thought to himself in silence for some time and then, abandoning Dame Wang unceremoniously, strode out the door and headed back to his lodgings in front of the district yamen. Opening the door, he went into his room, changed into a set of plain white garments, and sent his orderly out into the street to buy a hempen sash, a pair of cotton shoes, and a mourning cap to wear on his head. He also picked up some fruits and sweetmeats, incense sticks and candles, paper money and imitation gold and silver ingots, and so forth. Returning to his brother's home, he set up a new spirit tablet to Wu the Elder, prepared the soup and rice he had brought with him, lit lamps and candles on the table in front of the tablet, laid out the sacrificial wine and delicacies, and hung up funeral streamers with appropriate quotations from the sutras inscribed on them. It took him less than four hours, all told, to complete these arrangements.

A little after the first watch Wu the Second lit the incense, prostrated himself, and kowtowed, saying, "Elder Brother, hear me, if your departed soul be not too far away! When you were in this world you were of a meek disposition, and now that you are dead the circumstances remain unclear. Look you, if you have: Suffered injustice and harbor resentment, as the victim of a murder, appear to me in a dream. As your brother I will undertake to: Requite your wrong and assuage your resentment."

Pouring the wine to make a libation, and burning the paper money, Wu the Second commenced to weep aloud, saying, "After all: We came into this world by the same route."

He wept to such effect that among the neighbors to either side there were none who were not moved.

When Wu the Second had finished weeping he shared the soup and rice, wine and delicacies, with his orderly and Ying-erh. As soon as they had eaten he sought out two sleeping mats, instructed his orderly to bed down beside him in the room where they were, sent Ying-erh off to her own room, and then, taking the other mat for himself, lay down in front of the table on which Wu the Elder's spirit tablet was located.

It was around midnight and Wu the Second:

Tossed first this way and then that, but could not get to sleep. All he could do was to give vent to long sighs. His orderly, meanwhile, lay there, snoring away, stretched out as if he were a dead man. Wu the Second got to his feet to look around and saw that the glass lamp on the table that held the spirit tablet seemed to be: Half alight and half extinguished.

He sat down on the mat again and started to talk to himself, saying, "When my elder brother was alive he was of a meek disposition, and now that he is dead the circumstances remain unclear."

Before he had finished speaking he suddenly became aware of a gust of cold wind swirling up from underneath the table that held the spirit tablet. Behold: Devoid of shape and form,

Neither fog nor mist;
Swirling like an eerie wind,
its chill invades the bones;
Icy as a baleful breath,
its cold penetrates the flesh.
Nebulous and dark,
It causes the lamplight before the tablet to grow dim;
Somber and spectral,
It makes the paper money on the wall fly every which way.
All too dimly, it conceals
the poison-eater's ghost;
With a flutter, it ruffles his soul-inducting banner.¹⁵

This gust of cold wind made Wu the Second's hair stand on end. When he took a close look, he saw someone climbing out from underneath the table that held the spirit tablet, who called out to him, "Younger Brother, I died a grievous death!"

Wu the Second could not see him distinctly, but by the time he started forward to enquire further the cold wind had dissipated and the figure was no longer to be seen.

Wu the Second collapsed onto the mat and sat there thinking to himself, "How uncanny!"

Was it a dream or not a dream?

Just now my elder brother wanted to tell me something, but my vital spirits caused his soul to disperse. It seems clear that this death of his must have been the result of foul play."

As he listened he heard the watchman strike the third quarter of the third watch. He looked over at his orderly, who was still fast asleep, and then, muttering unhappily to himself, "I'll have to wait till dawn before I can do anything about it," he fell into a fitful sleep.

Eventually, at the fifth watch, the cock crowed and it began to grow light in the east. The orderly got up to heat some water. After Wu the Second had washed and rinsed out his mouth, he woke up Ying-erh, so she could look after the house, and went out, taking the orderly with him.

As he went along the street he asked the neighbors who lived in the vicinity, "How did my elder brother come to die? And who has my sister-in-law married herself off to?"

The neighbors who lived on that street knew perfectly well what had happened, but they were all afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing, so no one cared to interfere.

All they would say was, "Captain, there's no need to enquire any further. Dame Wang lives right next door. Just ask Dame Wang and you'll find out what you want to know."

A certain busybody also told him, "That Yün-ko who sells pears and Ho the Ninth, the coroner's assistant, are two people who know a good deal about it."

Wu the Second proceeded immediately to the commercial center of town to look for Yün-ko, but couldn't find him at first. Then he spotted the little monkey, carrying a basket woven out of willow osiers in his hand, on his way back from the rice store.

"Yün-ko," called out Wu the Second, "your brother salutes you."

When the young scamp saw that it was Wu the Second who accosted him, he said, "Captain Wu, you've shown up just a step too late. And another thing. My father's in his sixties and there's no one else to look after him. I can't very well let myself get involved in a lawsuit with you just for the fun of it!"

"Good Little Brother," said Wu the Second, "come with me." Leading him to the upper floor of a restaurant, he summoned the waiter and ordered him to have two meals prepared for them.

"You may be young, Little Brother," Wu the Second said to Yün-ko, "but you've got the filial desire to maintain your family. I'm afraid I don't have anything much to offer."

After groping around in his pocket, he produced five taels worth of loose silver and gave it to Yün-ko, saying, "You take this for the time being and use it to provide for your father's expenses. There's a matter in which you can be of use to me. Once it's taken care of I'll give you another ten taels or so of silver, which you can employ as capital in your trade. Now tell me in detail, whom did my elder brother quarrel with? Who plotted to do him in? And who carried my sister-in-law off in marriage? Tell me everything you know about it and don't conceal anything."

Yün-ko accepted the silver with alacrity, thinking to himself as he did so, "This five taels of silver is enough to provide for my father for three to five months. So even if I get involved in a lawsuit with him it won't matter."

"Brother Two," he said, "hear me out, and try not to get too upset at what I tell you."

Thereupon he told him the whole story, from beginning to end: how he had gone looking for Hsi-men Ch'ing to peddle some pears, how he had subsequently been beaten by Dame Wang, who wouldn't let him into her room, how he had helped Wu the Elder to catch them in the act of adultery, how Hsi-men Ch'ing had kicked Wu the Elder in the solar plexus, how he had suffered from pain in the region of the heart for several days, and then died under suspicious circumstances.

When Wu the Second had heard him out, he asked, "Is what you tell me really true?" Then he asked again, "And who did my sister-in-law marry herself off to?"

"Your sister-in-law," said Yün-ko, "was carried off to his own house by Hsi-men Ch'ing, so he could knock the bottom out of her at his leisure. And you ask me if it's true or if it's false!"

"You'd better not be lying," said Wu the Second.

"Even if I have to tell it in front of the magistrate," said Yün-ko, "I'll tell it the same way."

"Little Brother," said Wu the Second, "if that's the way things stand, let's have something to eat."

In no time at all they polished off a meal served in:

Large platters and large bowls.

When Wu the Second had paid the reckoning and the two of them had come downstairs, he said to Yün-ko, "You go home now and turn over the living expenses to your father. Early tomorrow morning meet me in front of the district yamen, and be prepared to testify on my behalf." Then he went on to ask, "Where does Ho the Ninth live?"

"It's a little late in the day to be looking for Ho the Ninth," said Yün-ko. "Before you came back, three days ago, he took himself off to who knows where."

Wu the Second let Yün-ko go his own way and then went home.

The next day Wu the Second got up early in the morning and went to Master Ch'en's house for assistance in drafting a formal complaint. Then he went to the front gate of the district yamen, where he found Yün-ko was already waiting. Taking him along with him, he went straight into the courtroom, knelt down, and began loudly to complain of a case of injustice.

When the district magistrate saw him, he recognized that it was Wu Sung and asked, "What is your plea? And what injustice do you have to complain of?"

Wu the Second pled as follows: "My brother, Wu the Elder, has been the victim of collusion between the influential malefactor, Hsi-men Ch'ing, and my sister-in-law, née P'an, with whom he has been carrying on an adulterous affair. The accused, having kicked my brother in the solar plexus, then contrived, at the instigation of Dame Wang, to conspire with his paramour in his murder. Ho the Ninth connived with them by fudging the coroner's inspection and cremating the body, thereby destroying the evidence of the crime. At the present time, Hsi-men Ch'ing has sequestered my sister-in-law by taking her into his house as a concubine. The youngster, Yün-ko, who is now present, is prepared to testify to the truth of these allegations. I trust that Your Honor will see that justice is done."

When he had finished making his plea, Wu the Second presented the written text of his complaint. The district magistrate accepted it, and then asked, "Why is Ho the Ninth not here?"

"Ho the Ninth is aware of his culpability and has decamped," Wu the Second replied. "His whereabouts are unknown."

The district magistrate took Yün-ko's verbal deposition and then withdrew from the courtroom in order to consult with his subordinates.

It so happens that the district magistrate, the vice-magistrate, the assistant magistrate, and the docket officer had all of them, high and low, been engaged in hanky-panky with Hsi-men Ch'ing. For this reason they were unanimous in concluding that this case would be a difficult one to try.

When the district magistrate came back into the tribunal he summoned Wu Sung before him and said, "You are, yourself, a police captain on the staff of this court, and yet you seem to be ignorant of the law. It has always been true that: To prove adultery, you must nab both parties;

To prove theft, you must produce the loot;

To prove homicide, you must find the wound.¹⁶

The corpse of that elder brother of yours is no longer available as evidence, and you have not nabbed the accused in the act of adultery. For you to rely solely on the verbal allegations of this youngster in pressing a charge of murder against them is surely to make a travesty of justice. You ought not to act rashly but think it over to yourself.

If you decide to proceed, then proceed;

If you decide to desist, then desist."

"If Your Honor will permit me to speak," said Wu the Second, "all of these allegations are true. I have not invented a single one of them."

"You may rise, for the present," said the district magistrate. "Let me:

Consider what course would be best.

If it turns out to be feasible to do so, I will have them arrested for you."

Only then did Wu the Second get to his feet and go outside. Yün-ko, however, was detained in the yamen and not permitted to return home.

It was not long before someone reported these events to Hsi-men Ch'ing, informing him that Wu the Second had returned and had taken Yün-ko with him to court to make a formal charge against him. Hsi-men Ch'ing was sufficiently alarmed by this development to send his trusted servants, Lai-pao and Lai-wang, with their sleeves full of silver, to take care of the officials involved, all of whom were bought off.

The next morning Wu the Second showed up in the courtroom bright and early and petitioned the district magistrate to proceed with the arrest of the accused. Who would have thought that this official coveted the bribe he had received?

As soon as the case was called, he said, "Wu the Second, you oughtn't to let yourself be misled by anyone else into becoming an antagonist of Hsi-men Ch'ing. The truth in this matter is not clear, and it would be a difficult case to try. As the sage has said: If even what one sees with one's eyes,

May be feared suspect;

How can words spoken behind one's back,

Be completely trustworthy?¹⁷

You ought not to act rashly, on the spur of the moment."

The docket officer, who was standing to one side, also said, "Captain, since you work in the yamen, you must be acquainted with the law. In any case involving an accusation of homicide there are five prerequisites that must be possessed by the prosecutor before he can proceed to trial: the corpse of the victim, the wound, the medical cause of death, the weapon, and evidence that implicates the accused. The corpse of that elder brother of yours is no longer available as evidence. How can such a case be tried?"

"Since Your Honor denies my suit," said Wu the Second, "you must have your reasons."

He then recovered the written text of his complaint, left the courtroom, and returned to his lodgings with Yün-ko, whom he then released from his obligation and allowed to go home.

Scarcely aware of what he was doing, he gazed up to Heaven and gave a long sigh.

Grinding and gnashing his teeth, he kept muttering, "That damned whore!" to himself, over and over again. How was this man to find a vent for his anger?

Wu Sung headed straight for Hsi-men Ch'ing's wholesale pharmaceutical shop, with the intent of finding the culprit and taking matters into his own hands.

Manager Fu, who was in charge of the shop, was sitting inside the counter when Wu the Second strode up in an obviously belligerent mood, saluted him, and asked, "Is the Honorable Gentleman at home?"

Manager Fu recognized that it was Wu the Second and replied, "He's not at home, Captain. What have you got to say to him?"

"Walk a few steps with me, if you please," said Wu the Second. "I've got something to say to you."

Manager Fu did not dare to refuse and, coming outside, allowed Wu the Second to lead him to the mouth of an out-of-the-way alley for a chat. No sooner did they get there, however, than Wu the Second adopted a menacing manner, took hold of him by the lapel: Opened wide his weird eyes, and demanded, "Do you want to die, or do you want to live?"

"With all due respect, Captain," said Manager Fu, "I've never done anything to offend you. What are you so angry about, Captain?"

"If you want to die," said Wu the Second, "don't bother to reply. But if you want to live, tell me the truth. Where is that bastard, Hsi-men Ch'ing, at this moment? And how long is it since he took my sister-in-law into his household? If you tell me everything I ask, I'll let you go."

Manager Fu was not a courageous man. When he saw that Wu the Second meant business, he became panic-stricken and said, "Calm yourself, Captain! My position in his household is only that of an employee whom he hires for two taels of silver a month to manage his shop. I am not privy to his private affairs. The Honorable Gentleman really isn't at home. Just a little while ago he went out with an acquaintance to have a drink at the Great Tavern on Lion Street. I wouldn't dare tell you a lie."

It was only on hearing these words that Wu the Second released his grip and, with giant strides, flew off in the direction of Lion Street, like a cloud scudding before the wind. Manager Fu was so frightened it was some time before he could stir from the spot. Wu the Second made straight for the tavern just below the bridge on Lion Street.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the company of one of the black-robed lictors on the staff of the district yamen, who was known as Li Wai-ch'uan, or Leaky Li. This man played the role of influence peddler in both the district and the prefecture, intervening in public business on people's behalf, and keeping his ear to the ground as he ran back and forth, for a fee. If two parties were engaged in a lawsuit, he would peddle his services as a conduit of confidential information. Or if anyone wished to offer a bribe to the officials or functionaries, he would take a cut from both sides. For this reason he was known around the district yamen by the nickname Leaky Li.

That day, when he saw the district magistrate reject Wu Sung's suit, he had no sooner acquired the news than he came looking for Hsi-men Ch'ing to tell him that Wu the Second's suit had failed. Hsi-men Ch'ing had invited him to have a drink with him on the second floor of the tavern, where he presented him with five taels of silver.

Just as they were settling down to enjoy their drinks, Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to look out the window and caught sight of the formidable-looking Wu Sung, racing up toward the tavern from below the bridge. Realizing immediately that he could be up to no good, he excused himself on the pretext of going to the bathroom, leapt out a rear window, fled along the ridge of an adjacent roof, and jumped down into someone's rear courtyard.

Wu the Second dashed up to the front of the tavern and asked one of the waiters, "Is Hsi-men Ch'ing here?"

"The Honorable Hsi-men," the waiter replied, "is upstairs drinking wine with one of his acquaintances."

Quickening his pace and hiking up his clothes,

Wu the Second flew upstairs, where the only thing he saw was a man, occupying the place of honor, with a pair of painted singing girls sitting to either side of him. He recognized that it was Li Wai-ch'uan, the lictor from the district yamen, and knew that he must have come to tell Hsi-men Ch'ing the news.

Enraged, he went up to him and demanded, "Where has Hsi-men Ch'ing gone?"

When Li Wai-ch'uan saw that it was Wu the Second he was too dumbstruck to get a word out for some time. With a single movement of his leg, Wu the Second kicked over the table, smashing the cups and saucers to smithereens. The singing girls were frozen with fright. Wu the Second struck Li Wai-ch'uan right in the face with his fist.

Crying out, "Don't you ... !" Li Wai-ch'uan jumped onto the bench he had been sitting on and tried to make his escape through the rear window, but Wu the Second picked him up with both hands and hurled him clear through the front window, so that he fell, headfirst, into the street below, and was knocked unconscious.

When the waiters on the ground floor saw that Wu the Second was running amok they were scared out of their wits. None of them dared to intervene. The pedestrians on either side of the street all stopped and stared. Wu the Second was still on the rampage. Racing downstairs, he saw that his victim was already half dead from the impact of his fall and lay there, at full length on the ground, unable to move anything but his eyes. Thereupon, square in the crotch, he gave him two additional kicks, with the result that: Alas and alack;

He stopped breathing and died.

"Captain!" everyone exclaimed. "This man is not Hsi-men Ch'ing. You've attacked the wrong person."

"I asked him a question," said Wu the Second. "Why didn't he respond? That's why I assaulted him. Now, it appears that, without even suffering a beating, he has died."

Captain Wu Mistakenly Assaults Li Wai-ch'uan

The local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit saw that a homicide had occurred but did not dare to accost Wu the Second directly in order to place him under arrest. All they could do was to gradually edge closer to him until they had him surrounded and then keep him under strict surveillance. The proprietor of the tavern, Wang Luan, and the two singing girls, whose surnames were Pao and Niu, were also taken into custody, after which they all proceeded to the yamen to appear before the district magistrate.

By this time:

All Lion Street was dumbfounded;
The district of Ch'ing-ho was disturbed.

The spectators who gathered in the streets could not be numbered.

They all said, "Hsi-men Ch'ing must not have been fated to die. When his assailant discovered that he had made good his escape, he took out his wrath on this man instead."

Truly:

Mr. Chang drinks wine, but Mr. Li gets drunk;

The mulberry tree is cut with a knife,
but the willow bark is scarred.¹⁸

While one person enjoys himself;

Another is haled into court.

Can such things be?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The hero, endeavoring to assuage his resentment, suffers the rigors of the law;

What can the Lord of Heaven be up to,
that such murk should be allowed to spread?

In the Nine Springs the poison-eating sojourner has died in vain;

While, deep in her boudoir,
Chin-lien laughs her head off.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 10

WU THE SECOND IS CONDEMNED TO EXILE IN MENG-CHOU; HSI-MEN AND HIS HAREM REVEL IN THE HIBISCUS PAVILION

In the morning you may read the yogācāra sutras;
In the evening recite disaster-dispelling dhāranis.
If you plant melons you will surely harvest melons;
If you plant beans you will surely harvest beans.
Sutras and dhāranis have no minds of their own;
Once you have made your karma how can it be unmade?
Hell on the one hand and Heaven on the other;
Are only the consequences of our own actions.¹

THE STORY GOES that once Wu Sung and the others had been taken into custody by the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit, they all proceeded to the yamen to appear before the district magistrate.

Let us now return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Having leapt out a rear window on the second floor of the tavern and fled along the ridge of an adjacent roof, he had concealed himself in someone's rear courtyard.

It so happens that this was the residence of Old Man Hu, the doctor. While Hsi-men Ch'ing was still attempting to make himself inconspicuous, what should he see but a large, fat maidservant coming out to the privy to relieve herself. Just as she was in the process of jutting out her beefy behind, she suddenly caught sight of a man, on all fours, at the foot of the courtyard wall. Dashing back the way she had come, without even taking the time to put herself to rights, she screamed out, "Thief!" so lustily that Old Man Hu hurried into the courtyard to see what was the matter and recognized that it was Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Congratulations, sir!" he said. "When Wu the Second failed to find you he killed the other person instead. The local constable has already taken him to the district yamen to appear before the magistrate. There is little reason to doubt that he will be convicted of a capital crime. You are free to go home, sir. Nothing will come of it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then bade Old Man Hu a grateful farewell and swaggered off to his home, where he gave P'an Chin-lien a word-for-word account of everything that had happened. The two of them clapped their hands and laughed for joy, thinking that their only cause for worry had been eliminated.

"Spread a little extra money around, high and low," the woman advised Hsi-men Ch'ing. "See to it that they finish him off, so there'll be no danger of his ever getting free again."

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent his trusted servant, Lai-wang, to convey a set of gold and silver wine vessels and fifty taels of "snowflake" silver to the district magistrate. He also distributed a good deal of additional money, high and low, to the other functionaries, including the docket officer. The only purpose behind this largess was to see to it that Wu the Second was not treated leniently. The district magistrate accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribe.

The next morning, at the early session of the court, the district magistrate took his place on the bench and the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit escorted Wu the Second, along with the proprietor of the tavern and the singing girls who were to act as witnesses, into the courtroom and had them kneel down in front of the dais.

The district magistrate had altered his demeanor overnight. "Wu the Second, you rascal," he said. "Only yesterday you tried to bring a specious suit. I don't know how you could have shown such disrespect for the law. And now you have actually killed someone for no reason at all. What have you got to say in your defense?"

Wu the Second kowtowed and pled as follows: "I trust that Your Honor will see that justice is done on my behalf. My quarrel was really with Hsi-men Ch'ing, but when I unexpectedly ran into this man on the second floor of the tavern and asked him where Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone, he refused to give me an answer. In a momentary fit of rage, I wrongly killed him."

"This rascal is talking nonsense," proclaimed the district magistrate. "How could you have failed to recognize that he was a lictor on the staff of the yamen? You must have had an ulterior motive and are refusing to tell the truth."

Then he called out to his minions, "Put him to the question."

Man is a miserable creature;

Unless you beat him he'll never confess."²

From either side three or four lictors and jailers appeared, bearing a full panoply of instruments of torture. They turned Wu Sung over, and the blows of the light bamboo fell on him like rain. In no time at all they had administered twenty strokes, but, despite the beating, Wu the Second continued to protest, again and again, that he was being treated unjustly.

"In the past," he said, "there have been occasions when I exerted myself to the utmost on Your Honor's behalf. How can you show no pity for me now? Your Honor ought not to subject me to such cruel torture."

When the district magistrate heard these words he became even more incensed. "You scoundrel!" he replied. "You've killed someone with your own hands and you're still trying to tough it out. You can't stick anyone else with your own guilt." Then he called out, "Put the squeezers on him and give him a good squeezing."

Thereupon the finger-squeezers were applied to Wu Sung and, after being tightened in place, were struck fifty times with a heavy bamboo. He was then put into a long cangue and incarcerated in the district prison, while the witnesses in the case were temporarily detained in the gatehouse of the yamen.

Now among the vice-magistrate and other subsidiary officials there were some who had been on friendly terms with Wu the Second, who knew him to be a man of righteous and heroic cast, and who would have liked to help him out. But because they had all accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribes, their mouths were sealed, and there was nothing they could do about it.

Wu Sung continued to protest that he was being treated unjustly, which delayed matters for a few days, but eventually he was driven into making a hugger-mugger confession. The docket officer on duty, the coroner's assistant, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, the witnesses, and so forth, were all escorted to Lion Street where a formal inquest was performed on Li Wai-ch'uan's corpse, and the inquest report form filled out. The said document read as follows: Wu Sung demanded reparation from the deceased for the unequal division of a sum of money, and, failing to receive satisfaction, in a drunken rage, assaulted him with both fists and feet and threw him to the ground with fatal results. The left rib cage, the face, the solar plexus, and the scrotum of the deceased all exhibit livid marks produced by injuries of varying degrees of severity.

After the inquest was completed they returned to the district yamen. One day, after a formal report of the particulars had been prepared, the prisoner was escorted under guard to Tung-p'ing prefecture to await the final disposition of his case.

Now the prefect of Tung-p'ing was named Ch'en Wen-chao.³ He was a native of Honan and was an official of absolute integrity. As soon as he learned that the prisoner had arrived he took his position on the bench. What was this official like? Behold: All his life he has been correct and upright;

By natural endowment he is worthy and perspicacious.

In his youth he studied his books by light reflected from the snow;⁴

Once grown up he responded to imperial inquiries in the Palace of Golden Bells.⁵

He constantly harbors
 a loyal and filial heart;
 He is always motivated by humane and kind considerations.
 The population of his jurisdiction grows;
 The taxes are honestly levied;
 Common people who sing his praises fill the streets.
 The number of lawsuits is diminished;
 Banditry and robbery are curtailed;
 The clamor of elders extolling his virtues is heard in the marketplace.
 The people curb his carriage and tug at his stirrups;⁶
 Enshrining his name in the history books for a thousand years.
 His merits are carved on stone and engraved on stelae;
 So that his fame as a prefect will be acclaimed for all time.
 Correct and upright, of absolute integrity,
 he is the father and mother of the people;
 Worthy and good, square and proper,
 he deserves the epithet "Azure Heaven."⁷

Now the prefect, Ch'en Wen-chao, already knew something about this case and gave immediate orders that both the accused and the witnesses should be brought before him. The first thing he did, right there in the courtroom, was to examine the report of the case that had been forwarded from Ch'ing-ho district as well as the various depositions and the recommended sentence. Truly, what did this report say? The text read as follows: Ch'ing-ho district reports a case of homicide to Tung-p'ing prefecture, as below: The accused, Wu Sung, twenty-seven years of age, is a native of Yang-ku district. Because of his unusual strength, the magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district appointed him to the post of police captain. On his return from an official mission, while preparing to make a ritual sacrifice in commemoration of his deceased elder brother, he learned that his sister-in-law, née P'an, had remarried before the expiration of her mourning period. The said Wu Sung, on making further inquiries in the streets, made his way, as he should not have done, to the second floor of Wang Luan's tavern in Lion Street, where he encountered the initially unknown but now identified Li Wai-ch'uan. Upon drunkenly demanding repayment of a prior loan of three hundred cash and meeting with a refusal from Li Wai-ch'uan, he engaged him, as he should not have done, in an affray, neither one being willing to submit to the other. In the course of being seized, beaten, kicked, and thrown to the ground, the victim suffered such severe injuries that he died on the spot. Two singing girls, surnamed Niu and Pao, were present at the time as witnesses of the affray. The accused was taken into custody by the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit. An official was deputized to proceed to the site of the crime, summon the coroner's assistant, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, the witnesses, and so forth, and conduct an inquest. Depositions were taken, bond was posted for the witnesses, and the inquest report form was duly filled out and submitted. If no conflicting evidence is adduced during retrial, the recommended sentence is as follows: According to the article of the penal code that reads "In cases of involuntary manslaughter resulting from an affray, no matter whether the fatal injury be inflicted by hand, foot, other object, or metal blade, the penalty shall be strangulation,"⁸ Wu Sung should be sentenced to death by strangulation. The testimony of the proprietor of the tavern, Wang Luan, and the singing girls surnamed Niu and Pao indicates them to be innocent of any crime. The case is hereby duly forwarded to your tribunal for final disposition.

Date: The nth day of the eighth month of the third year of the Cheng-ho reign period.⁹

Signed: Li Ta-t'ien, District Magistrate
 Yüeh Ho-an, Vice-Magistrate
 Hua Ho-lu, Assistant Magistrate
 Hsia Kung-chi, Docket Officer
 Ch'ien Lao, Clerk, Office of Punishment

When the prefect had finished reading this document he called up Wu Sung, who knelt down in front of the dais, and asked him, "Why did you kill Li Wai-ch'uan?"

Wu Sung kowtowed and appealed to the prefect, saying, "Lord 'Azure Heaven,' to appear before you is to see the light of day. If you permit me to speak, I will presume to speak."

"Pray speak up, then," the prefect responded.

"I was actually bent on avenging the death of my elder brother," said Wu Sung. "In the course of seeking out Hsi-men Ch'ing, I wrongly assaulted and killed this person."

He then gave an account of the foregoing events, concluding as follows, "The truth is that I have: Suffered injustice and harbor resentment.

The power of Hsi-men Ch'ing's money is too great for me to withstand. The only thing that rankles is that my brother, Wu the Elder, still bears a grudge in the nether world and has lost his life for nothing."

"You need not say another word," the prefect responded. "I already know all about it."

He then called up the clerk from the office of punishment, Ch'ien Lao, and ordered him to be given twenty strokes with the light bamboo, saying, "That district magistrate of yours doesn't deserve to continue in office. How can he have put justice up for sale so flagrantly?"

Thereupon, after taking the depositions of all the witnesses once again, he picked up his brush and rewrote Wu Sung's confession.

Turning to his subsidiary officials, he said, "This man was seeking to avenge the death of his elder brother when he wrongly killed this Li Wai-ch'uan. He is a man of honor, motivated by righteous indignation. This is not an instance of 'deliberate homicide of an innocent person.' "

On the one hand, he ordered that Wu Sung's long cangue be taken off and replaced with the lighter one prescribed for lesser offenses, and had him incarcerated in the prefectural prison, while he sent the witnesses back where they came from to await the final disposition of the case. On the other hand, he sent a dispatch to Ch'ing-ho district ordering the magistrate to apprehend the influential malefactor, Hsi-men Ch'ing; the sister-in-law of the accused, née P'an; Dame Wang; the youngster, Yün-ko; and the coroner's assistant, Ho the Ninth; to subject them to honest interrogation; and to report the results before taking any further action.

While Wu Sung was in prison in Tung-p'ing prefecture, since everyone knew that he was the victim of a miscarriage of justice, the jail warden and the guards actually provided him with food and wine without demanding a candareen for themselves.

It was not long before someone reported these events back to Ch'ing-ho district, and when Hsi-men Ch'ing got wind of them he was more alarmed than before. Ch'en Wen-chao was an official of absolute integrity, and he was afraid to try to bribe him. He had to go ask for help from the Ch'en family, to whom he was related by his daughter's marriage. That very night he dispatched one of their trusted servants, along with his own servants, Lai-pao and Lai-wang,¹⁰ to travel to the Eastern Capital and deliver a letter to Yang Chien, the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard.

The commander, in his turn, sought the aid of the grand councilor and grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching. The grand preceptor, fearing lest the reputation of District Magistrate Li be tarnished, immediately sent an urgent secret message to Ch'en Wen-chao in Tung-p'ing prefecture, directing him not to insist on haling Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien into court.

Now this Ch'en Wen-chao had been the director of one of the two divisions of the Court of Judicial Review in the capital when he was promoted to the position of prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture, and Grand Preceptor Ts'ai had been his examiner when he qualified for office by passing the civil service examinations. He was also aware that Yang Chien, as the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, was an official who had the ear of the emperor himself. Thus: His obligations cancelled each other out.¹¹

All he could do under the circumstances was to save Wu Sung from the death penalty. His judgment was therefore rendered as follows: Recommended sentence: that the accused shall be beaten forty strokes on the back with the heavy bamboo; that the name of his offense shall be tattooed on his face; and that he shall be condemned to military exile for life at a distance of 2,000 li.

In addition: whereas Wu the Elder is already dead; and whereas his corpse is no longer available as evidence; and whereas nothing more than suspicions have been adduced as to the circumstances of his death; the matter shall not be pursued further. All other persons involved with this case may be released and permitted to return to their homes.

The records of the case were forwarded to the Ministry of Justice in the capital, and thence to the Censorate for ratification, and, one day, a directive came down ordering that the sentence be carried out without delay. Ch'en Wen-chao had Wu Sung brought out of prison, and the imperial decree was read out loud to him in the courtroom. His cangue was then removed, and there was no way to avoid the infliction of forty strokes on the back with the heavy bamboo. He was then fastened into a seven-and-a-half catty, ironclad, round-ended cangue, and two columns of gold-colored characters were tattooed on his face, preparatory to his removal to the prison camp at Meng-chou.

After the other persons involved in the case had been sent on their way, the prefect, right there in the courtroom, stamped the necessary documents with his seal and deputed two guards to escort Wu Sung to Meng-chou and turn him over to the authorities there.

That very day Wu Sung and the two guards left Tung-p'ing prefecture and returned to his brother's house in Ch'ing-ho district. He auctioned off whatever furnishings remained in order to provide the two guards with expense money along the way.

Then he approached a neighbor, Yao the Second, and asked him to look after Ying-erh for him, saying, "If, by imperial grace, an amnesty should ever be proclaimed that would allow me to return home: Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

The neighbors in the vicinity and the prominent householders who had been on good terms with Wu the Second, knowing that he was a man of honor who had had the misfortune to suffer this punishment, all helped him out with gifts of silver, or by providing food and wine, cash, or rice.

Wu the Second then went to his own lodgings and asked his former orderlies to bring out the bundle of his personal effects. That very day they set out on their journey, leaving Ch'ing-ho district, and wending their way along the highway toward Meng-chou. The weather was that of the middle month of autumn. With regard to this trip, truly:

Wu the Second Is Condemned to Exile in Meng-chou

If one is only able, somehow,
to preserve his foolish life;
He will be happy to go hungry
for the rest of his days.¹²
There is a poem that testifies to this:

The prefect, in investigating this case,
maintained the utmost impartiality;
He was successful in rescuing Wu Sung from the brink of death.
Though he was condemned to military exile

in a distant prison camp;
The sickly verdure recovered its health upon exposure to the genial breeze.¹³

Wu the Second set off on his way to military exile in Meng-chou. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that his enemy had taken to the road, he felt as though: The stone on his head had finally fallen to the ground;

The blockage in his heart had been miraculously removed.

He was as happy as could be.

Thereupon he ordered his servants, Lai-wang, Lai-pao, and Lai-hsing, to tidy up and sweep clean the Hibiscus Pavilion in the rear flower garden, set up standing screens, suspend gold-colored partitions, and make all the necessary preparations for a feast. Having engaged musicians to provide: Wind and string instruments, song, and dance, for their entertainment, he invited the First Lady, Wu Yüeh-niang, the Second Lady, Li Chiao-erh, the Third Lady, Meng Yü-lou, the Fourth Lady, Sun Hsüeh-o, and the Fifth Lady, P'an Chin-lien, to join him in a party for the: Jollification of the entire family.

The wives of his household retainers, along with maidservants and waiting women, stood in attendance on either side. What were the revels like that day? Behold: Incense smolders in precious tripods;

Blossoms are displayed in golden vases.

The table service is an array of exotic antiques from Hsiang-chou;¹⁴

The hanging blinds are adorned with shining pearls from Ho-p'u.¹⁵ Crystal platters, Are piled high with the magic jujubes and pears that confer immortality;

Chrysoprase goblets,
Are filled to the brim with the jade and carnelian hued nectars of the gods.

There are deep-fried dragon livers,
And roast phoenix entrails;
Truly, one has but to use one's chopsticks to exhaust ten thousand cash.

There are black bears' paws,
And purple dromedaries' pads;
When these are presented after the wine their fragrance suffuses the table.

And there are also:

Tenderly steamed fragrant rice garnished with red lotus blossoms;
And neatly sliced gray mullet large enough to swallow an official seal;¹⁶

Bream and carp from the I and Lo rivers,
Truly, more costly than beef or lamb;¹⁷
As well as longans and litchis,
Verily, the finest fruits of the Southeast.
As the phoenix tablets are crushed,¹⁸

Foaming whitecaps of brick tea
break in white jade cups;
As the carnelian liquid is poured,
The pure bouquet of vintage wine bursts from the golden flagon.
In fine, the sumptuousness of this repast could put Lord Meng-ch'ang to shame;¹⁹
This feast, alone, required such wealth as might have beggared Shih Ch'ung.²⁰

On this occasion, as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang had occupied the positions of honor, the rest of the ladies, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsiieh-o, and P'an Chin-lien, arrayed themselves on either side and the drinking began: With the raising of glasses and passing of cups;²¹

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade.

Who should appear at this juncture but the page boy, Tai-an, who led into their presence a young boy and a young girl, with their hair cut straight across their foreheads, prepossessing in appearance, and carrying a pair of gift boxes.

"They're from Eunuch Director Hua's house, next door," he said. "They've brought over some flowers for the ladies to put in their hair."

The two messengers went up and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, Yüeh-niang, and the others, and then stood to one side, saying, "Our mistress has sent us over to deliver this box of pastries and some flowers for Madam Hsi-men to wear in her hair."

Hsi-men and His Harem Revel in the Hibiscus Pavilion

Yüeh-niang pulled aside the hanging blind to take a look at the gifts. One box contained stuffed, spiced, gold-colored pastries, of a kind reserved for use in the imperial palace. The other box contained newly picked fresh plantain lilies.

"I've been the occasion of putting your mistress to too much trouble once again, I fear," said Yüeh-niang, utterly delighted.

She saw to it that the two of them were offered something to eat and then gave the young girl a handkerchief and the young boy a hundred cash.

"Tell your mistress many thanks," she said, and then asked the young girl, "What's your name?"

"I'm called Hsiu-ch'un," she replied, "and the boy's called T'ien-fu." After they were gone, Yüeh-niang turned to Hsimen Ch'ing and said, "This lady from the Hua household next door is really nice. She's always sending her page boy and maidservant over here with gifts for me, and I'm afraid I haven't yet done anything to reciprocate."

"It hasn't even been two years," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "since Brother Hua the Second took this woman to wife. He tells me himself that she has a most accommodating disposition, otherwise she'd never consent to keep two such attractive young girls as personal maids."

"Not long ago," said Yüeh-niang, "in the sixth month, when the old gentleman of their household passed away, I met her by the graveside while attending the funeral. She is petite in stature and has a round face, delicately curved eyebrows, and a fair complexion. She seems very considerate by nature and must still be quite young, not more than twenty-three or twenty-four."

"You don't know the story," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was originally the concubine of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh when he was regent of the Northern Capital at Ta-ming prefecture, so her union with Hua Tzu-hsü is a case of remarriage, though she brought him a considerable fortune."

"The fact that she has sent over these gift boxes indicates a desire to get better acquainted," said Yüeh-niang. "We are next-door neighbors, after all. We mustn't be remiss in our social obligations. One of these days we'd better send something over there in return."

Gentle reader take note: It so happens that the maiden name of Hua Tzu-hsü's wife was Li. Because she was born on the fifteenth day of the first month, and someone had made her family a gift of a pair of fish-shaped vases on that day, her informal name was P'ing-erh, or Vase. She had formerly been a concubine in the household of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh in Ta-ming prefecture. Privy Councilor Liang was the son-in-law of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital.²² His wife was extremely jealous by nature and had beaten numbers of maidservants and concubines to death and buried them in the rear flower garden. Li P'ing-erh, consequently, resided outside the women's quarters in her husband's studio, where she had a waiting woman to look after her.

It happened that on the fifteenth day of the first month of the first year of the Cheng-ho reign period,²³ during the Lantern Festival, Privy Councilor Liang and his wife were enjoying themselves on the upper floor of the Blue Cloud Tavern, when Li K'uei slaughtered their entire household, old and young alike, during a bandit raid on Ta-ming prefecture.²⁴ Privy Councilor Liang and his wife were forced to flee for their lives. On this occasion Li P'ing-erh managed to escape the carnage, along with her waiting woman, but not before she had appropriated a necklace of one hundred large, Western Ocean²⁵ pearls and a pair of onyx gemstones weighing a good two ounces, with which she made her way to the Eastern Capital to seek refuge with relatives.

At that time Eunuch Director Hua had just been promoted from his post in the imperial palace to the position of grand defender of Kuang-nan. Because his nephew, Hua Tzu-hsü, was still without a mate, he sent a matchmaker to propose a marriage, and Li P'ing-erh thus entered the household as a legitimate wife. When the old eunuch departed to take up his post in Kuang-nan, he took them with him, but after they had lived there for something over half a year, he unfortunately fell ill and petitioned the throne for permission to retire to his native place. Because he was originally from Ch'ing-ho district, it was there that he had come to live in retirement.

Now that Eunuch Director Hua had died, his entire estate fell into the hands of Hua Tzu-hsü, who made it a daily practice to frequent the licensed quarter with his friends, one of whom was Hsi-men Ch'ing. They had formed a club, of which Hsi-men Ch'ing was the senior member.

The second member was named Ying Po-chüeh, or Sponger Ying. He had started life as the son of Master Ying, the merchant, who owned a fine-silk-goods store, but once the business had come into his hands, he had lost his capital and fallen on hard times. He now made his living by squiring young rakes about the licensed quarters and picking up whatever he could along the way. He was an expert performer at kickball and knew all there was to know about such games as backgammon and elephant chess.

The third member was named Hsieh Hsi-ta, or Tagalong Hsieh, whose courtesy name was Tzu-ch'un. He, too, was a profligate hanger-on as well as being an expert performer on the p'i-p'a. He had nothing to do every day but to haunt the licensed quarter and live off the tea and rice afforded by romance.

There were also other members with names such as Chu Jih-nien, or Sticky Chu; Sun Kua-tsui, or Blabbermouth Sun; Wu Tien-en, or Heartless Wu; Yün Li-shou, or Welsher Yün; Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang; Pu Chih-tao, or No-account Pu; and Pai Lai-ch'iang, or Scrounger Pai. There were ten of them in all.²⁶ Pu Chih-tao had died recently, and Hua Tzu-hsü, or Nobody Hua, had been allowed to take his place.

Every month the ten of them met together somewhere and engaged the services of two singing girls so they could enjoy themselves: Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade.

The other members of the club, observing that Hua Tzu-hsü was the profligate scion of a eunuch household and that he had: Money to spend and silver to squander,²⁷ were anything but backward in encouraging him to patronize singing girls in the licensed quarter, with the result that he often stayed out for three or five nights in a row without going home. Truly: On the purple roads spring is at its height;

In the red bowers the music is intoxicating.

How long a span of life are we allotted?

Not to enjoy it is to live in vain.²⁸

Now that this matter has been explained, we will say no more about it.

To resume our story, that day Hsi-men Ch'ing and his wife and concubines enjoyed a feast in the Hibiscus Pavilion for the: Jollification of the entire family.

The party did not break up until evening. By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing retired to P'an Chin-lien's quarters he was already half drunk and, exhilarated by the wine, wanted to play at clouds and rain with her. The woman hastily lit some incense and laid out the bedding, after which they: Took off their clothes and went to bed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, however, did not proceed directly to the clouds and rain. Knowing that the woman was partial to "toying with the flute,"²⁹ he sat down inside the green gauze mosquito netting and ordered her to get down on all fours beside him. After: Lightly adjusting her golden bracelets, she took hold of his organ with both hands and popped it into her mouth. Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Bent his head in order the better to savor,
The marvelous sight as it went in and out.
She sucked it audibly for some time, until Their lewd excitement was redoubled.

At this point Hsi-men Ch'ing called out to Ch'un-mei to come in and bring them some tea. The woman was afraid the maidservant would see what they were up to and hastily let down the bed curtains.

"What are you afraid of?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Brother Hua the Second next door," he went on, "actually has two attractive young girls as maidservants in his rooms. The one who delivered the flowers today was the youngest. There is another one, as old as Ch'un-mei, whom Brother Hua the Second has already had his way with. I caught sight of her once, when she had followed her mistress to the front door, and could see that she has a good figure. Who would have thought that Brother Hua the Second, young as he is, would carry on that way in his own house?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing and His Cronies Form the Brotherhood of Ten

When the woman heard this, she gave him a look, saying, "You crazy good-for-nothing! I'd just be wasting my breath on you! If you want to have your way with this maidservant, go ahead and take her. What need is there to: Beat around the bush; or Point out a mountain and promise a millstone.³⁰ Why drag anyone else into it? In the first place, I'm not that sort of person; and, in the second place, she's not really my maidservant to begin with. If that's the way things stand, tomorrow I'll pay a visit to the rear compound and leave the way open for you. Just call her into the room and have your way with her. That's all there is to it."

When she had finished speaking, she went back to "toying with the flute" until Hsi-men Ch'ing ejaculated. Only then did they go to sleep: Arm around head and thigh over thigh.

Truly:

Past mistress of the intimate arts,
she caters to her lover's whim;
How quick she is, and diligent,
to "play the purple flute."³¹

There is a lyric to the tune "Moon on the West River" that testifies to this:

The scent of orchid and musk pervades
the gauze netting;
The delicate beauty is an old hand at "playing the flute."
Her snow-white jade body is visible
through the bed curtains;
It's enough to make one's "ethereal and material souls take flight."

On jade wrists she gently adjusts golden bracelets;
Both of them are passionate,
"half drunk, half crazed."

The talented gentleman is moved to enjoin his partner,
"Take it easy, so you can go on sucking a little longer."³²

The next day, sure enough, the woman went to pay a visit to Meng Yü-lou's quarters in the rear compound. Hsi-men Ch'ing called Ch'un-mei into the room and had his way with the young girl.

When spring touches the apricot and peach trees, their new buds burst into red flower;
When the breeze plays among the willow fronds, they are made to bend their green waists.³³

From this day on, her mistress treated her with special favor, no longer sending her to the kitchen to: Do the cooking or clean the stove, but only asking her to serve inside her own rooms, to:

Make the beds and fold the quilts, or to fetch tea. She presented her with some of her favorite articles of clothing and jewelry, and encouraged her to bind her feet in order to keep them delectably tiny.

It so happens that Ch'un-mei was quite unlike Ch'iu-chü. She was naturally intelligent, enjoyed repartee, was quick on the uptake, and rather good-looking. Hsi-men Ch'ing was very partial to her. Ch'iu-chü, on the other hand, was stupid and dull, and could not be relied upon to perform her tasks. She was the one who got beaten by her mistress. Truly: The swallows and sparrows round the pond make quite a clamor with their chatter;

All appeal to humanity and righteousness and judge each other stupid or worthy.
Though they may belong to different species,
they are alike in being birds of the air;
And yet, noble and base, high and low,
even they are not all the same.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 11

P'AN CHIN-LIEN INSTIGATES THE BEATING OF SUN HSÜEH-O; HSI-MEN CH'ING DECIDES TO DEFLOWER LI KUEI-CHIEH

When the woman, for her part, is "as jealous as can be";
The wastrel, on his part,
"does just as he pleases."
Susceptible to "clever words and deceptive phrases";
He cares nothing for "new loves and old affections."
Once out the door, he
"feels the tug of red sleeves";

And finds another place to "peddle his romantic feelings."
Each day becomes "a Cold Food or a Lantern Festival";¹
Who will not "cater to his whims or connive in his ruin"?²

THE STORY GOES that once P'an Chin-lien was established in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household she: Relied on his favor to become arrogant;

Transmuting the "cold" into the "hot," to such effect that, day or night, there was no longer any peace and quiet to be had. She was extremely suspicious by nature and was forever: Listening at the fence or eavesdropping by the wall, on the lookout for an excuse to make trouble. Nor was her maidservant, Ch'un-mei, any model of forbearance.

One day, as ill luck would have it, Chin-lien was upset over some insignificant matter and spoke a few intemperate words to Ch'un-mei. Ch'un-mei, having no place else to vent her spleen, went back to the kitchen in the rear compound and started: Pounding the table and banging the pans, in no mood to be trifled with.

Sun Hsüeh-o, who found this behavior annoying, twitted her sarcastically with the words, "You crazy good-for-nothing! If you're hard up for a man, go be hard up someplace else. I can do without your high-handedness around here."

When Ch'un-mei, who was still at the height of her ill-humor, heard these words, she flared up immediately.

"Just who is insinuating that I'm on the lookout for a man?" she demanded to know.

Hsüeh-o saw that she was really out of sorts and managed to keep her mouth shut. Ch'un-mei, however, took off in a huff for the front compound, where she gave Chin-lien a provocative word-for-word account of this exchange: Thus and thus, and

So and so, with a few additional details thrown in for good measure, such as, "She claimed that you connive with me to share our favors with him as a means of keeping him all to ourselves."

Chin-lien had had a bellyful. She was already feeling rather tired from having to get up earlier than usual in order to see off Wu Yüeh-niang on her way to a funeral. She took a nap and then went out to sit in the pavilion in the garden.

While she was there, who should come strolling along but Meng Yü-lou, who addressed her with an ingratiating smile, saying, "Sister, how come you're so silent and glum?"

"I don't even want to talk about it," said Chin-lien. "I'm feeling all tired out this morning. Where've you come from, Sister Three?"

"I've just paid a visit to the kitchen in the rear compound," said Meng Yü-lou.

"And what did that woman have to say to you?" asked Chin-lien.

"Sister didn't have anything to say," replied Yü-lou.

Although Chin-lien said no more about it at the time, she stored up the resentment in her heart and, henceforth, regarded Sun Hsüeh-o as her enemy. But no more of this.

The two of them did some needlework together for a while when Ch'un-mei appeared with a pot of hot water and Ch'iu-chü with two cups of tea. After finishing their tea, the two of them set out the pieces of a board game and started to play with each other.

Just as they were at a critical point in their game, the page boy, Ch'in-t'ung, whose job it was to watch the garden gate, suddenly appeared and announced, "Father has come home."

The two women made haste to put the game away, but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had already crossed the threshold of the garden, caught sight of them. They were wearing their everyday chignons enclosed in frets of silver filigree, from which two tufts of hair were allowed to escape at either temple, pendant onyx earrings, blouses of white silk, pink vests, drawnwork skirts, and two pairs of tiny shoes, the up-turned points of which were adorned with red mandarin ducks. Each of them appeared to him to be: Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.

Without his even being aware of it, Hsi-men Ch'ing's face became wreathed in smiles, and he blurted out, "They look just like a pair of painted faces, and they'd cost a pretty penny too."

"We're no painted faces," declared Chin-lien. "But if that's what you're looking for, you can find the genuine article in the rear compound."

At this sally, Meng Yü-lou excused herself and started back toward her own quarters, but Hsi-men Ch'ing caught her with one hand and said, "Where are you off to? Do you have to leave as soon as I show up? Tell me the truth, now; when I'm not at home, what do the two of you do around here?"

"We're bored to distraction," said Chin-lien, "and were only playing a couple of rounds of a board game here. We really haven't stolen anything. How were we to know that you would turn up?"

As she spoke, she helped him off with his outer clothes and then said, "You've come back from the funeral early today."

"Most of the guests at the reception," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "were either eunuchs or official colleagues of the deceased. Moreover, the weather was hot. I couldn't stick it out, so I came home before it was over."

"Why isn't our elder sister home yet?" asked Meng Yü-lou.

"Her sedan chair has probably reached the city walls by now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already sent two servant boys back to meet her."

When he had finished taking off his outer clothes, he sat down and asked, "What do the two of you wager when you play games together?"

"We were only playing for the fun of it," said Chin-lien. "Why should we have to wager anything?"

"Let me play a game with you," proposed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Whoever loses will have to forfeit a tael of silver and treat the rest of us."

"But we don't have any money," said Chin-lien.

"If you don't have any money," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can pull out one of your fancy hairpins and pawn it with me. It all comes to the same thing."

Thereupon, they set up the board and the three of them played a game together. P'an Chin-lien lost. While Hsi-men Ch'ing was still counting the pieces, the woman upset the board and then ran over beside a clump of sweet-smelling daphne, leaned against an ornamental rock, and pretended to busy herself picking flowers.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing located her, he said, "All right, little oily mouth! It was you who lost the game, and now you're trying to hide over here, are you?"

When the woman saw Hsi-men Ch'ing coming, she broke into giggles, saying, "You crazy good-for-nothing! It was Meng the Third who lost, but you didn't dare enforce the rules on her, but have come to bother me instead."

As she spoke, she tore the petals off the flowers in her hand and scattered them all over Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Stepping forward, Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her with both arms, pushed her up against the ornamental rock: Stuck out his clove-shaped tongue;

Mingled his sweet spittle with hers, and began to toy with her in earnest.

At this juncture, Yü-lou appeared on the scene and called out, "Sister Six, the First Lady has arrived home. I'm going back to the rear compound."

Only then did the woman abandon Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Brother, I'll have something more to say to you later," Chin-lien said to him as she went off to accompany Yü-lou on her way back to the rear compound.

When they had paid their respects to Yüeh-niang, she asked them, "What are the two of you laughing about?"

"Today Sister Six played a board game with Father," replied Yü-lou, "and lost a tael of silver. Tomorrow she'll have to play host and invite you to join the fun."

Yüeh-niang smiled. Chin-lien, on this occasion, did no more than put in a pro forma appearance before Yüeh-niang and then head back to the front compound in order to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company. She ordered Ch'un-mei to light some incense in her room and to prepare the bathing tub and heat some bath water so that that evening she and Hsi-men Ch'ing could: Emulate the pleasures of fish in the water.³

Gentle reader take note: Although Wu Yüeh-niang was the First Lady of the house and occupied the master suite, she was sick so much of the time that she hadn't been able to take effective charge of household affairs. All she really did was to go out and pay the social calls that propriety demanded. The household expenditures and receipts were all in the hands of the excourtesan, Li Chiao-erh. Sun Hsüeh-o was in charge of the wives of the household retainers who worked in the kitchen, and it was her responsibility to supply the needed food and drink to the separate quarters of the various residents. For example, if Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in one of his concubine's quarters and needed anything to eat or drink, or a particular kind of soup, it was Hsüeh-o's responsibility to see that it was duly prepared, and the maidservants from the rooms in question would come to fetch it. But no more of this.

That evening Hsi-men Ch'ing remained in Chin-lien's quarters where they drank wine for a while, and then, when they had finished bathing, went to bed.

The next day was one of those occasions on which: Something was destined to happen. Hsi-men Ch'ing had promised Chin-lien that he would visit the fair at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak and buy some pearls for her to make into a headband. For this reason he rose early and expressed a desire for some lotus-blossom cakes and pickled fish and vermicelli soup for breakfast. As soon as he got up he asked Ch'un-mei to go to the kitchen and order these things for him, but she refused to budge.

"Don't send her back there," said Chin-lien. "There's someone there who goes around saying that I encourage her to connive with me in sharing your favors as a means of keeping you all to ourselves. She's forever: Pointing at the pig but cursing the dog,⁴ and abusing the two of us every way she knows how. What would you want to send her back there for?"

"Who is it that says that sort of thing or abuses her?" Hsi-men Ch'ing demanded to know. "Tell me who it is."

"What's the point of talking about it?" said Chin-lien.

"Even basins and jugs have ears."⁵

Just don't send her back there, but send Ch'iu-chü instead, that's all."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, therefore, called in Ch'iu-chü and told her to go back to the kitchen and give Hsüeh-o his instructions. Enough time went by in which to eat two meals; the woman had already set the table, but still no food was forthcoming. By this time Hsi-men Ch'ing was getting very hot and bothered.

When the woman saw that Ch'iu-chü had not returned she turned to Ch'un-mei and said, "You go back there and see what's going on. That slave still hasn't come back. She must have: Taken root and sent up sprouts, by now."

Ch'un-mei was rather out of sorts to begin with and marched off to the kitchen in a huff.

When she saw that Ch'iu-chü was still waiting for the food, she started to curse at her, saying, "You lousy, sleepy-eyed slave! Mother's going to beat the legs right off you! 'Why haven't you come back?' she'd like to know. Father's being kept waiting. As soon as he's eaten he wants to go to the temple fair. There he is up front, anxious to be on his way, and getting increasingly hot and bothered. I've been sent to see if I can drag you back with me."

If Sun Hsüeh-o had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them, she became enraged and started to curse, saying, "You crazy little whore! You may think I'm like: The Mohammedan bowing to Mecca;⁶

So whoever shows up gets a bow.

But:

The saucepan is beaten out of iron;

Things take a little time to make.

The congee I had already prepared, he doesn't want to eat. Instead, all of a sudden, he comes up with a brand new idea, and expects me to start grilling cakes and making soup. How was I supposed to know what he wanted? After all, I'm not a: Tapeworm in his belly."⁷

Ch'un-mei was incensed at her cursing and responded, "Stop talking through your cunt! If the master hadn't ordered us to come for it, who would have dared to demand anything of you? Whether you come up with it or not, we're going back up front and report. Why make such a fuss about it?"

Taking hold of Ch'iu-chü by the ear, she set off toward the front compound.

"Like mistress, like slave," muttered Hsüeh-o. "Do you think you can carry on so high-handedly, and remain in favor, forever?"

"If you've got the favor,

You might as well flaunt it," said Ch'un-mei. "I wouldn't sell the two of us short if I were you."

Thereupon, she marched off in a fit of high dudgeon.

When Chin-lien saw her come in the door, her face waxen with rage, dragging Ch'iu-chü behind her, she asked, "What's the matter?"

"Why don't you ask her?" said Ch'un-mei. "When I went, she was still mooning around in the kitchen, waiting, while the other one: Just as slow and easy as you please, had only started to knead the dough. Although I probably shouldn't have, I said, 'Father's up front waiting, and Mother wants to know why you haven't come back yet. She's sent me here to get you.' Whereupon that insignificant harlot started to curse me, calling me 'slave' a thousand times, if not ten thousand times. She said, 'Father seems to think I'm like: The Mohammedan bowing to Mecca;

So whoever shows up gets a bow.

Someone must have been putting ideas in his head. The congee I had already prepared, he doesn't want to eat. Instead, out of the blue, he comes up with a brand new idea, and calls for cakes and soup.' She was so busy with her cursing in the kitchen that she couldn't get around to the cooking."

"Just as I said," interjected the woman, "you shouldn't have sent her back there. As long as someone's so ill-disposed toward her, and claims that she and I are keeping you all to ourselves here in our quarters, she's bound to get nothing but abuse for her pains."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he became enraged. Marching back to the kitchen:

Without permitting any further explanation,

he kicked Hsüeh-o several times and cursed her, saying, "You lousy, splay-legged whore! When I sent her here to ask after the cakes, what did you curse her for? You called her a slave, did you? Why don't you: Piddle a bladderful of piss, and Take a good look at yourself?"⁸

Hsüeh-o had to suffer Hsi-men Ch'ing's kicking and abuse, but:

Though she dared to be angry,

She dared not speak.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had hardly gone out the kitchen door when Hsüeh-o turned to the wife of the head servant, Lai-chao, whose nickname was "The Beanpole," and said, "This must be my unlucky day! It's a good thing you were here to see it. I didn't say anything to her. She came marching in here like an avenging spirit: Making all kinds of threatening noises, and dragging the other maidservant away. Then she went:

Talebearing and embroidering on the facts,⁹ in front of the master, so that he came storming in here and abused me this way for no reason at all. I'm going to keep my eyes peeled from now on. The two of them are like mistress, like slave. Do they think they can carry on so high-handedly forever? They'll come a cropper if they don't watch out."

Unbeknownst to her, Hsi-men Ch'ing had overheard everything she said.

He came back in and struck her several additional blows with his fist, cursing as he did so, "You lousy slave of a whore! And you still claim you weren't abusive to her, when I've heard you cursing her with my own ears?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing beat her until:

The pain was difficult to bear, and then went back to the front compound. Hsüeh-o was left in the kitchen with the tears running down her face. Convulsed with sobs, she began to cry out loud.

Wu Yüeh-niang had just gotten up and was in the master bedroom combing her hair.

"What's the ruckus in the kitchen all about?" she asked Hsiao-yü.

Hsiao-yü came back and reported, "Father wanted some cakes to eat before going to the temple fair. They say the lady in the kitchen was cursing at Ch'un-mei, from the Fifth Lady's quarters, when Father overheard her and gave her a few kicks. That's why she's started to cry."

"I don't remember his ever asking for cakes before," said Yüeh-niang. "But all she needed to do was to make them up as fast as she could and send him on his way. What need was there for her to curse the maidservant from the other quarters?"

Thereupon, she sent Hsiao-yü to the kitchen to urge Hsiieh-o and the servants' wives to hurry up with the preparation of the soup. Hsi-men Ch'ing finally ate his breakfast, mounted his horse, and set off for the temple, accompanied by one of his page boys. But no more of this.

Sun Hsüeh-o couldn't get over her resentment at what had happened, so she went into Yüeh-niang's room and started telling her about it. But she didn't realize that Chin-lien had stolen up outside and was standing by the window, eavesdropping.

Chin-lien saw that Hsüeh-o was inside the room and overheard her saying to Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh, "She's got him completely monopolized. Behind your back: There's nothing she won't do."¹⁰ Mother, you don't know that whore. When you get right down to it, she's more insatiable than any mere adulteress. She can't stand to go even a single night without a man. She's always up to something behind your back.

Things no one else would do;
She can bring herself to do."¹¹

Originally, when she was living in her own home, she poisoned her husband to death. And now that she's here, she's trying her best to bury the rest of us alive. She's turned our husband into an angry fighting cock who glares at us as though he doesn't even see us."

"I don't remember your ever acting this way before," said Yüeh-niang. "If he sent a maidservant from the front compound to ask for cakes, all you needed to do was to make them up as best you could and send him on his way. What need was there for you to start cursing her for no good reason?"

"I'll call her bald or blind if I like!" retorted Hsüeh-o. "Just a little while ago, when that maidservant worked for you, if she refused to do as she was told when I was on duty in the kitchen, I would give her a smack with the back of a knife. And you didn't say anything about it. But now that she's fallen into the hands of that other one, she's started to carry on as though she owns the place."

While they were still talking, Hsiao-yü came in and said, "The Fifth Lady is outside."

A minute later, Chin-lien came into the room and said to Hsüeh-o, "If I really did do in my former husband, you had no business allowing your husband to bring me into the household in the first place. That way I could never have monopolized him or taken your place away from you. As for Ch'un-mei, she wasn't even my own maid to begin with. If you're so angry about it, all you have to do is make her go back to serving the First Lady. That way if you want to quarrel with her, I won't get dragged into it. No one feels good about losing a husband and having to marry another, but, right now, there's really nothing difficult about it. Just wait till he gets home and have him give me a writ of divorce. I'll go, and that will be the end of it."

"I don't know what's at the bottom of all this," said Yüeh-niang, "but it would help if the two of you would be a little more sparing of words."

"Just look at her, Mother," protested Hsüeh-o:

"Her mouth is like the Huai River in spate."¹²

Nobody can get the better of her. And she's always wagging her tongue in front of our husband, turning him against us, so he scarcely recognizes us any more."

"If you had your way," she continued, turning to Chin-lien, "except for Mother, the rest of us would all be driven away, so you'd be the only one left."

Wu Yüeh-niang just sat there and let the two of them continue to trade insults, without saying a word. It didn't take long for it to heat up even further.

"You may call me a slave," said Hsüeh-o, "but it's you who are the real slave."

They were on the verge of coming to blows when Yüeh-niang decided she had had enough of it and told Hsiao-yü to drag Hsüeh-o back to the kitchen.

P'an Chin-lien, for her part, went straight back to her quarters, where she:

Took off her fancy attire,
Washed away her makeup,
Let loose her raven locks, and Left her flowery countenance in disarray.

She wept until:

Her two eyes were the color of peaches, and threw herself down on her bed.

When the sun began to set in the west, Hsi-men Ch'ing came back from the temple fair, carrying four ounces of pearls in his sleeve. No sooner did he enter her room and see the state she was in than he asked, "What's the matter?"

The woman started to cry out loud, demanding a writ of divorce from Hsi-men Ch'ing and pouring out, thus and so, the entire story.

"I certainly never loved you just for your money, and now that I've joined my fate to yours, how can you let anyone abuse me so? She said I had done in my husband, a thousand times, if not ten thousand times. What's it to me if I: Pick up something that I already have, or Lose something that never belonged to me?

If I have to do without a maidservant, so be it. What do I want with a maid from someone else's quarters to wait on me, if I have to take all this abuse for it? I've got one shadow too many as it is."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them: The spirits of his Three Corpses¹³ became agitated; The breaths of his Five Viscera¹⁴ ascended to Heaven.¹⁵

Like a whirlwind he descended upon the kitchen, seized Hsüeh-o by the hair, and proceeded to beat her with a short stick as hard as he could.

Luckily for her, Wu Yüeh-niang intervened, grabbing him by the hand and saying, "Why doesn't everyone take things a little easier? You're just upsetting the master of the house."

"You lousy, splay-legged whore!" exploded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I heard you cursing in the kitchen with my own ears, and you're still trying to drag other people into it. If I don't beat your bottom right off for you, I might as well forget it."

Gentle reader take note: As a direct result of the beating of Sun Hsüeh-o this day, P'an Chin-lien would find that: Though her deeds were done in the past,

The chickens would come home to roost.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Chin-lien, by relying on her husband's favor,
could count on his support;
But, in so doing, she aroused the deepest enmity in Sun Hsüeh-o.
It has always been true that gratitude for kindness and festering resentment;
Even in a thousand or ten thousand years will never be allowed to gather dust.¹⁶

On this occasion, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had beaten Hsüeh-o, he returned to the front compound and endeavored to mollify Chin-lien. He brought out from his sleeve the four ounces of pearls that he had bought at the temple fair that day and gave them to her to make into a headband. When the woman saw that her husband had taken action on her behalf and thereby enabled her to vent her spleen, there was no reason for her to be anything but delighted. From this time on: Whatever she asked for, she received tenfold,¹⁷ and the favor shown her was even greater than it had been before.

One day thereafter, she fulfilled her obligation by giving a little party in the garden to which she invited only Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, so the four of them could have a drink together.

To make a long story short, Hsi-men Ch'ing had formed a club, the membership of which consisted of ten friends, who met together once a month for a drinking party.¹⁸

The first of them was named Ying Po-chüeh, or Sponger Ying. He was the decadent scion of what had once been a substantial family, but had managed to completely squander his patrimony, and now made his living by squiring wealthy young rakes about the licensed quarters and picking up whatever he could along the way. His nickname was Beggar Ying.

The second was named Hsieh Hsi-ta, or Tagalong Hsieh. He had inherited the right to a position as a battalion commander in the Ch'ing-ho Guard, but, having lost his parents while still a child, had become: A dedicated idler, devoted to his leisure.¹⁹

He was an expert performer at kickball and also liked to gamble. Having abandoned his prospects of a career, he was now a confirmed hanger-on.

The third was named Wu Tien-en, or Heartless Wu. He had been a yin-yang master on the staff of the district yamen, but had been removed from his post for cause. He now made his living by hanging around in front of the yamen and acting as a guarantor for loans to the local officials and functionaries. This was how he had become acquainted with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The fourth was named Sun T'ien-hua, whose nickname was Sun Kua-tsui, or Blabbermouth Sun. He was more than fifty years old and specialized in talking his way into the brothels in the licensed quarter without purchasing their wares.²⁰ He made himself useful to the singing girls by: Delivering letters and passing notes, or helping them to attract customers, thus depending for his living on the emoluments of romance.

The fifth, who was the younger brother of Assistant Regional Commander Yün, was named Yün Li-shou, or Welsher Yün.

The sixth, who was the nephew of Eunuch Director Hua, was named Hua Tzu-hsü, or Nobody Hua.

The seventh was named Chu Jih-nien, or Sticky Chu.

The eighth was named Ch'ang Shih-chieh, or Cadger Ch'ang.

The ninth was named Pai Lai-ch'iang, or Scrounger Pai.

Together with Hsi-men Ch'ing, they made ten in all. The other members of the club, out of consideration for Hsi-men Ch'ing's supply of ready cash, insisted on his taking the position of senior member. Every month they met together somewhere for a drinking party, at which they took turns playing host.

One day it was the turn of Hua Tzu-hsü to convene the club at his home, which was right next door to that of Hsi-men Ch'ing. As befitted the household of a eunuch, everything was done on a lavish scale, with: Large platters and large bowls.

The others had already arrived, but Hsi-men Ch'ing was busy that day, and by midafternoon had still failed to show up, though they were careful to keep a place for him.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing finally arrived, he was immaculately dressed and accompanied by four page boys. The whole company got up from their seats to welcome him. When they had finished with the social amenities, the host sat down in the appropriate place and Hsi-men Ch'ing took the seat of honor. A performer with a painted face and two other singing girls were there to entertain them, playing a p'i-p'a, a psaltery, and a mandola, and singing in front of the gathering. Truly, words are inadequate to describe: The graceful beauty of the denizens of the Pear Garden;²¹

Whose beauty and talent both approached perfection.

Behold:

Their silk garments are like drifts of snow;

Their jeweled chignons are like storeyed clouds.

They have cherry mouths, apricotlike faces,
 and peach-colored cheeks;
 They possess willow waists, orchidaceous hearts,
 and epidendronlike natures.
 The sound of their singing is melodious;
 Their voices are like the warbling of orioles as they sport upon the branch.
 The style of their dancing is fastidious;
 Their postures resemble the pacing of phoenixes as they move among the flowers.
 Their tunes adhere to classic standards;
 Their music has the air of spontaneity.
 Their dancing waylays the bright moon into shining on the pleasure-houses of Ch'in;
 Their singing diverts the moving clouds into hovering atop the bordellos of Ch'u.
 High or low, allegro or andante,
 they adhere to the appropriate modes;
 Spitting out jade and expectorating pearls.
 Light or heavy, scherzando or legato,
 they follow the prescribed melodies;
 Like plangent metal or tinkling jade.
 The bridges on the psaltery are ranged like wild geese;
 making each note distinct.
 The wood of the clappers is inlaid with red ivory;
 so every beat sounds new.²²

After a little while, when:

Three rounds of wine had been consumed; and Two suites of songs had been performed, the three singing girls laid aside their instruments, came forward, and:
 Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze;
 Sent the pendants of their embroidered sashes flying, as they kowtowed to the company. Hsi-men Ch'ing called for his page boy, Tai-an, and instructed him to take three sealed gift packets out of his letter case. There were two mace for each of them. After they had kowtowed once again to express their gratitude, they withdrew.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked his host, Hua Tzu-hsü, "What's the name of this girl? She can really sing!"

Before his host could reply, Ying Po-chüeh interjected, "You're certainly becoming rather forgetful not to recognize her, sir. The one who was playing the psaltery is Brother Hua the Second's sweetheart, Wu Yin-erh, or Silver, from the back alley in the licensed quarter. The one who was playing the mandola is Greenhorn Chu's daughter, Chu Ai-ai, or Love. And this one who was playing the p'ï-p'a is the daughter of Auntie Li the Third, from Second Street. She's the younger sister of Li Kuei-ch'ing and her informal name is Kuei-chieh, or Cassia. Since her paternal aunt is a member of your household, how can you pretend not to know her?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "It's been six years since I saw her last, and she's grown up to be a woman already."

A little later, when they had run out of wine, the girls came out to replenish their drinks, and Kuei-chieh performed her task most ingratiatingly, engaging them in flirtatious conversation as she did so.

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked her, "What are Auntie Three and your sister, Kuei-ch'ing, doing at home these days? Why haven't they paid me a visit recently, or come to see your aunt?"

"My mother's been in bad shape since last year," said Kuei-chieh. One of her legs is partially paralyzed to this day, so she can't even walk without someone to lean on. My elder sister, Kuei-ch'ing, has been engaged by a merchant from the Huai region for the last six months. He's always taking her off to stay with him in his inn, and he won't let her come home for two or three days at a time. There's hardly anyone to be relied on at home these days. My mother is completely dependent on me to come out and sing every day, helping to entertain the few gentlemen that we're acquainted with. It's a hard life. We simply haven't had the time to pay a visit at your house, or look in on my aunt. How is it, Father, that you haven't been inside the quarter for such a long time? And why haven't you let my aunt come home to visit with my mother?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that her manner was congenial and her conversation clever and sprightly, he felt himself rather attracted to her.

"If I arranged with two of my friends to escort you back to your place today," he asked, "how would that be with you?"

"Don't joke with me, Father," said Kuei-chieh. "How could:

Such distinguished feet tread on such humble ground?"²³

"I'm not joking," said Hsi-men Ch'ing; and he actually reached into his sleeve, pulled out his handkerchief, along with a toothpick and a box of breath-sweetening lozenges, and gave them to Kuei-chieh as a pledge.

“When do you plan to leave?” asked Kuei-chieh. “I ought to send the servant back home right away, to let them know, so they’ll be able to make some preparations.”

“As soon as the party breaks up,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “we can set out together.”

Not long thereafter, when they had finished passing around the wine, it was lamplighting time and the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch’ing invited Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta to join him, and, without even bothering to go home, they set out, on horse and mule back, to accompany Kuei-chieh into the licensed quarter, to the Li family establishment. Truly: Into the brocaded nest,

It is not nearly as good to venture as it is to stay away;

Into the red floss noose,

It is easy enough to stick your head but hard to extricate it.²⁴

There is a song to the tune “The Water Nymphs” that testifies to this:

A human pitfall, secretly constructed,
like an underground dugout;
A circean cave, as artfully designed as a penitentiary;
A charnel house, openly laid out like a butcher shop;
Its sole purpose is to love you to death
while devouring you alive.
On its signboard you will find written in large characters:
“For the cost of his entertainment the patron will receive no discount;

For the expenses incurred
the madam alone will accept payment;
For the price of their favors the girls will not extend credit."²⁵

When Hsi-men Ch'ing and the others had escorted Li Kuei-chieh's sedan chair to the door of her establishment, Li Kuei-ch'ing came out to meet them and ushered them into the main room. After they had finished with the appropriate amenities, they invited her old mother to come out so they could pay their respects. Before long, the old procuress made her appearance, hobbling along with the aid of a stick, for she suffered from partial paralysis on one side of her body.

When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing she saluted him with the words, "My Heavens! It's my distinguished kinsman. What wind has blown you this way?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "I've been so busy recently I haven't been able to stop by. I hope you won't take it amiss."

"And who may these two gentlemen be?" asked the procuress.

"They're two good friends of mine," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother Ying the Second and Hsieh Hsi-ta. We had a meeting of our club at the Hua residence today and ran into Kuei-chieh there, so we decided to see her home together. Bring on the wine. We'd be happy to have three cups with you."

The procuress asked her three guests to be seated at the upper end of the room while she busied herself with seeing that tea was served, a dining table wiped off, and wine and delicacies prepared. In a little while a servant came in with the table, the lamps and candles were lit, and an array of wine and foodstuffs appeared.

Kuei-chieh returned to her room and changed her clothes before coming back out to help entertain them. It was truly:
A nest of breezes and moonlight;

A lair of orioles and flowers.

There was nothing for it for the two sisters but to:

Fill their golden goblets to the brim; and

Tune their jade mandolas to one melody, as they sang and served the wine. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Inside glass goblets,
The amber fluid is rich.
From the small press the wine drips in pearls of red.

Frying dragons and roasting phoenixes weep jade fat.

Silk screens and embroidered curtains contain the perfumed air.
Blow dragon flutes!
Beat alligator drums!
Let white teeth sing!
Slender waists dance!
All the more, since verdant spring must not be spent in vain,
And silver lamps reflect the voices of alluring damsels.
No wine now wets the earth of Liu Ling's ²⁶ tomb. ²⁷

On this occasion, Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh sang a suite of songs together, while at the table the guests were having such a good time that: Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter. ²⁸

Turning to Kuei-ch'ing, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Since the two of you are both here today, and I've heard for a long time what an accomplished performer of southern melodies Kuei-chieh has become, why not ask her to sing us a song, as a means of encouraging our two guests to have another cup of wine? What do you think?"

"We really oughtn't to put her to the trouble," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but are prepared to wash our ears in hopes of hearing a superb performance."

Hsi-men Ch'ing Decides to Deflower Li Kuei-chieh

Kuei-chieh simply sat there with a smile on her face for some time, without making a move.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had gotten the idea into his head that he might like to deflower Kuei-chieh, and that was why he had first expressed a desire to hear her sing a solo. This fact did not escape the practiced eyes of the denizens of the quarter, who: Knew a ghost when they saw one, and had already guessed 80 or 90 percent of what was afoot.

Li Kuei-ch'ing, who was sitting by her side, was the first to speak, saying, "I'm afraid our Kuei-chieh has been spoiled ever since she was a child. She's always been rather shy, by nature, and doesn't like to sing for people on a merely casual basis."

At this, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for his page boy, Tai-an, drew a five-tael ingot of silver out of his letter case, and placed it on the table, saying, "This doesn't amount to anything, but may help to defray the cost of Kuei-chieh's makeup for the time being. On another day I'll send over a few sets of brocade clothing for her."

Kuei-chieh hastily rose to her feet and expressed her thanks, after which a maidservant was directed to put the money away, on the one hand, while on the other, a small table was placed out for her, and Kuei-chieh was invited to leave her place at the main table and sing for them.

Thereupon, Kuei-chieh:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily;
Lightly raising her silken sleeves,
Setting her beige skirt in motion, and with a pink, tasseled handkerchief, decorated with a motif of:
Fallen blossoms on flowing water, dangling from the mouth of her sleeve, sang a song to the tune "Stopping the Clouds in Flight:"

Though her demeanor is nonchalant,
She has outdone every rival in the quarter to take top billing.
Her every move is escorted by a fragrant breeze,
And never fails to elicit respect.
Ch'a!
She is a piece of jade sullied in the muck;
Hardly run of the mill.
With a single, unaccompanied song,
She takes her audience by storm.

Just like the epiphany
in King Hsiang's dream.²⁹
Just like the epiphany,
in King Hsiang's dream.³⁰

By the time she had finished her song, Hsi-men Ch'ing was so delighted he scarcely knew what to do with himself. He ordered Tai-an to take the horse home with him, and that evening he spent the night in Li Kuei-ch'ing's room. Merely because Hsi-men Ch'ing felt an inclination to deflower this girl, and Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta were on the spot to aid and abet him in this enterprise, he took the bait.

The next day he sent a page boy to his house to fetch fifty taels of silver and also to a silk goods store to buy four sets of clothing, explaining that he planned to deflower Li Kuei-chieh. When Li Chiao-erh heard that it was her own niece, from her old establishment, that he was planning to deflower, how could she have been anything but delighted? She promptly produced a silver ingot of fifty taels weight and gave it to Tai-an to deliver to the licensed quarter.

A set of jewelry was made up, clothing was tailored, tables of food were ordered, and with: Wind and string instruments, song and dance;

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade, there were three days of nuptial festivities. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta also persuaded Blabbermouth Sun, Sticky Chu, and Cadger Ch'ang to come up with five candareens each, in the way of a gift, when they came to offer their congratulations. Every last thing, including the bedding, was paid for by Hsi-men Ch'ing. Day after day they regaled themselves in the licensed quarter with: Unlimited quantities of meat and wine.
But no more of this.

Amid dancers' skirts and singers' clappers
he is forever seeking novelty;
But when all the yellow gold is spent nothing but his body remains.
A word of advice to wealthy young men:
"Don't spend it all too fast;
The practice of economy is like good medicine, for it can cure poverty."³¹

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 12

P'AN CHIN-LIEN SUFFERS IGNOMINY FOR ADULTERY WITH A SERVANT; STARGAZER LIU PURVEYS BLACK MAGIC IN PURSUIT OF GAIN

How laughable is the parvenu Hsi-men Ch'ing;
Whoever possesses money is welcomed as a patron.
His whole household is in a state of disorder;
Who cares about standards of decency or propriety?
His days are spent consorting with boon companions;
His nights devoted to sleeping with a painted woman.
Though this may not be a long-lived relationship;
It still counts as "a fling in the spring breeze."¹

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing was so infatuated by Li Kuei-chieh's beauty that he lingered in the licensed quarter for nearly half a month, without going home. Wu Yüeh-niang sent a servant with his horse to bring him home on numerous occasions, but the proprietors of the Li family establishment even hid his clothes and hat, so reluctant were they to let him leave the premises. As a result, the women in his household were all left at loose ends.

This might have been tolerated by the rest of them, but as for P'an Chin-lien:

She was still in the springtime of her youth, not thirty years old;
The flames of her desire could not be banked,² but flared up ten feet high.

Every day, without fail, she and Meng Yü-lou would make their way to the front gate, looking as though they were: Modeled in plaster, carved of jade;

Displaying white teeth and red lips, and lean against the doorjamb as they gazed out into the street, often remaining there until dusk.

In the evening when Chin-lien returned to her room she found that:

On her glossy pillow, amid deserted bed curtains,
There was no companion on the Phoenix Terrace.³

Unable to sleep, she would wander into the garden where she:

Gently paced the flower-strewn moss, and Watched the moon bobbing beneath the water;

fearful lest Hsi-men Ch'ing's:

Heart should prove as difficult to capture.
She objected to the lovemaking of the tortoiseshell cats,
For the tumult it engendered in her fragrant heart.

At the time when Meng Yü-lou had entered the household she had brought with her a page boy named Ch'in-t'ung, who was about fifteen years old and had just begun to wear his hair in adult style. He was: Bright-eyed and clean-cut, as well as being:

Artful and accomplished.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had entrusted the keys of the garden to him and made him responsible for keeping it properly swept. At night he slept in a small side chamber just outside the garden gate.

During the day, P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou often met in the pavilion in the garden and did needlework together, or played board games with each other. This page boy was adept at performing little favors and, when he saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived home, was in the habit of coming to let the women know before telling anybody else. For this reason Chin-lien was fond of him and often invited him into her room and treated him to a drink of wine. As a result, the two of them: Morning after morning and evening after evening;

Exchanged looks with eyes and eyebrows,⁴ until they both began to get ideas.

It happened that Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month was approaching. When Wu Yüeh-niang realized that he was still in the licensed quarter, so enamored of the mist and flowers that he had no thought of return, she sent the page boy, Tai-an, to take his horse to the Li establishment and try to bring him back home.

P'an Chin-lien secretly addressed a note to him and gave it to Tai-an, with the injunction, "Slip this to your father inconspicuously, and tell him, 'The Fifth Lady hopes you'll come home as soon as possible.' "

Tai-an did not dare to be remiss, but mounted the horse and proceeded straight to the Li family establishment in the licensed quarter. What should he see when he got there but Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, Sticky Chu, Blabbermouth Sun, and Cadger Ch'ang, the whole bunch of them in fact, keeping Hsi-men Ch'ing company as he embraced his painted lady: Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade;

Enjoying themselves as they drank up the wine.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Tai-an had arrived, he asked, "What have you come for? Is everything all right at home?"

"Everything's all right at home," replied Tai-an.

"Tell Uncle Fu the Second to try to collect those unpaid bills that are still outstanding in the shop up front," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll look over the accounts when I get home."

"The last few days Uncle Fu the Second has collected quite a few of them," said Tai-an. "He'll present the accounts when you get home."

"Did you bring that outfit for your Aunt Kuei-chieh?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I've got it right here," replied Tai-an.

He then reached into his felt bag, drew out a red blouse with a blue skirt to match, and handed them to Kuei-chieh. Kuei-chieh and Kuei-ch'ing both bowed to express their thanks, and the present was put away. After which, they made haste to give orders that Tai-an should be properly entertained with food and wine in the servants' quarters.

As soon as the page boy had finished his food and wine he came back into the main room to await his instructions, and he took advantage of the occasion to approach Hsi-men Ch'ing and: Whisper into his ear in a low voice,⁵
"The Fifth Lady at home asked me to deliver this note. She hopes you'll come home as soon as possible."

Just as Hsi-men Ch'ing was reaching out his hand to take it, Li Kuei-chieh caught sight of the transaction and, assuming it to be a love letter from some prostitute in the front sector of the quarter, snatched it out of his hands and tore it open to see for herself. It turned out to be a sheet of fancy note paper with a diapered border, on which there were a few lines of handwriting. Kuei-chieh handed it to Sticky Chu and asked him to read it out loud to her.

Sticky Chu saw that the missive was in the form of a pair of songs to the tune "The Wind Scatters the Plum Blossoms" and proceeded to declaim them to the company, as follows: Yearning for him at twilight,

Longing for him by day;
I've tired myself out waiting,
but my lover doesn't come.
Solely on his account, only for his sake,
I've worn myself to a frazzle.
Alas, beneath my brocade coverlet,
I sleep alone.⁶

The lamp is guttering out,
Everyone else is asleep;
All that remains, peeping through my window,
is the bright moon.
Sleeping alone, even if my heart
were hard as iron;
How could it endure the desolation of this night?⁷

The note was signed:

Respectfully,

Your favorite, P'an the Sixth

When Kuei-chieh heard the contents of this missive, she left the table, went back to her room, threw herself down on the bed, and lay there with her face to the wall.

To resume our story, as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that Kuei-chieh was upset, he took the note and tore it to shreds and then, in front of everybody, kicked Tai-an twice with his booted foot. He also sent someone twice to ask Kuei-chieh to return, but she did not come back. Hsi-men Ch'ing was so flummoxed by this that he made his way back to her room himself and carried her out to rejoin the party.

Upon his return he said to Tai-an, "I order you to take the horse and go home. If any whore at my place sends you here again, no matter who it is, when I get back I'll beat her to a stinking pulp!"

Tai-an returned home in tears, but we will say no more of that.

"Kuei-chieh," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there's no need to be so upset. This note is not from anyone else, it's only from the fifth concubine back at my place, asking me to go home because there's something she needs to take up with me. That's all there is to it."

Sticky Chu continued the joke, saying, "Kuei-chieh, don't you believe him. He's only trying to fool you. This P'an the Sixth is really a prostitute from another part of the quarter that he's recently taken up with. She's a real looker. You shouldn't let him off the hook."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and pretended to hit him, saying, "You goddamned louse! All you ever do is plague people to death. She's giving me enough trouble as it is without you and your nonsense on top of everything else."

"It's you who are in the wrong, brother-in-law," said Li Kuei-ch'ing. "As long as you have people at home to keep you in line, what need is there for you to deflower a painted woman in the first place? You might as well stick to the ones you've already got, period. How long have the two of you been together, after all, that you should already be prepared to abandon her?"

"You've got a point there," interjected Sponger Ying. "Sir," he continued, turning to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you'll only take my advice, you won't have to go home, on the one hand, and Kuei-chieh won't have to be upset, on the other. From this day on, let's agree that if anyone gets into such a spat again, each of the culprits will have to forfeit two taels of silver and buy meat and wine to treat the rest of us."

And sure enough, the four or five boon companions at the table:

The talkers talking,
The jokers joking;
Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits,

Enjoying themselves as they drank up the wine, finally succeeded in mollifying Kuei-chieh. Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her and sat her on his lap with an ingratiating smile, while the two of them passed the same cup of wine back and forth between them as they drank.

Before long, seven cups of tea were brought in on a vermilion tray of bright red lacquer. The teacups were the color of snowy linen, the teaspoons were in the shape of apricot leaves, and the tea itself, which was flavored with marinated bamboo shoots, sesame seeds, and osmanthus, was of a bewitching fragrance.

When a cup had been placed in front of each of them, Ying Po-chüeh said, "I know a song to the tune "Imperial Audience" that describes the virtues of tea: The tender leaves,

Of this high-grade tea,
Are nourished by the spring breeze.
Though, if neglected, they will wither away;
The slightest infusion brings out their true colors.
Incomparable, extraordinary;
Hard to depict or to describe;
Often savored in the mouth;
When drunk, you long for them;
When sober, you adore them;
But a single armful will cost you a bundle.⁸

Tagalong Hsieh laughed, saying, "If the Honorable Gentleman is:

Spending his money and wasting his goods, without hoping to get such an armful, what else could he be hoping for? Now, everyone ought to pitch in, by singing a song if he knows one, or, if he can't sing, by telling a joke, to help Kuei-chieh down her wine."

Tagalong Hsieh, himself, was the first to tell a joke. "Once upon a time there was a mason who was engaged to repave a courtyard in the licensed quarter. Because the madam had been less than generous with him, he surreptitiously stuck a brick in her covered drain.⁹ As a result, when it rained, her whole courtyard filled up with water. The madam, in a state of consternation, sought him out, gave him all he could eat or drink, weighed out a mace of silver, and begged him to get rid of the water for her. The mason consumed the food and wine and then stealthily removed the brick from her drain, whereupon all the water immediately drained away. 'Foreman,' asked the madam, 'what was the problem?' To which the mason replied, 'The problem with your drain was the same as it is with you: It's only dough that makes things flow;

Without the dough, there'd be no flow.' "

It so happens that this joke reflected badly on Kuei-chieh's profession, which induced her to speak up, as follows, "I've got a joke of my own with which to regale you gentlemen. Once upon a time, the Taoist adept Sun Ssu-miao¹⁰ had prepared a feast and wished to summon his guests, so he sent the tiger who was customarily in attendance beneath his dais to invite them. The tiger proceeded to eat each and every one of the guests while they were en route to the feast. The Taoist waited until evening, but not a single guest had arrived. Everyone told him, 'That tiger of yours must have eaten the guests on their way here.' Before long the tiger arrived and the Taoist asked him, 'What has become of the guests I sent you to invite?' To which the tiger, who could speak the language of men, replied, 'You should know, master, that I've never been known to invite people to partake of anything. The only thing I'm any good at is devouring people.' "¹¹

This joke reflected badly on the whole bunch of them.

"It would seem," said Sponger Ying, "that all we know how to do is free-load off your patron, without being able to stand him a treat in return."

Thereupon, he extracted a silver-plated earpick from his hair that weighed one mace. Tagalong Hsieh contributed the pair of gilded rings he used to hold his hairnet in place, which were found to weigh nine and a half candareens. Sticky Chu pulled an old handkerchief out of his sleeve, which was assessed at a value of two hundred discounted cash. Blabbermouth Sun divested himself of the white cotton breechcloth he wore around his loins, which was pawned for enough to buy two and a half jars of wine. Cadger Ch'ang had nothing he could contribute, so he asked Hsi-men Ch'ing for the loan of a full mace of good-quality silver.

The entire proceeds of the collection were handed over to Li Kuei-ch'ing, to defray the expenses of standing Hsi-men Ch'ing and Kuei-chieh a treat. Kuei-ch'ing turned the money over to the servant, who managed to buy a mace worth of crabs, a mace worth of pork, and a chicken. The Li establishment threw in a few side dishes of its own, and everything was duly prepared in the kitchen and served up in: Large platters and large bowls.

Once the company was seated they scarcely needed an invitation before setting to.

The telling is slow;
What happened was quick.

Behold:

Everyone's mouth goes into motion,
Each of them lowers his head to the task.
Obscuring the sky and bedimming the sun,¹²
They are like a swarm of locusts
all descending at once;
Squinting their eyes and hunching their shoulders,

They are like starving prisoners
just let out of jail.
This one sets to with flailing arms,
As though it has been years
since he saw food or wine;
That one holds his chopsticks together,
As if it has been ages
since he attended a feast.
One of them has sweat pouring from his face,
As he engages in a grudge match with a chicken bone;
Another wipes the oil from his lips,
As he wolfs down bristle and rind with his hog's flesh.
When they have eaten but a while,
The cups and plates are in a state of disarray;¹³
By the time they are through,
The chopsticks lie about helter-skelter.
The cups and plates are in a state of disarray;
As spic-and-span as though washed.
The chopsticks lie about helter-skelter;
As neat and clean as though scoured.

This one rates the designation
Commander in Chief of the Gourmands;
That one has earned the sobriquet
General of the Trenchermen.¹⁴
The wine pots are drained dry, but they continue to upend them;
The platters are quite empty,
yet they scan them in vain.

Truly:

Delicacies of every variety have perished in but a moment;

Sacrificed upon the altar in the Temple of the Five Viscera.¹⁵

On this occasion, the bunch of them cleaned the place out as thoroughly as any Buddha King of Purifying Light¹⁶ could have done. Hsi-men Ch'ing and Kuei-chieh barely had two cups of wine apiece, and a few meager gleanings from the dishes on the table, before everything was gobbled up by the ravenous horde.

That day two of the chairs at their table were broken. The page boy who waited out front with the horse was not invited in for a snack, so he knocked the image of the tutelary god off its pedestal in the shrine by the door and deposited a bulging pile of hot shit in its place. On his way out the door, Blabbermouth Sun stuffed the gilded brass Buddha from the Li family's parlor into his waistband. Sponger Ying, pretending to kiss Kuei-chieh, snatched a gold-filled pin from her hairdo. Tagalong Hsieh pocketed Hsi-men Ch'ing's Szechwan fan. Sticky Chu went into Kuei-ch'ing's room to have a look at himself and made off with her mercury-backed mirror. Even the discount on the mace of silver that Cadger Ch'ang had borrowed from Hsi-men Ch'ing was put onto the reckoning.

It so happened that this bunch of men had nothing better to do than keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company in his revels. What a time they had together! There is a poem that testifies to this: The prostitutes of the licensed quarter are as coquettish as monkeys;

They are only fit to be visited on the impulse of the moment.
If one allows himself to become infatuated,
with no sense of satiety;
To whom can he safely entrust
the keys to his coffers?

His boon companions continued to cluster around Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Enjoying themselves as they drank up the wine.

But let us put this aside for a moment and return to the story of Tai-an.

When the page boy returned home with the horse, Wu Yüeh-niang was sitting in her room with Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien.

As soon as she saw Tai-an, she asked, "Have you brought your father back with you or not?"

Tai-an had been crying so hard that both his eyes were as red as could be. He gave an account, thus and so, that concluded, "I only got kicked and cursed by Father for my pains. And he also said, 'Whoever sends after me again will hear from me when I get home.' "

"Just look at him," said Yüeh-niang. "How unreasonable can you get? If he won't come home, so much for that; what business does he have abusing the page boy? How can he allow himself to be so bewitched by that vixen?"

"It's bad enough to kick a page boy," said Meng Yü-lou, "but how can he threaten to abuse us into the bargain?"

"Nine out of ten of those whores in the licensed quarter," said P'an Chin-lien, "don't have any real feelings for their customers. As the saying goes: Not even shiploads of gold and silver,

Can fill up the camps of mist and flowers."

Chin-lien simply blurted out what she had to say, without remembering that:

Even if you only talk along the road,
There may be someone lurking in the grass.¹⁷

Ever since Tai-an had returned from the licensed quarter, Li Chiao-erh had stolen up outside and had been standing by the window, eavesdropping. When she overheard P'an Chin-lien abusing the members of her own household to Yüeh-niang and referring to them as whores a thousand times, if not ten thousand times, she secretly stored up the resentment in her heart and, henceforth, regarded Chin-lien as her enemy. But no more of this. Truly: Honeyed words and plausible speeches can make the twelfth month warm;

Cruel words that are hurtful to others can turn the sixth month cold.¹⁸ Chin-lien's only consideration was the need to make herself heard;
How could she anticipate that a bystander could be the cause of calamity?

We will say no more for the moment about the enmity that Chin-lien incurred in Li Chiao-erh, but return to the story of that woman herself.

When Chin-lien returned to her room:

Each half hour was like three months of autumn;

Each two-hour period seemed like half a summer.

Knowing that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not coming home that night, she sent her two maidservants off to sleep, made a pretense of going out for a stroll in the garden, invited Ch'in-t'ung into her room, drank wine with him until he was drunk, closed the door: Took off her clothes and unfastened her girdle, and proceeded to couple with him. Truly:

With lustful daring as big as the sky,

what is there to fear?

Amid mandarin duck curtains the clouds and rain:

a lifetime of passion.¹⁹

Behold:

One of them shows total disregard for ethical norms or distinctions of status;

The other does not discriminate between above and below or high and low.
One of them, inspired by perverse lustful daring,
Cares nothing for the severity of her husband;
The other, carried away by lecherous desires,
Ignores a clear-cut violation of the law.
One of them, breathing heavily with staring eyes,
Sounds like an ox snoring in the willow's shade;
The other, with coy words and inarticulate cries,
Reminds one of an oriole warbling among the flowers.
One of them, murmurs in her partner's ear of passions evoked by clouds and rain;
The other, swears by the pillow side to be as faithful as the hills and seas.
The garden with its hundred flowers,
Has been transformed into a pleasure ground;
The bedroom of his lawful mistress,
Has turned into a Kingdom of Cockaigne.
Almost before they know it, a glob of donkey's spunk,
Has been deposited in Chin-lien's
jadelike body.²⁰

From this time on, every night the woman invited the page boy into her room for a repeat performance and sent him on his way again before dawn. She secretly let him have two or three of her gold-headed pins to wear in his hair, and she also gave him the brocade scent bag she wore suspended at her waist, together with the gourd toggle that held it in place, so he could wear them under his clothes.

How could she have known that this page boy:

Was not the sort to abide by his lot,²¹

but constantly went out into the street to drink and gamble with his fellow servants, where he was so indiscreet as to allow these gifts to be seen? As the saying goes: The best way to avoid being found out,

Is not to do it in the first place.²²

One day wind of this came to the ears of Sun Hsüeh-o and Li Chiao-erh, who said to each other, "That lousy whore is forever hypocritically protesting her own virtue. How is it, then, that today she's been caught red-handed committing adultery with a page boy?"

The two of them went off together to tell Yüeh-niang about it, but Yüeh-niang expressed herself repeatedly to be incredulous.

"It's all because the two of you are on the outs with her," she said. "But how can you help offending Sister Meng the Third by such an accusation? She'll say you're just trying to get rid of her page boy."

This response reduced the two to silence.

Sometime after this, the woman was carrying on with the page boy in her room one night when she forgot to close the back door. Her maidservant, Ch'iu-chü, happened to come out to relieve herself and saw what was going on. The next day she reported what she had seen to Hsiao-yü in the rear compound, and Hsiao-yü mentioned it to Hsüeh-o. Hsüeh-o and Li Chiao-erh again sought out Yüeh-niang and told her about it.

It happened to be the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month, the eve of Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday, and he had just come back from the licensed quarter to celebrate it. The two of them recounted everything, thus and so.

"The maidservant from her own quarters has reported it with her own mouth. It's not just a case of our trying to do her in. If you won't say anything about it, we'll go tell Father ourselves. You'd do as well to forgive a whore like that as you would to forgive a scorpion!"

"He's only just come home," said Yüeh-niang, "and it's a special day for him to boot. If you two disregard me and insist on telling him about it, in a little while, when the trouble starts, you'll have to look out for yourselves."

The two of them did not take Yüeh-niang's advice, but waited until Hsi-men Ch'ing came into his room and then told him all about how Chin-lien had been committing adultery with the page boy.

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them:

Anger flared up in his heart, and Malice accrued in his gall.²³

Marching out to the front compound, he sat down and called out in a loud voice for Ch'in-t'ung.

It was not long before someone reported these events to P'an Chin-lien.

In a state of panic she sent Ch'un-mei to call the page boy into her room, where she enjoined him, "Whatever happens, don't admit to anything!"

She demanded back the pins he was wearing in his hair, but she was so flustered she forgot to recover the scent bag with the gourd toggle.

Summoned into the front reception room, the page boy was made to kneel in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who ordered three or four servants to stand by with heavy bamboo canes.

"You lousy slave!" Hsi-men Ch'ing addressed him, "Do you acknowledge your crime?"

Ch'in-t'ung was too frightened to answer for some time.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered his minions, "Take off his hat and pull out the pins in his hair. I want to take a look at them. He's been seen sporting two gold-headed silver pins." Then, addressing him directly, he demanded, "What's become of the gold-headed silver pins you've been wearing?"

"I've never had any silver pins," said Ch'in-t'ung.

"The slave is still up to his tricks," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Strip off all his clothes and beat him with the bamboo."

The two or three servants in attendance set about their task. One of them, while engaged in stripping off his clothes, took down his trousers, disclosing the fact that underneath them he was wearing a jade-colored damask tunic, from the waist-string of which there hung a brocade scent bag with a gourd toggle.

Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed it immediately and called out, "Bring it here so I can have a look at it."

Recognizing it as the very object that P'an Chin-lien customarily wore suspended at her waist, he became enraged.

"Where did you get this?" he demanded. "Tell me the truth. Who gave it to you?"

The page boy was so frightened that it was some time before he could open his mouth to reply.

"It's something I picked up one day while I was sweeping in the garden," he said. "Nobody gave it to me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing gnashed his teeth in rage and shouted out the order, "Tie him up and give him a real thrashing."

Then and there Ch'in-t'ung was bound, hand and foot, and the blows of the cane fell on him like rain. In no time at all they had administered thirty strokes of the heavy bamboo, so severely that: The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and

Fresh blood flowed down his legs.²⁴

Hsi-men Ch'ing also gave orders to his chief household retainer, Lai-pao: "Pluck out the hair on the slave's temples and throw him out of here. See that he never sets foot on the threshold again."

When Ch'in-t'ung had kowtowed to his master, still weeping and wailing, he was given the gate. This page boy, only because: Last night he flirted with the nymph who keeps the books in the Palace of the Jade Emperor;

Today, guilty of a clear-cut violation of Heaven's law,²⁵ is banished to the realms below.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Tigers deploy the revenants of their prey,
birds are snared with decoys;
Chin-lien was not the sort to remain chaste within her empty boudoir.
Today she's in an untenable position for adultery with a servant;
From now on, if she encounters criticism
she has no one to blame but herself.

On this occasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing had Ch'in-t'ung beaten and then ejected him from the household.

When P'an Chin-lien, in her room, heard what had happened, it was: Just as though she had been dunked in a tub of ice water.

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her quarters. The woman trembled with fright as if the pulse had stopped beating in her body. When she went up to him, obsequiously, to take his outer garments, Hsi-men Ch'ing slapped her in the face so hard he knocked her down. He ordered Ch'un-mei to lock the front and back gates and not let anyone in. Then he got himself a small chair, sat down in the courtyard underneath the flower arbor, pulled out a riding crop, and, brandishing it in his hand, commanded, "Whore! Take off your clothes and get down on your knees."

The woman, troubled as she was by a bad conscience, did not dare to disobey. She actually took off all her clothes, above and below, and knelt down before him: Hanging her powdered face in shame, not daring to utter a sound.

"You lousy whore!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There's no use pretending you're:

Still asleep in dreamland.

I've just gotten the truth out of that slave. He's confessed to everything. Tell me the truth. While I've been away from home, how many times have you made out with him?"

"My Heavens!" the woman wept. "You really do me a mortal injustice, that's all there is to it. During the whole time you've been away from home the last half month or so, I've spent my days in the company of Sister Meng the Third, doing needlework together, and in the evenings I've locked the gate early and gone to bed. Without some reason I haven't presumed to step outside the postern gate. If you don't believe me, just ask Ch'un-mei, that's all. If I'd been indulging in any: Illicit salt or illicit vinegar,²⁶ she could hardly fail to know about it." Then, calling to Ch'un-mei, she said, "Sister, come over here and tell your father all about it."

"You lousy whore!" Hsi-men Ch'ing cursed. "They say you gave two or three of your gold-headed hairpins to that page boy on the sly. How can you deny it?"

"They do me a mortal injustice, that's all there is to it," the woman said. "It's all the doing of some backbiting whore, who will come to a bad end, eating her heart out when she sees how often you come to my room to spend the night, and angry enough to try to nail me with such a preposterous²⁷ story. As for the hairpins you've given me, there are only so many of them, and every last one is accounted for. Take a look for yourself. What could I be thinking of to give them to that slave for no reason at all? Someone like that, who hardly even makes the grade as a slave! He's such a babe in the woods it would be no exaggeration to say he hasn't even learned to piss yet. It's all a story someone has made up out of whole cloth to get back at me.”

“Forget about the hairpins,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, reaching into his sleeve and pulling out Ch’in-t’ung’s scent bag. “This is something that belongs to you. How did it come to be discovered hanging underneath the clothes of that page boy? Brazen that out if you can.”

As he spoke, the gorge rose within him and he brought down the riding crop, with a whistling slash, across her pale and fragrant flesh. He struck the woman so hard that: The pain was difficult to bear, and Tears streaked her powdered face.

“Please, Father!” she blubbered. “If you let me speak, I’ll speak. If you don’t let me speak, you can beat me to death if you like, and make a stinking mess of the place. As for this scent bag and its gourd toggle; while you were away from home one day, I was going past the banksia rose trellis, on my way into the garden to do some needlework with Sister Meng the Third, when my girdle came undone. It must have fallen off at that time. I’ve looked for it everywhere. Who could have known that this slave would pick it up? I certainly never gave it to him.”

This explanation happened to accord perfectly with what Ch’in-t’ung had just stated in the front reception room when he said he had picked it up in the garden. Moreover, when Hsi-men Ch’ing saw the woman’s flowerlike body, which had been stripped stark naked, kneeling before him as she uttered her: Winsome sobs and melting words,²⁸

His anger flew to Java, and he became 80 or 90 percent disposed to clemency.

Calling over Ch’un-mei, he sat her in his lap, and asked her, “Has the whore really been engaged in hanky-panky with the page boy or not? If you tell me to forgive the whore, I’ll forgive her.”

Affecting the:

Coquetry and petulance of a spoiled child,²⁹

Ch’un-mei sat down in his lap and said, “As for that, Father, needless to say, all day long Mother and I have been: As inseparable as the lip and the cheek.”³⁰

How could she have had anything to do with that slave? This is all something fabricated by someone who is jealous of Mother and me. Father, you ought to think what you’re doing, or you’ll only make an ugly reputation for yourself, which won’t sound any too good when it gets abroad.”

With these few words she succeeded in reducing Hsi-men Ch’ing to silence. Throwing aside the riding crop, he told Chin-lien to get up and put on her clothes, on the one hand, while he also gave orders to Ch’iu-chü to fetch something to eat and set the table so they could have a drink.

P'an Chin-lien Suffers Ignominy for Adultery with a Servant

The woman thereupon filled a cup of wine to the brim and, holding it in front of her with both hands, knelt down on the ground: Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying,
as she offered it up to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing admonished her as follows: "I'll forgive you this once. But whenever I'm away from home, I want you to: Cleanse your heart and reform your ways.³¹

Lock the doors early and don't allow yourself to:

Give way to foolish fancies.³²

If I find out anything, I certainly won't forgive you again."

"I hear and I obey," the woman said, and then:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing four times. Only then did she take her place at the table and keep him company as they drank wine together. Truly: If you're going to be a human being,

don't be a woman;

Or your every joy and sorrow will be dependent on another.³³

This woman, P'an Chin-lien, had been so favored by Hsi-men Ch'ing in the past as to lose all sense of decorum, but today she had brought this shameful ignominy on herself. There is a poem that testifies to this: No matter how congenial and compliant Chin-lien might appear;

She flaunted her favor to compete for affection and thereby aroused enmity.
Had it not been for Ch'un-mei's intervention on the day in question;
How could her parents' legacy of skin and flesh have borne up under the lash?

While Hsi-men Ch'ing was still drinking wine in Chin-lien's room, they were interrupted by the sound of a page boy knocking at the gate, who announced that Hsi-men Ch'ing's brothers-in-law, Wu Yüeh-niang's eldest brother Wu K'ai³⁴ and second brother Wu the Second, along with his shop manager, Fu Ming, his daughter and son-in-law, and other relatives, had arrived in the front reception room to offer presents and wish him a happy birthday. Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing relinquish Chin-lien, readjust his clothing, and go out front to entertain his guests.

On this occasion, there were gifts from Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and the other members of the club, and Li Kuei-chieh's establishment in the licensed quarter also sent a servant with a gift. Hsi-men Ch'ing was kept busy in the front compound, acknowledging the presents people had sent and issuing invitations. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Meng Yü-lou heard that Chin-lien had been thus humiliated, she waited until Hsi-men Ch'ing was out of the house, took pains to evade the notice of Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o, and came to pay Chin-lien a visit.

Finding her lying on her bed, she asked, "Sister Six, what's the real story behind this? Tell me all about it."

Her eyes brimming over with tears, Chin-lien sobbed out, "Sister Three, just look at what that insignificant whore has done. Today, behind my back, she's provoked our husband into giving me such a beating. From now on, the enmity between those two whores and me will be as deep as the sea."

"Even if you had a bone to pick with them," said Yü-lou, "you didn't have to do it in such a way that my page boy got thrown out of the household, did you? Sister Six, don't let yourself get too depressed about it. After all, it's not as though our husband will no longer listen to anything we have to say. If he doesn't come into my quarters someday soon, there won't be anything I can do about it, but if he does come into my quarters, I'll see if I can't put in a good word for you."

"Many thanks for your help, Sister," said Chin-lien. She then called in Ch'un-mei to bring them some tea, and they sat down and chatted together for a while, until Yü-lou said goodbye and returned to her own quarters.

That evening, because Wu Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, was visiting in the master suite, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to Yü-lou's quarters to spend the night.

Yü-lou took the opportunity to say to him, "You really oughtn't to flout Sister Six's feelings for you. She never did anything like that. It's all because, in the past, she's had words with Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o, and now, for no reason at all, these charges have been trumped up against my page boy. Without so much as enquiring into the: Blue or red, black or white."³⁵ of the situation, you've done him an injustice. You mustn't blame Sister Six. You've really been too hard on her. I'm prepared to swear an oath on her behalf. If anything like that had really happened, do you think Elder Sister wouldn't have told you?"

"I asked Ch'un-mei about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and she said the same thing."

"She's in her room right now," said Yü-lou, "feeling miserable. Why don't you go look in on her?"

"I know," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll go to her quarters tomorrow."

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day was Hsi-men Ch'ing's birthday, and a lot of distinguished guests had been invited to attend a party, including the commandant, Chou Hsiu,³⁶ the judicial commissioner, Hsia Yen-ling, the militia commander, Chang Kuan, and Hsi-men Ch'ing's brother-in-law, Wu K'ai. A sedan chair was dispatched to bring Li Kuei-chieh, and the services of two other singing girls were also engaged, to sing at the daylong celebration.

When Li Chiao-erh saw that her niece had come, she led her in to meet Yüeh-niang and the others, and she was invited to sit down in the master suite and have a cup of tea. She asked to meet P'an Chin-lien, and maidservants were sent after her twice, but Chin-lien refused to put in an appearance, claiming that she felt out of sorts.

In the evening, when Kuei-chieh was about to go home, she came to say goodbye to Yüeh-niang, who gave her a vest of cloud-patterned damask, a handkerchief, and some other trinkets, and, together with Li Chiao-erh, accompanied her to the main gate.

On their way, Kuei-chieh herself went up to Chin-lien's postern gate in the garden, saying, "Come what may, I'd really like to meet the Fifth Lady."

When Chin-lien heard she had come, she sent Ch'un-mei to shut the postern gate and:

Lock it tight as an iron bucket, so that
Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through,³⁷ while repeating, quite audibly, the words, "I won't let her in."
As a result of this rebuff, the prostitute returned home:
Her face crimson with mortification.

Truly:

Distribute your favors widely;
In this life you never know where you will meet again.
If you make a lot of enemies;
You'll encounter them in a tight spot where there's no escape.³⁸

We will say no more for the moment about how Li Kuei-chieh went home, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing. That evening he appeared in Chin-lien's quarters and she met him at the door with her: Cloudy locks in disarray, and her Flowery countenance dispirited, as she helped him off with his clothes. She waited on him with tea and hot water to wash his feet, playing up to him with every trick at her disposal in the endeavor to please him. That night as they shared pillow and mat: Like fish sporting in the water;

She humbled herself to the most shameful acts.
There was no length to which she would not go.³⁹

"Darling," she said, "who is there in the whole household who really loves you? Out of all these cases of: Cohabitation amid the dewdrops,⁴⁰ among all these 'remarried goods,' you and I are the only ones who really understand each other. When the others see how much you care for me, and how much time you spend with me, it makes them angry, and they fabricate things behind my back and try to make trouble between us. My foolish lover, what have you been thinking of, to allow yourself to be made the instrument of someone else's revenge? How could you have treated the person you love with such heartless cruelty? As the saying goes: If you beat domestic fowl, they'll hop around in circles; If you beat wildfowl, they'll fly high into the sky.⁴¹

Even if you were to beat me to death, I'd still be right here in this room. Where else would I dare go? Just the other day, for example, when you were in the licensed quarter and kicked and cursed your page boy—fortunately Elder Sister from the master suite and Sister Meng the Third were there to corroborate this—didn't I say something—and it was well-intentioned—about my fears that the painted woman in that establishment would exhaust your vitality—that the singing girls in the licensed quarter are only in it for the money and don't have any real feelings for their customers—what do they really care for you? How was I to know that this would be overheard by an interested party and that the two of them would connive against me behind my back? It's always been the case that: When other people are out to get you it's seldom fatal;

It's only when Heaven is out to get you that it's fatal.

Later on:

With the passage of time the truth will become clear.⁴²
The only thing is you've got to stand up for me, that's all."

On this occasion, with no more than these few words she succeeded in mollifying Hsi-men Ch'ing. That night the two of them: Indulged their lusts without restraint.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing had his horse prepared and set off for the licensed quarter with the two page boys, Tai-an and P'ing-an, in attendance.

To resume our story, Li Kuei-chieh was all dressed up and engaged in entertaining a customer. When she heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, she hastily returned to her room, where she: Washed away her makeup,

Took off her pins and earrings,
Threw herself down on the bed, and Pulled the coverlet over her head.

Upon his arrival, Hsi-men Ch'ing had to wait a long time before anyone came out to keep him company. At long last, the old lady appeared, bowed to him in greeting, and offered him a seat.

"How now, Kinsman?" the madam said. "It's been days since you've paid us a visit."

"It's only on account of all the busywork in connection with my birthday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There isn't anyone to be relied on at home."

"My daughter imposed on your hospitality the other day," said the madam.

"Why didn't her elder sister, Kuei-ch'ing, come with her that day?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Kuei-ch'ing is not at home," the madam replied. "Her patron has taken her to stay with him in his inn and hasn't let her come home the last few days."

They talked for a long time. After a while, someone brought tea and she kept him company while he drank it.

"What's become of Kuei-chieh?" Hsi-men Ch'ing finally asked.

"You mean you don't know about it, Kinsman?" the madam asked. "It's childish of her, and I don't know what it was that happened, but she was upset about something when she came home that day. She's been out of sorts ever since and has taken to her bed. In fact, she hasn't set foot outside her room from that time to this. It's really too cruel of you, Kinsman, not to have come to see her."

"Is that so?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I didn't know anything about it." And he went on to ask, "Which room is she in? I'll go pay her a visit."

"She's sleeping in her bedroom at the back of the house," the madam replied, and immediately ordered a maidservant to show him the way.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to her room, where he found the painted woman with:

Raven locks in disarray, and

Pale countenance unadorned, sitting on the bed, with the coverlet wrapped around her, and her face to the wall. When she saw it was Hsi-men Ch'ing, she made no response of any kind.

"What went wrong when you were at my place the other day?" he asked.

Receiving no reply, he asked again, "Who was it who upset you? Tell me all about it."

He kept on asking for a long time before Kuei-chieh replied, saying, "Well, anyway, it was the Fifth Lady of your household. Since you've already got someone who's so good at: Playing up to people and trading on her looks, what need is there for you to bother yourself with whores like me? We may have been born to the trade, but when we put our legs in the air we do a better job of it than any of those amateurs on the outside, no matter what their social standing. I wasn't there in my professional capacity the other day, to provide entertainment, but came to bring you a gift, like the other guests. The First Lady treated me very cordially, as did the other two ladies, and presented me with clothes and trinkets. Under the circumstances, if I hadn't asked to be introduced to her, she would have said that we denizens of the licensed quarter were ignorant of the rules of proper behavior. Having heard people say there was a Fifth Lady in your household, I assumed I might ask to be introduced to her. But she refused to make an appearance. When I was about to come home, together with my aunt, I went to say goodbye to her, but she sent her maidservant to shut the gate in my face. Really: She wouldn't know a favor if she saw one."

"Don't hold it against her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She was really feeling out of sorts that day. If she had been feeling all right, she could hardly have refused to come out and meet you. What a whore she is! Why, several times, on account of her backbiting and troublemaking, I've been on the verge of giving her a beating."

Kuei-chieh brushed Hsi-men Ch'ing across the face facetiously with the back of her hand and said, "What a shameless fellow! You'd actually beat her, would you?"

"You don't know what I'm capable of," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Except for my regular wife, it's nothing for me to give any one of the other concubines or maidservants a beating. When you get right down to it, if twenty or thirty strokes with a riding crop are not enough to subdue them, I'll even go so far as to cut off their hair, whether they like it or not."

"Decapitation's too good for you," said Kuei-chieh. "This calls for 'delinguification,' if there's any such thing. You probably: Bow down to them thrice, and for all I know. If you're really up to it, when you get home, just cut off a single hank of hair, and bring it here to show me. Only then will I acknowledge your claim to fame as a real devotee of the licensed quarters."

Say yes to them twice,⁴³

"Are you willing to shake on it?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I'd shake on it a hundred times," said Kuei-chieh.

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in the licensed quarter. The next day, around dusk, he said goodbye to Kuei-chieh and mounted his horse to return home.

Kuei-chieh said:

"My eyes are on the lookout for the flag of victory,

My ears are always on the alert for good tidings.

Darling, if the quest for this object proves unsuccessful, you needn't expect to see me again."

Hsi-men Ch'ing's dander was up as a result of her needling, and he was already inebriated by the time he returned home. He didn't go anywhere else, but headed straight for P'an Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound. When the woman saw that he was in his cups, she waited on him with more than usual care. In reply to her questions, he said he didn't want any food or wine, but ordered Ch'un-mei to wipe off the cool bamboo bed mat and then close the door and leave them alone.

Sitting down on the bed, he ordered the woman to take off his boots. The woman did not dare to refuse. In no time at all she had taken off his boots and helped him into bed. But Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go to sleep. Sitting up on a pillow, he ordered the woman to take off her clothes and kneel down on the surface of the bed before him.

The woman was so apprehensive she broke into a sweat. Without any idea what it was all about, she knelt down on the bed and began to weep out loud in a quavery voice, saying, "Father, if you'd only give me a clear-cut idea of what's going on: I'd be prepared to die if I must."⁴⁴

Even when you:

Keep me on tenterhooks,⁴⁵

all evening and I do my level best to watch my step, I don't seem to be able to suit your fancy. How can I bear it when all you do is saw away at me with a blunt knife?"

"You lousy whore!" cursed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you don't take off your clothes I'm going to lose my patience."

"The riding crop's hanging on the other side of the door," he called out to Ch'un-mei. "Bring it here for me, will you?"

Ch'un-mei deliberately refused to come into the room. Only after he had called for some time did she push open the door and come in: Just as slow and easy as you please. She saw the woman kneeling on the surface of the bed in the lamplight, with her hair tumbled before her like oil pouring from an overturned table. Hsi-men Ch'ing repeated his order, but she didn't budge.

"Ch'un-mei, my sister," the woman pled with her. "Help me! He's going to beat me."

"Little oily mouth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Don't pay any attention to her. Just fetch me the riding crop so I can give this whore a beating."

"Father, how can you carry on so shamelessly?" demanded Ch'un-mei. "What business of yours has Mother ever ruined, that you should take the word of some whore, whose only interest is to: Stir up a storm in untroubled waters,⁴⁶ and persist in making such capricious demands on her? How can you expect anyone to be:

Of one heart and one mind, with you under the circumstances? You'll be lucky if they give you a second glance."

Ch'un-mei refused to obey him, latched the door behind her, and went off to the front of the compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, finding himself:

At a loss for what to do next, laughed loudly and said to Chin-lien, "I won't beat you then. You can get up. If I ask you for something, will you give it to me, or won't you?"

"Darling," the woman said, "my whole body, bones and flesh alike, is completely at your disposal. Whatever it is you may want, I could not refuse to comply. But I don't know what it is you've set your heart on."

"What I want," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is a lock of the best hair from the crown of your head."

"Dear heart," the woman said, "any part of my body is yours for the asking. You can burn it with moxa wherever you like and I'll go along with you. But to cut off my hair is out of the question. The very thought of it scares me to death. From the time I left my mother's womb twenty-five years ago, I've never done anything like that. On top of which, recently the hair has already begun to thin out on the crown of my head. You really ought to take pity on me, that's all."

"You were upset at my annoyance with you just now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but when I ask you for something, you refuse to comply."

"If I didn't comply with your desires," said the woman, "with whose should I comply?" She then went on to ask, "Tell me the truth. What do you want this hair of mine for, anyway?"

"I want to make a hairnet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"If you want to make a hairnet," said the woman, "I'll make it for you. Just don't give it to that whore so she can use it to cast a spell on me."

"I won't give it to anybody, that's all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I only want your hair to make the main cord of a hairnet to bind my topknot with."

"If all you want it for is to make a cord for your topknot," said the woman, "I'll cut it off for you."

Thereupon, the woman undid her hair and let Hsi-men Ch'ing himself take a pair of scissors and neatly cut off a large lock from the crown of her head. He wrapped it in paper and put it in his wallet.

The woman then fell into Hsi-men Ch'ing's arms and, weeping coquettishly, said, "I'll do anything you want. I only hope you don't forget your feelings for me. No matter how stuck you become on anyone in the quarter, just don't abandon me."

That night they:

Enjoyed each other even more than usual.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing got up and, as soon as the woman had fed him his breakfast, went outside, mounted his horse, and headed straight for the licensed quarter.

"Where's the hair you've cut off her head," Kuei-chieh demanded.

"I've got it right here," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. He then reached into his wallet, pulled it out, and handed it to Kuei-chieh. She opened it and took a look, and when she saw that it was really a lock of beautiful hair, as glossy and black as oil, she promptly tucked it into her sleeve.

"Now that you've seen it, give it back to me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Last night she made all kinds of difficulties about cutting this hair. It was only when I changed countenance and got angry that she let me cut off this single lock of it. I fooled her by saying I only wanted it to make the main cord of a hairnet to bind my topknot with, and then brought it straight here to show you. You can see, I'm as good as my word."

"What sort of a rarity is this," said Kuei-chieh, "to have put you into such a state? When you're ready to go home I'll give it back to you. If you're as afraid of her as all that, you shouldn't have cut it off in the first place."

"Who's afraid of her?" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's just that I don't want to go back on my word."

Kuei-chieh induced Kuei-ch'ing to keep him company for a drink of wine, and then, as soon as she was out of sight, inserted the woman's hair into the linings of her shoes, so she could trample her underfoot every day. But no more of this.

Now that she had Hsi-men Ch'ing in her clutches, she kept him there for several consecutive days, without letting him go home.

From the time that Chin-lien allowed the cutting off of this lock of her hair, she became dispirited. Every day she: Confined herself to her room,

Too languid to consume tea or food.

Wu Yüeh-niang, consequently, sent a page boy after a certain Dame Liu, whose services were frequently called upon in the household, to come and take a look at her.

"Madam has contracted a black humor," the old lady said, "which continues to rankle in the heart and can't be eliminated. Your head aches, you feel nauseous, and you have no appetite."

On the one hand, she opened her medicine bag and left behind two doses of medicine, in the form of black pills, which were to be taken in the evening along with a decoction of ginger, while, on the other hand, she said, "I'll get my old man to come by tomorrow and ascertain whether or not you're fated to suffer any calamities during the current year of your horoscope."

"So your old man can also tell fortunes, can he?" said Chin-lien.

"Even though he's blind," said Dame Liu, "there are two or three things he can do. First of all, he's an expert at the Yin-yang School of fortune-telling and can either avert peoples' calamities or offer them protection against them. Secondly, he's well versed in acupuncture, moxabustion, and the treatment of pyogenic infections of the skin. His third skill is one that I really shouldn't talk about, but he's always helping people to perform 'turnabouts.'"

"What does the word 'turnabout' mean?" asked the woman.

"Well, for example," said Dame Liu, "if a father and son are at odds, or two brothers are not getting along harmoniously, or a legitimate wife and a concubine are quarreling with each other; if one of the parties calls on the services of my old man, he can employ a counteractive agent on his or her behalf in order to keep the other party in check, or provide him or her with a philter containing a counteractive spell that, if given to the other party to drink, will cause, within three days, the father and son to become intimate, the brothers to become harmonious, or the wife and concubine to cease to quarrel. Or if someone's business is not doing well, or his real estate is not prospering, he can 'open the door to wealth' for him, or enable him to 'turn a profit.' And as for such things as the treatment of disease, the performance of ritual purification, the exorcism of the spirits of baleful stars,⁴⁷ or the invocation of the Great Dipper, he's good at all of them. For this reason people all call him Stargazer Liu.

"There was one case, I remember, of a newly married daughter-in-law, of humble social origin, who was somewhat light-fingered and was constantly stealing things from her mother-in-law's household and taking them back to her own family. Whenever her husband found out about it she was regularly beaten. My old man was able to perform a 'turnabout' for her, by writing two spells, which were burnt, and the ashes buried under the water jar. The whole family drank water from the jar, after which the daughter-in-law could steal things right in front of their eyes without their noticing it. He also provided her with a counteractive agent, which was placed under her pillow, with the result that whenever her husband slept on that pillow it was just as though his hands had been restrained and he no longer beat her."

When P'an Chin-lien heard this, she took it to heart and ordered her maidservant to provide Dame Liu with tea and something to eat. When the latter was about to leave, Chin-lien wrapped up three mace of silver for her medical services. She also weighed out an additional five mace to enable her to buy paper money and other ritual objects, and asked her to bring her blind husband back with her at breakfast time the next day to burn the spirit money for her. Dame Liu then took her leave and went home.

The next day, sure enough, bright and early in the morning, Dame Liu showed up with the blind rascal in tow and proceeded to come straight in through the front gate. That day Hsi-men Ch'ing was still in the licensed quarter, from which he had not yet returned home.

The page boy in charge of the gate asked the blind man where he thought he was going, to which Dame Liu replied, "Today we've come to burn paper for the Fifth Lady."

"Dame Liu," said the page boy, "if you've come to burn paper for the Fifth Lady, you can lead him right in, but look out for the dog."

The old lady took her husband by the hand and led him straight to P'an Chin-lien's parlor, where they had to wait a long time before the woman finally appeared. The blind man saluted her and then sat down.

The woman told him the eight characters that determined her horoscope,⁴⁸ and after the blind rascal had performed some calculations on the fingers of his hand, he said, "Madam was born in a keng-ch'en year, in a keng-yin month, on an i-hai day, during the hour chi-ch'ou. Since the solar term 'Spring Begins' fell on the eighth day of the first month that year, one day before the day of your birth, your horoscope begins in the first month of the year. According to the orthodox interpretation of the Tzu-p'ing School,⁴⁹ although this horoscope of yours is certainly splendid and remarkable, you will not, in this life, receive any support from your 'husband star,' which corresponds to the stem keng. There will also be some difficulty as far as your 'children star' is concerned. The element wood, associated with the stem i in the combination i-hai that designates the day of your birth, is the governing element in your horoscope, but your horoscopic 'body' cannot be said to 'flourish' when this element occurs in the first month. If the effect of this unpropitious factor is not counteracted, the element is likely to burn itself up. Moreover, the reduplication of the element metal, associated with the stem keng in the combinations keng-ch'en and keng-yin that designate the year and month of your birth, indicates that the influence of the baleful star Yang-jen, or Ram's Blade, is too great. This will create difficulties for your 'husband star.' Only after you have gained the ascendancy over two husbands will you be all right."

"I already have," the woman said.

The blind rascal then continued, "As for this horoscope of yours, madam, excuse me for saying so, but the Tzu-p'ing School attaches great importance to the horoscopic categories called the 'killer' and the 'seal,' which would correspond, in your case, to the elements metal and water. These two elements would normally be quite compatible, but the presence of the element water, associated with the stem kuei, in the 'one-sided seal' pertaining to the combination i-hai that designates the day of your birth, and the recurrence of the same element in the horoscopic category called 'injurer of the official' pertaining to the combination keng-ch'en that designates the year of your birth, indicates an excess of water that produces a 'collision' with your governing element of wood. This is inadequately compensated for by the presence of the element earth, associated with the stem chi in the combination chi-ch'ou that designates the hour of your birth. Since the stem keng, which is your 'official,' and the stem hsin, which is your 'killer,' are both associated with the element metal, they conflict with each other. As the authorities say: If the 'killer' is in the ascendant for a man, he will exercise authority and power;

If the 'killer' is in the ascendant for a woman,

she is sure to 'punish' her husband.

"All of this indicates that you must be intelligent, adept at adapting yourself to changing circumstances, and sure to attract the favorable or unfavorable attention of others. But there is one problem. This year of your horoscope is a *chia-wu*⁵⁰ year, and the indications are that during this 'annual fatal period' calamities are likely to occur. You are fated to suffer difficulties resulting from encounters with the influence of the two baleful stars Hsiao-hao, or Little Waster, and Kou-chiao, or Strangler. Although you may escape unharmed, the indications are that there will be disharmony resulting from the 'matched shoulders' between your governing element and that associated with the stem chia in the designation of this year in your horoscope, both of which are wood. The wagging tongues of petty persons may often cost you some groaning and discomfort."

Stargazer Liu Purveys Black Magic in Pursuit of Gain

When the woman had heard him out, she said, "I'd be much obliged to you, sir, if you could do whatever you can to effect a 'turnabout' on my behalf. I've got a tael of silver here for you, sir, as a token of my gratitude. I hope it will suffice to buy you a cup of tea. I don't ask for anything else; all I want is to keep petty persons at a distance, and to be assured of the love and respect of my husband."

Retiring into her bedroom, she pulled out two of her hair ornaments and handed them to the blind rascal, who accepted them and tucked them into his sleeve.

"If you want me to effect a 'turnabout,' " he said, "I'll take a piece of willow wood and carve a pair of male and female effigies out of it. They must be inscribed, respectively, with the sets of eight characters that determine your and your husband's horoscopes, and then bound together with seven times seven, or forty-nine, strands of red thread. A strip of red gauze must be fastened over the eyes of the male effigy, love grass must be stuffed into its heart cavity, its hands must be secured with needles, and, below, its feet must be stuck together with glue. The effigy must then be concealed inside the pillow on which he sleeps. In addition to this, I will write a spell for you, using vermilion ink, which you must burn to ashes, and surreptitiously stir into a cup of strong tea. If your husband drinks the tea and sleeps, the same night, on the pillow, in no more than three days, the magic will naturally take effect."

"Please, sir," the woman asked, "tell me, what's the significance of these four things?"

"I'll explain them to you, madam," the blind rascal said. "The fastening of the gauze around the eyes is to make you appear in your husband's sight as captivating and voluptuous as Hsi-shih. The stuffing of the heart cavity with love grass is to make him love you in his heart. The securing of the hands with needles is to prevent him from daring to strike you, no matter what you do, so that, in fact, he'll even get down on his knees to you. The sticking together of the feet with glue is to make it impossible for him to go out and sow any more wild oats."

When the woman heard tell that:

Such things could be,
she was utterly delighted. Thereupon, the incense, candles, and paper money were all prepared and the ceremony of burning spirit money on the woman's behalf was duly carried out.

The next day Stargazer Liu sent his wife to deliver the spell for the making of the philter and the other counteractive agents that he had promised. The woman took care of everything just as she had been told. Having burnt the spell to ashes, she stirred it into some good tea and, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home, had Ch'un-mei serve it to him. That night the two of them: Shared a single pillow on the same bed.

As time passed:

One day became two,

Two days became three,

and they became:

As inseparable as fish from water, and Enjoyed each other as usual.

Gentle reader take note: No matter whether your household be great or small, it is best to avoid the services of priests and nuns, Buddhists and Taoists, wet nurses and go-betweens. There is no telling what they will do behind your back. A poet of yore has left us some words of admonition, in the form of a quatrain, that express this very well: To the formal reception room of your house never admit female professionals;

Always keep your back door securely locked in order to deny them admission.
If you have a well in your courtyard, repair even the slightest fissure;
Then your catastrophes will be few and your stars of good fortune many.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 13

LI P'ING-ERH MAKES A SECRET TRYST OVER THE GARDEN WALL; THE MAID YING-CH'UN PEEKS THROUGH A CRACK AND GETS AN EYEFUL

Since there's no such thing in this life
as complete satisfaction;
In one's way of coping with the world do not be too demanding.¹
It's a good thing always to pay heed only to the words of superior men;

When disputes arise never listen to the words of petty persons.²
Only regard the customs of the age
as a source of amusement;
While respecting the intentions of others
by keeping them at a distance.
If one were to address perceptive women with a word to the wise;
It would be, "Don't ever confide your troubles to your sweetheart."³

THE STORY GOES that one day earlier that summer,⁴ on the fourteenth day of the sixth month, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came in from the front compound and went into Yüeh-niang's room, she said to him, "While you were out today, the Hua household sent a page boy over with a note inviting you for a drink. 'Ask him to come over whenever he gets home,' he said."

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the invitation, which read, "Can you join me for a chat at Wu Yin-erh's place in the licensed quarter at noon today? Come over to my place so we can go together. I do hope you can make it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon dressed himself to befit the occasion, ordered two of his attendants to prepare his best horse, and proceeded directly to the Hua household next door. How could he have known that Hua Tzu-hsü would not be at home? His wife, Li P'ing-erh, was standing on the raised stone platform just inside the second gate, the unfinished vamp of a sand-green Lu-chou pongee shoe in her hand. She was wearing a summer outfit that consisted of: A chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree,

Pendant amethyst earrings in gold settings,
A blouse of pale lavender silk, opening down the middle,
And a white silk skirt with drawnwork borders,
Beneath which there peeked out a pair of tiny shoes,
The points of which bore the beaks of red phoenixes.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, quite unaware of what was in store for him, proceeded through the gate, and the two of them ran smack into each other.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had already had her on his mind for some time. Although he had caught a glimpse of her by the graveside at the old Eunuch Director's funeral the previous summer, he had not yet had a chance to savor the details. Now that he was able to meet her face to face and saw that she had a naturally fair complexion, was petite in stature, and had a face shaped like a melon seed and delicately curved eyebrows, before he knew it: His ethereal souls flew beyond the sky, and

His material souls dispersed among the nine heavens.⁵

Stepping forward with alacrity, he gave her a deep bow, and the woman returned his salute, after which she turned around and disappeared into the interior of the house. But she sent out the maidservant with her hair cut straight across her forehead, named Hsiu-ch'un, to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing to take a seat in the parlor, while she herself stood just inside the postern gate: Half revealing her captivating countenance, and addressed him, saying, "Please sit down for a little while, sir. He's gone out on an errand just now, but he'll be back any minute."

Before long she sent out a maidservant with a cup of tea, and while Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking it, she conversed with him from the other side of the gate, saying, "At this drinking party over there that he's invited you to today, sir, whatever happens, for my sake, couldn't you urge him to come home a little earlier than usual? Our two menservants will both accompany him, leaving only these two maidservants and myself, so there won't be anyone to be relied on at home."

"Sister-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're certainly in the right. My brother really ought to: Pay more attention to his family affairs.

Since you have so instructed me, Sister-in-law, I'll be sure to stick by his side.

Together we'll go and together return.

How could I do anything detrimental to my brother's interests?"

While they were still speaking, who should appear but Hua Tzu-hsü himself, and the woman returned to her own quarters.

Hua Tzu-hsü saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing and then said, "How good of you to accept my invitation. Something came up just now that I simply had to run out and take care of. Forgive me for not being here to greet you myself."

Thereupon, they took their places as guest and host, and a page boy was ordered to bring tea.

It was not long until they had done with the tea, and Hua Tzu-hsü instructed the page boy, "Tell Mother to prepare the refreshments. I'm going to share three cups of wine with Mr. Hsi-men here before we set off."

Then, turning to his guest, he continued, "Today is the birthday of Wu Yin-erh from the licensed quarter, and so I've invited you to join me in paying her a visit in order to celebrate the occasion."

"My Good Brother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why didn't you say so before?"

Turning to Tai-an, he ordered, "Go home at once, get five mace of silver put into a sealed packet, and bring it back to me here."

"What need is there for you to put yourself to such trouble, Brother?" protested Hua Tzu-hsü. "I'm afraid I'm to blame."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the servants were setting up a table, he said, "Brother, there's no need to entertain me here. Let's go into the quarter and do our drinking there."

"I wouldn't presume to detain you," said Hua Tzu-hsü. "Just stay a little longer."

Whereupon, in:

Large platters and large bowls,
such delicacies as chicken feet and fresh pork were set before them. A high-stemmed silver goblet in the shape of a sunflower was provided for each of them. There were also four "spring rolls" left over when they had finished eating, which they saved as a treat for the boys who tended their horses.

Before long, after Tai-an had returned with the requested gratuity, the two of them mounted their horses and set off together. Hsi-men Ch'ing was accompanied by Tai-an and P'ing-an, and Hua Tzu-hsü by T'ien-fu and T'ien-hsi, so they had four page boys in their retinue as they made their way directly to Madam Wu the Fourth's establishment in the back alley of the licensed quarter in order to celebrate Wu Yin-erh's birthday.

After they got there:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade,
Song and dance and wind and string instruments, they continued drinking until the first watch before the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing saw to it that Hua Tzu-hsü got stinking drunk, while at the same time, in response to Li P'ing-erh's request, he actually accompanied him on his way home. When the calls of the page boys had succeeded in getting someone to open the front gate, they helped their master into the parlor and set him down. Li P'ing-erh and her maidservants, carrying lamps and candles, came out and supported Hua Tzu-hsü on his way into the interior of the house.

His mission accomplished, Hsi-men Ch'ing was about to take his leave when the woman came back out to thank him.

"My poor husband is a sorry lot and something of a sot," she said. "It's very kind of you to have put up with him for my sake and to have brought him home with you. Please don't laugh at my solicitude, sir."

"How would I dare?" replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, hastening to make a low bow in response to her salutation. "Since you gave me my marching orders this morning, Sister-in-law, I have shown myself capable of: Leading the army forth, and Leading it back again.

How could your wish that I should accompany your husband home be anything but:

Imprinted in my heart and engraved on my bones?⁶

Had I failed to do so, it would not only have added to your worries, but would have shown me to be: Undependable in the performance of my task.

The people at that establishment would have had Brother in their clutches if I hadn't insisted on urging him to leave. But as we passed by the gate of the Star of Joy establishment—the one that features the painted face, Cheng Ai-hsiang, whose nickname is Cheng Kuan-yin, or Goddess of Mercy Cheng, and who's quite a looker—Brother would have ventured in there, if I hadn't done everything in my power to stop him. 'Brother,' I said to him, 'let's go home. There's time enough to come another day. Sister-in-law's at home worried to death about you.' It was only then that he consented to come straight home with me. Otherwise, if he'd gone into the Cheng place, he wouldn't have been home all night.

"With all due respect, Sister-in-law—I really shouldn't say this sort of thing—but Brother's a fool. With such a young wife and such a large house to look after, how can he simply abandon you and stay away from home for whole nights at a time? It doesn't make any sense."

"It's just as you say," the woman responded. "Simply because of this philandering of his, and his refusal to take anyone's advice, I get so upset here at home that my body aches all over. From now on, sir, whenever you run into him in the licensed quarter, whatever happens, for my sake, urge him to come home as soon as possible.

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

Now this Hsi-men Ch'ing was the sort of man of whom it is said: If you hit him on the top of his head,

The soles of his feet will ring.

He had been a habitué of the world of breeze and moonlight for so many years that there wasn't much he didn't know about anything. Therefore, on this particular day, the fact that the woman was opening up a wide avenue of approach to herself was not lost on him.

His face wreathed in smiles, he laughed, saying, "How can you talk that way, Sister-in-law? Really! What are friends for, anyway? I'll certainly do my best to admonish my brother. You can rest assured, Sister-in-law."

The woman bowed to him again to express her thanks and also directed a young maidservant to bring out a cup of tea, flavored with fruit kernels, in a carved lacquer cup with a silver spoon.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished the tea, he said, "I'd better be on my way. Be careful not to let anyone into the house."

Whereupon, he took his leave and went home.

From this time on, Hsi-men Ch'ing made up his mind that he would contrive to make a conquest of this woman. Time and again he saw to it that Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, and the rest of that crowd detained Hua Tzu-hsü in the licensed quarter, carousing all night long, while he slipped out and made his way back to his own home. Once there, he would stand around in front of the gate until the woman and her two maidservants appeared at the front gate next door. She noticed that it was Hsi-men Ch'ing, who gave a discreet cough as he passed in front of her door. First he would head east, then turn around and go west, or come to a halt in front of the gateway across the street and stare fixedly in the direction of her door. The woman would show herself in the doorway and then, when she saw him coming, duck inside, only to stick her head out again as soon as he had passed by. As for: The messages in their eyes and the expectations in their hearts;

There was no longer any need to express them in words.

One day, as Hsi-men Ch'ing was standing in front of his gate, the woman sent her young maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, to invite him over.

"What are you inviting me for, Sister?" Hsi-men Ch'ing pointedly asked. "Is your father at home or not?"

"Father's not at home," Hsiu-ch'un replied. "It's Mother that's inviting you, sir. There's something she wants to ask you."

This was just the signal Hsi-men Ch'ing had been waiting for. He complied with alacrity, was shown into the parlor, and took a seat.

After some time, the woman came out and saluted him, saying as she did so, "I'm extremely grateful for your consideration the other day."

It is imprinted in my heart,

My gratitude knows no bounds.

Since my poor husband went out last, it's been two days in a row now that he hasn't come home. I wonder if you happen to have come across him or not, sir?"

"Yesterday, along with three or four others, he was drinking in the Cheng family establishment," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Something happened to come up that brought me home, and today I haven't had a chance to go into the quarter, so I don't know whether he's still there or not. If I'd been there I could hardly have failed to urge him to come home as early as possible. I'm well aware how upsetting it is for you, Sister-in-law."

"It's just as you say," the woman responded. "I suffer constantly from his refusal to take anyone's advice, his frequent resort to the quarter: Sleeping among the flowers and lolling beneath the willows, and his refusal to pay any attention to family affairs."

"If one had to assess Brother's character," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "he's certainly humane and righteous enough, but he does have this one flaw."

As they were talking, the young maidservant brought tea, and they drank it together. Hsi-men Ch'ing was afraid Hua Tzu-hsü might come home and thought it imprudent to linger, so he prepared to take his leave.

The woman, for her part, begged Hsi-men Ch'ing, in no uncertain terms, "If you happen to go there tomorrow, whatever happens, urge him to come home as soon as possible. Your kindness will be rewarded. You can be sure I'll make it worth your while, sir."

"Say no more, Sister-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "After all, Brother and I are just like that together."

After saying which, Hsi-men Ch'ing went home.

The next day, when Hua Tzu-hsü came back from the licensed quarter, the woman complained to him, saying, "While you've been out: Indulging your taste for wine and sex, we've become more than a little obligated to our next-door neighbor, the Honorable Hsi-men, who has, more than once, helped to see you safely home. You really ought to buy him a present of some kind to express your gratitude if you don't want to fall behind in your social obligations."

Hua Tzu-hsü immediately bought four boxes of presents and a jar of wine and sent the page boy, T'ien-hsi, to deliver them to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted them and gave the messenger a generous tip, but we will say no more of this.

Wu Yüeh-niang, who was present on this occasion, asked, "What is the Hua household sending you this batch of presents for?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "This must be because, the other day, when Brother Hua the Second invited me to join him in the licensed quarter to help celebrate Wu Yin-erh's birthday, he got drunk, and I had to help him to get home. And also because his wife is aware that I constantly urge him not to spend the night in the quarter but to go home as early as possible, and she can't get over her feelings of gratitude at my consideration. I imagine she must have suggested to Brother Hua the Second that he buy these presents in order to thank me."

Wu Yüeh-niang folded her hands in front of her chest and made him a bow in the manner of a Buddhist priest, saying, "Brother, you really ought to take a good look at yourself. You're just like: The earthenware idol preaching to the idol of clay.

You, too, stay away from home for days at a time:

Seducing people's daughters and carrying on with their wives, and you have the face to preach to someone else's husband."

"I don't suppose," she continued, "that you're planning to simply accept these presents from them without doing anything in return. Whose name was written on the card that came with the gifts, anyway? If it was his wife's name, then we can write an invitation in my name today and invite her over for a visit. She's been anxious to make our acquaintance for some time. If it was her husband's name, invite him or not, as you please. It's no business of mine."

"It was in Brother Hua the Second's name," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll invite him over tomorrow, that's all."

The next day, sure enough, Hsi-men Ch'ing made the necessary preparations and invited Hua Tzu-hsü over for a visit. They spent the better part of the day drinking together.

When he got home, Li P'ing-erh said to him, "We mustn't be remiss in our social obligations. We sent him a set of presents and he has reciprocated by inviting you over for a drink. Some day soon you ought to make the necessary preparations and invite him back over here for a drink. Turnabout is fair play.”

Light and darkness alternate swiftly.

Before long the Double Yang festival,⁷ on the ninth day of the ninth month, rolled around. Hua Tzu-hsü took advantage of the occasion to engage the services of two singing girls, and sent an invitation to Hsi-men Ch'ing to come over and enjoy the chrysanthemums with him. He also invited Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, Sticky Chu, and Blabbermouth Sun to keep them company. Playing the game: “Passing the Flower to the Beat of the Drum,”⁸ they:

Enjoyed themselves as they drank up the wine.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The raven and the hare⁹ move in their orbits as swiftly as arrows;
Among the festivals in the human world
it is again the Double Yang.
The red leaves on a thousand branches supply autumn color;
The yellow blossoms on the garden paths
emit unusual fragrance.
But the black-hatted young official is not seen ascending the heights;
He is still dreaming of a silk-clad young lady offering him wine.
Amid embroidered hangings, behind latticed doors,
they gaze at each other;
From this time on, their mutual love will never be forgotten.

That day the bunch of them continued to drink until after the lamps had been lighted. At this juncture Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to get up from his place and go outside to relieve himself. He did not anticipate that Li P'ing-erh would be standing there, eavesdropping, just on the other side of the latticework partition, and the two of them ran smack into each other. Before Hsi-men Ch'ing could get out of the way, the woman, who had hastily withdrawn behind the postern gate on the west side of the courtyard, surreptitiously sent her maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, to waylay him in the shadows.

“Mother has sent me to ask you, sir,” she whispered, “if you won't take it easy on the wine and go home as early as you can. Right now she's contriving a way to hustle Father off to the quarter to spend the night. This evening, thus and so, Mother would like to have a word with you.”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this:

His delight knew no bounds.

He returned to the party, after relieving himself, and from that point on surreptitiously disposed of his drinks, concealing what he was doing behind his sleeve. As the singing girls continued to play their instruments, sing, and ply the guests with wine, he pretended to be too drunk to have any more.

Before long it was already the first watch, and Li P'ing-erh kept coming back impatiently to eavesdrop outside the screen. She saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting in the place of honor, pretending to have fallen asleep, while Sponger Ying and Tagalong Hsieh were sitting there, as if their bodies were nailed to their chairs. They were so drunk they bobbed about like the float valve in an oil jar, but they wouldn't get up to go. It got so bad that Sticky Chu and Blabbermouth Sun finally left, but the two of them still wouldn't budge. Li P'ing-erh was beside herself.

Hsi-men Ch'ing eventually got up to go, but Hua Tzu-hsü wouldn't let him get away.

“I must not have done my duty as a host today,” he said. “Brother, how can you refuse to stay a little longer?”

“I'm really drunk,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “I can't swallow another drop.” Whereupon, making a deliberate display of: Swaying to the east and tumbling to the west, he prevailed upon his two page boys to help him back home.

“I don't know what's the matter with him today,” said Sponger Ying, “that he kept refusing to have anything more. He got drunk when he'd hardly had anything to drink. But since our host has gone to so much trouble on our behalf, let's ask our two sisters here to bring out some larger cups, and we'll have another forty or fifty rounds before breaking up.”

When Li P'ing-erh heard this, from her vantage point on the other side of the screen, she cursed them unremittingly for a pair of slobber-pussed jailbirds, and inconspicuously sent the page boy, T'ien-hsi, to call Hua Tzu-hsü out for a word with her.

“If you want to go on drinking with that bunch,” she told him, in no uncertain terms, “you can take yourselves into the licensed quarter, this minute, and do your drinking there. Don't stick around the house and bother me anymore. Before I know it, it'll be: The third watch in the middle of the night, and you'll still be:

Burning oil and wasting fuel.

I've had enough of it.”

“If I go into the licensed quarter with them at this hour,” said Hua Tzu-hsü, “I'll never make it back home tonight. You'd better not give me a hard time about it.”

“You go ahead,” the woman said. “I'll not give you a hard time about it, that's all.”

This was just the signal Hua Tzu-hsü had been waiting for. He came back and told the others about it, thus and so, saying, “Let's go into the licensed quarter.”

“Really?” said Sponger Ying. “Sister-in-law said that? It's no use trying to fool us. You'd better go back and ask Sister-in-law again before we get going.”

"My wife just spoke to me about it a minute ago," said Hua Tzu-hsü. "She told me not to come home till tomorrow."

"I've got it," said Tagalong Hsieh. "She just couldn't take any more of Beggar Ying's palaver. Now that our brother's succeeded in getting her permission, we can go without anything to worry about."

Thereupon, along with the two singing girls, the whole party set off for the licensed quarter. T'ien-fu and T'ien-hsi accompanied their master, Hua Tzu-hsü, and his two guests. When they arrived at Wu Yin-erh's place in the back alley of the quarter it was already the second watch. They called until someone opened the gate. Wu Yin-erh had already gone to bed, but she got up, lit some candles in the reception room, and invited them to come in and have a seat.

"The patron of your establishment," explained Sponger Ying, "invited us to his place to enjoy the chrysanthemums and have a drink today. Having already drunk to the point where we can't stop, he's also invited us to look in on you here in the quarter. Whatever you've got in the house to drink, serve it up, so we can continue drinking."

We will say no more, for the moment, about Hua Tzu-hsü's drinking bout in the licensed quarter, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When he arrived home, still feigning drunkenness, he went into P'an Chin-lien's quarters. No sooner had he taken off his outer clothes, however, than he went out into the front garden and sat down to await a signal from Li P'ing-erh's side of the wall. After some time had passed, he heard them chasing the dog and locking the gate on the other side. Not long after this, what should appear in the dark shadows over the wall but the maidservant, Ying-ch'un. She pretended to be calling a cat, but when she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing sitting in the pavilion, she gave him a message. Hsi-men Ch'ing then moved over a table and a bench and, by mounting on top of them, was able to get over the wall. A ladder had already been put in place on the other side.

Now that Hua Tzu-hsü was out of the way, Li P'ing-erh had already:

Removed her headdress,

Carelessly coiled her raven locks, and Adorned herself with demure elegance, before coming out to stand in the veranda. When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come over the wall: Her delight knew no bounds.

She welcomed him into her room, which was brightly illuminated by lamps and candles, and where she had already laid out a magnificent spread of wine and delicacies, condiments and appetizers.

There was a small pot:

Filled to the brim with fragrant wine.

The woman:

Lifting high a jade goblet,

with both hands, allowed Ying-ch'un to fill it from the wine pot, and then offered it to Hsi-men Ch'ing with a deep bow, saying, "We've been obligated to you in the past, sir, and you have even gone to the trouble of entertaining us. It's enough to make me: Uneasy in my heart."

Li P'ing-erh Makes a Secret Tryst over the Garden Wall

Today I took it upon myself to prepare this cup of watery wine and invite you over, sir, as a means of expressing some small part of my inadequate feelings. And then I've had to contend with the refusal of those two goddamned slobber-pusses to leave. I was really beside myself. But now I've succeeded in packing them all off to the licensed quarter."

"My only fear is that Brother Two might come home," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I've already told him to spend the night there and not come back," said the woman. "The two menservants have both gone with him. There's no one else left at home but these two maidservants and Old Mother Feng, who looks after the gate. She's been a servant in my family since I was a child and is completely trustworthy. The front and back gates are already locked."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he was completely delighted. The two of them then sat down together: Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,

Exchanging cups as they drank, while Ying-ch'un stood at their side to pour the wine and Hsiu-ch'un went back and forth to serve the food. When they began to feel the effects of the wine; within the brocade bed curtains, the maids: Perfumed with incense the mandarin duck quilt, and Put in its place the coral pillow.

The servants then removed the table at which they had been drinking and put the latch on the door, after which the two of them: Got into bed and engaged each other in amorous sport.

It so happens that well-to-do households are equipped with double windows, the outer layers of which are called shutters, and the inner layers, casements. When the woman sent her maidservants out of the room, she closed the two casements on the inside, so that even though the room was illuminated by lamps and candles, no one could see in from the outside.

Now the maidservant, Ying-ch'un, was already sixteen years old and knew something of the world. When she saw that the two of them were going to engage in an illicit liaison that night, she stealthily pulled a hairpin out of her headdress, poked a hole in the paper of the lower part of the casement, and peeped inside. Truly, what were the two of them doing with each other? Behold: By the gleam of lamplight,

Amid mermaid silk curtains;
One comes, the other goes,
One butts, the other lunges.
One of them stirs his jade arms into motion,
The other raises her golden lotuses on high.
This one gives vent to the warbling of an oriole,

The Maid Ying-ch'un Peeks through a Crack and Gets an Eyeful

That one gives voice to the twittering of a swallow.
 It is just like Chang Chün-jui's rendezvous with Ts'ui Ying-ying,¹⁰
 It much resembles Sung Yü's secret tryst with the Goddess of Witches' Mountain.¹¹
 Promises to be as faithful as the hills and seas,
 Still resonate within their ears;
 The butterfly is enamored, the bee distraught,

They are not yet willing to call a halt.
The engagement is protracted,
The coverlet disturbed by crimson waves,¹²
Until the transfusing touch of the "magic rhinoceros horn"¹³ penetrates her creamy breast; The battle is prolonged,
The bed curtains clipped by silver hooks,
Until the twin arcs of her painted eyebrows wilt on her jade face.

Truly:

The third time that lip meets lip passion is stronger than ever;
A single melting sensation suffuses the body when lovers meet in secret.

While the two of them were in the room playing at clouds and rain, who would have thought that everything they did was so clearly seen and heard by Ying-ch'un from her vantage point outside the window that she might well have exclaimed: "Is it not delightful?"¹⁴

She could hear everything that they said.

"How old are you?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked the woman.

"I was born in the year of the ram," said Li P'ing-erh, "so, this year, I'm twenty-two."

She then went on to ask, "How old is your first lady?"

"My wife was born in the year of the dragon," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "which would make her twenty-five."

"So she's three years older than I am," said the woman. "One of these days I ought to buy a set of presents and go pay a call on your First Lady. My only fear is that she may not be any too friendly."

"My wife has always had a most accommodating disposition," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If that were not the case, how could I ever manage to keep so many bedmates around the place?"

"When you came over here, just now," the woman went on to ask, "did the First Lady know about it or not? If she should ask you about it, what would you say?"

"My wives all live in the rear compound," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "four courtyards back from the front of the house. The only exception is my fifth concubine, née P'an, who lives all by herself in a two-storied belvedere in the front garden, but she doesn't dare interfere with me."

"And how old is the Fifth Lady?" the woman asked.

"She was born in the same year as my wife," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"That's good," the woman said. "If she doesn't think it presumptuous of me, I'd like to acknowledge her as an elder sister. Someday soon, if you can get hold of the outlines of the First Lady's and the Fifth Lady's feet for me, I'll make two pairs of shoes for them, myself, and take them over with me, as a token of my feelings."

The woman then pulled out two gold pins from among those that held her headdress in place and gave them to Hsi-men Ch'ing, enjoining him, "If you should go into the licensed quarter, don't let Hua Tzu-hsü see them."

"I understand," Hsi-men Ch'ing promised.

Thereupon, the two of them:

Like glue and like lacquer, dallied with each other until the fifth watch, when:
The cock crowed outside the window, and
The eastern horizon began to grow light.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, fearing that Hua Tzu-hsü might come home, got up and put his clothes in order.

"You can climb over the wall the same way you came," the woman said.

The two of them agreed on a set of signals between themselves. Whenever Hua Tzu-hsü was safely out of the way, a maidservant on this side would look over the wall and give a surreptitious cough as a signal, or first throw a piece of tile over the wall to see if the coast was clear before climbing up to communicate with him. Hsi-men Ch'ing could then use a ladder to climb over the wall, where he would find another already in place to receive him. The two of them could thus: Communicate across the intervening wall,¹⁵ as they engaged in:

Pilfering jade and purloining perfume.¹⁶

As long as they did not go in and out the main gates, there would be no way for the neighbors in the vicinity to find out about their clandestine affair.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In your eating, go easy on the salt and vinegar;
Don't bother to go places where you don't belong.
If you want to be respected, study diligently;
If you don't want a deed discovered, don't do it.¹⁷

To resume our story, as the day dawned, Hsi-men Ch'ing climbed back over the wall the way he had come and went to P'an Chin-lien's room.

Chin-lien, who was still in bed, asked him, "Where did you go off to yesterday without anyone's knowing it? You didn't come home all night, and you didn't tell me where you were going."

"Once again," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it was Brother Hua the Second who sent a page boy over to invite me to join him on an excursion into the licensed quarter. We've been drinking half the night, and I came home as soon as I could tear myself away."

Although Chin-lien believed him, the shadow of a doubt still lingered in her mind.

One day, after dinner, she and Meng Yü-lou were sitting in the pavilion in the garden doing some needlework together when a piece of tile came flying over the wall and landed right in front of them. Meng Yü-lou was so preoccupied with stitching the sole of the shoe she was working on that she didn't notice anything. But P'an Chin-lien swiftly surveyed the scene and caught an indistinct glimpse of a white face that poked over the top of the wall and then immediately withdrew.

Chin-lien nudged Yü-lou, pointing to the place where the head had appeared, and said, "Look, Sister Three, that was the older of the two maidservants in the Hua household next door. She must have climbed up to look at our flowers over the wall and then, on seeing us here, gotten down again."

Although this is all that she said at the time, she didn't let it go at that.

Later the same evening, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home after a social engagement and came into Chin-lien's quarters. When she helped him off with his outer garments and asked if he wanted anything, he expressed no interest in food or tea of any kind, but made a beeline for the front garden. P'an Chin-lien, on the principle that: One thief knoweth another, decided to spy on him and observed that, after he had sat there for some time, the same maidservant as before peeked over the wall, whereupon Hsi-men Ch'ing clambered up a ladder and disappeared over the wall himself.

Once there, he was met by Li P'ing-erh, who conducted him into her room for a rendezvous, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

P'an Chin-lien returned to her room where, all night long, she:

Tossed first this way and then that,
but could not get to sleep.

At dawn the next day, who should appear but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who pushed open the door to her room and came inside. The woman pretended to be asleep and did not pay him any attention. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was already feeling somewhat uneasy about the situation, came up and sat down beside her on the edge of the bed.

When the woman saw what he was doing, she jumped up into a sitting position herself, took hold of him by the ear with one hand, and berated him, saying, "You unfaithful scoundrel! Where did you really go off to last night, anyway; leaving your old mother to fret the whole night through?"

"No sooner do I let you out of my sight," she continued, "than you're up to your old tricks. But I already know all about them, and you're beginning to try my patience. Tell me the truth at once, all this while, how many times have you made out with that whore in the Hua household next door? If you confess to everything, I may let you off the hook; but if you try to deceive me by so much as a single word, the next time you set one foot over there, I'll raise such a hue and cry before you can get your other foot over the threshold, you fickle jailbird, that: You'll die without a plot to be buried in."¹⁸

"You've been arranging to have your cronies latch onto her husband and keep him overnight in the licensed quarter while you're here making out with his wife. If it's trouble you want, I'll give you enough so that: When you've had your fill, there'll be enough left over for you to wrap up and take home with you.

No wonder, yesterday, when Sister Meng the Third and I were in the garden doing our needlework, what should appear but that elder maidservant from her place: Sticking out her head and craning her neck, over the wall? It turns out she was nothing but a ghost-snatching demon sent by that whore to snatch you away. You think you can fool your old mother, do you? The other night when that cuckold of hers supposedly invited you to join him for an excursion into the licensed quarter, it was his own home that was the licensed quarter, wasn't it?"

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them, he was flustered enough to adopt the posture of a dwarf.

Stamping his feet in exasperation, he knelt down on the ground with an ingratiating laugh and pleaded with her, saying, "You crazy little oily mouth! Not so loud! The truth of the matter is that, thus and so, she asked how old the two of you were and said that, someday soon, if she can get hold of the outlines of your feet, she'll make a pair of shoes for each of you. She'd also like to acknowledge you both as elder sisters. She's quite content to be a younger sister to you."

"I don't need that whore to acknowledge me as any older brother or older sister," exclaimed Chin-lien. "She steals other people's husbands and then comes around offering to do them little favors as a means of cementing the relationship. Your old mother is: Not the sort of person to let dust be thrown in her eyes."¹⁹

She thinks she can get away with that kind of mischief right under my nose, does she?"

As she spoke, she pulled open his trousers with one hand, exposing to view his limp and flaccid organ, which still had a silver clasp fastened around it.

"Tell me the truth," she demanded. "How many times did you make out with that whore last night?"

"Only once that would really count," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You'll have to swear an oath on that all too vigorous body of yours before you can get me to believe that," said the woman. "One time only and it's: As soft as driveling snot and thick as gravy."²⁰

It might as well have been stricken with paralysis. The slightest sign of vitality would be cause for hope."

As she spoke, she removed the clasp with a single motion of her hand, and continued to berate him, saying, "You shameless ruffian!

You may be a brown cat, but you've got a black tail.
No wonder I turned the place upside down looking for it, and all the time it was you who had spirited the thing away in order to screw around with that whore."

Affecting an ingratiating smile, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "You crazy little whore! You'll be the death of me yet. She has repeatedly asked me to convey the message that someday soon she'll come over and kowtow to you. And she's going to make a pair of shoes for you too. Yesterday she sent her maidservant over for an outline of the feet of the one from the Wu family. And today she asked me to deliver this pair of hairpins in the shape of the character for long life to you as a present."

Thereupon he took off his cap, pulled them out of his headdress, and presented them to Chin-lien. Taking them into her hand and looking them over, Chin-lien saw that they were a pair of gold, openwork pins, in the shape of the character for long life, which had been deeply chased in intaglio and inset with azurite. It was obvious from the extraordinary intricacy of the craftsmanship that they had been manufactured for imperial use and came from the palace.

Chin-lien was utterly delighted and said, "Well, if that's the way things stand, I won't say any more about it, that's all. When you go over there in the future, I'll act as a lookout, so the two of you can screw away to your hearts' content. How would that be?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so delighted he put both arms around her and said, "My precious child, if you really do that, it will prove the truth of the adage: You don't raise a child in the hope it will shit gold and piss silver;

All you can hope for is that it will respond empathetically to you.²¹

Tomorrow I'll go myself and buy you a set of patterned clothing to express my gratitude."

"I don't trust that:

Honeyed mouth and sugared tongue, of yours," the woman responded. "If you want your old mother to fix things up for the two of you, you'll have to agree to three conditions."

"No matter how many conditions you impose, I'll agree to them all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The first condition," the woman said, "is that you will have to give up frequenting the licensed quarter. The second condition is that you must do as I say. The third condition is that when you go over to sleep with her, when you come home, you must tell me all about it, without deceiving me by so much as a single word."

"Those conditions are no obstacle," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll agree to all of them, and make an end to it."

From this time on, whenever Hsi-men Ch'ing came back after spending the night next door, he would regale the woman with an account of his adventures.

"Li P'ing-erh has a naturally fair complexion," he would say. "Her face is shaped like a melon seed. She's very amorous and she drinks like a fish. We often bring a box of delicacies inside the bed curtains and play cards there and drink for half the night before going to sleep."

One day, he reached into his sleeve and pulled out an object, which he handed to Chin-lien to look at, saying, "This is an album of paintings from the Palace Treasury that the old eunuch director obtained during his service in the Imperial Household Department. The two of us consult it by lamplight and then attempt to emulate the proceedings."

Chin-lien took the album in her hand and opened it up to take a look. There is a lyric that testifies to this: Mounted on patterned damask in the imperial palace,

Fastened with ivory pins on brocade ribbons;
Vividly traced in outlines of gold, enhanced by blue and green colors;
The square painting on each folio leaf is neatly framed.
The women vie with the Goddess of Witches' Mountain,
The men resemble that handsome paragon, Sung Yü.²²
Pair by pair, within the bed curtains, they show themselves to be practiced combatants.
The names of the positions are twenty-four in number;²³
Each one designed to arouse the lust of the beholder.

Chin-lien, having perused it from beginning to end, was reluctant to let it out of her hands and, turning it over to Ch'un-mei, said, "Put it away safely in my trunk so we can amuse ourselves with it whenever we want to."

"You can look it over for a few days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but then you'll have to return it to me. This is a prized possession, belonging to someone else, which I borrowed to bring home and look at, on condition that I return it to her afterward."

"If it belongs to her, what's it doing in my house?" demanded Chin-lien. "I didn't take it out of her hands. And even if I had, she couldn't get it out of me now."

"It wasn't you who asked her for it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It was I who borrowed it. You crazy little slave. Stop fooling around."

As he spoke, he went after her and tried to wrest the album out of her hand.

"If you try to grab it," said Chin-lien, "I'll go you one better. I'll tear it to shreds and then nobody will be able to enjoy it."

"I guess I'm outmaneuvered," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh. "Do as you like with it, but return it when you're through, that's all. If you give this back to her, she's got another remarkable object I can borrow for you in the future."

“My child, whoever taught you to be so disingenuous?” said Chin-lien. “Bring it here first, and then I’ll let you have this album back.”

The two of them continued their badinage for some time.

That evening, in her room, Chin-lien:

Perfumed with incense the mandarin duck quilt,

Deftly trimmed the silver lamp’s wick,

Made herself up alluringly, washed her private parts, and, together with Hsi-men Ch’ing, opened up the album inside the bed curtains, preparatory to: Enjoying the pleasures of connubial bliss.

Gentle reader take note: Black magic and sorcery have existed since ancient times. If you look at the way in which Chin-lien, from the time she prevailed upon the blind Stargazer Liu to effect a “turnabout” on her behalf, in no time at all contrived to so complicate the situation that Hsi-men Ch’ing’s: Annoyance and anger were transformed into favor, while her:

Seclusion and disgrace were transmuted to joy, with the result that he no longer dared to control her; can the existence of such arts be doubted? Truly: Though you may be as devious as any demon,

You’ll drink the water she’s washed her feet in.²⁴

There is a lyric to the tune “Partridge Sky” that testifies to this:

She remembers that time in the studio
when they had just met;
The clouds and rain they enjoyed together
were known to only a few.
When evening came, the phoenix and his mate
alighted on adjacent pillows;
Left untrimmed, the silver lamp
shed only a half-light.

Thinking of the past,
Her dreaming soul deluded;
Tonight she is all too happy to enjoy
the pleasures of connubial bliss.
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,
their pleasure knows no bounds.
From this time on, surely, the pair of them will never be separated.²⁵

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 14

HUA TZU-HSÜ SUCCUMBS TO CHAGRIN AND LOSES HIS LIFE; LI P'ING-ERH INVITES SEDUCTION AND ATTENDS A PARTY

The message in her eyes and expectation in her heart will brook no further delay;
She is not content merely to fiddle with her hairpin of jade.¹
When spring blooms on her smiling countenance
the flowers look seductive;
At the slightest perturbation of her delicate brows
the willows droop in sorrow.
While blushes suffuse her peachlike cheeks
she dreams of matrimony;
As the chill invades her orchid-scented chamber she longs for togetherness.
If only she could contrive to comply with Ssu-ma Hsiang-ju's wishes;
Without suffering the fate of Cho Wen-chün when she sang the "Song of White Hair."²

THE STORY GOES that one day when Wu Yüeh-niang was feeling out of sorts, her sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, came to pay her a visit and she invited her to stay overnight.

While she was entertaining her visitor in her room, the page boy, Tai-an, happened to come in, carrying his master's felt bag, and reported, "Father's come home."

Wu K'ai's wife promptly moved over to Li Chiao-erh's quarters in order to get out of the way.

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing came in, took off his outer garments, and sat down. Hsiao-yü brought him a cup of tea, but he didn't drink it.

Yüeh-niang noticed that he looked rather worried and asked, "Why is it that you've come home so early from your club meeting today?"

"It was Ch'ang Shih-chieh's turn to entertain us today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but he doesn't have room in his own house, so he invited us to make an excursion to the Temple of Eternal Felicity, at Wu-li Yüan, outside the South Gate. Then Brother Hua the Second invited Brother Ying the Second and several of the rest of us, four or five in all, to join him for a drink at Cheng Ai-hsiang's place in the licensed quarter. Just as we were beginning to enjoy ourselves, all of a sudden, a group of official lictors appeared, and:

Without permitting any further explanation, arrested Brother Hua the Second and took him into custody. This development caught all of us completely off guard, and in my alarm I fled to Li Kuei-chieh's place and hid out for a while. Still uneasy about it, I sent someone to make inquiries.

"It turns out that Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth, from Brother Hua the Second's branch of the old eunuch's family, are suing him for a share of the family property. They have filed a suit in the prefectural yamen at K'ai-feng, the Eastern Capital, and, since the suit has been accepted, the authorities in this district have been ordered to arrest the defendant. It was only after ascertaining the facts that we felt secure enough to break up and come home."

When Yüeh-niang had heard him out, she said, "It serves you right! You've been spending altogether too much of your time hanging around and playing the god with that bunch, without so much as thinking of coming home. All you want to do is fool around outside. It's only appropriate that something like this today should happen before you're ready to call it quits. If you don't give it over now, sooner or later you're going to get involved in a brawl in which they'll drag you off somewhere and:

Pound you into a bloody sheep's head,³ before you abandon this kind of behavior once and for all.

"When your legitimate wife, at home, gives you her well-meant advice, you seldom pay any attention. But whenever a whore in the licensed quarter says a few words to you, you prick up your donkey's ears and do as she says. Truly:

The words of your family are wind in your ears;

The words of outsiders are sutras in letters of gold.”

“Who would have the:
Seven heads and eight galls,
to assault me?” scoffed Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“You good-for-nothing,” Yüeh-niang responded. “You’re given to shooting off your mouth at home all right, but if it came to the crunch, you’d be so terrified your tongue would hang out.”

As they were talking, who should come in but Tai-an, who reported, “Hua the Second’s wife, next door, has sent T’ien-fu to ask Father if he would step over there to have a word with her.”

This was just the signal Hsi-men Ch’ing had been waiting for, and he lost no time in starting on his way.

“One of these days,” said Yüeh-niang, “if you don’t watch out, it’s going to be you that gets nabbed.”

“It’s right next door,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “What harm can it do? I’ll just go over and see what she has to say.”

Thereupon, he went over to Hua Tzu-hsü’s place. Li P’ing-erh sent a page boy to invite him into the rear of the house for a talk. What should he see when he got there but the woman, with her:

Silk tunic in disarray, and Pale countenance unadorned, coming out of her room, so frightened her face had turned as sallow as wax?

Kneeling down before Hsi-men Ch’ing and making repeated supplications, she said, “Sir, there’s no help for it!
If you won’t do it for the priest’s sake,
do it for the Buddha’s.”⁴

As the saying goes:
When calamities strike the home,
Neighbors help each other out.

It’s all because of my poor husband’s refusal to take anyone’s advice, coupled with his unwillingness to pay any attention to serious family affairs. He reposes his trust in the people he fools around with outside and stays away from home for days at a time. It’s only appropriate that today he should have allowed himself to be taken advantage of and gotten himself into this kind of a fix.

“And now that it’s come to the crunch, at this late date, he sends his page boy to me and wants me to pull strings and get him off the hook. I’m only a woman, after all, about as much good as a legless crab; where does he think I’m going to go to find the strings to pull on his behalf? I get so angry when I think of his refusal to take anyone’s advice, I’m tempted to let him be dragged off to the Eastern Capital and beaten to a pulp. It would serve him right. The only thing that deters me is that it would reflect unfavorably on the late old eunuch director’s reputation.

“I hadn’t any alternative, sir, but to ask you to come over and appeal to your generosity. Forget about him! But if you could only find it in you, for my poor sake; if you know of any strings to pull, whatever happens, be good enough to pull one. I just don’t want to see him abused, that’s all.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw the woman kneeling before him, he quickly said, “Sister-in-law, please get up. It’s no problem. At first, today, I didn’t know what was going on. We were all at the Cheng establishment drinking wine together when a group of official lictors suddenly appeared and carried brother off to the Eastern Capital.”

“It’s a long story,”

the woman said. “The trouble is being caused by the nephews of my father-in-law, the late eunuch director, who belong to the same collateral branch of the family as the one from which my husband was adopted. The eldest nephew, Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, Hua the Fourth, and my husband are all natural brothers. The eldest is called Hua Tzu-yu, the third is called Hua Tzu-kuang, the fourth is called Hua Tzu-hua, and my husband is called Hua Tzu-hsü. They are all the consanguineous nephews of the old eunuch director.

“Although the old gentleman had succeeded in amassing a tidy fortune for himself, he saw clearly enough that this husband of mine would not amount to anything; so, when he came back from Kwangtung, he put his property into my hands for safekeeping. He even went so far, at times, as to give my husband a regular caning. The other nephews, too, had tasted enough of the stick at his hands not to dare to interfere.

“Last year, when the old gentleman died, Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth were given something in the way of furniture and household effects to take home with them, but they didn’t receive so much as a candareen’s worth of silver. I said at the time, ‘We’d better take care of them by giving them a little something.’ But this husband of mine spent all his time fooling around on the outside and was unwilling to pay any attention at all to serious matters. Now, today, they’ve been able to:

Act so quietly not a breath of air escaped, and he’s allowed himself to be undone.”

When she had finished speaking, she let herself go and began to weep out loud.

“Don’t worry, Sister-in-law,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “I was afraid it would be something big. But, as it turns out, it’s only a case of members of the same branch of the family suing each other over the division of property. It shouldn’t be too difficult to handle. As long as you want me to, I’ll:

Treat my brother’s affairs as my own, and Treat my own affairs as my brother’s.

No matter what you ask of me, I’ll be only too happy to comply.”

“If you’ll only deign to help out, sir,” the woman said, “everything will be fine. I’ll need to know, though, how much money will be required in order to pull the necessary strings, so I can get it ready.”

"It won't require all that much," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I understand that Prefect Yang, who presides over the prefectural yamen in K'ai-feng, the Eastern Capital, is a protégé of the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching. Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, along with my kinsman by marriage at four removes, the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, Yang Chien, are both people who have the ear of the reigning emperor himself. If these two men can be induced to interest themselves on your behalf, and they both speak to Prefect Yang, he could hardly refuse to comply. No matter how important a matter it might be, that ought to take care of it. Now we will certainly need to make a present to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, but since Commander in Chief Yang is related to me by marriage, he will probably refuse to accept anything."

The woman then went into her room, opened a trunk, and brought out sixty large ingots of silver, weighing fifty taels each, making a total of three thousand taels, which she handed over to Hsi-men Ch'ing to expend, both high and low, as he saw fit, in the endeavor to pull the necessary strings.

"Half of that would do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What need is there to use so much?"

"If there's anything left over, you can keep it for me, sir," the woman said. "Concealed behind my bed there are four lacquer chests decorated with gold tracery that contain python robes, jade-ornamented girdles, jeweled cap buttons, chatelaines, pendants, and bracelets, as well as valuable jewels and objets d'art. If you could take these off my hands at the same time, sir, and keep them over at your place, I could ask for them whenever I need anything. If I don't take precautions ahead of time, but leave everything to him, we're going to end up having trouble making ends meet. It's obvious that:

Three fists are no match for four hands.⁵

If we let ourselves be outnumbered, sooner or later they'll get the better of us and make off with the property, and I'll be left in the lurch with nowhere to turn."

"But what will happen when Brother Hua the Second comes home and starts looking for this stuff?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"These are all things," the woman replied, "that the old gentleman, while he was still alive, personally handed over to me for safekeeping. My husband doesn't know a thing about them. You can feel free to take charge of them, sir."

"If that's what you want me to do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll send someone over to move them as soon as I get home."

Thereupon, he went straight home and consulted with Yüeh-niang about it.

"As for the silver," said Yüeh-niang, "we can send page boys over to carry it back in food boxes. But if we bring the stuff in the chests in at the front door, we can hardly avoid attracting the attention of the neighbors. The best thing to do is, thus and so; if we hoist it over the wall at night, it will be less conspicuous."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was greatly delighted by this suggestion and immediately dispatched the four servants, Lai-wang, Tai-an, Lai-hsing, and P'ing-an, with two sets of food boxes, to carry the three thousand taels of silver over to his house on their carrying poles. Later that evening, when the moon rose, Li P'ing-erh, on her side, together with her two maidservants, Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, by putting a bench on top of a table, managed to hoist the chests up to the top of the wall. Hsi-men Ch'ing, on his side, accompanied only by Yüeh-niang, Chin-lien, and Ch'un-mei, set up a ladder to receive them. They spread a strip of felt over the top of the wall and then hoisted the chests over the top, one at a time, and deposited them in Yüeh-niang's room.

You may well ask:

"Can such things be?"

If you want to get rich,

You've got to take risks.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Wealth and success are often attained
by strokes of good luck;
Profit and fame, on the other hand,
bring troubles of their own.
If you are destined to attain them,
you will do so in the end;
If you are not destined to attain them,
no amount of effort will avail.⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing had succeeded in taking into his own possession a considerable quantity of his neighbor's disposable wealth, in the form of gold and silver and other valuables, without the other residents of the neighborhood being any the wiser. The same day he had the requisite monies packed up, requested a letter of introduction from his son-in-law's family, the Ch'en household, and sent a servant off to deliver them to the Eastern Capital.

Along the way this messenger:

Each morning took to the purple road;

Each evening tramped the red dust,⁷ until, one day, he arrived in the Eastern Capital and turned over the letter and presents to the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, Yang Chien. The latter, in his turn, requested the grand councilor and grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching, to send a note to Prefect Yang in the prefectural yamen at K'ai-feng.

Now this prefect was named Yang Shih,⁸ his courtesy name was Kueishan, and he was a native of Hung-nung district in the province of Shensi. He had passed the chin-shih examination in the year 1103 and had risen to the position of chief minister of the Court of Judicial Review before receiving his current appointment as prefect of K'ai-feng. He was an official of absolute integrity. But the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching, had been his examiner in the chin-shih examination and Yang Chien was a favored and highly placed official, so he could hardly refuse to do the requested favor.

At the same time Hsi-men Ch'ing had also dispatched a letter to Hua Tzu-hsü, informing him of the steps that were being taken on his behalf, and saying, "The officials involved have all been taken care of. When you appear in court and are interrogated about the whereabouts of the inherited property, simply say that all of the money has been spent and that nothing remains but the houses and real estate."

To resume our story, one day Prefect Yang Shih ascended the tribunal, and the functionaries of the six local offices stood in attendance. Behold:

His official conduct is honest and correct;
His actions reveal integrity and intelligence.
He always harbors a compassionate disposition;
He constantly possesses benevolent intentions.
In cases of disputes over the ownership of land,
He distinguishes between the crooked and the straight before taking action.
In instances of mutual contention or affrays,
He weighs the lightness or heaviness of the offense before passing sentence.
In moments of leisure he fingers the zither or entertains guests;
He also devotes himself to the investigation of the condition of the people.
Despite the fact that he is a presiding official in the capital,
He really is a father and a mother to the people in his jurisdiction.⁹

That day, Prefect Yang Shih ascended the tribunal and ordered that Hua Tzu-hsü be taken out of the lockup and brought before him. When the parties to the suit had been assembled in the courtroom and knelt down before the dais, the prefect began his interrogation as to the whereabouts of the inherited property.

All Hua Tzu-hsü would say was, "After the death of the old eunuch director, the money was all expended on the funeral and services for the dead. All that remains are two houses and a country estate. As for the furniture and household effects, they have all been divided up among the other members of the family."

"It is difficult to ascertain anything about the property of eunuchs," pronounced Prefect Yang. "It is a case of:

Easy come, easy go."¹⁰

Since the money has apparently all been spent, I hereby rule that the presiding magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district be ordered to depute functionaries to assess Eunuch Director Hua's two houses and country estate, to sell them off for their market value, to divide up the proceeds among Hua Tzu-yu and the other two plaintiffs, and to report back to me in writing."

Hua Tzu-yu and the others wanted to kneel down before the tribunal and petition the prefect to continue to hold Hua Tzu-hsü in custody until the whereabouts of the missing money could be determined, but Prefect Yang angrily rejected their petition, saying, "You rascals are lucky to have escaped a beating. When this eunuch director of yours died, why didn't you bring a suit at that time, instead of waiting until now when:

The affair is over and the circumstances have changed, to kick up such a fuss and waste the paper and brushes required to file a suit?"

Thereupon, without beating Hua Tzu-hsü a single stroke, he signed an order authorizing the return of the defendant to Ch'ing-ho district, and the assessment of the real estate. But no more of this.

No sooner did Hsi-men Ch'ing's retainer, Lai-pao, ascertain the facts about the disposition of the case than he traveled back, post haste, to report to his master. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard that the prefect, Yang Shih, had proven responsive to pressure and had released Hua Tzu-hsü and allowed him to return home, he was extremely pleased.

Li P'ing-erh invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over to her place to discuss the matter and said to him, "Why don't you get together a few taels of silver and buy the house we're living in? After all, it won't be long now before I'm completely yours."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went home and broached the issue with Wu Yüeh-niang.

"No matter what it's officially assessed at," Yüeh-niang said, "you ought not to enter into an agreement to buy that house. What will you do if her husband should start to suspect something?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing made a mental note of what she had said.

Not many days thereafter, Hua Tzu-hsü arrived home. The district magistrate of Ch'ing-ho deputed Vice Magistrate Yüeh to carry out the assessment, with the following results. The eunuch director's mansion, located on Main Street in An-ch'ing ward, was evaluated at 700 taels of silver. It was sold to a distaff relative of the imperial family named Wang. The country estate outside the South Gate was evaluated at 655 taels of silver. It was sold to the commandant, Chou Hsiu. All that remained was the modest house in which Hua Tzu-hsü was currently residing. It was evaluated at 540 taels of silver, but because it was right next door to Hsi-men Ch'ing's property, no one dared to buy it.

Hua Tzu-hsü repeatedly sent people over to make representations, but Hsi-men Ch'ing stalled, maintaining that he couldn't afford it, and refused to rise to the bait. The district magistrate was anxious to settle the matter so that he could file the required written report. Li P'ing-erh, in desperation, secretly sent Old Mother Feng over to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to suggest that he use 540 taels of the silver she had deposited with him to make the purchase. Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing agree, and the silver was duly weighed out in the presence of the officials. Hua the Elder even signed the paper that formalized the transaction.

That very day the necessary documents were completed and a report was sent up to the higher authorities. The sale of the old eunuch's real estate holdings had produced, in all, a total of 1,895 taels of silver, which was evenly divided among the three plaintiffs.

Hua Tzu-hsü had come out of this lawsuit without anything for himself. His money, his houses, and his landed property were all gone. Not a trace remained of the 3,000 taels of silver, in large ingots, that had been stored in his coffers.

In a state of severe perturbation he demanded an accounting of Li P'ing-erh. "How was the silver that you provided to Hsi-men Ch'ing actually spent? And how much of it is left over? After all, we have to come up with the money to buy another house."

The only result of these queries was that he had to endure four or five days of abuse at the hands of his wife.

"Phooey! You muddleheaded troll!" she railed at him. "Day after day you neglected your proper concerns, going out and:

Sleeping among the flowers and lolling
beneath the willows, without bothering to come home. It only serves you right that someone should have been lying in wait for you and succeeded in luring you into this trap.

"Once you landed in jail, you sent someone to speak to me, urging me to pull strings on your behalf. I'm only a woman, after all. I've scarcely ventured out so far as the front gate.

I may be able to run, but I can't fly.¹¹

What do I know about such things? Who do I know, anyway, that might be able to pull strings for you?

Even if I were made of iron, how many nails could you get out of me?

I had to run all over the place, saying 'Please sir' and 'I beg you, madam,' before I could find anyone that could be of any use. If you haven't planted any seeds in the past, when the going gets rough, who's going to pay any attention to you?

"Thank goodness, our next-door neighbor, Hsi-men Ch'ing, out of consideration for our former relationship, was willing, despite the coldness of the weather and the ugly winds that were blowing, to send his servant all the way to the Eastern Capital, where he succeeded in bringing this affair of yours to a satisfactory conclusion.

"But now that you've escaped the clutches of the law and find yourself with:

Both feet on level ground again,¹²

what do you do but:

Once your life's been saved, think of money;

Once your wound's been healed, forget the pain, and come home to demand an accounting of your wife?

"Even if there were anything left over, it wouldn't be yours to fritter away on your own gratification. After all, I've still got the note you sent me. If I didn't have your written authorization, it's not very likely that I'd have laid out your money in order to pull strings for you entirely on my own hook, or have simply handed it over to somebody, is it?"

"Of course I sent you that note," said Hua Tzu-hsü. "But the truth of the matter is I was hoping there would be something left over. We've got to come up with enough money to buy another house and have something to live on before we can worry about anything else."

"Phooey!" his wife exclaimed. "What a nincompoop! I'm just wasting my breath on you. If you'd only paid some attention a little bit earlier, instead of:

Ignoring things when you're flush, and Starting to worry when you're in the hole!

You may accuse me of spending too much a thousand times, or ten thousand times if you like, but where do you suppose those three thousand taels of yours went, anyway? I wouldn't underestimate the appetites of people like the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching, or the commander in chief of the Imperial Guard, Yang Chien, if I were you. If they had been offered any less, do you suppose you could have escaped with impunity from your bout with the law, without suffering so much as a lash with a wisp of straw on your cuckold's body, only so you could come home and shoot off your mouth?

"Hsi-men Ch'ing is no connection of yours. You've got no claim on him. And which of your beloved relatives or friends would have been willing to:

Travel north and journey south, or go to such lengths or spend so much money, in order to come to your rescue? When you got home you should have laid on a feast and invited him over to express your appreciation, instead of:

Trying to sweep it all under the rug with a single stroke of the broom,¹³ or demanding that everything be accounted for after the fact."

It did not take very many such pointed and derisive speeches to reduce Hua Tzu-hsü to silence.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an over with a gift to Hua Tzu-hsü to help calm his flustered spirits. Hua Tzu-hsü reciprocated by preparing a feast, hiring two singing girls, and extending an invitation to Hsi-men Ch'ing to express his gratitude. He intended to take advantage of the occasion to ask what had become of his money, and he hoped to be able to rely on Hsi-men Ch'ing for the return of several hundred taels of silver, which would enable him to buy another house.

Li P'ing-erh did not want this to happen, so she secretly sent Old Mother Feng over to say to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Don't accept this invitation. Provide him with a false account of how the money was spent, claiming that it was all used up in taking care of the officials involved in the case, both high and low."

Hua Tzu-hsü did not catch on, but sent his servant over two or three times to press the invitation. Hsi-men Ch'ing actually went so far as to hide out in the licensed quarter, while ordering his servants to report that he was not at home. Hua Tzu-hsü was giddy with rage at this treatment, but all he could do was stamp his feet in frustration.

Gentle reader take note: As a rule, when a wife has had a change of heart and no longer sees eye to eye with her husband, even a man with the strength and resolution to chew up nails will find it difficult to defend himself against her secret wiles. It has always been true that:

Man is responsible for what lies outside the household;

Woman is responsible for what lies within it.¹⁴

Yet, on many occasions a man's reputation is ruined by a woman. Why is this so? It is always because he doesn't know how to handle her. To sum it up in a nutshell, the secret lies in the saying:

The husband sings and the wife follows.¹⁵

Where:

Beauty and virtue attract each other,

Affinities are mutually compatible,

The man admires the woman, and

The woman admires the man, one can, perhaps, be confident that there will be no problem. But, if the slightest distrust develops between them, it will soon turn into revulsion and hatred. As for the likes of Hua Tzu-hsü, who spent his days in:

Insensate dissipation, and Unrestrained license; for such a man to hope that his wife would not get other ideas into her head, was futile indeed. Truly:

If one's own resolution is supported,

There is no tempest that can shake it.¹⁶

There is a poem that testifies to this:

If success and accomplishment could be won by intelligence and effort;

In ancient times Tao Chih¹⁷ would have been made a marquis.

If one's actions are righteous, one is truly deserving of respect;

If one is lustful and uncaring, how can one fail to be ashamed?¹⁸

The scion of the Hsi-men family was given over to lust and dissipation;

His adulterous and fickle paramour was nothing but a captivating wench.

Hua Tzu-hsü became so engorged with rage
his tender guts gave way;

But another day, in the court of the underworld,
he would be revenged.

To make a long story short, Hua Tzu-hsü could only scrape together 250 taels of silver, with which he bought a house on Lion Street for them to live in. He was already suffering from the ill effects of his rage, and no sooner had they completed their move than he was unfortunate enough to come down with an acute intestinal fever.

He took to his bed early in the eleventh month and was unable to get up again thereafter. Li P'ing-erh responded to his entreaties by calling in Dr. Hu from Main Street, but later had to dispense with him in order to save money. From then on it was merely a matter of time.

One day became two,

Two days became three,

until finally, on the last day of the month:

Alas and alack;

He stopped breathing and died.

At the time of his death he was twenty-three years of age. No sooner had he taken to his bed than his eldest servant, T'ien-hsi, absconded with five taels of silver and vanished without leaving a trace.

Once Hua Tzu-hsü was dead, Li P'ing-erh lost no time in sending Old Mother Feng to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing over for a consultation. A casket was purchased, the encoffining ceremony completed, sutras were duly recited, and Hua Tzu-hsü's body was escorted out to the graveyard and buried. Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth, together with their wives, all came to offer their condolences, and after they had returned from accompanying the coffin to its final resting place they went their separate ways.

Hua Tzu-hsü Succumbs to Chagrin and Loses His Life

On the day of the funeral Hsi-men Ch'ing also had Wu Yüeh-niang arrange for a table of food and wine in their name so that they could offer a sacrifice at the graveside of the deceased.

That day, when Li P'ing-erh had returned home in her sedan chair, she procured a spirit tablet for her dead husband and set it up in her room. But, although she went through the motions of keeping vigil for him, all she could think of was Hsi-men Ch'ing. Even while Hua Tzu-hsü was still alive she had encouraged Hsi-men Ch'ing to make free with her two maidservants, and now that he was dead the two families became closer than ever.

Before long it was the ninth day of the first month and Li P'ing-erh had ascertained that it was P'an Chin-lien's birthday. Even though the fifth of the seven weekly commemorations of Hua Tzu-hsü's death had not yet been observed, she bought presents, got into her sedan chair, all dressed up in a white satin jacket over a skirt of blue brocade, with a white hempen snood over her chignon, held in place with a pearl headband, and came to pay a call in honor of Chin-lien's birthday. Old Mother Feng carried her felt bag, and T'ien-fu escorted her sedan chair.

The first thing she did after crossing the threshold was to kowtow to Wu Yüeh-niang four times:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, saying as she did so, "The other day at the graveside I'm afraid I provided you with but meager fare. And thank you very much for your lavish present."

After she had paid her respects to Yüeh-niang, she asked to be presented in turn to Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou. It was only then that P'an Chin-lien came in.

"So this is the Fifth Lady," the visitor exclaimed, as she kowtowed once again, repeating as she did so, "Elder Sister, please accept my salutation."

Chin-lien demurred at first and the two of them dickered politely for a while until they settled the matter by kowtowing to each other. Chin-lien thanked her for her birthday presents. The visitor was also introduced to Wu Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of her elder brother, Wu K'ai, and to Chin-lien's mother, Old Mrs. P'an.

Li P'ing-erh then asked to be allowed to pay her respects to Hsi-men Ch'ing, but Yüeh-niang told her, "Today he's gone to the Temple of the Jade Emperor outside the Eastern Gate to attend the chiao rites of cosmic renewal¹⁹ in honor of the Jade Emperor's birthday."

She urged her visitor to sit down, and another serving of tea was called for and consumed. After some time had passed, who should come wandering in but Sun Hsüeh-o.

Li P'ing-erh, observing that she was slightly less well dressed than the others, got up and asked, "Who might this lady be? Since I did not know of her, I'm afraid I didn't ask to be presented to her."

"She's just one of my husband's young ladies," said Yüeh-niang.

Li P'ing-erh Invites Seduction and Attends a Party

Li P'ing-erh hastily prepared to kowtow to her, but Yüeh-niang intervened, saying, "There's no need for you to go to all that trouble. A bow to each other will be quite sufficient."

When the two of them had finished saluting each other as directed, Yüeh-niang invited Li P'ing-erh into her own room to change her clothes and instructed a maidservant to set up a table in the parlor and serve tea.

Before long wine was brought in, and they:

Drew round the newly replenished brazier, and Decanted the finest Yang-kao²⁰ vintage.

Thereupon, Wu K'ai's wife, Old Mrs. P'an, and Li P'ing-erh, took the seats of honor, Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh assumed the role of hosts, Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien sat to one side, and Sun Hsüeh-o, not daring to presume on their company for too long, went back to look after things in the kitchen.

Yüeh-niang, observing that Li P'ing-erh never refused a drink, served a round of wine herself and then directed Li Chiao-erh and the others each to serve a round in turn.

They joshed with their guest freely, saying, "Mrs. Hua, you've moved so far away that we sisters must:

Spend more time apart than together."²¹

You no longer give us a thought. It would really be too cruel of you if you don't promise to visit us again."

"If it hadn't been for P'an the Sixth's birthday," said Meng Yü-lou, "you wouldn't even have come to see us today."

"My dear First Lady, and Third Lady," said Li P'ing-erh, "thanks to the kindness all of you have shown me, I've wanted to come and pay you a visit for a long time. But, on the one hand, I'm still in mourning, and on the other hand, after my poor husband's death, there's been no one to look after the place. In fact, I've hardly observed my husband's fifth weekly commemoration yet. If I hadn't been afraid of offending the Fifth Lady, I wouldn't have ventured to come today."

She then went on to ask, "First Lady, when does your birthday come?"

"It's a bit early yet for my birthday," said Yüeh-niang.

"The First Lady's birthday," said P'an Chin-lien, taking over the conversational lead, "is on the fifteenth day of the eighth month. I hope, whatever happens, you'll be able to come visit us then."

"Needless to say," said Li P'ing-erh, "I'll be sure to come."

"Now that you're here," said Meng Yü-lou, "why don't you give us the pleasure of your company by making a night of it, and not bothering to go home?"

"I really would welcome the chance to have a good talk with all of you," said Li P'ing-erh. "To tell you the truth, I find myself living in reduced circumstances, a newcomer to the neighborhood, and ever since my poor husband died, there's been no one to look after the place. The back wall of my house abuts on the garden of that distaff relative of the imperial family named Ch'iao. It's as desolate as can be, and at night there are often fox spirits about:

Pitching bricks and tossing tiles,"²² and I'm afraid. We used to have two page boys, but the eldest of them has run away. T'ien-fu, here, looks after the front gate, but the back of the house is completely deserted. I'm entirely dependent on Old Feng. She's been with me a long time, and she often comes over to do the laundry and help the maidservants make shoes. I'm really beholden to her."

"How old is Mother Feng?" asked Yüeh-niang. "She certainly looks like a good, dependable body. I've never even heard her raise her voice."

"She's fifty-five years old this year," said Li P'ing-erh. "She was born in the year of the dog. She has no children of her own, either male or female, and depends on matchmaking for her living. I supply her with clothes from time to time. Ever since the recent death of my poor husband I've asked her to come over and keep me company. At night she sleeps on the same k'ang with the maidservants."

"There you are," said P'an Chin-lien, who was always quick on the uptake, "as long as you've got Old Feng to look after the house for you, you might just as well spend the night here. After all, since Mr. Hua is dead, there's no longer anyone to tell you what to do."

"If you'll do as I say," said Meng Yü-lou, "you'll send Old Feng home with the sedan chair and forget about going yourself."

Li P'ing-erh only smiled, without uttering a sound.

As they were talking:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed.

Old Mrs. P'an was the first to get up and make her way toward the front of the compound. P'an Chin-lien then followed in her mother's wake and went off to her own quarters.

"I've already had enough wine," Li P'ing-erh kept insisting, as she refused to accept any more, but Li Chiao-erh said, "How is it that you've been willing enough to drink at the hands of the First Lady and the Third Lady, but when I offer you wine, you refuse to drink any? It's really too discriminatory."

Thereupon, she picked up a larger cup and proceeded to fill it.

"My dear Second Lady," protested Li P'ing-erh, "I really can't manage any more. I'm not just pretending."

"After you've finished this cup," said Yüeh-niang, "you can rest awhile."

Only then did Li P'ing-erh accept the proffered cup and put it down in front of her while she continued to engage them in animated conversation.

Meng Yü-lou, noticing that Ch'un-mei was standing to one side, asked her, "What's your mother doing up front, anyway? You go up there and invite both your mother and Old Mrs. P'an to come back here. Tell them that the First Lady invites them back to help her keep Mrs. Hua company while she drinks wine."

Ch'un-mei had not been gone for long when she returned and said, "Old Mrs. P'an is not feeling well and has gone to bed. Mother is in her room putting on her makeup. She'll be here any minute."

"I've never seen anything like it," said Yüeh-niang. "After all, you're one of the hostesses, and yet, before anyone even knows what you're up to, you abandon your guest and run off to your own room. I don't know how many times a day this sister of mine has to redo her face. Whenever she feels like it she runs off to do it again. She's fine enough in other respects, but about this one thing she's still rather childish."

While she was still speaking, who should appear but P'an Chin-lien. She was wearing a saffron-colored jacket of Lu-chou silk that opened down the middle and was decorated with a motif of wild geese holding bulrushes in their mouths. It had a stiff-standing white satin collar with purpled edging and gilt buttons that depicted honeybees rifling chrysanthemum blossoms. Beneath this she wore a drawnwork skirt with a foot-wide, gold-spangled border representing sea horses sporting in the waves, shoes of scarlet silk with high white satin heels, and figured ankle leggings. She also sported pendant onyx earrings and a pearl headband. In fact, she was dressed identically with Meng Yü-lou. Yüeh-niang, on the other hand, had on a scarlet silk jacket, a plain blue satin cloak, and a skirt of sand-green pongee, while on her head she wore a fret over her chignon, enclosed in a sable toque.

Meng Yü-lou was the first of the party to catch sight of Chin-lien as she made a conspicuous entrance:

Heavily made up and richly attired, with a gold pin in the shape of the character for long life carelessly stuck in the hair over her temple.

She proceeded to josh her, saying, "A fine wench you are, Slavey Five. You're the one who was you know what 'under a lucky star'²³ this very day, yet you've abandoned your guest and run off to hide in your room. And you call yourself a human being!"

Chin-lien laughed loudly and gave her a playful slap.

"You're a pretty nerry wench, Slavey Five," exclaimed Yü-lou. "It's your turn to offer our guest a drink."

"I've already had more than a little at the hands of the Third Lady," said Li P'ing-erh. "I've reached my limit."

"What you had to suffer at her hands is her business," said Chin-lien. "I, too, make bold to offer you a cup."

Thereupon, she tucked up her sleeves, filled a large cup to the brim, and presented it to Li P'ing-erh, who merely allowed it to sit in front of her, without venturing to take a drink.

Yüeh-niang, who had withdrawn into the master suite with her sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, came out and saw that Chin-lien had sat down to help entertain Li P'ing-erh.

"Why doesn't Old Mrs. P'an come out and provide some company for our guest?" she asked.

"My mother isn't feeling well," replied Chin-lien. "She's stretched out in my room, and even if you send for her, she won't come."

Yüeh-niang caught sight of one of the pins in the shape of the character for long life that was visible in the hair over Chin-lien's temple and asked Li P'ing-erh, "Where was this pair of pins that you gave Sister Six made? They're really very fine. In the future I'd like to get them reproduced so we could each have a pair to wear."

"If you'd like some, First Lady, I still have a few more of them at home," said Li P'ing-erh. "One day soon I'll send over an additional pair for each of you. They are made to imperial specifications and were smuggled out of the palace by the old eunuch, my late father-in-law. Workmanship of this kind is not to be found on the outside."

"I was only having a little joke at your expense," said Yüeh-niang. "There are such a lot of us, you could scarcely be expected to have that many to give away."

As the group of womenfolk continued to drink and amuse themselves, the sun was gradually sinking in the west. Old Mother Feng, who had been plied with wine in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters at the rear of the compound, came out with a very red face and urged Li P'ing-erh to make up her mind either to leave or, if not, to send the sedan chair back home.

"Don't go," said Yüeh-niang to her guest. "Just tell Old Feng to go home with the sedan chair."

Li P'ing-erh merely said, "There's no one to look after the place. I'll come again sometime soon to pay my respects to all of you. There'll be time enough for me to stay the night another day."

"Why be so insistent on having your own way?" said Meng Yü-lou. "It looks as though none of us carries much weight with you, but if you won't send the sedan chair off, just wait until Father comes home in a little while; you can be sure he'll try to persuade you to stay, too."

This argument had the effect of overcoming Li P'ing-erh's objections. Taking out the keys to the house, she handed them to Old Mother Feng, saying, "Since all these ladies are so insistent on my staying, if I were to refuse, it would only show that:

I didn't know a favor when I saw one.

You can dismiss the sedan chair for today, but tell the bearers to come back for me tomorrow. When you and the page boy get home, be careful not to let anyone into the house."

She also called Old Mother Feng over to her and:

Whispered into her ear in a low voice,

"Tell my head maid, Ying-ch'un, to get the keys to the trunk in my bedroom and take four pairs of pins in the shape of the character for long life out of the small jewelry box with the gold tracery on it. Bring these to me first thing tomorrow morning. I want to give them to the four ladies here."

When Old Mother Feng had received her instructions she took formal leave of Yüeh-niang.

"Have something to drink before you go," Yüeh-niang said.

"I've had both food and wine just now in the quarters of the young lady at the rear of the compound," said Old Mother Feng. "I'll be back first thing tomorrow morning."

Whereupon, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,
she made her exit. But no more of this.

Shortly thereafter, when Li P'ing-erh refused to have anything more to drink, Yüeh-niang invited her into the master suite to have some tea with her sister-in-law.

All of a sudden, who should come in but the page boy, Tai-an, carrying his master's felt bag. Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home, and his first words upon lifting aside the portiere and entering the room were, "So Mrs. Hua is here."

Li P'ing-erh jumped hastily to her feet and the two of them exchanged salutations, after which she sat back down again. Yüeh-niang called Yü-hsiao to help Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his things.

Turning to Wu K'ai's wife and Li P'ing-erh, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Today I've been attending the chiao rites of cosmic renewal in celebration of the birthday of the Jade Emperor at his temple outside the Eastern Gate. It was my turn to preside this year. Otherwise, I would have come home after the vegetarian feast at noon. As a consequence I had to join the others in going over the accounts in Abbot Wu's room and, what with one thing and another, have been tied up all this time."

He then went on to ask, "I take it that Mrs. Hua is not going to go home today?"

"She kept refusing our invitations and proposing to leave," said Meng Yü-lou, "until, by combining our efforts, we carried the day by main force."

"There's no one to look after the place," said Li P'ing-erh. "I can't help worrying about it."

"Don't talk such rot!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The night patrols have been very strict recently. What is there to be afraid of anyway?"

If the wind so much as stirs a blade of grass, all I'd have to do is send a note to Commandant Chou Hsiu and he'd:

Act upon it even in defiance of the law."²⁴

"Why have you been neglecting Mrs. Hua so?" he added. "Has she been given anything to drink, or hasn't she?"

"All of us have been trying our hands at persuading her," said Meng Yü-lou, "but she affects an inability to drink."

"You're not up to the task," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Let me give it a try. She's got no mean capacity."

Although Li P'ing-erh said the words, "I can't handle any more," she made no effort to withdraw.

Thereupon, the maidservants were instructed to reset the table and an elaborate spread of meat and vegetable dishes, along with other dainties of every kind, which had been prepared in anticipation of Hsi-men Ch'ing's return, was laid before them. Sister-in-law Wu, sensing that the time had come to take flight, asserted that she did not wish to have any more wine and withdrew to Li Chiao-erh's quarters to get out of the way.

Thereupon, Li P'ing-erh was seated in the place of honor, Hsi-men Ch'ing drew up a chair across from her and assumed the role of host, Wu Yüeh-niang sat on the k'ang with her feet on the frame of the brazier, and Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien sat down at the other two sides of the table. As soon as the five of them had taken their places they started to decant the wine. They didn't use small cups either, but called for large goblets of chased silver.

It was a case of:

First a cup for you,

Then a cup for me.

As the saying goes:

Romantic affairs are consummated over tea, and Wine is the go-between of lust.

As the cups passed back and forth, the woman continued to drink until:

Her painted eyebrows drooped low, and Amorous glances escaped the corners of her eyes.

Truly:

A pair of peach blossoms bloomed upon her cheeks,²⁵

Her brows and eyes proclaiming her a wanton wench.

When Yüeh-niang saw that the two of them were:

As stuck on one another as sugar candy,²⁶

and that:

The conversation was becoming rather risqué,²⁷

she found it so offensive that she withdrew to her own room and sent for her sister-in-law to keep her company, leaving the other three to entertain their guest.

They continued drinking until the third watch. By that time Li P'ing-erh's:

Starry eyes were all a blur.

Hardly able to stand on her own legs, she asked Chin-lien to accompany her to the bathroom in the rear of the compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, too, was:

Swaying to the east and tumbling to the west, as he went into Yüeh-niang's room to ask her where they should put their guest for the night.

"Let her sleep in the room of the one whose birthday she came to celebrate," said Yüeh-niang.

"Where shall I spend the night, then?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Spend the night wherever you like," said Yüeh-niang. "Or, better yet, go spend it with her if you want."

"Whoever heard of such a thing?" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he called for Hsiao-yü to help him off with his clothes. "I'll sleep in here tonight, then."

"Don't be so delirious," said Yüeh-niang. "Or do you want to provoke me into a real tirade? If you stay here, where do you suppose my sister-in-law is going to sleep?"

"Enough! Enough!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll go and sleep with Meng the Third." Whereupon, he went off to Yü-lou's quarters to spend the night.

After she had accompanied Li P'ing-erh to the bathroom, P'an Chin-lien took her up to her own quarters in the front part of the compound, and that night she shared a bed with Old Mrs. P'an.

The next morning Li P'ing-erh got up and was combing her hair in front of the mirror when Ch'un-mei brought her some hot water to wash her face and helped her with her toilet. She noticed how clever Ch'un-mei was and, knowing that she was a maidservant who had enjoyed Hsi-men Ch'ing's sexual favors, she made her a present of a gold chatelaine with three pendant charms in the shape of three miniature toilet articles.

Ch'un-mei immediately reported this gift to her mistress and Chin-lien was profuse in her thanks, saying, "I've put you to the additional expense of being so generous to her."

"You really are lucky, Fifth Lady, to have such a fine maid," said Li P'ing-erh.

That morning Chin-lien had Ch'un-mei open the gate to the garden and took Li P'ing-erh and Old Mrs. P'an on an extended tour of the entire premises.

Li P'ing-erh noticed that a gate had been opened in the wall that had formerly separated Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence from hers, and asked, "When is Father Hsi-men going to start construction on the new building?"

"Recently he had the yin-yang master come over to give him an appraisal," said Chin-lien. "He's planning to:

Break ground and start construction,

Put it up and top it off, in the second month. He's going to tear down your old house and combine the two pieces of property into one, erect an artificial hill and a summer-house in the front, and make a large garden out of it. Then he's planning to build another three-room belvedere, to be called the Flower-viewing Tower, which will be lined up with my own to form one boundary of the grounds."

Li P'ing-erh made a mental note of everything she was told.

While the two of them were still talking together, Yüeh-niang sent Hsiao-yü to invite them back to the rear of the compound for some tea. The three of them then made their way to the master suite where they found Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, and Meng Yü-lou keeping Sister-in-law Wu company as they waited for them, with the tea things already laid out.

Just as everyone was enjoying the tea and the snacks that accompanied it, who should suddenly appear but Old Mother Feng. When they had offered her a seat and served her some tea, Old Mother Feng pulled an old kerchief out of her sleeve, in which the four pairs of pins in the shape of the character for long life were wrapped, and handed it to Li P'ing-erh. No sooner had she accepted them than she presented one pair to Yüeh-niang, and afterward, a pair each to Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and Sun Hsüeh-o.

"These must have cost you a pretty penny," said Yüeh-niang. "This will never do."

"My dear First Lady," laughed Li P'ing-erh, "It's not as though they were genuine rarities. I'm only offering them to you to give away to someone if you like."

Yüeh-niang and the others bowed in gratitude before venturing to stick the pins in their hair.

"I hear that your front door opens right on the Lantern Market," said Yüeh-niang. "It must be quite exciting. If we go for a look at the lanterns someday soon, we'll come pay you a visit. Pray don't pretend you're not at home."

"Let me extend an invitation to all of you ladies for that day," said Li P'ing-erh.

"You may not know it, elder sister," said Chin-lien, "but I've heard that the fifteenth is actually our guest's birthday."

"That settles it," said Yüeh-niang. "If it's really your birthday, every last one of us will come to wish you many happy returns."

"My humble abode is scarcely fit to accommodate a snail," laughed Li P'ing-erh, "but if you ladies deign to visit me, consider yourselves invited."

It was not long before they finished their morning repast, after which wine was served and they fell to drinking again. The time passed swiftly as they enjoyed each other's company until the sun began to sink in the west and the sedan chair came back to pick her up. Li P'ing-erh said her farewells, and her sorority of hostesses could not persuade her to stay any longer. Before leaving, she asked if she might be permitted to say good-bye to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"He had to get up early this morning," said Yüeh-niang, "and go outside the city gate to see off the district vice-magistrate."

Only then, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude, did Li P'ing-erh get into her sedan chair and go home. Truly:

The coupled halves of the peach stone
serve to evoke a chuckle;

Because inside, it will be found, lie

yet another couple.²⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 15

BEAUTIES ENJOY THE SIGHTS IN THE LANTERN-VIEWING BELVEDERE; HANGERS-ON ABET DEBAUCHERY IN THE VERDANT SPRING BORDELLO¹

As the sun sinks amid the western hills,
the moon rises in the east;
Even the span of a hundred years is like wind-blown tumbleweed.
Before one knows it, the red-cheeked lad
one so admires,
In the twinkling of an eye turns into a white-haired gentleman.
Do not waste the fullness of your youth, so quickly does it pass;²
Even Heaven-scaling wealth and success are as evanescent as clouds.
One might as well seek to divert oneself
among scarlet skirts;
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red in houses of pleasure.

THE STORY goes that:

Light and darkness alternate swiftly, and before anyone knew it, the fifteenth day of the first month was at hand. The day before, Hsi-men Ch'ing sent his page boy, Tai-an, to deliver four trays of preserved fruit, two trays of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, a jug of wine, a tray of birthday noodles, and a set of heavy silk brocade clothing to Li P'ing-erh in honor of her birthday. The gifts were sent in Wu Yüeh-niang's name, accompanied by a card that read, "Respectfully presented with straightened skirts by the lady, née Wu, of the Hsi-men household."

Li P'ing-erh had just gotten up and was still engaged in doing her toilet. Calling Tai-an into her bedroom, she said, "I'm afraid I imposed upon your First Lady's hospitality the other day, and now she has gone to the further trouble of sending me these gifts."

"Mother sends her greetings," said Tai-an, "and Father sends his greetings too. They told me to say, 'It's only a little something for you to give away to someone if you like,'"

Li P'ing-erh told Ying-ch'un to set up a small table outside in the parlor. There Tai-an was entertained with tea and four little boxes of delicacies. As he was about to leave, she gave him two mace of silver and a handkerchief of shot silk decorated with the symbolic representations of the "eight treasures."

"When you get home," she said, "please convey my greetings to all the ladies of the house. I'll send Old Mother Feng around with written invitations. Whatever happens, I hope they will all condescend to pay me a visit tomorrow."

When Tai-an kowtowed and went outside she also gave him a hundred cash for the two carriers who had brought the boxes containing her presents.

Li P'ing-erh lost no time in dispatching Old Mother Feng with a letter box containing five written invitations, inviting Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Sun Hsüeh-o to visit her on the fifteenth. At the same time she also sent Hsi-men Ch'ing a private note asking him to drop in on her later that evening to help celebrate her birthday.

The next day Wu Yüeh-niang, having told Sun Hsüeh-o to stay behind and look after the house, set out with Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien in four sedan chairs. All of them were dressed in clothing of figured brocade. Accompanied by the page boys Lai-hsing, P'ing-an,³ Tai-an, and Hua-t'ung, they arrived in front of Li P'ing-erh's newly purchased house, which was located in the Lantern Market on Lion Street.

The house consisted of a twenty-four-foot-wide frontage and three interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis. The first part of the building was a two-story structure with windows on the upper floor that opened directly over the street. Inside the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard there was a row of three rooms on either side and a formal reception hall. A passageway through an antechamber led into the third courtyard, which contained three bedrooms and a kitchen. The open space behind the third courtyard, abutted directly on the garden of a distaff relative of the imperial family named Ch'iao.

Li P'ing-erh, knowing that Wu Yüeh-niang and the others were coming to see the lanterns, had furnished the second-story room that overlooked the street with standing screens, chairs and tables, and an array of decorated lanterns. She first ushered her guests into the formal reception hall and then, after they had performed the customary exchange of greetings, invited them back to the parlor in the rear courtyard for some tea. When they had finished changing their clothes in her room, tea was served, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

At noontime Li P'ing-erh invited her guests to return to the reception hall where four place settings had been provided and two singing girls, named Tung Chiao-erh and Han Chin-ch'uan, had been engaged to entertain them as they enjoyed the feast. After: Five rounds of wine had been consumed; and Three main courses had been served,

Wu Yüeh-niang and the others were invited to go up to the second-story room that overlooked the street to enjoy the display of lanterns as they continued their feast.

Hanging blinds of speckled bamboo had been let down under the eaves, from which an array of brightly colored lanterns were suspended. Wu Yüeh-niang was wearing a full-sleeved jacket of figured scarlet material, a stylish green silk skirt, and a sable cloak. Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien all wore white satin jackets and blue silk skirts, over which Li Chiao-erh also wore a brocaded aloeswood-colored vest, Meng Yü-lou a brocaded green vest, and P'an Chin-lien a brocaded scarlet vest. On their heads: Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;

Phoenix hairpins were half askew, while, from just behind the hair over their temples, there dangled innumerable pendant earrings in the shape of miniature lanterns of every description.

Leaning out of the windows of the second-story room, they looked down on the Lantern Market below where: Crowds of people had congregated; and

The merrymaking was at its height.

Several tens of elaborate lantern-stands had been erected in the street, and peddlers were busy hawking their wares on all sides.

The men and women come to see the lanterns;
Were red as flowers and green as willows.
Carriages and horses rumbled like thunder;
Hills of lanterns soared into the Milky Way.⁴
What did this wonderful Lantern Market look like? Behold:
Insinuating themselves among the mountain rocks, a pair of dragons sports in the water;
Concealed amid the sunset clouds, a solitary crane ascends to the heavens.
Golden Lotus lanterns,
Tower of Jade lanterns,
Scintillate like a cluster of pearls;
Lotus blossom lanterns,
Hibiscus lanterns,
Scatter a thousand embroidered rosettes.⁵
Hydrangea lanterns,
Are chaste and immaculate;
Snowflake lanterns,
Are tumbled and tossed.
Scholar lanterns,
Bow and scrape, advance and retreat,
Preserving the manners of Confucius and Mencius;
Housewife lanterns,
Display virtuous demeanors and gentle dispositions,
Emulating the fidelity and resolve of Meng Chiang.⁶
There is a Buddhist monk lantern,
Depicting Yüeh-ming and the courtesan Liu Ts'ui;⁷
And an underworld assessor lantern,
Showing Chung K'uei seated with his little sister.⁸
There is a shamaness lantern,
Fluttering her feathered fan,
Pretending to subdue evil spirits;
And a Liu Hai lantern,
Bearing the golden three-footed toad on his back,
As it gobbles its string of cash.⁹
There are camel lanterns,
And green lion lanterns,
Bearing priceless rarities,
Snorting and roaring;
As well as gibbon lanterns,
And white elephant lanterns,
Proffering treasures fit to ransom cities,
Gamboling and playing.
All arms and legs,
Crab lanterns,
Cavort in the clear waves;
With gaping mouths and long beards,
Catfish lanterns,
Gulp down green algae.

Silver moths vie with one another in brilliance,
 Snowy willows compete with each other in beauty;
 Pair by pair, they follow in the wake of brocade sashes and dangling pomanders,
 Branch by branch, they brush against decorated pennants and turquoise carriage curtains.¹⁰
 Fish and dragons sport on the sand,
 As the Seven Perfected Ones and the Five Ancients¹¹ present their vermilion texts;
 Tasseled portieres are suspended,
 While the Nine Barbarians and the Eight Tribes come to offer their tribute.
 Parading village mummers, Troupe after troupe, drum up a dreadful din;
 Peddlers of toys and knickknacks,
 Item by item, tout the uniqueness of their wares.
 Among the revolving lanterns,
 One comes, the other goes;
 Amid the suspended lanterns,
 One bobs up, another down.
 There are vitreous vases,
 Depicting only a beautiful woman or rare flower;
 As well as mica screens,
 Portraying paradises on both mountains and seas.
 To the east,
 There are bedsteads of carved lacquer,
 And bedsteads of inlaid mother-of-pearl,
 The golds and greens of which blend their hues;
 To the west,
 There are lanterns spangled with gold,
 And lanterns striped with colors,
 Producing brocade effects that dazzle the eye.
 To the north,
 There are exhibited antiques and curios;
 To the south,
 Calligraphy, painting, vases, and incense burners.
 Patrician youths are out in force,
 From beneath low balustrades their kickballs rise into the clouds;
 Wellborn young ladies escort each other,
 As within lofty belvederes they show off their good looks.
 The booths of the fortune-tellers are massed like clouds,
 The stalls of the physiognomists are arrayed like stars;
 They are prepared to expatiate on one's fortune
 in the impending spring,
 Or determine the success or failure of a lifetime with sure precision.
 Then there are those,
 Professional storytellers,
 Who, standing on a slope,
 Relate in doggerel and song the exploits of Yang Yeh;¹²
 And see those others,
 Itinerant Buddhist monks,
 Who, clapping their sounding cymbals,
 Elaborate upon the adventures of Tripitaka.¹³
 The sellers of Lantern Festival dumplings,
 Make imposing piles of their ingredients;
 The makers of artificial plum blossoms,
 Attach them ubiquitously to dead branches.
 Paper cutouts of spring moths,
 Stuck rakishly in the hair over the temples,
 quiver in the east wind;
 Gold-flecked gimcrack hairpins,

Twinkle atop chignons with a glitter that rivals the sun's.
Standing screens depict the extravagant Shih Ch'ung and his brocaded windbreak;¹⁴
Beaded portieres display the twin perfections of plum blossom and moonlight.
Though the attractions of the hills of lanterns cannot be exhaustively enumerated;
They surely must portend a bumper harvest and a happy year to come.

Wu Yüeh-niang contemplated the spectacle for a while, after which, observing that the crowd below was getting rowdy, she and Li Chiao-erh withdrew to the table and sat down to enjoy their wine. P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou, however, along with the two singing girls, continued to lean out over the windowsills and gaze at the scene below. P'an Chin-lien went so far as to tuck up the sleeves of her white satin jacket, revealing the brocaded lining and exposing her ten slender fingers, which sported six gold stirrup-shaped rings. Leaning halfway out the window, she cracked melon seeds with her teeth and spit the empty shells onto the heads of the people below. All the while she and Meng Yü-lou maintained a steady stream of laughter and banter.

One minute she called out, "Elder Sister, come and see. Look at the two hydrangea lanterns hanging from the eaves of the house over there: One comes, the other goes;

Bobbing up, bobbing down.

They're really something to see."

The next minute she said, "Second Sister, come and see. On the stand just across the street there's a big fish lantern with all kinds of small fry, turtles, shrimp, crabs, and so forth, tagging at its heels. They're really fun to watch."

A minute later she called to Meng Yü-lou, saying, "Third Sister, just look at the old lady lantern and the old man lantern over here."

As she spoke, a sudden gust of wind blew up and tore a gaping hole in the abdomen of the old lady lantern. When Chin-lien saw what had happened she laughed uproariously.

This had the effect of attracting the attention of the sightseers below.

Rubbing shoulders and nudging backs,

Lifting their heads and gazing upward;

Jammed together into an indivisible mass,

Treading on one another's heels, in no time at all a considerable crowd of onlookers had gathered. Among them were to be found some dissolute young scamps who were not averse to offering their own assessments of the situation.

One said, "They must be dependents of some princely or noble household on an outing."

Another hazarded, "They must be the seductive concubines of some relative of the imperial family, come to see the lanterns. Otherwise, what are they doing dressed in palace style?"

Another ventured, "They must be whores from the licensed quarter that some big spender has engaged to entertain him while he enjoys the lanterns."

Still another strolled over and said, "I'm the only one who can identify them. None of you will ever guess right. If you take them for whores, how do you account for the other four at the back? I'll tell you who they are: those two women don't belong to just anybody. They might as well be mates of King Yama himself or concubines of the General of the Five Ways. They're the womenfolk of the Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing who owns the wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen and engages in moneylending to both officials and functionaries. You'd be well-advised to leave them alone. They must have come here along with his wife to see the lanterns.

"The one wearing the brocaded green vest I don't recognize, but the one wearing the brocaded scarlet vest with the turquoise beauty patch on her face looks like the wife of Wu the Elder who used to peddle steamed wheat cakes on the street. When Wu the Elder tried to catch her in the act of adultery in Dame Wang's teashop, the Honorable Gentleman just mentioned gave him such a kick that he died of the effects, after which he took her into his household as a concubine. Later on, her brother-in-law, Wu Sung, came back from the Eastern Capital and lodged a complaint against him, but ended up killing the lictor, Li Wai-ch'uan, by mistake, so that Hsi-men Ch'ing was able to get his assailant condemned to military exile, while he himself got out of the affair completely unscathed. She hasn't shown herself in public for the last year or two, but she's looking better than ever."

At this point another busybody chimed in, saying, "What's the point of wasting our time talking about the likes of them? Let's move along."

When Wu Yüeh-niang, from her vantage point in the upstairs room, became aware that a large crowd had assembled below, she told Chin-lien and Yü-lou to come back and join her at the table, where they listened to the two singing girls perform songs in celebration of the lantern festival while they drank their wine.

Beauties Enjoy the Sights in the Lantern-viewing Belvedere

After a while, Yüeh-niang indicated that she was ready to make her departure by saying to her hostess, "I've had enough to drink. The Second Lady and I will go ahead home, but we'll leave our two sisters behind to keep you company a little longer and show our appreciation for your hospitality. Our husband isn't at home today, so there's no one to look after the place. When only the maidservants are there, I can't help worrying about it."

Li P'ing-erh could hardly let them go without a protest.

"My dear First Lady," she said, "I've scarcely had a chance to show my respects to you. Since your arrival today I haven't even had the opportunity to help you to a proper serving of anything. It's a festival occasion, after all, and yet you want to go home before the lanterns are lit or dinner is served. Even if Father Hsi-men is out today, as long as the young ladies are there, what is there to worry about? Wait until the moon rises, at least, and I'll see you all home myself."

"It's not that," said Yüeh-niang. "It's just that I'm not accustomed to drinking so much. If I leave my two sisters behind it will be just as though I were here myself."

"Even if you don't want any more yourself," said Li P'ing-erh, "that's no reason why the Second Lady shouldn't have another cup. The other day, at your house, I accepted cup after cup without demur, and you ladies refused to let me off. Now that you've been good enough to visit these cramped quarters of mine, though I have nothing to offer, you must let me do the best I can."

Thereupon, she took a large silver goblet and handed it to Li Chiao-erh, saying, "Second Lady, you must have a cup, no matter what. I know the First Lady has had enough, so I don't dare offer her a big one, but only a little one."

So saying, she filled a cup to the brim and offered it to Yüeh-niang, and then did the same for Li Chiao-erh, encouraging her as she did so with the words, "Second Lady, do drain this cup."

Yüeh-niang gave two mace of silver to each of the singing girls, and then, after waiting for Li Chiao-erh to finish her wine, got up to go.

Turning to Yü-lou and Chin-lien, she said, "The two of us will go on ahead. When we get home, I'll send a page boy back with a lantern to fetch you. Do come home then; there's no one to look after the place."

Yü-lou assented to this suggestion. Li P'ing-erh then saw Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh out the door and into their sedan chairs before returning upstairs to keep Yü-lou and Chin-lien company as they continued to drink wine. Gradually, as it grew late: The jade hare rose in the east,¹⁵ and the lanterns on the second floor were lit. The singing girls entertained them with songs as they drank their wine. But no more of this.

To resume our story, that day Hsi-men Ch'ing had invited Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta to dine with him at home, after which they set out together to enjoy the sights in the Lantern Market. When they arrived at the eastern end of Lion Street Hsi-men Ch'ing, because he knew that Yüeh-niang and the others were being entertained in the front second floor room of Li P'ing-erh's house and he didn't want his companions to see them, did not proceed to the western end of the street where the big lanterns were displayed, but came to a halt when he had gotten no further than the shop that sold gauze lanterns.

No sooner had he turned around than he ran into Blabbermouth Sun and Sticky Chu, who saluted him with the words, "We haven't seen you for ages, Brother, but you've been very much in our thoughts."

Seeing that he was accompanied by Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, they upbraided them, saying, "A goddamned fine couple of fellows you are; going out on the town with our elder brother without giving us the word!"

"Brother Chu," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you're doing them an injustice. We've only just run into each other on the street."

"Well now, where are you headed, then, after you've seen the lanterns?" asked Sticky Chu.

"We might as well go to the Great Tavern right here on Lion Street and have a few drinks together," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'd invite you all home with me if it weren't for the fact that my womenfolk are all out at a party today."

"Rather than letting you treat us to a round at the tavern," said Sticky Chu, "why don't we all go into the licensed quarter together and pay a visit to Li Kuei-chieh? It's only appropriate on a festival occasion like this that we should go wish her a happy new year and have some fun together. The other day when we were over at her place she appealed to us, and actually broke down and cried, saying that ever since she became indisposed last month not even your shadow has been into the quarter to see her. All we could do was to say that you must be busy in order to cover up for you. Since you're free today, we'll be happy to accompany you inside to pay her a visit."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was preoccupied by his assignation with Li P'ing-erh later that evening, tried to excuse himself, saying, "I'm afraid I can't make it today; I've got something to do. How about tomorrow?"

But he was quite unable to withstand the urgings of his cronies who: Dragged him off, dead or alive. Thereupon, he consented to go into the licensed quarter with them. Truly: The shadows of the flowers under the willows hold down the dust on the road;

Each time one sets out to enjoy them one's pleasure is renewed.
If one could only assess the sums spent for a smile in the metropolis;
Who knows how many commoners' households
they would serve to support?¹⁶

When Hsi-men Ch'ing and his companions arrived at the Li family establishment they found Li Kuei-ch'ing, all made up, standing in the doorway. She ushered them into the main room and greeted each of them in turn.

Sticky Chu then called out in a loud voice, "Invite Auntie Li the Third to come out at once! It's only thanks to our combined efforts that we've induced the Honorable Gentleman to pay you a visit."

Before long, the old procuress made her appearance, hobbling along with the aid of a stick.

After they had finished with the appropriate amenities, she said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I hope we haven't been remiss in the entertainment we've provided you, Kinsman. How is it that you haven't dropped in to see my daughter for such a long time? You must have taken up with a new sweetheart somewhere else."

"You've hit the nail on the head, madam," interjected Sticky Chu. "The Honorable Gentleman has recently had his eye on another tart of incomparable beauty and has been spending all his free time at her place. He doesn't give a thought to your Kuei-chieh any longer. In fact, if the two of us hadn't run into him in the Lantern Market just now and dragged him along with us, he wouldn't be here now. If you don't believe me, just ask Blabbermouth Sun here." Then, pointing at Ying

Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, he continued, "And this goddamned pair, for their part, are: Deities of the same persuasion."¹⁷

When the old procuress heard these words she cackled out loud, saying, "Well, Brother Ying, we've never done anything to get on the wrong side of you. Why don't you use your good offices to put in a word for us with our kinsman here? However complicated his affairs in the quarter may be, as the saying goes: A practiced profligate doesn't confine his attentions to a single whore;

A practiced whore doesn't reserve her blandishments for a single patron.

The hole in the cash has much the same shape wherever you find it.

There's no need for me to boast about our Kuei-chieh's looks. The gentleman has eyes of his own and doesn't require anyone to point out the obvious to him."

"To tell the truth," interposed Blabbermouth Sun, "this new tart that Brother's taken up with isn't even an inhabitant of the quarter. She's an outsider who doesn't give a fuck for the insiders."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he chased Blabbermouth Sun around the room, pretending to hit him, exclaiming as he did so, "Madam, don't pay any attention to this: Goddamned and man-condemned,¹⁸ old oily mouth! All he ever does is plague people to death."

This exhibition only caused Blabbermouth Sun and the rest to collapse in a heap with laughter.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to pull three tael of silver out of his sleeve and hand them to Li Kuei-ch'ing, saying, "On this festival occasion I'd like to stand my friends a treat."

"I really couldn't agree to such a thing," Kuei-ch'ing affected to reply. "Give it to my mother."

"How now?" Auntie Li responded. "My kinsman must think so little of us that he doesn't think we can afford to furnish a feast, even on a festival occasion, for the entertainment of his distinguished friends. If you have to reach into your own pocket to defray the expenses, it will look as though we denizens of the licensed quarter are only interested in money after all."

At this juncture Ying Po-chüeh interrupted her, saying, "Auntie, if I were you I'd take what you're offered. As the saying goes: Don't risk your luck by refusing the first gleanings of the New Year: stash them away.

Just bring on the wine, now, as quickly as you can."

"That will never do," said the procuress, but even as she persisted in her protestations she accepted the silver and slipped it into her sleeve.

Making a deep bow, she said, "Thank you for your generosity, Kinsman."

"Wait a minute, Auntie," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I've got a story for you. A certain young man was having an affair with a prostitute in the licensed quarter. One day, just for the fun of it, he disguised himself as a pauper and paid a visit to his regular establishment. When the madam saw how shabby his clothing was, she paid him no attention and let him sit there for some time without even offering him a cup of tea. The young man said, 'Auntie, I'm hungry. If you've got any rice, please bring me something to eat.' To which the old procuress replied, 'The bin is completely dry. Where would I get you any rice from?' 'Since you're out of rice,' the young man said, 'If you have any water, please bring me a little to wash my face with.' To which the old procuress replied, 'We haven't been able to pay the water carrier, so he hasn't delivered any water the last few days.' At this, the young man reached into his sleeve, pulled out a silver ingot weighing ten taels, put it on the table in front of him, and told her to buy rice and order water with it. This flustered the old procuress so much that she blurted out, 'Kinsman, would you rather eat your face before washing your rice, or wash your rice before eating your face?'"

Everyone laughed uproariously at this.

"I see you're still as quick to make fun of people as ever," said Auntie Li. "It so happens that, as the saying goes: Such a thing may be said, but It ain't necessarily so."

"Lend an ear," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I've got something else to tell you. The Honorable Gentleman has recently engaged the services of Brother Hua the Second's former sweetheart, Wu Yin-erh, from the back alley of the quarter. He isn't interested in your Kuei-chieh any longer. If we hadn't dragged him along with us today, do you think he'd be here now?"

"I don't believe you," laughed the procuress. "Our Kuei-chieh can be said, without exaggeration, to be superior to Wu Yin-erh in every way. Our establishment and our kinsman's family are bound together by ties that: The sharpest knife could never sever.

What do you take our kinsman for, anyway? He's seen enough of the world, if you get right down to it, to know the value of true gold when he sees it."

When they had finished with their palaver, four folding armchairs were set up in the parlor, on which Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Sticky Chu, and Blabbermouth Sun sat down, in the positions of honor, while Hsi-men Ch'ing assumed the place of host, across from them. The old lady then excused herself in order to supervise the preparation of the wine and accompanying delicacies for the party.

Sometime after her departure, Li Kuei-chieh herself finally appeared. Her hair was done up in a casual "bag of silk" chignon in the Hang-chou style, fastened in place with a gold filigree pin. Her coiffure was further augmented by plum-blossom-shaped ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays, a pearl headband, and gold lantern earrings. She was wearing a white satin jacket that opened down the middle, with purpled edging and green brocade sleeve linings, over a red silk skirt. Indeed, she was so made up as to look as though she were: Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.

After having:

Neither correctly nor precisely, made a bow to the company and uttered a word of greeting, Kuei-chieh sat down with Kuei-ch'ing at the two unoccupied ends of the table. Before long, one of the girls of the establishment brought in seven cups of tea on a square tray of painted lacquer. The teacups were the color of snowy linen, the silver teaspoons were in the shape of apricot leaves, and the tea itself, which was flavored with attar of roses and the kernels of melon seeds, was of a bewitching fragrance. Kuei-ch'ing and Kuei-chieh served a cup to each of their guests and kept them company until the tea was finished and the raised saucers were cleared away.

A servant then came in to wipe off the table and began to lay out the delicacies to go with the wine. Just at this juncture, from behind the hanging blind over the door, a number of shabbily dressed young men, known to the trade as "cribbers," were observed: Sticking out their heads and craning their necks, awaiting the right moment to make their way inside and kneel down in front of the company.

They held three or four pints of melon seeds in their hands, which they presented to the host with the words, "A humble offering to Your Honor on this festival occasion."

Hsi-men Ch'ing recognized their leader as a fellow called Yü Ch'un, or Stupid Yü, and asked him, "Which of you are here today?"

"Tuan Mien, or Half-baked Tuan, Sha San, or Yokel Sha, and Nieh Yüeh, or Tiptoe Nieh, are just outside," replied Stupid.

Half-baked Tuan and the others then came inside and, noticing that Ying Po-chüeh was one of the company, kowtowed to him, saying, "Master Ying, you're here too."

Hsi-men Ch'ing stood up, announced that he would take the melon seeds, and then, rummaging in his purse for a tael's worth of silver, tossed it on the floor.

When Stupid Yü had picked it up, he and his companions kowtowed on their hands and knees, saying, "Thank you for your generosity, sir," and beat a hasty retreat.

There is a song to the tune "Imperial Audience" that describes the conduct of these "cribbers."

Assembling at one place,
Congregating at another,
Their status may be low, but their pretensions are great.
If you rub them the wrong way, they'll give you a hard time.
No part of the licensed quarter is off their beat.
At parties they'll join the fun,
Ever ready with idle conversation;

Only after doing their turn will they disperse.
The money they make isn't much, So why do they make such a fuss?
They live off the spittle licked from the tiger's mouth.¹⁹

As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing had gotten rid of the "cribbers," wine was served and the party settled down to drink. Kuei-chieh: Filled the golden cups to the brim, Dangling her pair of red sleeves.
Dainties were prepared of the rarest kind,
Fruits were provided just in season.
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,
The flowers were gorgeous and the wine heady.

After:

Two rounds of wine had been consumed,
Kuei-ch'ing and Kuei-chieh, one playing the psaltery and the other the p'i-p'a, accompanied themselves as they sang the song suite on the beauties of spring, the first number of which, to the tune "Flowers in Brocade," begins with the words: The fair weather is balmy.²⁰

Just as they were in full voice, three young men appeared, wearing black clothing and brown leather boots, who were known to the trade as "ball clubbers."

They held a gift box containing a roast goose and two bottles of vintage wine in their hands, which they presented to the company, after making a half obeisance, with the words, "A humble offering to Your Honor and his distinguished friends on this festival occasion."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was already acquainted with them. The first was called Pai T'u-tzu, or Baldy Pai, also known as Mohammedan Pai, the second, Hsiao Chang Hsien, or Trifler Chang, and the third, Lo Hui-tzu, or Mohammedan Lo.

"Wait outside a little while," he said to them, "until we've finished our wine. Then we'll come out and kick three rounds with you."

So saying, he sent them on their way with four plates of delicacies from the table, a large jug of wine, and a saucerful of savories for their refreshment.

When the "ball clubbers" had eaten their fill and inflated their ball, Hsi-men Ch'ing came outside and played a round of kick-about with them in the courtyard. After him it was Kuei-chieh's turn, and she joined a pair of them to form a triangular threesome in which the other two faced off as receivers to field her endeavors. As she did her best to "hook" and "chip" with her kicks, they were lavish with meretricious praise, and whenever she made a mistake they were quick to retrieve the ball for her.

Hangers-on Abet Debauchery in the Verdant Spring Bordello

When they were through, they made up to Hsi-men Ch'ing in the hope of reward, saying, "Kuei-chieh's 'ball-handling' is more professional than ever. When she 'volleys' with a 'flick pass' or a 'chip kick' we hardly know what to do with ourselves. In another year or two she and her sister will rank among the best 'ball-handlers' on this side of the quarter. There won't be another 'hooker' or 'chippy' in the same league. Already they're ten times better than the girls from the Tung establishment on Second Street."

By the time Kuei-chieh had kicked two rounds:

Dust had settled about her eyebrows,
Sweat had moistened her cheeks;

She was panting and puffing, and
Her limbs ached with exhaustion.

Extracting a folding fan from her sleeve, she endeavored to cool herself with it while she stood hand-in-hand with Hsi-men Ch'ing and watched Kuei-ch'ing engage Hsieh Hsi-ta and Trifler Chang in the same three-cornered game of kick-about. Baldy Pai and Mohammedan Lo stood on the sidelines, emptily gesturing with their feet and running back and forth to retrieve the ball when any of the players made an error.

There is another song to the tune "Imperial Audience" that describes the conduct of these "ball clubbers."

Idle when at home,
Forever on the make,
No honest trade for them,

Yet their kickballs are never far from their sides.
Every day they haunt the street corners,
Paying no heed to the poor,
But toadying to the rich.
From early morning till late at night,
They seldom eat a full meal.
Though they never make much money,
They make ends meet by hiring out the favors of their wives.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was still in the licensed quarter, looking on at his companions as they challenged each other to backgammon, played at kickball, and drank wine, when Tai-an arrived on horseback to fetch him.

Approaching his master as inconspicuously as possible he:

Whispered into his ear in a low voice,

"The First Lady and the Second Lady have already gone home. Mrs. Hua told me to ask you to come over as soon as you can."

On hearing this message, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave Tai-an whispered instructions to take the horse around to the back door and wait for him there. Then, without even taking another drink, he accompanied Kuei-chieh back to her room and sat down with her for only a few minutes, after which, feigning the need to answer a call of nature, he came out to the back door, jumped on his horse, and disappeared in a cloud of dust.

Before he had made good his departure, Ying Po-chüeh sent the servant of the house out to intercept him, but Hsi-men Ch'ing merely said, "I've got something to attend to at home," and refused to return.

He did remember, however, to leave Tai-an a tael and five mace of silver with which to take care of the three "ball clubbers." The proprietors of the Li family establishment were so worried lest Hsi-men Ch'ing be on his way to visit Wu Yin-erh's place in the back alley that they sent a maidservant after him who tailed him all the way to the gate of the quarter before coming home. Ying Po-chüeh and the rest continued drinking, and it was not until the second watch that the party finally broke up. Truly: If any curse me, curse away;

I'll have my pleasures anyway.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 16

HSI-MEN CH'ING IS INSPIRED BY GREED TO CONTEMPLATE MATRIMONY; YING PO-CHÜEH STEALS A MARCH IN ANTICIPATION OF THE CEREMONY

Doubt not the existence of beauties who can topple kingdoms and cities;
Yet dreams of clouds and rain on Witches' Mountain are ever deluded.
Too great an infatuation with rouge and powder can melt the sturdiest bones;
And lead one to neglect the claims of friendship in favor of moth eyebrows.
In Warm Soft Country one's prowess is still undiminished; Affected by the Alluring Breeze one's carriage remains dashing.
The heedless fellow is not awake to the evanescence of spring;
Having spent a thousand for a night of pleasure
he is reluctant to quit.

THE STORY GOES that as soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing had made his way out the gate of the licensed quarter that day, with Tai-an in attendance, he whipped up his horse and headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's house on Lion Street. Arriving at her front door and dismounting, he saw that the gate was tightly shut and surmised that her guests must already have returned home in their sedan chairs. He told Tai-an to rouse Old Mother Feng, who opened the door for them.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came in, Li P'ing-erh was standing in the candlelit reception room:

Her flowery headdress in perfect order,

Her white mourning-clothes very becoming, as she leaned against the latticework of the door, cracking melon seeds with her teeth.

As soon as she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had arrived, she: Lightly moved her lotus feet,¹

Gently lifted her beige skirt, and descended the steps to welcome him, saying as she did so, "If you'd come a little earlier your Third Lady and Fifth Lady would still have been here. They only got into their sedan chairs and departed for home a few minutes ago. Your First Lady left early today. She said you weren't at home. Where have you been?"

"This morning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I set out with Brother Ying the Second and Hsieh Hsi-ta to see the lanterns. We had hardly passed by your front door when we happened to run into a couple of friends who dragged us off to visit one of the establishments in the licensed quarter. We've been carrying on there ever since. I was afraid you might be waiting for me, so when the page boy showed up I pretended to have to go to the bathroom and made my escape through the back door. If I hadn't taken matters into my own hands that crew would have hung onto me so tenaciously I could never have gotten away."

"Thank you very much, sir, for your generous presents," said Li P'ing-erh. "Your ladies refused to stay any longer. They kept saying there was no one at home to look after the place, but I can't help feeling rather left in the lurch."

Thereupon:

More vintage wine was poured, and Another rare repast was spread.

In the reception room:

Decorated lanterns were lit up,

Heat-holding drapes were let down.

Animal-shaped briquettes replenished golden braziers,

The scent of ambergris wafted from jeweled censers.

On the festive board:

Rare delicacies rose in piles,

From the goblet's rim:

Fragrant wine overflowed.

The woman handed Hsi-men Ch'ing a cup of wine and then kowtowed to him, saying, "Now that my poor husband is dead I'm completely alone in the world. I offer you this cup of wine today in the hope that you will accept responsibility for me in the future. Sir, if you only saw fit not to reject me for my inadequacies, I'd be more than willing to: Make the beds and fold the quilts, for you. If you could just permit me to play the role of a younger sister among the ladies of your household: I'd be prepared to die if I must.

But I don't know what you think about this."

Hsi-men Ch'ing Is Inspired by Greed to Contemplate Matrimony

As she spoke her eyes brimmed over with tears.

Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted the wine and said with a smile, "Please get up. Since you have deigned to express so much love for me, rest assured that where any request from you is concerned: It is imprinted in my heart.

As soon as your mourning period is over you can leave the rest to me. There's no need for you to worry any more about it. Today is your birthday. Let's drink to it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, drank off the wine and then, after refilling the cup, offered it in return to the woman. She bade him take the seat of honor, and Old Mother Feng went off to busy herself with the preparations in the kitchen. Before long she brought in a serving of birthday noodles.

As they ate, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked who had provided the entertainment during the day, and Li P'ing-erh replied, "Tung Chiao-erh and Han Chin-ch'uan were here today. When the party broke up they accompanied your Third Lady and Fifth Lady home to pick up some artificial flowers they had been promised."

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat on the left side of the table and the two of them fell to drinking together: Exchanging cups as they drank.

Li P'ing-erh's maidservants, Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, stood in attendance, pouring wine and fetching food for them as occasion demanded. Who should come forward at this juncture but Tai-an, who prostrated himself on the floor and kowtowed to Li P'ing-erh, wishing her a happy birthday.

Li P'ing-erh promptly rose to her feet and returned his salute, telling Ying-ch'un as she did so, "Get Old Mother Feng to set aside some noodles and savories in the kitchen, along with a jug of wine, for Tai-an."

"As soon as you've finished eating," Hsi-men Ch'ing told him, "you can go home with the horse."

"When you get there," said Li P'ing-erh, "if your mistress should ask, don't tell her that your master is here."

"Leave it to me," said Tai-an. "I'll just say that Father is spending the night in the licensed quarter and wants me to come and fetch him in the morning."

Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded approvingly, and Li P'ing-erh was as pleased as could be. "What a clever lad," she said.

"He doesn't miss a wink."²

She ordered Ying-ch'un to fetch two mace of silver for him, saying, "Here's a little something to help you celebrate the festival. Buy yourself some melon seeds to crack. If you bring me the outlines of your feet sometime soon, I'll make a nice pair of shoes for you."

Tai-an hastily kowtowed, saying, "How could I dream of such a thing?" and then withdrew to the kitchen.

When he had finished eating he led the horse outside, and Old Mother Feng put the crossbar on the front door to secure it for the night.

Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ch'ing played at guess-fingers as they drank. After a while, a set of thirty-two ivory dominoes³ was brought out. A madder red strip of felt was placed over the table and the two of them played dominoes and drank by the light of the suspended lanterns.

They enjoyed themselves in this way for some time, after which Li P'ing-erh ordered Ying-ch'un to light the candles in her bedroom.

It so happened that after the death of Hua Tzu-hsü, Hsi-men Ch'ing had already enjoyed the favors of both Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, so there was no need to hide anything from them. They were instructed to prepare the bed and to bring along the food boxes and wine service from the reception room.

Thereupon, inside the bedstead, within the purple brocade curtains, the woman exposed her powder-white body and was joined by Hsi-men Ch'ing. With their: Fragrant shoulders huddled together, and Jade bodies snuggled up against each other, the two of them continued to play dominoes and drink wine out of large goblets.

As they were so engaged, Li P'ing-erh asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "When are you going to be finished with the reconstruction work you plan to do over there?"

"I'm only waiting until sometime next month to:

Break ground and start construction," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm going to tear down your old house and combine the two pieces of property into one. Then I'll erect an artificial hill and a summerhouse in the front, and make a garden and pleasure ground out of it. I'm also planning to build another three-room belvedere, like the one I already have, and call it the Flower-viewing Tower."

"In the tea chest over there behind the bed," the woman said, pointing as she spoke, "I've got forty catties of aloeswood, two hundred catties of white wax, two jars of quicksilver, and eighty catties of imported pepper stored away. If you will have it taken away sometime soon and sold off for its cash value, I'll contribute the proceeds of the sale to your building expenses. If you don't see fit to reject me for my inadequacies, please, whatever happens, tell your First Lady when you get home that I'd be more than willing to play the role of a younger sister among the ladies of your household. It wouldn't matter where I was ranked in the hierarchy. Darling, I just can't go on without you."

As she spoke a cascade of tears began to fall from her eyes.

Hsi-men Ch'ing solicitously endeavored to wipe them away with his handkerchief, saying, "Your feelings are fully understood by me. But we'd better wait until your period of mourning is over, on the one hand, and until I've finished the new construction work, on the other. Otherwise, if I took you into my household, you'd have no place to stay."

"If you really intend to take me into your family," the woman responded, "be sure, whatever you do, to locate the quarters you build for me next to those of your Fifth Lady. I don't know what I'd do without her, she's such a nice person. She and the Third Lady, née Meng, who lives in the rear compound, were just as friendly as could be to me on our very first meeting. The two of them are so alike they seem less like fellow-wives than sisters born of the same mother. Only your First Lady seems somewhat ill-disposed, as though: Nobody amounts to much in her eyes."

"Actually," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "this humble wife of mine, née Wu, has a most accommodating disposition. If that were not the case, how could I ever manage to have so many bedmates at my disposal? What I plan to do is to build a three-room belvedere on your former property for you to live in, just like the one on mine, and provide access through two postern gates. What do you think of that?"

"Sweetheart," the woman replied, "that would please me no end."

Thereupon, the two of them:

Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,

Indulging their lusts without restraint.
It was the fourth watch before they finally:
Fell asleep on the same pillow,
Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh.

The next day it was past lunchtime before they stirred. The woman had not yet combed her hair when Ying-ch'un brought in some congee. She and Hsi-men Ch'ing had hardly finished half a bowl of the congee when wine was brought in and the two of them fell to drinking again.

It so happened that Li P'ing-erh was fond of doing it doggie fashion. Getting down on all fours, she made Hsi-men Ch'ing sit on the pillow and insert himself into her inverted flower while she: Moved back and forth as she wished. Just as the two of them were approaching their climax, what should they hear but Tai-an knocking at the gate, having arrived on horseback to fetch his master. Hsi-men Ch'ing called him over to the window and asked him what was up.

"There are three merchants from Szechwan and Hu-kuang waiting for you at home," replied Tai-an. "They have some excellent stock to dispose of and would like to weigh it out with Uncle Fu the Second and settle accounts. They are asking only a hundred taels down to conclude a contract, with the balance due in the middle decade of the eighth month. The First Lady sent me to ask you to come home and take care of the matter."

"You didn't say I was here, did you?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I told her you were at Li Kuei-chieh's place in the licensed quarter," said Tai-an. "I didn't tell anyone you were here."

"She doesn't know how to handle things," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All she had to do was tell Uncle Fu the Second to take care of it. What need was there to send for me?"

"Uncle Fu the Second proposed to do just that," replied Tai-an, "but the merchants wouldn't agree to it. They refused to sign the contract until they had seen you in person."

"As long as they've sent the boy after you," said Li P'ing-erh:

"Business comes first.

If you don't go home you'll only upset the lady of the house."

"You don't know these lousy southern bastards," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "They never come knocking at your door, trying to unload their goods, unless the market is slow and they've got nowhere else to dispose of them. You've got to buy on time, for three months or half a year. If you pay them off any sooner than that they'll start getting ideas. I've got the largest store in the whole Ch'ing-ho district and do the largest volume of business. It wouldn't matter how long I kept them waiting, they'd still have to come looking for me in the end."

"To refuse a business deal,

Is to risk making an enemy," said Li P'ing-erh. "Why don't you do as I say; go on home, take care of them, and come back later? After all: There are as many days ahead of us as there are leaves on the willow tree."⁴

Hsi-men Ch'ing acknowledged the force of Li P'ing-erh's rhetoric by slowly getting up, combing his hair and washing his face, donning his hairnet, and putting on his clothes. After Li P'ing-erh had provided him with something further to eat, without more ado, he put on his eye-mask and rode home on horseback.

There were four or five merchants waiting for him in the shop who went about their business as soon as he had supervised the weighing out of the merchandise, settled the account, and signed the contract.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then paid a visit to P'an Chin-lien's quarters.

"Where did you go yesterday?" she demanded to know. "If you tell the truth, I'll forget it; but if you don't, I'll kick up a real rumpus."

"Since you were all out being entertained at the Hua house," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I went for a tour of the Lantern Market with a few of my friends, after which we went into the licensed quarter and made a night of it. I didn't get home until the page boy came to fetch me this morning."

"The page boy went to fetch you all right," said Chin-lien, "but I doubt if any part of the licensed quarter saw so much as your ghost. So much for that! You lousy two-timer, you still think you can fool me do you? That whore yesterday was so anxious to get us out of the way it was obvious she was: Up to her preternatural pranks.

She must have invited you over so you could screw the night away. She didn't let you go till you were screwed out, I dare say. And as for that lousy jailbird, Tai-an: He's such a practiced old hand, he had one story for the First Lady and another story for me.

"Initially, when he came back with the horse and the First Lady asked him, 'Why hasn't your father come home? Who's place is he drinking at?' he replied, 'He went for a tour of the Lantern Market with Uncle Ying the Second and that crowd. They're all in the licensed quarter now, having a party at Li Kuei-chieh's place. He told me to come back and fetch him in the morning.'

"Later on, however, when I called him into my room and interrogated him myself, he just giggled and wouldn't say anything. Only after I began to give him a hard time did he say, 'Father's really at Mistress Hua the Second's place on Lion Street.' The lousy jailbird! How did he know that you and I are: Of one heart and one mind? You must have told him it was all right to tell me."

"I did nothing of the sort," said Hsi-men Ch'ing evasively.

Seeing that concealment was no longer possible, however, he went on to tell her all about Li P'ing-erh's invitation of the previous night.

"When I arrived she offered me a cup of wine and apologized for the scant entertainment she had been able to provide you. Then she started to weep and wail, telling me that her household was understaffed, that the rear part of the property was deserted, and that she was afraid to be alone there at night. Her one desire is that I will marry her. She asked when I was going to finish building the new house. She also showed me several hundred taels worth of aromatics, wax, and other valuable goods, and suggested that I broker them for her and keep the proceeds to help defray the building expenses. She wants me to start on the construction work as soon as possible so she can move in next to you and be a sister of yours. But I fear you may not agree to that."

"It's not as though I have:

A shadow too many,
here as it is," said the woman. "I only hope she does move in. That would be fine by me. This place of mine is completely deserted, and I'd love to have somebody to keep me company. It's always been true that: A multitude of boats need not clog the channel,

A multitude of carts need not block the road.⁵
I could hardly refuse her the same sort of welcome I once received myself. It's not as though she were trying to take my place away from me or anything like that. My only fear is that: Other people may not be as well disposed as I am. You'll have to find out what the First Lady thinks about it."

"It's only something to talk about at the moment," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Her mourning period isn't even over yet."

Their colloquy at an end, the woman was helping Hsi-men Ch'ing off with his white satin jacket when an object fell out of his sleeve with a tinkling sound. Taking it in her hand, she found it had a heavy feel to it and was about the size of a fowling pellet. She scrutinized it for some time but couldn't tell what it was. Behold: To the tune "Immortal at the River"

First introduced as a product of the barbarian armies;
It has found its way by recommendation to the capital itself.
Its body is miniature,
its interior hollow.

Once set in motion
by the merest touch;
It will roll around spontaneously,
stridulant as a cicada.

Adept at arousing consternation
in the beauty's heart;

A veteran contributor to the vigor of the loins;
Its sobriquet is "Brazenfaced Valiant Vanguard."

On the victory honors list forever number one;

It has won renown as
"The Titillating Bell."⁶

The woman examined it for some time before asking, "What on earth is it? And why does it give me a numb feeling halfway up my arm?"

"This is something you wouldn't be familiar with," Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed. "It's called a 'titillating bell' and comes from the southern country of Burma. Good ones cost four or five taels of silver."

"What do you do with it?" the woman asked.

"If you put it in your 'crucible' before doing the deed," said Hsi-men Ch'ing:

"It's too wonderful for words."

"You've been experimenting with Li P'ing-erh, haven't you?" the woman said.

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave a full account of the events of the preceding night, with the result that Chin-lien's: Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Though it was broad daylight, the two of them:

Took off their clothes and went to bed.

Truly:

Who knows what reason there might be that Wang-tzu Ch'iao,⁷

No sooner learned to "play the flute" than he became transported.⁸

To make a long story short, one day Hsi-men Ch'ing met with the appropriate brokers and weighed out the aromatics, wax, and other goods that had been stored in the tea chest behind Li P'ing-erh's bed. In all he was able to realize 380 taels of silver by the sale. Li P'ing-erh kept only 180 taels out of this sum for her own expenses and turned over the balance to Hsi-men Ch'ing to help defray the cost of the new building.

The yin-yang master was consulted and the eighth day of the second month chosen to:

Break ground and start construction.

Hsi-men Ch'ing turned over five hundred taels of silver to his head servant, Lai-chao, and his manager, Pen the Fourth, and put them in charge of procuring the necessary bricks, tiles, lumber, and stone, supervising the work, and handling the accounts.

This Pen the Fourth, whose name was Pen Ti-ch'uan, or Scurry-about Pen, was a young man who was by nature: Dashing and affected, Versatile and clever.

He had begun his career as a flunky in the household of one of the imperial eunuchs. But because he: Was not the sort to abide by his lot,

Took his cut of both outgo and income,⁹ and got caught cooking the books, he had been dismissed. He supported himself for a while as a catamite, after which he took a job as a servant in a well-to-do household. From this position he had subsequently absconded with a wet nurse, whom he took as his wife, and set himself up as a dealer in the secondhand clothes trade. On top of all this he was also a proficient performer on the p'i-p'a, the flute, and other wind instruments.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so impressed by the variety of his talents that he often patronized him, allowing him to weigh out the goods in his wholesale pharmaceutical business and earn commissions as a middleman. As a result, he had come to feel, in matters both great and small, that he could hardly do without him.

On the appointed day, Pen Ti-ch'uan and Lai-chao supervised the artisans of the various trades as they began the construction work. First they demolished the old house on what had been the Hua property and took down the intervening wall, then they laid the foundations and erected a summerhouse, an artificial hill, pavilions, terraces, and other recreational facilities. This was not the work of a day, but there is no need to describe it exhaustively.

Light and darkness alternate swiftly,

The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had remained at home overseeing the construction of his new garden for more than a month when the hundredth-day anniversary of Hua Tzu-hsü's death, which fell in the first decade of the third month, became imminent. Li P'ing-erh invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over beforehand to discuss the arrangements.

"I intend to burn Hua Tzu-hsü's spirit tablet," she said. "I don't know whether you plan to sell this house or not, but I wish you would send someone over to look after it and take me into your own household as soon as possible. I don't want to stay here any longer than necessary. At night it's completely deserted and I'm afraid. There are often fox spirits about doing their best to drive me to distraction. When you get home, please tell the First Lady that if she would only take pity on me it would save my life. It wouldn't make any difference where you chose to rank me in the hierarchy, I'd be more than willing to: Make the beds and fold the quilts, for you without repining." As she spoke:

Her tears fell like rain.

"There's no need to get so upset," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I already mentioned what you told me to my wife and Fifth Lady after I got home the other day. Just wait until the house I'm building for you is finished. By that time your mourning period will be nearly over. It won't be any too late to have you carried over the threshold then."

"Fine enough," said Li P'ing-erh. "But if it's really true that you intend to marry me, I wish you'd expedite the building of the house and take me over there as soon as possible. If I were able to live for even a day as a member of your household: I'd be prepared to die if I must.

As long as I stay here:

Each day is like a year."¹⁰

"I understand what you're saying," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Even if the house isn't finished on time," said Li P'ing-erh, "once I've burnt the spirit tablet I could occupy the upper floor of the Fifth Lady's belvedere for a few days and then move into the new building after it's completed. Whatever else you do, when you get home speak to the Fifth Lady about it. I'll be waiting for your answer. The tenth of the third month is the hundredth-day anniversary of his death. I'll have to have a sutra reading and burn his spirit tablet then."

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave his assent and stayed overnight with the woman.

The next day he repeated everything she had said, word for word, to P'an Chin-lien.

"Of course, that would be fine," said Chin-lien. "I'd be perfectly happy to set aside a room or two for her to live in. It's the others I'd be worried about. You'll have to find out what the First Lady thinks about it. As far as I'm concerned: There's water enough in the channel for all the boats."¹¹

It all depends on what our elder sister has to say."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went straight to Wu Yüeh-niang's room. He found her combing her hair and proceeded to give her a complete account of Li P'ing-erh's desire to marry into the family, from beginning to end.

"You really can't very well marry her," said Yüeh-niang. "In the first place: her mourning period isn't over yet. In the second place: you were formerly on intimate terms with her husband. And in the third place: you've already been engaged in hanky-panky with her, first buying their house and then stashing away all the valuables she entrusted to you for safekeeping. As the saying goes: The loom may stay put, but the shuttle gets around."¹²

I've heard people say that Hua the Elder from her husband's branch of the family is a tough customer. If any word of this should get about you'd only be: Inviting lice onto your own head to scratch."¹³

What I say is in your own best interests, but:

Be you Chao, Ch'ien, Sun, or Li;¹⁴

I've had my say, you may do as you please."

With these few words she succeeded in reducing Hsi-men Ch'ing to silence. He went out to the front reception hall and sat down in a chair all by himself to ponder the situation. He didn't see how he could either convey this reply to Li P'ing-erh or refuse to go back and see her. After thinking it over for some time he returned to Chin-lien's room.

"When you went to see our elder sister, what did she say?" asked Chin-lien.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her everything Yüeh-niang had said.

"Her objections are certainly reasonable enough," said Chin-lien. "First you bought his house and now you want to marry his wife into the bargain, a woman with whom you only became acquainted through your long-standing relationship with her husband. And there's another thing to consider too. Since even between friends: Though there may be no secrets, there are some constraints,

if it ever came to the attention of the authorities, they would take a dim view of it."

"I think I could handle that," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What worries me is that bastard, Hua the Elder. No doubt he resents the fact that he: No longer has an arena for his tricks.

If he finds out about this and tries to make trouble on the grounds that her mourning period isn't over yet, what am I to do? Right now I'm at a loss how to reply to her."

"Phooey! What's so hard about that?" said Chin-lien. "Tell me, are you planning to give her your answer today or tomorrow?"

"She wants me to give her an answer of some kind today," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"When you go there today then," said Chin-lien, "this is what you do. Say to her, 'I talked it over with the Fifth Lady when I got home, but there are such quantities of raw pharmaceuticals in storage on the second floor of her belvedere that there'd be no place to put your furniture if you moved in. You might as well wait a little longer. Your house is 70 or 80 percent completed already. I'll urge the artisans to speed up their work on the decorating, painting and varnishing, and other finishing touches, and by the time they're through your mourning period will be nearly over. If I take you in then, everything will be in proper order. That would be a lot better than having you move in on top of the Fifth Lady right now, while you're still in a ritual status that makes you: Neither fish nor fowl.

You'd only get in each other's way and find it difficult to keep up appearances.' If you do as I suggest, I guarantee she'll give up the idea."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so delighted by what he heard that he set out for Li P'ing-erh's house without delay.

"How did it go with that request of mine when you got home?" the woman asked.

"The Fifth Lady said," reported Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that you'd do better to wait until they've finished painting and varnishing your new house before moving in. Right now there's so much stuff: Strewn about higgledy-piggledy, on the second floor of her place that if you went over there there'd be no place to store your things. And there's another problem as well. If your husband's eldest brother should complain that your mourning period isn't over yet, what would we do then?"

"He wouldn't dare interfere in my affairs," said the woman. "Quite aside from the fact that: Each of us has his own life to live, and that a formal settlement of the matter of the disputed property has already been reached; as far as I'm concerned: In one's first marriage one must obey one's parents;

In subsequent marriages one can suit oneself.
It's always been the case that:
Brothers and sisters-in-law do not ask after each other.

My husband's eldest brother has no business interfering in my private affairs. As it is, he can see I'm having a hard time making a go of it, but what does he care? If he so much as lets off a fart, by the time I'm finished with him, he'll: Die in his chair,

Not daring to die in his bed.

You can relax on that score, sir. He won't dare give me any trouble."

"As for this house of yours," she then went on to ask, "how soon is it going to be finished anyway?"

"I've already instructed the artisans," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to give priority to the three-room belvedere I'm building for you. By the time they're done with the painting and varnishing it will be the beginning of the fifth month."

"My darling," the woman said, "push ahead with it as fast as you can. I'm willing to wait until then if I must."

When they had finished talking, a maidservant brought in wine and the two of them fell to enjoying themselves and drinking together for the rest of the night.

From this time on, Hsi-men Ch'ing came to see her every three to five days, without fail, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Light and darkness alternate swiftly.

The construction work in Hsi-men Ch'ing's residential compound had already been under way for more than two months, and the three-room belvedere, called the Flower-viewing Tower, was nearing completion. All that remained was the summerhouse, for which the foundation had not yet been laid.

One day the Dragon Boat Festival, on the fifth day of the fifth month, rolled around.

In each household artemisia leaves adorn the gate,

In every dwelling efficacious charms deck the door.¹⁵

Li P'ing-erh prepared a feast in honor of the occasion and invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over to share the festival tsung-tzu with her, on the one hand, and to discuss the date she would be carried over his threshold, on the other. They decided that on the fifteenth day of the fifth month she would engage Buddhist priests to hold a sutra-reading and burn the spirit tablet of her deceased husband, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing would arrange to have her carried over his threshold.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked Li P'ing-erh, "On the day you burn the spirit tablet, are you planning to invite Hua the Elder, Hua the Third, and Hua the Fourth, or not?"

"I'll send them each an invitation," the woman replied. "They can come or not as they please."

Now that their plans had been made, all that remained was to wait for the fifteenth day of the fifth month. The woman engaged the services of twelve monks from the Pao-en Temple, who came to her home on the appointed day to perform the sutra-reading and preside over the burning of the spirit tablet.

The same day, Hsi-men Ch'ing wrapped up three mace of silver as a birthday present for Ying Po-chüeh. In the morning he also gave five taels of silver to Tai-an and instructed him to buy chicken, goose, duck, and whatever else was needed for a feast that evening to celebrate the end of Li P'ing-erh's mourning period. Then, taking P'ing-an and Hua-t'ung with him to look after the horse, he set out in the early afternoon for Ying Po-chüeh's house.

Among those attending the party that day were Tagalong Hsieh, Sticky Chu, Blabbermouth Sun, Heartless Wu, Welsher Yün, Cadger Ch'ang, Scrounger Pai, and the new recruit to the company, Scurry-about Pen. All ten members of the club were present, not one of them having failed to put in an appearance. Two boy actors had also been engaged to play and sing for them.

After everyone had been served with wine and they had taken their places at the table, Hsi-men Ch'ing called the two boy actors over to him. He recognized the first of them to be Wu Yin-erh's younger brother, Wu Hui.

The other, whom he did not recognize, knelt down and said, "I am Cheng Ai-hsiang's elder brother, Cheng Feng."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who occupied the seat of honor, rewarded each of them with two mace of silver.

The party continued until the sun began to sink in the west. At this juncture Tai-an arrived with a horse to fetch his master.

Coming right up to the table, he whispered into Hsi-men Ch'ing's ear, "The lady would like you to come over as soon as you can."

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded with a wink, and Tai-an had started on his way out of the room when he was called to a halt by Ying Po-chüeh, who demanded, "You lousy dog-bone! Come over here and tell me the truth. If you don't tell the truth, I'll give your little ear a permanent twist. How many birthdays do you think your Daddy Ying has in a year, that you should come with the horse to fetch your father while the sun is still high in the sky? Where are you off to anyway? And who really sent you here? It may have been one of your mistresses at home, but it may just as well have been that 'Eighteenth Youngster'¹⁶ from the licensed quarter. If you don't tell me, a hundred years will go by before I ever put in a good word with your father to find this little dog-bone of his a wife."

Tai-an's only response was to say, "The truth is: nobody sent me. I feared it was getting late and thought Father might want to be on his way, so I brought the horse along early to await his convenience."

Ying Po-chüeh harassed him a while longer, without effect, and then said, "If you don't tell me what's afoot, and I find out about it later on, see if I don't settle accounts with you, you little oily mouth."

So saying, he poured out a cup of wine and selected half a saucerful of savories for Tai-an to eat when he had retired from their presence.

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing withdrew to the bathroom in order to adjust his toilet.

Summoning Tai-an, he drew him aside and asked him, "Who all showed up at the Hua house today?"

"Hua the Third is off in the country somewhere," reported Tai-an. "And Hua the Fourth is at home suffering from an eye ailment. No one came from either of their families. Only Hua the Elder and his wife showed up. After they had eaten their fill of the vegetarian fare, the husband went home first, leaving his wife behind. When she was ready to leave, Mistress Hua called her into her room and presented her with ten taels of silver and two sets of clothes, for which she actually kowtowed in gratitude."

"Did she have anything to say?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"She didn't venture so much as a word about it," replied Tai-an. "All she said was that when Mistress Hua is carried over your threshold she'd like to pay you a call on the 'third-day celebrations.'"

"Did she really say that?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"How would I dare lie about it," responded Tai-an.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this his heart was filled with delight. "Are the oblations completed as yet?" he went on to ask.

"The monks left some time ago," replied Tai-an. "The spirit tablet has already been burned. Mistress Hua said she'd like you to come over as soon as you can."

"I understand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Go outside and take care of the horse."

Tai-an was on his way out when, unexpectedly, Ying Po-chüeh, who had been eavesdropping in the corridor, suddenly accosted him with a shout, which gave him quite a start.

"You lousy little dog-bone!" he cursed. "You wouldn't tell me anything, but I've already contrived to hear all about it. A fine thing your father and you are up to!"

"You crazy dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Don't make such a fuss or everyone in the place will find out about it."

"If you'd taken me into your confidence in the first place," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I might not have said anything about it."

Thereupon he went right back to the table and, thus and so, told everyone the whole story.

Taking hold of Hsi-men Ch'ing, he said, "Brother, what sort of a person are you anyway?"

Can such things be,
that you should keep them to yourself without even letting your brothers in on them? Even if Hua the Elder had had anything to say about it, all you would have had to do was give us the word. Once we had spoken to him, he would have gone along with anything, never fear. If he had dared to utter so much as a single 'no,' we would have given him his lumps, make no mistake about it.

"Honestly, though, is this marriage set, or isn't it? Tell us all about it. Really! What are friends for, anyway? If there's anything we can do for you, we'd be willing to: Go through fire for you, or

Go through water for you.¹⁷

In fact:

We seek not to have been born the same day;

We seek only to die, every man for himself.¹⁸

As long as we're prepared to treat you this way, unless you have some reason you haven't disclosed, why should you want to keep us in the dark?"

Tagalong Hsieh picked up where he left off.

"Brother," he said, "if you refuse to tell us any more, we'll make such a fuss in the licensed quarter that Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh will hear about it and everyone will be embarrassed."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "All right, then, I'll make a clean breast of it. The wedding has all been arranged."

"The day for the ceremony, when you have her carried over the threshold, hasn't been set yet, has it?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"The day you carry our sister-in-law over the threshold," said Tagalong Hsieh, "we'll come to congratulate you. Whatever else you do, Brother, you'll have to engage four singing girls and invite us to a wedding feast."

"That goes without saying," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Of course, all of you will be invited."

"Rather than waiting to congratulate our brother on a future occasion," said Sticky Chu, "why don't we offer him a toast in advance?"

Thereupon, Sponger Ying presented the toast, Tagalong Hsieh held the flagon, Sticky Chu proffered some viands, and the rest of them all knelt down too, to keep them company. The two boy actors were also dragged into the act, being made to kneel down and sing the song suite entitled "Thirty Melodies," which begins with the words: How happy this auspicious day.¹⁹

Hsi-men Ch'ing was made to swallow three or four cups of wine in a row.

"Brother," said Sticky Chu, "on the day you invite us to the feast, you must be sure to include Cheng Feng and Wu Hui as well. That's settled then. Whatever happens, the two of you must go."

Cheng Feng, deferentially covering his mouth with his hand, replied, "We promise to report to your home for duty at an early hour."

Before long, after everyone had been served with wine, they returned to their places, sat down, and embarked upon another bout of drinking.

The day gradually waned and Hsi-men Ch'ing grew restless. As soon as he thought no one was looking, he got up and tried to slip away, but Ying Po-chüeh attempted to block the door and prevent his escape.

"Brother Ying," intervened Tagalong Hsieh, "let him go. We wouldn't want to spoil his plans and arouse the resentment of our sister-in-law." Hsi-men Ch'ing seized the opportunity to leap on his horse and disappeared in a puff of smoke.

When he arrived at Lion Street, Li P'ing-erh had already divested herself of her mourning and changed into a more colorful outfit. In the reception room: Ablaze with lamps and candles,²⁰ the table was laid with a full complement of wine and delicacies, with a single folding armchair standing at its head.

Not until Hsi-men Ch'ing had assumed the place of honor was a jug of wine broached and decanted. A maidservant held the flagon, from which Li P'ing-erh proceeded to fill a cup to the brim and offer it to her guest.

She then kowtowed to him four times:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder, and said, "Today the spirit tablet of my poor husband has been burnt. If you, sir, deign not to reject me, I will enjoy the pleasure of: Waiting upon you with towel and comb, thereby:

Fulfilling my desire for connubial bliss."

When she rose to her feet after completing her obeisances, Hsi-men Ch'ing also got up from his seat and proffered the woman a cup of wine in return. Only then did they sit down to enjoy themselves together.

"Did Hua the Elder or his wife have anything to say today?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

Ying Po-chüeh Steals a March in Anticipation of the Ceremony

"After the noon vegetarian meal," replied Li P'ing-erh, "I invited them into my room and told them about your intentions. He expressed nothing but pleasure at the news and didn't have a word to say against it. All he said was that he'd have his wife pay you a call on the 'third-day celebrations.' I gave them ten taels of silver and two sets of clothes. The two of them were as happy as could be and thanked me again and again on their way out the door."

"If that was their only response," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I might as well let them come calling; what does it matter? But if they utter a single word of criticism, I'll never forgive them."

"If either of them so much as lets a hot fart on the subject," asserted Li P'ing-erh, "I won't let them get away with it."

Thereupon, Old Mother Feng brought out some soup and an assortment of appetizers from the kitchen. Li P'ing-erh had taken the trouble to: Wash her hands and trim her nails, before personally preparing some miniature steamed dumplings with a stuffing of minced scallions and mutton. From a chased silver goblet filled with southern wine, Hsiu-ch'un poured out two cups for her mistress and her visitor. Hsi-men Ch'ing drank only the first half-cupful of his wine and presented the remainder to Li P'ing-erh.

One goes, the other comes;
and thus they proceeded to drink several cups in a row. Truly:

The sway of passion takes one's years away;
The force of setting makes the wine flow free.²¹

Because the day of her marriage was impending, Li P'ing-erh was even happier than usual. Her face was wreathed in smiles.

"While you were drinking just now at the Ying place," she said, "you kept me waiting a long time. I was afraid you might get drunk, so I sent for Tai-an to ask you to come over as soon as possible. Did anyone there catch on?"

"Beggar Ying, as usual, guessed that something was afoot," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He pressured the page boy into letting out a few words about it, and then clowned around for a while. The members of the club demanded a chance to offer their congratulations, so I guess I'll have to engage singing girls and throw a party for them. They also ganged up on me and made me swallow a few cups of wine. As soon as I thought no one was looking, I tried to slip away, but they blocked the door, and: Argued the pros and cons, among themselves before letting me go."

"The fact they let you go shows they understand a thing or two," said Li P'ing-erh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, having noticed that:

Her drunken demeanor invited license; and Her passionate eyes expressed desire, lost no time in abandoning all restraint. He:
Stuck out his clove-shaped tongue; and Nuzzled her apricot cheeks.

Li P'ing-erh embraced Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "My darling, if you really do plan to marry me, make it as soon as possible. It's inconvenient for you to have to come and go this way. Don't leave me here to long for you day and night."

When she had finished speaking, they:

Tossed first this way and then that;
Till they were intertwined into one.

Truly:

A beauty who could topple kingdoms and cities belonged to Emperor Wu of Han;²²
A goddess who could make clouds and make rain appeared to King Hsiang of Ch'u.²³

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In passion's thrall breast presses close to breast;
In tender aftermath arms are gently enlaced.
Let the silver lamp burn brightly as it will;
They're still afraid it's nothing but a dream.²⁴

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 17

CENSOR YÜ-WEN IMPEACHES COMMANDER YANG; LI P'ING-ERH TAKES CHIANG CHU-SHAN AS MATE

To the tune "Partridge Sky"

She remembers that time in the studio
when they had just met;
The clouds and rain they enjoyed together
were known to only a few.
When evening came, the phoenix and his mate
alighted on adjacent pillows;
Left untrimmed, the silver lamp
shed only a half light.

Thinking of the past,
Her dreaming soul deluded;
Tonight she is all too happy to enjoy
the pleasures of connubial bliss.
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,
their pleasure knows no bounds.
From this time on, surely, the pair of them will never be separated.¹

THE STORY GOES that the twentieth day of the fifth month was the birthday of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command. When the day came, Hsi-men Ch'ing sealed up five mace of silver and two handkerchiefs in a packet, as his contribution toward the cost of the celebration. Then, having dressed himself to befit the occasion, he mounted a large white horse and, accompanied by four page boys, set off for the commandant's home to offer his birthday greetings. Among the others attending the party were the judicial commissioner, Hsia Yen-ling, the militia commander, Chang Kuan, the battalion commanders Ching Chung² and Ho Chin, and other military officials. The guests were met with drinks at the door and received to the strains of martial music. A southern-style play, of the genre known as hsi-wen,³ was performed for their entertainment, and four singing girls had been engaged to ply the guests with wine.

Tai-an took Hsi-men Ch'ing's outdoor clothes and went home with the horse. When the sun began to sink in the west, Tai-an set out on horseback to fetch his master.

As he was passing by the western end of Lion Street he ran into Old Mother Feng and asked her, "Mother Feng, where are you going?"

"Mistress Hua sent me to ask your master over," replied Old Mother Feng. "Silversmith Ku has finished the jewelry she ordered for the betrothal ceremony and delivered it today in a box. She wants your master to come and see it. She also has something she wants to talk to him about."

"My master's at Commandant Chou's place attending a party today," said Tai-an. "I'm on my way to fetch him. You can save yourself a trip. When I get there I'll give him the message."

"I'm imposing on you," said Old Mother Feng, "but, whatever you do, be sure to mention it. Mistress Hua is waiting for him."

Tai-an whipped up his horse and headed straight for the commandant's headquarters. The officials at the party were devoting themselves to their cups and having a high time of it.

Tai-an went up to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place at the table and said to him, "On my way back from home with the horse just now, I ran into Old Mother Feng in the street. Mistress Hua had sent her to invite you over. She said that Silversmith Ku had delivered the jewelry and she wanted you to come and see it. She also has something she wants to talk to you about."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he gave Tai-an some savories, soup, and rice to eat and prepared to make his departure. Commandant Chou was reluctant to let him go, blocking the door and foisting a large cup of wine upon him.

"Since you do me the honor, sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I will drink this cup at your behest. But there is something I must attend to that prevents me from enjoying your hospitality to the full. Forgive me. Forgive me."

Thereupon, he:

Drained it in one gulp,
bade farewell to Commandant Chou, got on his horse, and headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's house. When he had finished the tea with which the woman welcomed him, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Tai-an to take the horse home and come to fetch him in the morning.

After Tai-an had left, Li P'ing-erh told Ying-ch'un to get the jewelry out of its box for Hsi-men Ch'ing to look over. All ablaze like golden fire, it was a fine set of jewelry indeed.

When it had been put away, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "You won't have to wait any longer than the twenty-fourth for the presentation of the betrothal gifts, and we'll hold the ceremony proper next month, on the fourth."

The woman's heart was filled with delight. She promptly brought out the wine, and she and Hsi-men Ch'ing drank deeply and unburdened themselves to each other. After they had been drinking for a while, she ordered a maidservant to wipe off the cool bamboo bed mat in her room, and the two of them took their places inside the gauze netting.

The incense was redolent of orchid and musk;

The bedspread was fashioned of mermaid silk.

Taking off their clothes, they sat:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh;

Drinking wine and making merry with each other.

After some time:

The glint of spring pervading their eyes;⁴

They were carried away by lecherous desires.

Hsi-men Ch'ing started out by engaging the woman in the sport of clouds and rain for a while. After that, responding to a drunken whim, he ordered her to lie down across the mat and indulge him by "toying with the flute." Behold: To the tune "Moon on the West River"

The scent of orchid and musk pervades
the gauze netting;

The delicate beauty lightly proceeds to "play the flute."
Her snow-white jade body is visible
through the bed curtains;
It's enough to make one's "ethereal and material souls take flight."

A single cherry might describe her tiny mouth;
Tender stalks are not as gentle as her fingers.

The talented gentleman is moved to remark to his partner,
"I never knew the magic rhinoceros horn could feel so good."⁵

At this juncture, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was in his cups, playfully asked the woman, "In the old days, when your Hua Tzu-hsü was still alive, did you ever do anything like this with him?"

"When he wasn't asleep he was in dreamland," the woman replied. "How could I ever have had the patience to do this sort of thing with him? All he ever wanted to do was fool around outside. And even when he came home, I wouldn't ordinarily let him touch me. Moreover, as long as the old eunuch director was alive, we slept in separate rooms. As for my husband, I used to curse him till he looked as though: His head had been sprayed with dog's blood."⁶

If he gave me any trouble, all I had to do was tell the old eunuch about it and he'd give him a regular caning. He scarcely counted as a human being. What sort of stuff do you think he was made of, anyway? If I had played around this way with him it would only have given me the creeps. Who is there besides you who could suit me so perfectly? You're just what the doctor ordered. By day and by night, all I do is long for you."

The two of them fooled around for a while and then got back to business. Ying-ch'un waited on them, bringing in a small square box filled with assorted dainties, including nuts, rissoles, chicken and goose giblets and feet, and rose-and chrysanthemum-flavored cakes. A small gold flagon was: Filled to the brim with carnelian-hued nectar.

From dusk, when the lamps and candles were lighted, they intermittently played with one another and drank until the time of the first watch.

All of a sudden they were interrupted by the sound of loud knocking at the outer gate. When they sent Old Mother Feng to open the door and see who it was, it turned out to be Tai-an.

"I told him to come and fetch me tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What's he doing coming back at a time like this?"

When he called him into the room to question him, the page boy made his way as far as the door in a state of obvious agitation. Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman were still in bed, so he did not dare go inside, but he spoke to them from the other side of the portiere.

"Your daughter and son-in-law have arrived," he said, "along with a large number of boxes. The First Lady sent me to ask you to come home as quickly as possible to discuss the situation with her."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he didn't know what to make of it.

"At such an hour, what could have happened?" he wondered. "I'd better go home and see what's going on."

He got up hastily. The woman helped him on with his clothes and heated a cup of warm wine for him to drink.

Whipping up his horse, he went straight home, where he found the rear reception room brightly lit with lamps and candles. His daughter and son-in-law were both there, along with a large pile of boxes, beds and curtains, and other family belongings.

Hsi-men Ch'ing could hardly believe his eyes.

"What are you doing arriving home at such an hour?" he demanded.

His son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, kowtowed and said, with tears in his eyes, "Recently our kinsman, the venerable Yang Chien, was impeached by a supervising secretary in the Office of Scrutiny, with the result that an imperial edict has come down ordering his arrest and incarceration in the South Prison to await the final disposition of his case. His protégés, relatives, and employees have all been tentatively sentenced to public exposure in the cangue and military exile. Yesterday his factotum, Yang Sheng, by traveling day and night, managed to get word of this to my father. My father was thrown into such a state of consternation by the news that he directed me to take your daughter, along with some boxes of family belongings, and seek temporary lodging with you until things blow over. He himself immediately set off for my paternal aunt's place in the Eastern Capital, to find out whatever more he could. When things return to normal: Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

He will never dare to forget it."

"Did your father give you a letter, or anything?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I've got his letter right here," said Ch'en Ching-chi, pulling it out of his sleeve and handing it to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing broke open the seal and found that it read as follows:

Respectfully indited by his devoted servant, Ch'en Hung,⁷ for the perusal of my most virtuous kinsman, Hsi-men Ch'ing: I will dispense with the customary formalities. The northern barbarians are currently encroaching upon our frontiers, and their incursions have extended beyond the borders of Hsiung-chou. The failure of the minister of war, Wang Fu,⁸ to dispatch adequate defense forces has resulted in a military debacle in which our kinsman, the venerable Yang Chien, is also implicated. They have both been impeached on charges of the utmost gravity by a supervising secretary of the Office of Scrutiny.

His Majesty is incensed and has ordered their arrest and incarceration in the South Prison, pending a formal inquiry by the Three Judicial Offices. Their protégés, relatives, and employees have all, in accordance with precedent, been tentatively sentenced to military exile in frontier guard units.

On hearing this news, my entire family has been thrown into consternation, having no place to turn. I have taken the initiative of sending my son and your daughter, along with what they are able to carry with them in the way of boxes of family belongings, to seek temporary refuge in your household. I am leaving immediately for the capital, where

I plan to stay with my elder sister's husband, Chang Shih-lien,⁹ and await word of the final disposition of the case.

Once my affairs are in sufficient order to permit my return home:

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it.

Fearing that there may be some repercussions in the district, I have also ordered my son to provide you with five hundred taels of silver, in the hope that, as my kinsman, you will do what you can to cope with the situation.

Censor Yü-wen Impeaches Commander Yang

I shall endeavor to requite you in the future;

Not forgetting your kindness
as long as I live.¹⁰
Written in haste, by lamplight, I am unable to express myself more fully.
Date: The twentieth day of the middle month of summer.
Signed: Hung, again, respectfully salutes you.

By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing finished reading the letter he was extremely perturbed. He instructed Wu Yüeh-niang to prepare food and wine for his daughter and son-in-law, and ordered the servants to sweep out the three rooms on the eastern side of the courtyard in front of the main reception hall for the couple to stay in. The boxes of valuables were all stored away in Yüeh-niang's room in the master suite. Ch'en Ching-chi brought out the five hundred taels of silver and turned them over to Hsi-men Ch'ing to cover whatever expenses might be incurred in attempting to cope with the situation.

Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned his manager, Wu Tien-en, and gave him five taels of silver, along with instructions to go that very night to the office of the chief clerk in the district yamen and make a copy of whatever relevant documents had come down from the Eastern Capital. What did the texts in the government gazette actually say?

Memorial Submitted by Yü-wen Hsi-chung,¹¹ Supervising Secretary of the Office of Scrutiny for War, and Others In Re: An Urgent Request for an Imperial Decision in Favor of Summary Execution for the Traitorous Ministers Who Abuse Their Power and Betray the National Interest, with a View toward Reinvigoration of Our Armed Forces and Elimination of the Barbarian Threat Your servant has heard that the danger posed by the barbarians has existed since ancient times. In the Chou dynasty, the Hsien-yün; in the Han, the Hsiung-nu; in the T'ang, the T'u-chüeh; and in the Five Dynasties, the Ch'i-tan, all gradually became strong. And since our own Imperial Sung dynasty was established, the Great Liao has made incursions into the Central Plain for no little while. But I have never heard of a state being threatened by barbarians from without when it did not already harbor barbarians within.¹² As the proverb says: When frost descends, the bell of Feng-shan sounds;

When rain falls, the plinth under the pillar sweats.¹³

That like breeds like is a necessary principle. The situation is analogous to that of a sick individual whose vital organs have long been ravaged by disease. When his natural vitality is sapped from within, he becomes susceptible to the penetration of malign influences from without. Once the entire body has become infected, not even Pien Ch'üeh of Lu¹⁴ would be able to save him. How could he then long endure?

The present situation of the empire is just like that of an invalid in the final stages of debilitation. The ruler resembles his head; the chief ministers resemble his vital organs; and the lesser officials resemble his four limbs. If Your Majesty sits in state upon the throne above, and your officials fulfill their responsibilities below, the natural vitality of the body politic will be replenished within; its defenses will be strong without; and the menace of barbarian invasion will be eliminated.

At the present time, among those whose conduct has led to the menace of barbarian invasion, no one is more culpable than the grand academician of the Hall for the Veneration of Governance, Ts'ai Ching. His artful, specious, cunning, and dangerous nature, further abetted by the lack of integrity or shame, permits him to engage, indifferently, in slander and flattery. Above, he is incapable of supporting his sovereign in the exercise of his prerogatives, assisting in the primary tasks of ordering and transforming the realm. Below, he is incapable of promoting virtue or implementing policy, protecting and cherishing the common people. Solely devoted to fattening himself at public expense, he curries imperial favor in order to consolidate his position; engenders factions in order to conceal his traitorous designs; deceives his sovereign by keeping him in the dark; and underhandedly stigmatizes men of worth. The corps of loyal servants of the state has been dispersed;¹⁵ the hearts of the citizens of the realm have turned cold; yet an unbroken stream of high officials, clad in crimson and purple, continues to congregate at his door.

Recently, as a result of the failure of his policy in the Ho-Huang region, the initiation of hostilities with the Liao, the cession of the three commandaries, the revolt of Kuo Yao-shih,¹⁶ and the sudden proliferation of our losses, the Chin barbarians have broken their covenant and encroached upon the heartland of the empire. These egregious examples of betrayal of the national interest are all due to Ts'ai Ching's malfeasance.

Wang Fu is rapacious, mediocre, and unreliable; his conduct more befitting that of a buffoon. Having been dredged up by Ts'ai Ching, to whose recommendation he owes his post in the government, he was, before long, mistakenly entrusted with military power. He is ready to engage in appeasement in order to maintain his position, but is quite without any policy to advance. Recently, on the occasion of Chang Ta's annihilation at T'ai-yüan,¹⁷ he was too panic-stricken to know what to do. And now that the barbarians are threatening the interior, he has fled south with his wife and children, concerned only for his personal safety.¹⁸ The enormity of this betrayal of the national interest is such that execution is too good for him.

Yang Chien was originally nothing but a gilded and pampered youth who, by availing himself of inherited privilege, and thereby exploiting the favor shown to the dead, has succeeded in obtaining access to military power and unwarranted responsibility for external defense. He is but an arrant traitor, feigning loyalty,¹⁹ whose pusillanimity knows no parallel.

These three officials have conspired to form a cabal that fosters corruption in both the capital and provinces and is like a noxious venom gnawing at Your Majesty's vitals. For years now, their conduct has invited catastrophes and induced anomalies, destroying the health and vitality of the body politic. The burdens of corvée and taxation are heavy and vexatious; the common people are dislocated and scattered; banditry is rife; the barbarians have ceased to be loyal; the resources of the empire are exhausted; and the moral bonds that hold society together have broken down. Though we were to pluck out the hairs of our heads, they would not suffice to enumerate the crimes of Ts'ai Ching and his coadjutors.²⁰

If your servants, who but await punishment in the aforesaid office in the discharge of their responsibilities as censors, were to see these traitorous ministers betray the national interest without calling the fact to Your August Majesty's attention, they would fail in their obligations to ruler and father, above, and violate the principles to which they have devoted a lifetime of study, below. We, therefore, humbly request an imperial decision, whether it be to relinquish Ts'ai Ching and the other malefactors of his faction to the hands of the penal authorities, in order to display your clemency; to subject them to the extreme penalty, in order to demonstrate their conspicuous disgrace; or to sentence them to public exposure in the cangue, in accordance with precedent, and condemn them to military exile on the distant frontier,²¹ where they may contend against monsters and demons.²²

Should such measures be adopted, there would be reason to hope that the favor of Heaven might be restored²³ and the hearts of the people made glad. Should the law of the land be thus reaffirmed, the barbarian threat would dissolve of itself. The empire would then be fortunate indeed! Your subjects would then be fortunate indeed!

This memorial had elicited an imperial rescript that read as follows:

Let Ts'ai Ching remain in office, for the time being, in order to assist Us in Our government. Let Wang Fu and Yang Chien be remanded to the Three Judicial Offices, which will conduct a joint inquiry and report the result to Us.

Respectfully received and respectfully acted upon.

There followed a quotation from the report of the joint inquiry by the Three Judicial Offices, which read as follows: Wang Fu, Yang Chien, and the other malefactors of their faction are found guilty of malfeasance in regard to their military commands. In permitting the barbarians to penetrate deeply beyond our frontiers and wreak havoc with our populace, they have sustained heavy losses of officers and men and abandoned control of our territories. For such crimes the penalty prescribed by law is execution. Among the henchmen, clerical subofficials, functionaries, relatives, and adherents who have abetted them in their iniquities are Tung Sheng, Lu Hu, Yang Sheng, P'ang Hsüan, Han Tsung-jen, Ch'en Hung, Huang Yü,²⁴ Hsi-men Ch'ing,²⁵ Liu Sheng, Chao Hung-tao, and others. For all of the above whose names have been ascertained, the recommended sentence is: public exposure in the cangue for one month, followed by military exile in frontier guard units.

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not read these documents nothing might have happened, but having read them: In his ears all he heard was a sighing rush of air,

As his ethereal and material souls fled he knew not where.

Truly:

The shock affected all six of his vital organs, including liver and lungs;
The fright damaged the three bristles and seven apertures of his heart.²⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately turned his attention to the task of getting together a quantity of gold, silver, and valuable antiques, and seeing that they were properly packed.

He then summoned his servants, Lai-pao and Lai-wang, into his bedroom and gave them secret orders: Thus and thus, and

So and so:

"Hire horses for yourselves and leave for the Eastern Capital this very night to find out what's happening. Make no effort to seek out the place where my relative by marriage, Ch'en Hung, is staying. If you get wind of any adverse repercussions, do your best to fix things up by any means you can think of, and hurry back to report to me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing had already provided the two men with twenty taels for their traveling expenses. Early in the fifth watch they hired drivers and set out on their way to the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to get to sleep all night long. Early the next morning he directed Lai-chao and Pen the Fourth to put a stop to the construction work in the garden and send all the artisans of the various trades home for the time being. He gave orders that the main gate of his compound was to be kept tightly closed every day, that his servants were not to venture outside the premises except on specific business, and that if anyone were to knock they should not be admitted.

Hsi-men Ch'ing confined his activities to his own quarters, restlessly walking outside and then back in again from time to time.

Worry piled upon worry;
Depression augmented by depression;²⁷

he was just like:

A millipede on a hot surface,²⁸ and forgot his undertaking with Li P'ing-erh as effectively as though it had been: Relegated to outer space, beyond the nine heavens.²⁹

When Wu Yüeh-niang saw the way he kept to his room every day:

His brows contracted by melancholy;
His face exhibiting a worried hue;³⁰

she said to him, "It's a matter that primarily concerns the family of our kinsman by marriage, Ch'en Hung. After all: For every injustice there is a perpetrator;

For every debt there is a creditor;³¹

why should you be so upset over something that hardly concerns you?"

"You're only a woman; what would you know about such things?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Ch'en Hung is our relative by marriage, and those two karmic encumbrances, my daughter and son-in-law, have moved into our house to live. This is an inescapable fact. The neighbors in the locality who have had reason to be annoyed with us in the past are extremely numerous. As the saying goes: The loom may stay put, but the shuttle gets around.

When the sheep is beaten, the colt and donkey tremble.³²

If there should be any troublemakers about to point the finger at us or:

Pull up the trees to investigate the roots,³³

you and I would be hard put to protect ourselves."

Truly:

Though you sit in your house behind closed doors,
Catastrophe may yet strike you out of the blue.³⁴

Hsi-men Ch'ing remained at home in a state of deep depression, but we will say no more about it.

To resume our story, Li P'ing-erh waited first one day and then another, but nothing happened. She sent Old Mother Feng to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place twice in succession, but the main gate was: Locked tight as an iron bucket, so that

Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through.

She waited around half the day, but nobody came out, so there was no way for her to discover what was going on.

When the twenty-fourth finally arrived, Li P'ing-erh again sent Old Mother Feng to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to deliver the jewelry she had had made for their betrothal and to ask him to come and have a word with her. Unable to get anyone to open the gate, she was waiting under the eaves of the house across the street when who should appear but Tai-an, who came out to water the horse.

On catching sight of her, Tai-an said, "Old Mother Feng, what are you doing here?"

"Mistress Hua sent me to deliver the jewelry," said Old Mother Feng. "Why is there so little sign of activity around here? She wants your master to come over and have a word with her."

"My master has been occupied with inconsequential affairs for some days," said Tai-an, "and hasn't had any free time. You'd better take the jewelry back with you for the time being. When I get done watering the horse I'll be sure to tell my master what you've said."

"My good fellow," said Old Mother Feng, "I'll wait right here if you'll just take the jewelry inside and speak to your master about it. Mistress Hua is annoyed enough with me as it is."

Tai-an was prevailed upon to tether the horse and go back inside. After some time he came out again and reported, "I've told my master what you said and he's agreed to accept the jewelry. He wants you to tell Mistress Hua to wait a few days longer until he's able to pay her a visit and speak to her in person."

Old Mother Feng went straight home and reported this message to her mistress, who had no alternative but to wait a few days longer.

Before she knew it, the fifth month came to an end and she found herself in the first decade of the sixth month.

Pining by day and longing by night;
Of news from her lover she has none.
Beset by dreams, harried in spirit;
Her day of consummation is delayed.

Truly:

Too indolent to paint her moth eyebrows,
Too abashed to retouch her powdered face;
Her bosom swells with unexpressed resentment,
Her jadelike spirit is utterly distraught.

The woman waited expectantly for Hsi-men Ch'ing, but he did not come. Every day: Her intake of tea and food diminished,

Her spirits became ever more deranged.

At night:

Sleeping alone upon her pillow,
She tossed and turned obsessively.

Suddenly she heard a knocking at the gate and seemed to see Hsi-men Ch'ing coming in. The woman: Welcomed him at the door with a smile, and Led him into the room by the hand.

She asked him why he had failed to keep their tryst, and Each of them expressed their innermost thoughts.
Inseparable and impassioned,
They devoted the night to pleasure.
Only when the cock crowed and the day dawned,
Did he extricate himself and return home.

The woman awoke with a start and gave a great cry, but:

Her soul had already escaped.

Old Mother Feng hurried into the room to see what was amiss.

"Hsi-men Ch'ing just left," the woman said. "Have you locked the gate after him yet?"

"Your longing has addled your wits," said Old Mother Feng. "How could the Honorable Gentleman have been here? I haven't seen so much as his shadow."

From this time on, the woman's:

Dreamscapes were haunted.

Night after night she was disturbed by fox spirits with:

Assumed names and appropriated identities, who came to sap her vitality. Gradually her countenance grew wan and emaciated; she lost her appetite and took to her bed.

One day Old Mother Feng said to the woman, "I've asked that doctor, Chiang Chu-shan, who lives at the end of Main Street, to come and see you."

This man was still young, no more than thirty.

Petite in stature,
Precious in bearing;

he was as frivolous and untrustworthy a person as you could find.

Invited into the woman's bedroom, he found her with:

Misty locks and cloudy tresses,
Lying huddled in her bedclothes;

looking, for all the world, as though she were suffering from insurmountable grief.

After he had consumed the obligatory tea, a maidservant placed a cushion in the appropriate spot and Chiang Chu-shan approached the bed and proceeded to palpate the patient's pulse. The fact that the woman was good-looking was not lost upon him as he embarked upon his diagnosis.

"In attempting to ascertain the cause of your indisposition just now, I find that your hepatic pulse is thready, becoming full after passing the *ostium pollicare*³⁵ on the wrist; whereas your yin pulses are sluggish in their ascent from the ostium pollicare to the *linea piscis*³⁶ at the foot of the thenar eminence. This indicates a condition, engendered by the six desires and seven passions, in which: Yin and yang contend with one another,

Producing alternate fevers and chills;
and is characterized by a feeling of internal melancholic congestion that cannot be dissipated.
It appears to be malaria but is not malaria,
It seems to be the ague but is not the ague.

By day you feel:

Enervated and sleepy,
Lacking all vitality;

and by night:

Your spirit will not keep to its abode,
But dallies with demons in your dreams.

If not treated in time, it may develop into a consumptive inflammation of the bones, which is nearly always fatal.³⁷ What a pity! What a pity!"

"If you will be good enough to prescribe an efficacious remedy," the woman said, "should I recover I will see that you are amply rewarded."

"I will, of course, do my best," said Chiang Chu-shan. "If you take my medicine I am sure you will be restored to perfect health."

When the consultation was over he got up to go. Li P'ing-erh gave Old Mother Feng five mace of silver and sent her after him to fetch the prescription.

That evening the woman took the medicine he had prescribed and was able to sleep undisturbed. Gradually her appetite improved and she began to comb her hair again and get up and about. In the space of a few days her spirits were back to normal.

One day, having prepared a feast and set aside three taels of silver, she sent Old Mother Feng to invite Chiang Chu-shan to come over so she could thank him for his pains.

Now, ever since Chiang Chu-shan had diagnosed Li P'ing-erh's illness he had been coveting her³⁸ for no little while. Thereupon he no sooner heard the invitation than he changed his clothes and presented himself. He was ushered into the reception room where the woman, resplendantly attired, came out to greet him. After the tea had been twice replenished, she invited him into her boudoir where: Wine and viands were already laid out,

Amid the fragrance of orchid and musk.

The young maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, stood in attendance, ready to present him with the three taels of silver on a platter decorated with gold tracery.

The woman:

Lifting high a jade goblet, came forward and saluted him, saying, "The other day, when I was feeling so out of sorts, you were good enough to prescribe an efficacious remedy that provided immediate relief. Today I have prepared a meager cup of watery wine and invited you here to express my gratitude."

"That was only my professional responsibility" said Chiang Chu-shan, "something that principle required. What need is there to make so much of it?"

Then, seeing the three taels that were being offered in return for his services, he said, "How could I presume to accept such generous remuneration?"

"It is but a paltry expression of my gratitude, far less than propriety would demand," the woman said. "I sincerely hope that you will be good enough to accept it."

Only after repeated demurrals did Chiang Chu-shan consent to take it.

The woman presented him with the wine and they took their seats. After:

Three rounds of drinks had been consumed,

Chiang Chu-shan stole a glance at the woman and saw that she was:

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade;

Astonishingly seductive and voluptuous.

Without further ado he determined to see if he could get a rise out of her.

"I hardly dare ask," he said, "how old you are, young lady?"

"I'm twenty-three," the woman responded.

"There's another thing I'm curious about," he said. "Why on earth should someone like you, still in the flower of youth, born and bred in respectable circumstances, with ample means to supply all your needs, have been suffering the other day from a melancholic congestion and feeling of insufficiency?"

When the woman heard this, she smiled, and said, "I will not deceive you, sir. Since my poor husband passed away my domestic circumstances have been desolate. I am all alone in the world and beset by worry and longing. How could I avoid falling ill?"

"How long has it been, in fact, since your husband died?" asked Chiang Chu-shan.

"My poor husband," the woman replied, "during the eleventh month of last year, came down with an acute intestinal fever and died. It must be nearly eight months ago by now."

"Who prescribed for him?" asked Chiang Chu-shan.

"Dr. Hu from Main Street," the woman replied.

"You don't mean that Hu the Quack who lives in Eunuch Director Liu's house on East Street, do you?" said Chiang Chu-shan. "He never attended the Imperial Academy of Medicine as I did. What does he know about the pulse? Why did you call upon someone like that?"

"It was only because my neighbors recommended him," the woman said, "that I engaged his services. But my poor husband was simply not fated to live. It had nothing to do with him."

"Do you have any boys or girls?" Chiang Chu-shan went on to ask.

"No," the woman replied.

"What a pity," said Chiang Chu-shan, "that in the youthful prime of life you should be living the lonely life of a widow, without any children to keep you company. Why don't you seek some means of improving your lot? If you resign yourself to such melancholy seclusion how can you help becoming ill?"

"Recently I have entered into an engagement to be married," the woman said. "I'll be crossing my husband's threshold sometime soon."

"May I ask who it is you plan to marry?" inquired Chiang Chu-shan.

"It's the Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing, who owns the wholesale pharmaceutical business on the street in front of the district yamen," the woman replied.

When Chiang Chu-shan heard this, he said, "That's bad! That's bad! Why would you want to marry him? I've often been called on to perform medical services in his household and know all about it. He's nothing but an influence peddler in the district yamen, and a loan shark as well. His home is a veritable flesh market. Not counting the maidservants, he's already got five or six bedmates, of higher and lower status, about the place, whom he subjects to a regular caning if they get out of hand. Whenever one of them fails to please him in any way, however slight, he calls in a go-between and disposes of her without more ado. He's: The foreman of the wife-beaters,

The leader of the lotharios.

"It's a good thing you told me about it. Otherwise, if you had entered his household, it would have been like: A moth darting into the flame.³⁹

You would have been trapped, unable to escape in any direction, and it would have been too late to think better of it. Moreover, he has recently been implicated in an affair involving his kinsman by marriage and is holed up in his home, unable to come out. The construction work he has undertaken is only half-finished and has all been abandoned. Documents have been dispatched from the Eastern Capital ordering the prefectural and district authorities to arrest the implicated parties. It looks as though the buildings he was working on are likely to end up being confiscated by the government. Why on earth, for no good reason, would you want to marry someone like that?"

With this single speech he reduced the woman to tight-lipped silence. On top of everything else, there were all the valuables that she had stashed in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

She pondered this for some time and kicked herself, thinking, "No wonder when I invited him again and again he never showed up. It really was because he was embroiled in something at home."

She also noticed that Chiang Chu-shan's conversation was animated and his demeanor unassuming and respectful.

"If I could only manage to marry someone like that in the future," she thought to herself. "I wonder if he already has a wife or not."

"I am much indebted to you for your advice," she went on to say. "If any family of your acquaintance should have a suitable match to propose, I would have no reason to refuse it."

Chiang Chu-shan rose to the bait. "May I ask what sort of person you have in mind, so I can come tell you about it if I should hear of anyone that fits the bill?"

"It really wouldn't matter to me whether his social status were high or low," the woman said. "Someone just like you would be fine."

If Chiang Chu-shan had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them: His joy was so great,

He lost his bearings.⁴⁰

Thereupon, he got up from his seat, knelt down before her, and said, "I will not deceive you. I have lost my helpmate and no longer have anyone to look after me.⁴¹ I have been living the life of a widower for some time and have no children. If you should be so considerate as to bestow your affections upon me and consent to a marriage alliance, it would fulfill the wish of a lifetime. Though I should have to: Carry rings and knot grass,⁴²

I will never dare to forget it."

The woman smiled and took him by the hand, saying, "Please get up. I don't even know how long you've been a widower, or how old you are. If you would like to marry me, you must engage a go-between to propose the match in order to fulfill the demands of propriety."

Chiang Chu-shan went down on his knees again and importuned her as follows: "I am twenty-eight years old and was born on the twenty-seventh day of the first month at six o'clock in the morning. Unfortunately, my poor wife died last year. I possess but meager resources and my origins are humble. Since you have been good enough to grant your gracious consent, what need is there for the intercession of a matchmaker?"⁴³

When the woman heard these words she smiled, saying, "If you don't have any money, I have an old waiting woman here, named Feng, who can serve as go-between and witness. There's no need for you to present any betrothal gifts. All we need to do is pick an auspicious day and I will take you into my household as my husband. What do you think?"

Chiang Chu-shan hastily threw himself at her feet, with the words, "Young lady, you are like: Another set of parents to me,

A reborn father and mother.⁴⁴

This must have been fated in a prior existence,⁴⁵

Such good fortune would suffice for three lives.”⁴⁶

Li P'ing-erh Takes Chiang Chu-shan as Mate

Then and there, in the room they were in, the two of them exchanged loving cups, and the marriage contract was concluded. Chiang Chu-shan continued to drink with her until evening before going home.

The woman discussed the situation with Old Mother Feng, saying, "Since Hsi-men Ch'ing's household is implicated in such an affair: The outcome is unpredictable.

Moreover, I'm so alone here that when I fell ill I was lucky to escape with my life. Under the present circumstances, I might just as well take this doctor as my husband and try to make a go of it with him; why not?"

The next day she sent Old Mother Feng to communicate with him. She had selected the eighteenth day of the sixth month as the most auspicious date for the occasion, and when the time came she brought Chiang Chu-shan across the threshold and they became man and wife.

After the “third-day celebrations” were over, the woman got together three hundred taels worth of capital and had a twelve-foot-wide segment of the frontage of her residence opened up to serve as a dispensary for Chiang Chu-shan. As a result: Everything was put on an entirely new footing.⁴⁷

Originally, when he made calls on his patients, he had had to go on foot. But now he was able to buy a donkey to ride. He cut quite a figure as he came and went in the streets. But no more of this. Truly: Even a puddle of stagnant water, completely undisturbed,

May yet find its surface ruffled by the spring breeze.⁴⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 18

LAI-PAO TAKES CARE OF THINGS IN THE EASTERN CAPITAL; CH'EN CHING-CHI SUPERVISES THE WORK IN THE FLOWER GARDEN

It is deplorable, but man's heart is more venomous than a snake;¹
Who is aware that the eye of Heaven rolls as relentlessly as a wheel?
The property once purloined from one's neighbor to the east;

Will someday revert to the family on the north.

Unrighteous riches are like snow sprinkled with scalding water;

Unearned property is like sand propelled by the tide.
If one takes craft and cunning to be the secret of success;
It will prove as evanescent as the morning and the evening clouds.²

AT THIS POINT the story divides into two. We will say no more, for the moment, about Chiang Chu-shan's marriage into Li P'ing-erh's household, but return to the story of Lai-pao and Lai-wang's trip to the Eastern Capital to fix things up on Hsi-men Ch'ing's behalf.

Every morning they took to the purple road;
Each evening they tramped the red dust.
When hungry they ate, when thirsty they drank;³
Proceeding by moonlight, enveloped in stars.⁴

One day, they arrived at the Eastern Capital, entered through the Myriad Years Gate, and sought out an inn at which to take lodgings for the night.

The next day, they set out to see what they could learn in the streets. By listening to the "wind-borne words"⁵ of passersby, who:

Put their heads together to whisper,⁶ Gossiping in the streets and discoursing in the alleys,⁷ they ascertained that on the previous day the report of the joint inquiry with regard to the minister of war, Wang Fu, had elicited an imperial rescript confirming the sentence of execution after the Autumn Assizes. But because not all of the relatives and adherents of Commander Yang Chien had yet been apprehended, a final determination of his case was still pending, though further developments were expected to occur that very day.

Lai-pao and his companion, carrying their presents with them, lost no time in making their way to the gate of Ts'ai Ching's residence. Since they had come to the capital to take care of things twice before, they already knew their way around. Taking their stand beneath the commemorative arch on Dragon's Virtue Street, they waited to see what they could find out about the situation inside the mansion.

Before long, they saw a figure, clad in black, hurriedly coming out of the grand preceptor's residence and heading toward the east. Lai-pao recognized him to be the factotum, Yang Sheng, on the domestic staff of Commander Yang Chien.

He was on the verge of stopping him to ask how matters stood when he thought to himself, "The master didn't tell me to call on him." So he held his peace and let him go his way.

After waiting for some time, the two of them went up to the door of the mansion and saluted the gatekeeper with a deep bow, saying, "Might we ask, is His Honor, the grand preceptor, at home or not?"

"His Honor is not at home," the gatekeeper replied. "He has not yet returned from the deliberations at court. Why do you ask?"

"If you would be so kind," Lai-pao continued, "as to invite out the majordomo, Chai Ch'ien; I have something to report to him."

"The majordomo, Uncle Chai, is also not in," the functionary replied. "He went out together with His Honor."

"Wait a minute," Lai-pao thought to himself. "He's not being very forthcoming. He must be expecting to receive a little something for his pains."

Thereupon, he pulled a tael's worth of silver out of his sleeve and handed it to him.

The functionary took it and then asked, "Is it His Honor you want to see, or His Excellency, the academician? If it's His Honor you want, the person to go through is the principal majordomo, Chai Ch'ien. If it's His Excellency you want, the person to go through is the secondary majordomo, Kao An. Each of them has his own responsibilities. Moreover, His Honor has not yet returned from court; only His Excellency, the academician, is at home. If you have something to take up with him, I can invite out Majordomo Kao for you. Whatever your business may be, he can arrange an interview with His Excellency for you. It's all the same."

Lai-pao took advantage of the occasion by equivocating, "We are here on business from the household of Commander Yang."

When the functionary heard this, he dared not be remiss, but went straight into the mansion. After some time, Kao An appeared.

Lai-pao hastily made his obeisance and offered him ten taels of silver, saying, "I am a servitor of Commander Yang's who came to get the news from His Honor along with the factotum, Yang Sheng. Because I stopped on the way to get something to eat, I'm a bit late. It never occurred to me that he would come right ahead, so I was unable to catch up."

Kao An accepted the gratuity, saying, "Your factotum, Yang Sheng, left just a minute ago. His Honor is still detained at court. If you will wait a little bit, I'll see if I can arrange an interview for you with His Excellency."

So saying, he conducted Lai-pao past the great reception hall in the second courtyard, through an interior gate on one side, and up to a spacious eighteen-foot-wide structure that was situated with its back to the north and its front facing south. This building was adorned with a green-painted balustrade and displayed a vermilion plaque over the lintel that had been presented by the emperor himself. It was inscribed with four large gold characters in the imperial hand, set off against an intaglio ultramarine ground, that read "The Academician's Music Chamber."

It so happened that Ts'ai Ching's son, Ts'ai Yu,⁸ was also a favorite of the emperor's. At the time in question he held concurrently the posts of academician of the Hall of Auspicious Harmony, minister of rites, and superintendent of the Temple of the Supreme Unity.

Lai-pao waited outside the door while Kao An went in to confer with his master. When he came out, he summoned Lai-pao to follow him inside and kneel in the middle of the hall. A beaded blind was suspended at the upper end of the room, behind which Ts'ai Yu was seated, wearing an informal gown and a soft cap.

"Where do you come from?" he asked.

"I am a servant of Commander Yang's kinsman, Ch'en Hung," Lai-pao replied. "I came in the company of the commander's factotum, Yang Sheng, in order to ask His Honor for news. Unexpectedly, he got a head start on me, and I have been unable to catch up with him."

Thereupon, he pulled a document out of his breast pocket and handed it up.

When Ts'ai Yu saw that the words "Five hundred piculs of white rice"⁹ were written on it, he called Lai-pao to come up closer, and said to him, "His Honor, because of the allegations against him on the part of the censors, has for some days now avoided participation in the work of the Secretariat. Responsibility for such matters, including yesterday's report of the joint inquiry of the Three Judicial Offices, is in the hands of the minister of the right, Li Pang-yen.¹⁰ It is said that, with regard to the accusations against Commander Yang, news leaked out of the palace yesterday that His Majesty is disposed to be magnanimous and will reserve the matter for special treatment. Those of his subordinates and employees whose names have been ascertained will be tried as soon as the investigation is completed. You would be well advised to go to Li Pang-yen's place to make your plea."

Lai-pao kowtowed repeatedly, saying, "I have no entrée to Minister Li's mansion. I hope that Your Excellency will deign to show me some consideration, for Commander Yang's sake."

"Go to the area just north of the Heavenly River Bridge," Ts'ai Yu responded, "and look for a great gateway standing at the top of a rise. Ask for the residence of the minister of the right, grand academician of the Hall for Aid in Governance, and concurrently minister of rites, Li Pang-yen. Everyone will know where it is. However, I might as well send someone from my staff to take you there."

There and then, he ordered an usher to fetch a sheet of stationery, affixed his seal to it, and sent the majordomo, Kao An, to escort him to Minister Li's place and argue, thus and so, on his behalf. Kao An took the document and accompanied Lai-pao out the gate of the mansion, where they picked up Lai-wang to carry the presents. After traversing Dragon's Virtue Street they headed straight for the gate of Li Pang-yen's mansion above the Heavenly River Bridge.

It so happened that Li Pang-yen had just returned home after the morning audience. He was at the door, dressed in a scarlet crepe robe, with a jade-ornamented girdle about his waist, in the act of seeing off a senior official, who got into his sedan chair and went his way. When he returned to the reception hall, the gatekeeper announced that His Excellency, the academician Ts'ai Yu, had sent his majordomo to see him. He first summoned Kao An into his presence and talked to him for a while before calling on Lai-pao and Lai-wang to come inside, where they knelt down below the dais at the upper end of the hall. Kao An stood to one side and passed up Ts'ai Yu's sealed letter and the list of presents. Lai-pao then proceeded to make a formal presentation of the gifts from below.

When Li Pang-yen saw them, he said, "In view of the fact that you are asking a favor on behalf of His Excellency, Ts'ai Yu, and that you also represent a kinsman of Commander Yang's, how could I ever accept these presents? Moreover, as far as Commander Yang is concerned, yesterday His Majesty's heart was moved to clemency, so his problems are already over. The only thing is that a number of his subordinates, because of the gravity of the charges brought by the censors, are sure to be tried and sentenced."

There and then, he ordered an attendant clerk to fetch the list of names that had been forwarded by the Office of Scrutiny the day before and show it to Lai-pao. It read as follows:

Under the name of Wang Fu: clerical subofficial Tung Sheng; henchman Wang Lien; and foreman Huang Yü.

Under the name of Yang Chien: miscreant clerical subofficial Lu Hu; factotum Yang Sheng; domestic clerks Han Tsung-jen and Chao Hung-tao; foreman Liu Sheng; relatives and adherents Ch'en Hung, Hsi-men Ch'ing, Hu the Fourth, etc.

All of the above-named persons:

Fall into the category of mere falcons and hounds;¹¹
Are of the same ilk as the “fox who flaunted the tiger’s might.”¹²

By manipulating their superiors they have been able to take advantage of their power to do harm to others. In rapaciousness and cruelty they are without parallel, and the catalogue of their abuses has reached mountainous proportions. On their account the common people have been made to knit their brows and the marketplaces are in an uproar.

We humbly request that Your Majesty relinquish the members of this entire faction to the hands of the judicial authorities and either condemn them to military exile on the distant frontier, where they may contend against monsters and demons, or subject them to condign punishment, in order to reaffirm the law of the land. They ought not to be permitted to remain at large for even a single day.

When Lai-pao read this document, he was thrown into consternation and kowtowed repeatedly, pleading, “I am a retainer of Hsi-men Ch’ing’s. I hope Your Honor will see fit to open wide your all-embracing heart and save my master’s life.”

Kao An also got down on his knees and made a plea on his behalf.

When Li Pang-yen saw that he was being offered five hundred taels of silver to deal with but a single name, he could hardly refuse to do the requested favor. There and then, he ordered his attendants to bring in his writing desk, took up his brush, and so altered the name on the document that, instead of reading Hsi-men Ch’ing, it read Chia Lien.¹³ At the same time he indicated his acceptance of the presents and had them put away.

When Li Pang-yen had finished taking care of the matter, he wrote a note in reply to the academician Ts’ai Yu, and also rewarded Kao An, Lai-pao, and Lai-wang with a sealed packet containing fifty taels of silver. Once they were out in the street, Lai-pao and Lai-wang took their leave of the majordomo, Kao An, and went back to their inn, where they got their luggage together, paid the bill, and set out posthaste to return to Ch’ing-ho district.

As soon as they arrived home, they went to see Hsi-men Ch’ing and told him, from beginning to end, everything they had done in the Eastern Capital. When Hsi-men Ch’ing heard what they had to say it was:

Just as though he had been dunked in a tub of ice water.

“It’s a good thing I sent someone to take care of things,” he said to Wu Yüeh-niang. “Otherwise, who knows what might have happened?”

Truly, on this occasion, Hsi-men Ch’ing’s life was like:

Lai-pao Takes Care of Things in the Eastern Capital

The setting sun that has already sunk behind the western hills;
 When it is summoned forth once more to scale the Fu-sang tree.¹⁴
 Only then did he feel as though:

The stone on his head had finally fallen to the ground.

By the time two days had gone by, his gate was no longer closed, the construction work in his garden was resumed, and he began, gradually, to appear in public again.

One day, Tai-an was riding on horseback along Lion Street when he noticed that a large pharmaceutical shop had been opened in the front part of Li P'ing-erh's residence, with sizable stocks of raw and prepared pharmaceuticals visible within. There was a small red counter, a lacquered plaque over the door, and a shop sign hanging outside. Business appeared to be brisk.

When he got home, he told Hsi-men Ch'ing about it.

Not yet knowing that Chiang Chu-shan had married into Li P'ing-erh's household, Tai-an merely said, "Mistress Hua has acquired a manager somewhere and opened a pharmaceutical shop."

On hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing only half believed it.

One day, in the middle decade of the seventh month, when:

The autumn wind begins to sigh, and

The jade dew grows more chilly,¹⁵

Hsi-men Ch'ing was riding his horse along the street when he ran into Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta.

The two of them called him to a halt and when he dismounted saluted him, saying, "Brother, where've you been keeping yourself all this while? We went by your place several times but saw that the gate was shut and didn't venture to intrude. We've been utterly at a loss for lo, these many days. Really, Brother, what have you been up to at home, anyway? Have you taken our new sister-in-law to wife? You haven't invited us yet to help celebrate the occasion."

"It was something I didn't feel like mentioning," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Because the Ch'en family, to whom I'm related by marriage, got into a sticky predicament, I had to busy myself with their affairs for a few days. The wedding has had to be postponed."

"We didn't know you had anything to worry about," said Ying Po-chüeh. "But now that we've run into you today, we're not about to let you get away scot-free. Come share three cups with us at Wu Yin-erh's place in the licensed quarter. It will help dispel your gloom."

So saying:

Without permitting any further explanation, they dragged Hsi-men Ch'ing off into the licensed quarter, leaving Tai-an and P'ing-an to follow after them with the horse. Truly:

On the return trip one only grieves that the days are short;
When homesick one is prone to regret that the horse is slow.
Worldly wealth, painted faces, and wine
in the sing-song houses;
Who is there who is not deluded
by these three things?¹⁶

That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing allowed himself to be dragged off to Wu Yin-erh's place by the two of them, where they proceeded to drink the day away. Not until evening began to fall and he was half inebriated did they let him go.

Whipping up his horse, he was passing by the end of East Street on his way home when he ran into Old Mother Feng, who was coming from the south in a great hurry.

Hsi-men Ch'ing reined in his horse and asked, "Where are you going?"

"Mistress Hua sent me to attend the Ullambana¹⁷ services at the temple outside the South Gate," replied Old Mother Feng. "She asked me to have a coffer of paper money burned on behalf of the deceased Hua Tzu-hsü. I have had to hurry in order to get back before the gates are closed."

"Is Mistress Hua at home and well?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, drunkenly. "I'll come have a word with her tomorrow."

"Why should you ask after her anymore, sir?" demanded Old Mother Feng. "You had a ready-made, fully cooked meal there for the asking, but you let someone snitch the pot away from under your very nose."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words, he was astonished.

"You don't mean to say she's married someone else?" he asked.

"Mistress Hua sent me over to your place to deliver the jewelry again and again," Old Mother Feng replied. "But I was never able to see you. Your gate was closed. I persuaded your servant to go inside and urge you to action, but you didn't pay any attention. Now someone else has taken her. What have you got to say about it?"

"Who is it?" demanded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Old Mother Feng told him the whole story, from beginning to end. How, during the third watch in the middle of the night, the woman had been troubled by fox spirits and had fallen ill. How she gradually approached the brink of death. How she had engaged Dr. Chiang Chu-shan who lived on Main Street to come and see her. How she had taken his medicine and subsequently recovered. How, on such and such a day, she had brought him across the threshold and they had become man and wife. And how she had now produced three hundred taels worth of capital and set him up with a pharmaceutical shop of his own.

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard about this nothing might have happened, but having heard about it, he was so angry he tried to stamp his feet though he was still on horseback.

"That's bad!" he called out. "If you'd married anyone else, it wouldn't bother me. But how could you bring yourself to marry a stunted little cuckold like that? What can he do for you?"

Thereupon he whipped up his horse and headed straight home. He had just dismounted and was going through the inner gate when he came upon Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and his daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, in the courtyard outside the front reception hall, where they were amusing themselves by skipping rope¹⁸ in the moonlight. As soon as they saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come home, Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh withdrew to the rear of the compound. P'an Chin-lien, alone, remained behind, leaning against one of the pillars of the reception hall while she fiddled with her shoe.

"So you whores are bored enough to scream, are you!" Hsi-men Ch'ing shouted at her, drunkenly. "Don't you have anything better to do than jump rope?"

As he spoke, he went up to Chin-lien and kicked her twice. When he arrived in the rear of the compound, instead of going into Wu Yüeh-niang's room to change his clothes, he went back to an anteroom on the western side of the front courtyard that he was accustomed to use as a study, where he demanded his bedding and proposed to spend the night. All the while, he proceeded to:

Beat the maidservants, and Abuse the page boys, giving every indication of being in a foul mood.

His womenfolk huddled together in consternation, not knowing how to account for it. Wu Yüeh-niang was very critical of Chin-lien.

"You could tell he was drunk when he came in," she said. "All you had to do was take a few steps to get out of his way. Instead of which, you did everything you could to attract his attention, doubling up with laughter and fiddling with your shoe. As a result:

The locust and the grasshopper,

Are cursed in the same breath."¹⁹

"It's bad enough to abuse us," said Meng Yü-lou, "but how can he call our elder sister a whore? The unprincipled good-for-nothing!"

"It seems I'm the only one in the house fit to be taken advantage of," said Chin-lien, picking up where Yü-lou had left off. "The three of you were all there, just as I was, but I'm the only one who got kicked. It would appear that some people are more privileged than others."

This incensed Yüeh-niang, who said, "Then why didn't you get him to give me a kick too, just for starters? If you're not privileged around here, I'd like to know who is? You don't know your place, you lousy baggage, but at least I keep quiet about it; while you're always spouting off, yakkety-yak, with that mouth of yours!"

When Chin-lien saw that Yüeh-niang was angry, she tried to deflect the conversation in an effort to cover her tracks.

"Sister," she said, "that's not it at all. The fact is, whenever he gets upset anywhere, for whatever reason, he vents his spleen on me. He's always opening his eyes wide and threatening a thousand, if not ten thousand, times to beat me to a stinking pulp."

"Whoever told you to provoke him in the first place?" Yüeh-niang demanded.

If he doesn't beat you,

Should he beat the dog instead?"

"Elder Sister," said Yü-lou, "why don't you call in the page boy and ask him where he's been drinking today? Why should he have gone out in a perfectly good mood in the morning and come home in such a state?"

In no time at all, Tai-an was summoned into their presence and subjected to interrogation.

"You lousy jailbird!" Yüeh-niang railed at him. "If you don't tell the truth, I'll send for one of the older servants to hang you up and give you a real flogging. You and P'ing-an will both get ten strokes with the heavy bamboo."

"Don't beat me, mistress," said Tai-an. "I'll tell you the truth. Today the master, along with Uncle Ying the Second and company, had a drinking party in the Wu family establishment in the licensed quarter. They broke up early and, as he was passing the end of East Street on the way home, he ran into Old Mother Feng. She told him that Mistress Hua, having waited for him in vain, had married that Dr. Chiang Chu-shan who lives on Main Street. The master was as upset as could be all the way home."

"I can well believe it," said Yüeh-niang. "So that shameless perverted whore had such hot pants she couldn't wait to get married, did she? And now he comes home and vents his spleen on us."

"Mistress Hua didn't marry herself off to Dr. Chiang Chu-shan," said Tai-an. "She brought him across the threshold into her own household. And now she has put up the capital he needs to open a really prosperous big pharmaceutical shop. When I came home and told the master about it, he didn't, at first, believe it."

"If you stop to consider it," said Meng Yü-lou, "how long has her husband been dead, anyway? To marry someone like that, before her mourning period is even over, simply won't do at all."

"Nowadays," said Yüeh-niang, "who pays any attention to what will, or won't, do? It's not as though she were the only one with such hot pants she couldn't wait to get married until the mourning period for her husband was over. From whores like that, who spend all their time with their lovers:

Lolling in their cups, or

Snoozing in a stupor,²⁰

what kind of marital fidelity can you expect?"

Gentle reader take note: This speech of Yüeh-niang's;

Hit two people with one swipe of the stick.²¹

Both Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien had remarried before their mourning periods were over. When they heard these words, all they could do was return to their quarters, feeling somewhat discomfited. But enough of this. Truly:

One may find things less than satisfactory

eight or nine times out of ten;

But it is seldom wise to tell anyone about even two or three of them.²²

To resume our story, that evening Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in the anteroom on the west side of the front courtyard.

The next day, he arranged to have his son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, cooperate with Pen the Fourth in the task of supervising the construction work in the garden and handling the accounts, and he reassigned Lai-chao to responsibility for the main gate. His daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, spent the daylight hours in the rear of the compound, joining in the amusements of Wu Yüeh-niang and the other womenfolk, and only in the evening returned to the rooms on the eastern side of the front courtyard to sleep. Ch'en Ching-chi, on the other hand, spent his days in the garden supervising the construction work and did not venture as far as the rear reception hall unless asked. His meals were brought out to him from the back of the compound by page boys. As a result, the female members of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household had not even had a chance to meet him.

One day, Hsi-men Ch'ing was away from home, attending a farewell party for Battalion Commander Ho Chin of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. Wu Yüeh-niang had been feeling concerned for some time that ever since Ch'en Ching-chi had moved in with them he had been working hard supervising the construction in the garden, and they had never even invited him for a meal to express their appreciation for his labors.

On this occasion, she said to Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh, "I've wanted to do something about it, but have been afraid my husband would criticize me for interfering; if I don't do anything, though, it just doesn't seem right to me. When someone else's child is visiting you and gets up early and goes to bed late every day, working as hard as he can, to accomplish some task on your behalf, is it right that no one should think of some way of thanking him for his efforts?"

"Sister," said Meng Yü-lou, "you're the mistress of the household. If you don't concern yourself about it, who else is going to do so?"

Wu Yüeh-niang thereupon sent orders to the kitchen to prepare a table of wine, delicacies, and savories, and at noon she invited Ch'en Ching-chi to come in and share a meal with them.

Ch'en Ching-chi dropped his work, told Pen the Fourth to take over, and went straight into the rear compound. When he had finished bowing and paying his respects to Yüeh-niang, he sat down to one side. Hsiao-yü provided him with tea and, after he had done drinking it, brought in a table for him and served up a selection of vegetable dishes and hors d'oeuvres.

"Son-in-law," said Yüeh-niang, "you've been working hard every day supervising the construction in the garden. I've wanted to invite you in for a visit, but haven't had the opportunity. Today your father-in-law is not at home and I'm not otherwise engaged, so I've prepared a cup of watery wine as a means of expressing our appreciation for your labors."

"Your son is much indebted to both of you for your kindness," said Ching-chi. "What labors have I performed that you should put yourself to so much trouble?"

Yüeh-niang offered him a drink and Ching-chi sat down again to one side. Before long, the full complement of delicacies arrived, and Yüeh-niang kept him company for a while as he drank.

"Go and invite our daughter to join us," she said to Hsiao-yü.

"Mistress Ch'en is busy right now," said Hsiao-yü. "She'll be here in a minute."

Before long, they heard the sound of dominoes²³ being played in the inner room.

"Who is it playing dominoes?" Ching-chi asked.

"Your wife is playing dominoes with my maidservant, Yü-hsiao," replied Yüeh-niang.

"You can see she has no sense of propriety," said Ching-chi. "When you call for her, she doesn't come, but stays in the room and goes on with her game."

Sometime later, Hsi-men Ta-chieh lifted aside the portiere and came into the parlor, where she sat down across from her husband to have a drink with him.

"Is our son-in-law any good at dominoes?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"He knows something of the rudiments," said Mistress Ch'en.

At that time, Wu Yüeh-niang thought of Ch'en Ching-chi only as a worthy son-in-law and did not realize that, in fact, he was a young scamp. When it came to poetry, lyrics, songs, or rhapsodies; backgammon and elephant chess; or the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts, there was:

Nothing he had not mastered,

Little he did not know.

There is a lyric to the tune "Moon on the West River" that testifies to this:

Artful and accomplished from his youth,
Romantic and dashing as can be;
He loves to wear duck green, spend newly minted silver,
Or take a hand at backgammon or elephant chess.

Master of the p'i-p'a, pipes, and woodwinds;
Adept at fowling, horse racing, and kick-ball;
There is only one chink in his armor:
When he sees a pretty face he's a goner.

"Since your husband knows his dominoes," said Yüeh-niang, "why don't we all go inside and play a few hands together?"

"You and my wife play, Mother," said Ching-chi. "Your son really oughtn't to presume."

"It's all in the family, Son-in-law," said Yüeh-niang. "What is there to worry about?"

So saying, she led the way into the inner room. There they found Meng Yü-lou sitting on the bed, over which a madder-red strip of felt had been placed, playing with the dominoes.

On seeing Ch'en Ching-chi come in, she got up to go, but Yüeh-niang said, "It's only our son-in-law, not an outsider. Just give him a bow in greeting."

Then, turning to Ch'en Ching-chi, she said, "This is your Third Lady."

Ching-chi promptly made her a bow and Yü-lou returned his salute.

Thereupon Yü-lou, Mistress Ch'en, and Yüeh-niang played a threesome together, while Ching-chi kibitzed on the sidelines. After they had played for a while, Mistress Ch'en lost and stepped down, allowing Ching-chi to take her place.

When play was resumed, Meng Yü-lou melded a double six, a one-six, and a double one to produce the combination known as "Heaven and Earth Separated."²⁴ Ch'en Ching-chi added a five-six and another double six to Yü-lou's double six to produce the combination known as "One Spot Short."²⁵ Wu Yüeh-niang put down a pair of double fours and a double three, attempting to make the combination known as "Eight that Don't Add Up,"²⁶ but could not play her double three on the double one.

Trying first this and then that, she was unable to combine her dominoes with those on the board in order to make a scoring combination.

Just at that moment, P'an Chin-lien lifted aside the portiere and walked in. She was wearing a chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree into which she had inserted a fresh cactus flower.

Looking as captivating as ever, she laughed, saying, "I was wondering who it could be in here, and it turns out to be Master Ch'en."

When Ch'en Ching-chi swiveled his neck to see who had come in, she burst upon his sight to such effect that:

On Seeing P'an Chin-lien Ch'en Ching-chi Loses His Wits

His heart quivered, his eyes wavered, but
His soul had already escaped.

Truly:

Five hundred years ago these lovers were fated to meet this day;
Thirty years of bliss may be the result of just such an encounter.²⁷

"This is your Fifth Lady," said Yüeh-niang. "Just give her a bow in greeting, Son-in-law."

Ching-chi promptly stepped forward to make her a deep bow, and Chin-lien returned his salute.

"Take a look at this, Sister Five," said Yüeh-niang. "The young fledgeling has got the old corbie beat."

Chin-lien stepped closer, leaning against the bedrail with one hand and flirting a white gauze circular fan with the other, as she advised Yüeh-niang, saying, "That's not the best way to play your dominoes, Elder Sister. If you put the double three over there instead, you'll have the combination "Heaven All Different,"²⁸ which will beat Master Ch'en and Sister Three."

Just as the group of them were in the midst of enjoying their domino game, who should come in, carrying his master's felt bag, but Tai-an, who said, "Father's come home."

Yüeh-niang hurriedly told Hsiao-yü to escort Master Ch'en out by the postern gate.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had dismounted and come inside he went first to the front part of the compound to take a look at the construction work and then slipped into P'an Chin-lien's quarters.

Chin-lien made haste to receive him and helped him off with his outdoor things, saying, "You're home early from your farewell party today."

"Battalion Commander Ho Chin of the Provincial Surveillance Commission has just been promoted to the post of commander of Hsin-p'ing Stockade," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All his acquaintances from the entire guard battalion went out to the suburbs to see him off. Since he sent me an invitation, I could hardly decline to show up."

"You could use something to drink," said Chin-lien. "I'll tell the maidservant to bring you some wine."

Before long, a table was prepared for a drinking party and appropriate dishes were set before them. As they were drinking, Hsi-men Ch'ing brought up the fact that the ridgepole of the summerhouse in the garden would be put in place within a few days. A lot of friends and relatives would be invited, who would bring boxes of candied fruit, wine, and congratulatory red banners to commemorate the occasion; and they would have to hire caterers to supply a feast for their entertainment.

When they had talked for a while, it began to grow late. Ch'un-mei took a lamp and returned to her room, leaving the two of them to go to bed by themselves.

Because he had gotten up early to go to the farewell party, Hsi-men Ch'ing was tired. After only a few cups of wine he became drunk. No sooner did his head hit the pillow than he was:

Snoring thunderously;

Stertorously unwakable.

The weather was that of the third decade of the seventh month, so the nights were still rather hot. Under the circumstances, how could P'an Chin-lien be expected to get to sleep?

Suddenly, she became aware of the thunderous drone of mosquitoes inside the green gauze netting. Standing up, stark naked, she took a lighted candle in her hand and searched the interior of the net for mosquitoes, burning them one at a time as she found them.

Looking down, she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing, lying faceup on the pillow, fast asleep. She shook him but could not wake him up. The organ that lay between his loins was constricted by a clasp so that:

It was tumid and long.²⁹

Before she knew it, her:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Putting down the candlestick, she began to manipulate his organ with her slender fingers. After she had toyed with it for a while, she squatted down and began to suck it, moving it first this way and then that.

Hsi-men Ch'ing woke up and cursed at her, "You crazy little whore! Your daddy's asleep and you still want to plague him to death."

So saying, he got up and sat on the pillow, telling her to stay where she was and suck away. Meanwhile, he:

Bent his head to observe the action,³⁰

In order to augment his pleasure.³¹

Truly:

No wonder the beauty has become so extremely libidinous;

Late at night she practices in secret on the purple phoenix flute.

There is a lyric composed of double meanings on the subject of the mosquito that testifies to this:

To the tune "Treading the Grass"

I love its diminutive body,
And its attenuated waist.

With its throbbing sussuration it's forever buzzing about.
At dusk, when people forget to close their red doors,
It surreptitiously sneaks inside
the gauze netting.

Gently nuzzling the fragrant flesh,
Casually enamored of the jade body,

Whatever its mouth touches
it stains with rouge.
In one's ears it produces a constant hubbub;
Late at night, refusing to let one sleep.

The woman continued to toy with him for about the time it would take to eat a meal when Hsi-men Ch'ing suddenly had an idea. He summoned Ch'un-mei to decant some wine and stand beside the bed with flagon in hand. Then he moved the candle onto the backboard of the bed and ordered the woman to turn around and get down on all fours in front of him. Inserting his organ into hers in order to:

Poke up the fire on the other side of the mountains,³²
he told her to move back and forth as she liked while he proceeded to drink and enjoy himself from his superior vantage point.

"You insinuating ruffian!" the woman cursed at him. "Since when did you come up with this brand new way of doing things? How weird can you get? With the maidservant looking on to boot! What do you think you're up to?"

"I've told you before," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "your sister P'ing-erh and I often used to do it like this. We'd get her maidservant, Ying-ch'un, to hold the flagon and pour the wine for us. It's amusing to do it this way."

"I'd only be wasting my breath on you!" said the woman. "My sister P'ing-erh! Sister my prick! What are you dragging that whore into it for? As far as I'm concerned:

Even the best intentions go quite unrequited.³³
That whore had such hot pants she couldn't wait for you, but went off and married somebody else, didn't she?

"The other day, when you came home after you'd been drinking and found the three of us skipping rope in the courtyard together, you singled me out to vent your spleen on. I was the only one you chose to kick; and for that I was even given a hard time in certain quarters. It would seem that I'm the only one fit to be taken advantage of around here."

"Who gave you a hard time?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"After you came in the other day," the woman said, "the lady in the master suite got into quite an altercation with me. She accused me of talking back to her and called me a baggage who didn't know my place. The more I think about it, the more it seems that:

All you get for raising toads is dropsy.³⁴
So now everyone's down on me."

"That's not it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm not down on you. What happened the other day was that brother Ying the Second and that bunch dragged me off to Wu Yin-erh's place for a drink. On my way home I ran into Old Mother Feng in the street and she told me, thus and so, all about it. I was so angry I was stupefied. If she'd married anyone else, I could have taken it; but Dr. Chiang Chu-shan, that lousy stunted little cuckold! It's a wonder Hua the Elder hasn't bitten his balls off! What can he do for her that she should take him into her household and set him up with the capital to open a rival store and start doing business, as cool as you please, right under my nose?"

"It's a wonder you have the face to mention it," the woman said. "Didn't I tell you at the time that:

The first one to cook the rice is the first to eat?³⁵
But you didn't pay any attention to me and insisted on getting Elder Sister's permission. As the saying goes:
To defer when you differ,
Is to give up the dipper.³⁶

It was your mistake. You've got no one to blame but yourself."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so exasperated by these few words of the woman that:

The fire that ignited in the core of his crater, Turned half the cloud-capped volcano into magma.

"Let her do as she likes," he said. "If that undutiful whore says another word about it, she'll find out soon enough how much attention she can expect to get from me."

Gentle reader take note: It has always been true that malicious words and deceitful conduct are not unknown even between rulers and ministers, fathers and sons, husbands and wives, and elder and younger brothers; to say nothing of friends. If even so worthy and chaste a wife as Wu Yüeh-niang, who enjoyed the status of principal consort, could become abruptly alienated from her husband merely because Hsi-men Ch'ing chose to listen to the mischievous pillow talk of P'an Chin-lien, how much the more should one be on one's guard in matters of more moment.

From this time on, relations between Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang were so embittered that they refused to speak to each other when they met. Yüeh-niang let him spend the night with whomever he liked and made no attempt to interfere. No matter whether he arrived late or departed early, she paid no attention. Even when he came into their rooms to get something she would tell the maidservant to deal with it and pay him no heed. Thus the two of them let their feelings for each other grow cold. Truly:

Though the preceding carriages have overturned
by the thousands;
The carriages that follow continue to overturn
in the same way.
No matter how clearly one may point out
the safest route;
One's honest words are misconstrued
as ill-meant advice.

To resume our story, from the time that relations between Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang became embittered, P'an Chin-lien saw that her husband had succumbed to her wiles and believed that she had gained her objective. Every day she plucked up her spirits and:

Tricked herself out conspicuously,
To curry favor and court affection.

As a result of her meeting with Ch'en Ching-chi in the rear compound that day, she had noticed that the young scamp was:

Artful and accomplished, and got it into her head to see if she could seduce him; but she was too afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing to dare try anything. Whenever her husband was out of the house, however, she would send her maidservant to invite him into her room for a cup of tea, and they often spent their time playing board games together.

One day, the ridgepole of Hsi-men Ch'ing's newly constructed summerhouse was ready to be put in place, and relatives and friends came to commemorate the occasion by hanging up congratulatory red banners. Many of them also brought boxes of candied fruit. The artisans of the various trades were all presented with gifts in reward for their services. The male guests were entertained in the main reception room, and it was sometime in the afternoon before the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing waited to see that everything was properly put away and then went back to the rear compound to get some sleep.

Ch'en Ching-chi came into Chin-lien's room and asked for some tea.

Chin-lien, who was sitting on the bed fiddling with her p'i-p'a, said, "You mean to tell me they've been celebrating up front for half the day, ever since the ridgepole was put in place, and you haven't had anything to drink, but have to come into my room looking for tea?"

"Your son would not deceive you, ma'am," said Ching-chi, "but since I got up in the middle of the night I've been busy these ten hours or more and haven't had anything to eat or drink."

"Where's your father-in-law?" the woman asked.

"He's gone to the rear compound to get some sleep," Ching-chi replied.

"Well, if you really haven't had anything," the woman said, turning to Ch'un-mei, "Get some of those stuffed steamed-shortcake pastries out of my cabinet and give them to Master Ch'en to eat."

Thereupon, four saucers of savory appetizers were dished up on Chin-lien's bed table for the delectation of the young scamp.

As he ate, he noticed that the woman was strumming her p'i-p'a and asked her, playfully, "Fifth Lady, what tune is that you're playing? Why don't you sing me a song?"

"My good Master Ch'en," the woman laughed, "I'm not the one you're after. Why should I sing you a song? Just wait till your father-in-law gets up and see if I don't tell him what you've been doing."

Ching-chi promptly fell to his knees with an ingratiating giggle and pled with her, "I beseech you, Fifth Lady, take pity on me. Your son will not dare do it again."

At this, the woman couldn't help laughing.

From that time on, the young scamp and the woman:

Became more intimate by the day.³⁷
Drinking tea and eating meals;
Traversing rooms and entering chambers;³⁸
Engaging in badinage and repartee;
Rubbing shoulders and nudging elbows;³⁹
They carried on without restraint.

Wu Yüeh-niang, taking him to be no more than a boy, allowed her disingenuous son-in-law the run of the house. By so doing she showed herself to be blind to her own shortcomings. Truly:

Knowing only how to rifle flowers in order to elaborate honey;
The bee knows not for whom it labors to provide something sweet.⁴⁰

It is deplorable, but Hsi-men Ch'ing's vigilance leaves much to be desired;
This fact encourages his peach and plum blossoms to smile in the spring breeze.
Under his layers of embroidered quilts
there sleeps a rogue;
With three meals of delicacies a day
he nurtures a tiger.
Enamored of her person, his son-in-law
covets his concubine;
Attracted by his wealth, he is prepared to do his father-in-law in.
And there is yet another privilege of which he can boast;

Traversing rooms and entering chambers
he can dally as he likes.⁴¹

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 19

SNAKE-IN-THE-GRASS SHAKES DOWN CHIANG CHU-SHAN; LI P'ING-ERH'S FEELINGS TOUCH HSI-MEN CH'ING

When flowers bloom they do not disdain
the plots of the poor;
The moon shines on mountains and rivers
so that all are bright.
In this world the heart of man alone
remains vile;
In all things demanding that Heaven show him favor.
The foolish, the deaf, and the dumb everywhere prosper;
While the clever and the intelligent suffer in poverty.
The year, month, day, and hour of birth determine it all;
However calculated, events are controlled by fate rather than man.¹

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing had been constructing a formal garden and summerhouse in his residential compound for nearly half a year before the final decorating, painting, and varnishing were completed. From front to back: Everything was put on an entirely new footing.

The housewarming celebrations lasted for several days. But no more of this.

One day, during the first decade of the eighth month, Hsi-men Ch'ing was invited to help celebrate the birthday of Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling at his newly purchased country estate. He had engaged the services of four singing girls, a band of musicians, and a troupe of tumblers and acrobats to entertain his guests. At ten o'clock in the morning, Hsi-men Ch'ing, having dressed himself to befit the occasion, set off on horseback, accompanied by four page boys.

Wu Yüeh-niang, during her husband's absence, prepared a feast of wine and delicacies and invited Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsüeh-o, Mistress Ch'en, and P'an Chin-lien to join her. They opened the gate of the new garden and proceeded to enjoy it at their leisure. When they surveyed the scene within: Flowers and trees, pavilions and terraces,

Stretched before them as far as the eye could see.²

Truly, it was a fine garden. Behold:

At the main entrance, fifteen feet high,
There stands a red-lacquered memorial arch;
All the way round, in twenty segments,
There stretches a crenellated wall of crushed limestone.
At the portal there is a gate tower;
Terraces and kiosks spread in all directions.
There are artificial hills and genuine waters;³
Blue-green bamboos and glaucous pine trees.
The structures that are high but not pointed are called terraces;
Whereas those that are lofty but not forbidding are called kiosks.

If one wishes to enjoy the four seasons, there are places for each of them:

In spring there is Swallow-flight Hall,
Where cypress and cedar vie in verdancy.
In summer there is Brookside Lodge,
Where lotus and water lily display their colors.
In autumn there is Halcyon House,
Where the golden chrysanthemum braves the frost.
In winter there is Hidden Spring Grotto,
Where the white plum blossom gathers snow.

Just see how:

Capricious blossoms immure the narrow paths;
Lissome willows brush the carved balustrades.
Tossed in the breeze, willow fronds raise their mothlike eyebrows;
Laden with raindrops, flowering crab apples display their delicate features.
Before Swallow-flight Hall,

The daffodils seem about to open but haven't opened;
Behind Hidden Spring Grotto,
The holly is in half bloom but not yet full bloom.
The pale plum blossoms east of the Lowland Bridge
bloom and fade;
The redbuds above the Cloud Repose Pavilion are not yet in flower.
By the ornamental rocks,
The elecampane has just blossomed;
Beside the painted railings,
The dianthus has just appeared.
With a flutter of wings the purple swallows penetrate the curtains;
In a burst of song the yellow orioles traverse the shadows.

And there are also:

Moon windows and snowy grottoes;

Not to mention:

Waterside retreats and breezy pavilions.
The banksia rose arbor,
Runs into the rose-leaved raspberry trellis;
The peach tree with its thousand leaves,
Confronts the willow of the three springs.

And there are also:

Lilacs,
Mimosa,
Caragana,
Yellow roses,
Jasmine,
And narcissus.

In front and behind the summerhouse there are:

Juniper hedges and bamboo-lined walks,
Serpentine streams and square pools.
Plantains and palm trees shade the steps;
Helianthus and pomegranate catch the sun.

Amid the waterweeds frolicking fish startle the beholder;

Among the flowers powdered butterflies dance in pairs.

Truly:

The peonies have hardly begun to reveal their bodhisattvas' faces;
Before the litchis are ready to put forth their mārārājas' heads.⁴

Thereupon, Wu Yüeh-niang led the other womenfolk into the garden.

Some hold hands as they wander along the flowery paths;

Others, seated on the fragrant grass, compare botanical specimens.

One, approaching the balustrade to survey the scene, Playfully picks red lovers' beans to toss at the goldfish;

Another, leaning on the railing to enjoy the flowers,

Gigglingly flirts her silken fan to startle the butterflies.

Wu Yüeh-niang made her way to the highest point in the garden, the Cloud Repose Pavilion, where she proceeded to play a board game with Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh. P'an Chin-lien, along with Mistress Ch'en, and Sun Hsüeh-o, ascended the Flower-viewing Tower, from which they could see extending before them: The tree peony grove,

The garden peony bed,
The crab apple bower,
The seven sisters trellis,
And the banksia rose arbor;

Not to mention:

That "cold-enduring gentleman," the bamboo,⁵
And that "snow-despising grandee," the pine.⁶

Truly:

All four seasons produce their never-fading flowers;

All eight festivals appear one everlasting spring.⁷

Such a vision is not exhaustible;
Such a view exceeds comprehension.⁸

Before long, the wine was served. Wu Yüeh-niang took the seat of honor, with Li Chiao-erh sitting across from her. To either side of them, Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsüeh-o, P'an Chin-lien, and Mistress Ch'en sat down in order of precedence.

"I forgot to invite Master Ch'en," said Yüeh-niang. Turning to Hsiao-yü, she said, "Quickly! Run up front and ask our son-in-law to join us."

It was not long before Ch'en Ching-chi presented himself:

His head adorned with an ultramarine silk cap,
His body clad in an informal gown of purple satin,
His feet shod in white-soled black boots.

After making his bow of greeting, he sat down next to his wife, Mistress Ch'en.

After they had been drinking for a while:

With the raising of glasses and passing of cups,

Wu Yüeh-niang went back to playing board games with Li Chiao-erh and Mistress Ch'en, while Sun Hsüeh-o and Meng Yü-lou climbed the Flower-viewing Tower to enjoy the view.

Chin-lien wandered off by herself, beside the flower beds in front of the artificial hill, where she amused herself by batting at the butterflies⁹ with her round white-silk fan. Unexpectedly, Ch'en Ching-chi, who had crept up behind her to see what she was up to, addressed her, saying, "Fifth Lady, you don't know how to go about batting a butterfly. Let me show you how it's done. These butterflies dart up one second and down the next, as if they can't make up their minds. They certainly are elusive creatures."

Chin-lien swiveled her powdered neck and gave him a sidelong glance. "You lousy short-life!" she berated him. "If anyone should overhear you, you'd be done for; though I suppose you're too far gone to care."

With a giggle, Ch'en Ching-chi pounced up to her, embraced her, and gave her a kiss. The woman responded by giving him a shove with her free hand that knocked the young scamp head over heels.

Though neither of them realized it, this scene had been observed from a distance by Meng Yü-lou, atop the Flower-viewing Tower, who now called out, "Sister Five, come over here. I've got something to tell you." Only then did Chin-lien abandon Ching-chi and go off to climb the tower.

Thus it happened that neither of the two butterflies were caught that day.

Though they may have made a swallows' tryst or orioles' assignation,¹⁰

The bee's antennae had no more than grazed the corolla of the flower.¹¹

Truly:

Though distracted bees and wanton butterflies¹²
are sometimes to be seen;

Once they fly into the pear blossoms
they disappear from view.¹³

On seeing that the woman was gone, Ch'en Ching-chi returned to his room without a word. Finding himself beset by melancholy, he improvised a song to the tune "Plucking the Cassia" in order to dispel his depression.

I saw her rakishly sporting a spray of blossoms;
Smiling as she toyed with her spray of blossoms.
On her ruby lips she wore no rouge;
But looked as though she did wear rouge.
When we met the other day,
And then met again today;
She seemed to have feelings for me,
But displayed no feelings for me.
Though she wished to consent;
She never gave her consent.
It looked as though she refused me;
But she really never did refuse me.
When can we make another assignation;
When will we ever see each other again?
If we don't meet,
She may long for me;
When we do meet,
I still long for her.¹⁴

We will say no more, for the moment, about Wu Yüeh-niang and the others as they feasted in the garden, but return to the story of Hsi-men Ch'ing's visit to Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling's country estate outside the South Gate.

On his way home, after the party was over, he happened to pass through the Southern Entertainment Quarter.¹⁵

Now in days gone by, Hsi-men Ch'ing had been a habitu  of the:

Three quarters and two alleys, of the pleasure precincts, so all the "knockabouts" there were known to him. The people called "knockabouts" at that time, during the Sung dynasty, corresponded to what are vulgarly referred to today as "bare sticks." Among these were two men, named Snake-in-the-grass, Lu Hua, and Street-skulking Rat, Chang Sheng, who had often been patronized by Hsi-men Ch'ing, and belonged to the: Chicken-pinching and dognapping ilk.

Hsi-men Ch'ing caught sight of the two of them that day as they were engaged in a gambling game and pulled up his horse in order to have a word with them. The two men immediately came up and greeted him by falling to one knee, asking, "Sir, where are you headed at such an hour?"

"Today is the birthday of His Honor, Hsia Yen-ling, of the Judicial Commissioner's Office," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He invited some of us to his country estate outside the South Gate to help celebrate the occasion. There is a favor I'd like to ask of you. Will you agree to do it or not?"

"Needless to say, sir," the two replied, "we are mindful of everything you've done for us in the past. If you now have a task for us to perform: Though we should have to go through fire and water,

We would not decline to suffer ten thousand deaths."¹⁶

"If that's the way you feel about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "come to my house tomorrow and I'll give you your instructions."

"Why wait till tomorrow?" the two demanded. "Tell us about it now. Really, what's up?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then:

Whispered into their ears in a low voice, and related the whole story of how Chiang Chu-shan had deprived him of Li P'ing-erh. "All I want you two fellows to do is to help me vent my spleen," he concluded.

Still on horseback, Hsi-men Ch'ing hitched up his clothes and groped for his wallet, which turned out to contain four or five taels worth of loose silver. Pouring it all out and handing it to the two men, he said, "Take this and buy yourselves some wine to drink. If you manage to pull this affair off successfully for me, I'll reward the two of you further."

Lu Hua refused to accept the money, saying, "It's not as though you haven't already done us any favors in the past, sir. I thought you might want to send us: Down to the floor of that great sea, the Eastern Ocean,

To wrest the horn from the Green Dragon's head;

Or up to the very summit of Mount Hua, the Western Peak,

To wrench the tusk from the White Tiger's jaws;

in which case, we might not be able to comply. But if it's only such a piddling task as this, where's the difficulty? This silver I absolutely refuse to accept."

"If you won't take it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I won't trouble you any further." Whereupon, he told Tai-an to repossess the silver, whipped up his horse, and started on his way.

Chang Sheng, however, stopped him, saying, "Lu Hua, you don't understand His Honor's disposition. If you don't take what you're offered, it will seem as though we're trying to get out of it."

Lu Hua then accepted the silver and kowtowed on his hands and knees, saying, "Just go home and relax, sir. In two days or less, you can absolutely rely on us to give you something to laugh about."

"As for me," said Chang Sheng, "if you could only manage, in the future, to wangle some sort of position for me with His Honor Hsia on the staff of the Judicial Commissioner's Office, that would be quite sufficient."

"Is that all?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "That goes without saying."

Gentle reader take note: Afterward, Hsi-men Ch'ing did recommend Chang Sheng to Hsia Yen-ling, who got him a job on the domestic staff of Chou Hsiu, the commandant of the Regional Military Command. But this is a subsequent event; having mentioned it, we will say no more about it.

These two "knockabouts" took their newly acquired silver and went back to gambling as before. By the time Hsi-men Ch'ing had ridden into the city through the South Gate and arrived home, the sun was already setting in the west.

When Wu Yüeh-niang and the others heard that he had come home they all went back to the rear compound. Only P'an Chin-lien remained in the summerhouse to see that everything was properly put away. Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go back to the rear compound but came straight into the garden. When he saw the woman supervising the clearing up in the pavilion, he asked, "What have you all been up to here during my absence?"

"Today," Chin-lien said with a smile, "Elder Sister and the rest of us decided to open up the gate and have a look at the garden for ourselves. How could we have known you would get home so early?"

"Hsia Yen-ling really put himself out today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It was at his country estate. He had engaged four singing girls and four acrobats to entertain us, and there were only five guests there. Because I was worried about the distance, I left early."

The woman helped him off with his outdoor things and then said, "You could use something to drink. I'll tell the maidservant to bring you some wine."

"You can take the rest of the dishes away," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Ch'un-mei. "Just leave a few saucers of delicacies and decant a flagon of grape wine for me."

Sitting down in the place of honor, he noticed that the woman was wearing a blouse of aloeswood-colored moiré with variegated crepe edging, which opened down the middle, over a drawnwork skirt of white glazed damask. Shoes of scarlet iridescent silk, with white soles, satin high heels, and gold-spangled toes were visible beneath her skirt. On her head she wore a chignon, enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, in front of which there was a tiara of jade, encased with gold, representing the scene "plucking the cassia in the moon palace." Her hair was further adorned with plum-blossom shaped ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays, and a host of trinkets were stuck about the temples, which had the effect of further enhancing: The fragrant redness of her ruby lips, and

The glossy whiteness of her powdered face.

Before he knew it, Hsi-men Ch'ing's:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Taking her two hands in his, he embraced her and gave her a kiss. Shortly thereafter, Ch'un-mei brought in the wine and the two of them passed the same cup back and forth between them. As they drank they sucked each other's tongues so assiduously that the sound of the sucking was quite audible. The woman then hitched up her skirt and sat in his lap. Once there, she took a sip of wine and then proceeded to transfer it into the mouth of her companion like a bird feeding its young, after which she picked up a fresh lotus pod from the table with her slender fingers and fed it to him.

"That's not very appetizing," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Why feed me that?"

"My son," the woman said, "don't push your luck. You'd do better not to refuse anything from your mother's hand."

Thereupon, she put a fresh walnut kernel in her mouth and passed it to him before desisting.

Hsi-men Ch'ing wanted to play with the woman's breasts, so she unfastened the gold chatelaine with its three pendant charms that she wore at her collar and held it between her teeth while she pulled open her silk blouse, revealing: The beautiful unblemished jade, of

Her fragrant and creamy bosom;

Her tight and squeezable breasts.

Hsi-men Ch'ing fondled and caressed them for some time, sucking at the teats like a young calf. The two of them laughed and joked together as they: Enjoyed to the full the pleasures of connubial bliss.

In the midst of his euphoria, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to the woman, "I've got something to tell you that will give you something to laugh about in a day or two. You may have heard that Dr. Chiang Chu-shan has opened a pharmaceutical shop right under my nose. Well, one of these days, you can rely upon it, he's going to look as though he's opened a fruiterer's shop on his own face."

"Why's that?" the woman asked.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her the whole story of how he had run into Lu Hua and Chang Sheng outside the South Gate that day.

"What a depraved creature you are," the woman laughed. "There's no telling how much evil karma you will have accumulated before you're through."

She then went on to ask, "Isn't that Dr. Chiang the same Dr. Chiang whom we often call in to perform medical services here? He always looks circumspect and polite enough to me. He lowers his gaze whenever he sees anyone. The poor fellow! You really oughtn't to give him such a hard time."

"He's got you fooled," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You say he lowers his gaze when he sees you. That's only the better to ogle your feet."

"You delirious oily mouth!" the woman exclaimed. "He actually ogles the feet of other people's wives!"

"You don't know the half of it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Someone nearby called on him once while he was on his way home carrying a fish from the market. When he was intercepted, he said, 'Let me take the fish home first, and come after that.' His interlocutor said, 'I've got someone seriously ill at home. Please, doctor! Come right away.' This Chiang Chu-shan then followed him home. The sick person was on the second floor so he was invited upstairs. It turned out to be a woman who was ill, and a good-looking one at that. When he came into the room, she stuck her hand out so he could palpate her pulse. The rascal had her wrist in his hand when he suddenly thought of his fish, which had been left hanging on a curtain hook downstairs, and forgot himself, asking, 'You don't have a pussy down there do you?' When her husband, who was standing there in the same room, heard this, he strode over, grabbed him by the hair, and beat him to a stinking pulp. He not only lost his fee, but had his clothes torn to tatters by the time he made his escape."

"A likely story!" the woman said. "I don't believe a cultivated man like that would do any such thing."

"If you go by appearances," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you'll miss the boat. As far as he's concerned:

Outside he may be the picture of propriety;

But inside he harbors cunning and villainy."

When the two of them had talked and laughed with each other for a while, they stopped drinking wine, finished putting the things away, and went back to Chin-lien's room to spend the night. But no more of this. Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment.

To resume our story, two months or so had now passed since Li P'ing-erh brought Chiang Chu-shan across her threshold in wedlock. Initially, out of his desire to please her, Chiang Chu-shan had concocted various aphrodisiacs. He had even bought some "Yunnanese ticklers,"¹⁷ "ladies' delights,"¹⁸ and the like in front of the city gate, in the hope of arousing her passion. What he failed to realize, however, was that the woman had already experienced every kind of: Violent storm and sudden downpour,¹⁹ at the hands of Hsi-men Ch'ing, so that his inexperienced efforts often left her unsatisfied. Little by little she began to despise him, until the day finally came when she smashed the sexual implements to smithereens with a stone and threw them all away.

"You're just like a shrimp or an eel," she railed at him, "with no real strength in your loins. What's the point of your buying all this junk to titillate your old lady with? I thought I was getting a real hunk of meat, but it turns out you're: Good enough to look at, but not fit to eat."²⁰

You're about as much use as a 'pewter spearhead'²¹ or a 'dead turtle'!"

Li P'ing-erh cursed her husband till he looked as though:

His head had been sprayed with dog's blood, and drove him out to sleep in the shop up front, though it was the third watch in the middle of the night.

From then on, she could think of no one but Hsi-men Ch'ing, and she refused to let her husband into her bedroom. Every day she nagged him about the accounts and tried to monitor the expenditure of her capital.

One day, feeling that he had had a bellyful, Chiang Chu-shan had gone into the shop and was sitting there behind the narrow counter when who should appear but two men, staggering and stupefied with drink, who made their way in and sat down on a bench.

"Have you got any 'dog-yellow' in this shop of yours?" one of them demanded.

"You're pulling my leg," laughed Chiang Chu-shan. "I've only got 'ox-yellow.'²² Who ever heard of 'dog-yellow'?"

"Well, if you haven't any 'dog-yellow,' " his interlocutor continued, "I suppose 'ice-ashes' will do. Let me see some. I'll buy a few ounces from you."

"Pharmaceutical houses only carry 'ice-crystals,' "²³ said Chiang Chu-shan, "the best quality of which comes from Borneo in the South Seas. Who ever heard of 'ice-ashes'?"

"It's no use asking him," the other one said. "He's only been open a few days and could hardly be expected to carry pharmaceuticals like these. We'd do better to go to the Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing's shop."

"Come over here," the first one said. "We'd better get down to serious business. Brother Chiang, there's no use pretending you're: Still asleep in dreamland.

The principal and interest on those thirty taels of silver you borrowed from Brother Lu here three years ago when your wife died are mounting up. We've come to collect from you today. If we'd simply demanded payment as soon as we entered the door, seeing as how you've managed to marry money and open a brand new shop, we were afraid it might reflect on your reputation.²⁴ So we thought we'd do you a good deed by starting out with a few words of nonsense, so you could see the need to take your medicine. If you refuse to take your medicine, you'll have to repay him the silver just the same."

When Chiang Chu-shan heard these words he was stupefied with amazement. "But I never borrowed any silver from him," he stated.

"If you didn't borrow the money," said his interlocutor, "why should we be dunning you for it? It has always been true that: Flies don't cluster on eggs

unless they're cracked.²⁵

You'd better not stick to that line."

"I don't even have the honor to know the names of you gentlemen," said Chiang Chu-shan.

"I've never met you before."²⁶

On what grounds can you simply appear and demand money of me?"

"Brother Chiang," his interlocutor stated, "you are mistaken. It has always been true that:

Those who achieve office are seldom poor, and Those who repudiate debts are seldom rich.

Remember those days before you made a place for yourself when you had to peddle your nostrums with bell in hand like any mountebank. It was Brother Lu here who came to your aid then and made it possible for you to arrive at your present state."

"My surname is Lu and my given name is Hua," the other one asserted. "In such and such a year you borrowed thirty taels of silver from me to pay for your wife's funeral expenses. Including principal and interest, you owe me forty-eight taels by now. You'll have to repay me whether you like it or not."

"Since when did I ever borrow any money from you?" Chiang Chu-shan demanded in consternation. "And even if I did, there would have been a contract and a guarantor."

"I was the guarantor," stated Chang Sheng. Whereupon, reaching into his sleeve, he pulled out a contract and waved it in his face.

Chiang Chu-shan was so angry his face had turned as sallow as wax. "You gallows bird!" he cursed. "You servile cur! You think you can play the 'knockabout,' coming in here from out of nowhere and intimidating me, do you?"

When Lu Hua heard these words he reacted with outrage. From the other side of the narrow counter he sent a clenched fist whistling across that flew right into Chiang Chu-shan's face, knocking his nose to one side. At the same time he started pulling the pharmaceuticals off the shelves and hurling them into the street.

"You lousy 'knockabout!'" cursed Chiang Chu-shan. "How dare you despoil my merchandise?"

All he could do was call for T'ien-fu to come to his aid, but Lu Hua kicked him into a corner with one swing of his foot and he was too frightened to make a further move.

Chang Sheng pulled Chiang Chu-shan out from behind the narrow counter and made a show of staying Lu Hua's hand, saying, "Brother Lu, you've already waited long enough as it is. Give him another couple of days to come up with the cash, and make an end of it. What do you say, Brother Chiang?"

"I never borrowed his money in the first place," said Chiang Chu-shan. "But even if I had, you could have raised the issue more politely. What's the idea of all this rough stuff?"

"Brother Chiang," said Chang Sheng, I can see that:

You've swallowed the flesh of a bitter olive,

but the pleasing aftertaste is coming out;²⁷

You've only endured a slap with a flour sack, but you've done a complete about-face.²⁸

If you had only changed your tune a little earlier, I might have asked Brother Lu to forgive you some of the interest. As it is, even if you have to do it in two or three installments, the only thing to do is pay it off. It won't get you anywhere to talk tough and refuse to acknowledge it. After all, you can hardly expect him to simply forget it."

When Chiang Chu-shan heard these words, he said, "I can't take any more of this! I'll go to court with him. Who ever saw the color of his money?"

"Have you been hitting the bottle again this morning?" Chang Sheng responded.

Without any warning, Lu Hua struck Chiang Chu-shan another blow with his fist, knocking him flat on his back and nearly precipitating him headfirst into an open drain. His hairdo came undone, and his cap and headband were covered with filth.

"In broad daylight too!"²⁹ Chiang Chu-shan started screaming at the top of his voice. This attracted the attention of the head of the local mutual security unit, who proceeded, without more ado, to truss him up with a length of rope.

When Li P'ing-erh, inside the house, heard the sound of this altercation and came to peek out through the front door blind, she was just in time to see the local constable leading her husband away in bonds and was so angry she was stupefied. She sent Old Mother Feng out to take down the plaque over the door and the shop sign. The better part of the pharmaceuticals that had been thrown into the street had been appropriated by passersby. There was nothing to do but close up shop and return inside to sit it out.

It was not long before someone reported these events to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who immediately dispatched a message to the local constable telling him to hale the suspect before the Judicial Commissioner's Court first thing the following morning. At the same time he sent a personal note about the case to Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling.

Next morning, the prisoner was brought into the courtroom. When Judicial Commissioner Hsia had taken his position on the bench, he read the deposition of the arresting officer and summoned Chiang Chu-shan before him.

"I see that your formal name is Chiang Wen-hui," he said. "Why did you borrow money from Lu Hua and then not only refuse to repay it, but abuse him into the bargain. Such conduct is reprehensible."

"I don't even know this person," said Chiang Chu-shan, "nor have I ever borrowed money from him. I was in the process of trying to reason with him, but he wouldn't pay any attention, and started kicking and beating me. He even despoiled me of my merchandise."

Commissioner Hsia then called Lu Hua before him and asked for his side of the story.

"He originally borrowed the money from me to pay for his wife's funeral expenses," said Lu Hua. "Since then, it's been three years by now that he's postponed paying me back. The other day I heard that he had married into someone's family and had gone into business for himself in a big way. But when I asked him to settle up, he started to hurl every kind of abuse at me, even claiming that I was despoiling his merchandise. I've got the contract for the original loan right here. This Chang Sheng was the guarantor. I hope Your Honor will look into the matter."

Snake-in-the-grass Shakes Down Chiang Chu-shan

As he spoke, Lu Hua reached into his breast pocket and pulled out a contract, which he handed up to the bench. When Commissioner Hsia opened it, he found that it read as follows: The contracting party, Chiang Wen-hui, a physician of this district, finding himself without sufficient funds to defray the funeral expenses of his deceased wife, has arranged, through the good offices of the guarantor, Chang Sheng, to borrow the sum of thirty taels of silver from one Lu Hua at a rate of 3 percent interest, compounded monthly, for his personal use, and undertakes to repay the principal and interest by a year from this date. If he should default, his personal effects to the equivalent value are offered as collateral. Lest questions should arise in the future, this written contract is set down as evidence of the above transaction.³⁰

When Commissioner Hsia finished perusing this document, he struck the table in high dudgeon, saying, "It's outrageous! In the face of the guarantor and the contract, how can he continue to deny his liability? I can see this rascal is given to: Hairsplitting and logic-chopping."³¹ He has the look of a reneger about him." So saying, he called out to his minions, "Take him down and give him a good flogging with the heavy bamboo!"

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation, three or four lictors turned Chiang Chu-shan over on the ground and gave him thirty hard strokes with the heavy bamboo. They beat him so severely that: The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and Fresh blood flowed down his legs.

Two runners were then dispatched to escort Chiang Chu-shan to his place of residence, and a bench warrant was issued authorizing the requisition of thirty taels of silver with which to make restitution to Lu Hua; failing which, the prisoner was to be remanded to the yamen for further detention.

Chiang Chu-shan's legs had been beaten so severely that he was barely able to waddle. When he made his way home, weeping and wailing, and pled with Li P'ing-erh to give him the money to pay off Lu Hua, she spat in his face and cursed him, saying, "You shameless cuckold! Whose money do you think you're giving away? You've got a nerve demanding money of me. If I'd known that: Even if you lost your head, you'd leave a stump of debts behind,"³²

I'd never have been blind enough to marry you. You turtle! You're:

Good enough to look at, but not fit to eat."

When the two runners and the plaintiffs, who were waiting outside, heard the woman berating her husband, they kept up their unrelenting pressure, calling out, "Chiang Wen-hui, if you can't raise the money, there's no point in delaying any further. Let's go back and report to the yamen."

Chiang Chu-shan had to come out to placate the runners and then go back inside to continue pleading with his wife. Getting down on his knees, so his torso looked as though it were sticking straight out of the ground like a post,³³ and weeping and wailing as he spoke, he said, "Just look upon it as a good deed, like a pilgrimage to: The mountains of the four directions or the five sacred peaks;³⁴

Almsgiving, or providing vegetarian meals for monks.

If you don't give me these thirty taels of silver, and I have to go back to court, how will my lacerated buttocks ever take another flogging? It will be the death of me, that's all."

The woman had no alternative but to dole out thirty taels of "snowflake" silver to her husband. Chiang Chu-shan, in due course, turned this over to Lu Hua in the presence of the magistrate, who tore up the contract and thus brought the matter to a conclusion.

Lu Hua and Chang Sheng took the thirty taels of silver they had thus obtained and paid a visit to Hsi-men Ch'ing to report on the success of their venture. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited them into the summerhouse and entertained them with wine and food while they regaled him with their exploits. He was absolutely delighted and said, "You two have enabled me to vent my spleen, which was all I wanted."

Lu Hua offered to turn over the thirty taels of silver to Hsi-men Ch'ing, but he refused to accept it, saying, "You two take it and buy yourselves a jug of wine. You can regard it as an expression of my thanks. I may have further favors to ask of you in the future."

The two of them thanked him again and again as they got up to go and then set off with the silver in hand to resume their gambling. Truly: He was ever prepared to enjoy the pleasure of,

"abusing the innocent and good";

As a makeshift substitute for the delight of,

"addiction to clouds and rain."³⁵

To resume our story, when Chiang Chu-shan went home after handing over the silver in the judicial commissioner's courtroom, his wife refused to let him stay there.

"Just who do you think you are?" she demanded. "You might as well regard the whole episode as a fit of delirium on my part, and those thirty taels of silver as the fee for your treatment. The sooner you move out of here the better. If I let you stay any longer, I'm likely to discover that even the value of this house of mine will not suffice to pay off your debts."

Chiang Chu-shan realized that they had come to a parting of the ways and hobbled off on his painfully wounded legs, weeping and wailing, to look for a place to stay. He had to leave behind all the stock that had been purchased with his wife's money. She pressed him to remove the medical supplies, mortar and pestle, pharmacological sieve, and other impedimenta that he had brought with him, and the two of them severed their relationship forthwith. At their final parting, as he was on his way out the door, the woman even sent Old Mother Feng to dip up a pewter basin full of water and throw it after him, saying: "At last my enemy has been removed from my sight."

From the day that she got rid of Chiang Chu-shan, the woman could think of no one but Hsi-men Ch'ing. She heard, moreover, that the difficulties he had been in had come to nothing, and she much regretted what she had done. Every day found her: Too languid to consume tea or food,

Too lazy to paint her moth eyebrows;

Leaning against one doorjamb after another,

Wearing out her eyes with constant gazing;
longing in vain for someone to come. Truly:

His pillow words remain,
But now his love is dead;
In her room he is not seen,
In silence her soul melts.³⁶

We will say no more for the moment about how Li P'ing-erh longed for Hsi-men Ch'ing, but relate instead how, one day, Tai-an happened to pass by her house on horseback and noticed that the front door was shut tight, the pharmaceutical shop was no longer open for business, and everything looked as quiet as could be. When he arrived home he reported this to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who said, "I imagine the beating he got was more than that stunted little cuckold could take. He's probably confined to his room while he recuperates. It'll be half a month, at best, before he can come out and resume business." He saw no need to take any further action in the matter.

One day, it was Wu Yüeh-niang's birthday, on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, and a lot of female guests were being entertained in the main reception hall. Because Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang were no longer on speaking terms, he took himself off to the licensed quarter to pay a visit to Li Kuei-chieh's establishment. Once there, he said to Tai-an, "Take the horse home right away, and come back to fetch me this evening."

Later on, he sent someone to invite Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta to join him for a game of backgammon. Li Kuei-ch'ing was also at home that day, and the two sisters kept their guests company and plied them with wine. After a while, they all went into the courtyard together and amused themselves by playing at "pitch-pot."³⁷

As the sun was setting in the west, Tai-an came back with the horse to fetch his master. Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the toilet at the rear of the establishment, engaged in the act of defecation. When he caught sight of Tai-an, he asked, "Is everything all right at home?"

"Everything's all right at home," replied Tai-an. "The guests in the main reception hall have already left and the things have all been put away. The First Lady has asked her eldest brother's wife and Aunt Yang to come back to her own room and visit for a while."

"Mistress Hua from Lion Street sent Old Mother Feng over today to deliver some birthday presents to the First Lady, including four trays of preserved fruit, two trays of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, birthday noodles, a bolt of material, and even a pair of shoes she had made for her with her own hands. The First Lady gave Old Mother Feng a mace of silver and explained that you weren't at home, but didn't bother to invite her over."

Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that Tai-an's face was red and asked him, "Where've you been drinking?"

"Just now," said Tai-an, "Mistress Hua sent Old Mother Feng to invite me over and offered me some wine. I told her I didn't drink, but she put so much pressure on me I ended up taking two cups after all. That's why my face is red."

"Mistress Hua has now come to regret what she did. She cried like anything when she saw me. When I told you what had happened the other day, you hardly believed me. It seems that the very day Chiang Chu-shan was released from the Judicial Commissioner's Court, she sent him packing. She's really very sorry for what she did, and still has her heart set on marrying you."

"She's a lot thinner than she used to be. She begged me to ask you to go see her, no matter what, and get you to decide what you're going to do. If you indicate your assent, she wants me to go right back and let her know about it."

"That lousy worthless whore!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If she's already found a husband for herself, that ought to be that. What does she want to continue bothering me for?"

"Well, if that's the way things stand, I haven't the time to go see her. Tell her to forget about the ritual presentations of tea and betrothal gifts. Let her pick a good day and I'll have the whore carried across my threshold, and be done with it."

"I understand," said Tai-an. "She's waiting at her place for me to go back and give her the word. I'll get P'ing-an and Hua-t'ung to come wait on you here."

"Go ahead," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I understand."

Tai-an went out through the gate of the licensed quarter and straight to Li P'ing-erh's house, where he told her what had happened. The woman's heart was filled with delight.

"Good Little Brother," she said, "I'm very much indebted to you today for settling this matter with your master for me."

Thereupon, Li P'ing-erh took the trouble to:

Wash her hands and trim her nails, before going into the kitchen and personally preparing some dishes, so she could regale Tai-an with food and wine.

"I'm shorthanded here," she said. "I hope you can come over tomorrow, no matter what, to help T'ien-fu supervise the movers in carrying my stuff over to your place."

She hired five or six porters, with their carrying poles, and it took them four or five days to get everything moved. Hsi-men Ch'ing didn't even bother to tell Wu Yüeh-niang what was happening, but simply had her effects piled on the upper floor of the newly erected Flower-viewing Tower.

On the afternoon of the twentieth day of the eighth month, Hsi-men Ch'ing dispatched a large sedan chair, a length of red satin, and four lanterns, together with an escort consisting of Tai-an, P'ing-an, Hua-t'ung, and Lai-hsing, to have the woman carried across his threshold. Li P'ing-erh sent Old Mother Feng to take her two maidservants to their new home ahead of time and waited for her return before getting into the sedan chair and setting off herself. She turned her own house over to Old Mother Feng and T'ien-fu to look after.

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go out anywhere that day, but sat in the new summerhouse, wearing an informal gown and everyday hat, awaiting the woman's arrival. When her sedan chair was set down in front of his gate, a long time elapsed before anyone came out to receive her.

Meng Yü-lou went to the master suite and said to Yüeh-niang, "Sister, you are the mistress of the household. Right now she's already at the gate. If you don't go out to receive her, how can you help annoying our husband? He's just sitting in the summerhouse, and the sedan chair has already been at the gate for an age, without anyone going out to meet it. Under the circumstances, how can she be expected to come in?"

Wu Yüeh-niang was in a quandary. On the one hand, she could go out to receive her, but she was still angry about it and didn't want to give in. On the other hand, if she refused to go out, she was afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing's violent temper. Finally, after pondering the matter for a while, she: Lightly moved her lotus feet,

Gently lifted her beige skirt, and went out to receive her.

Li P'ing-erh, holding the ritual "precious vase"³⁸ in her arms, was conducted directly to the new dwelling that had been constructed for her. Her two maidservants, Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, had already had time to put everything in proper order, so she had nothing to do but await the arrival of Hsi-men Ch'ing that evening.

How could she have anticipated that Hsi-men Ch'ing was still so angry with her that he refused to enter her chamber?

The next day she had to come out and make a formal visit to Wu Yüeh-niang's quarters in the rear compound, where she paid her respects to the other female members of the household and was designated, in order of precedence, as the Sixth Lady. As was customary, a large feast was held on the third day, to which many female guests and relatives were invited. But her husband had yet to appear in her chamber.

The evening of her arrival he had gone to P'an Chin-lien's quarters to spend the night.

"She's your bride, after all," said Chin-lien, "and this is her first day in your home. How can you leave her in the lurch at such a time?"

"You don't know her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "That whore has a little too much fire in her eyes for my taste. I'll give her the cold shoulder for a couple of days and then go in to her in my own good time."

On the third day, after the guests had departed, Hsi-men Ch'ing still refused to set foot in her chamber, but went, instead, to Meng Yü-lou's quarters in the rear compound to sleep. In the middle of the night, when Li P'ing-erh saw that her husband had avoided coming into her room for the third night in a row, she sent her two maidservants off to sleep, abandoned herself to her tears, and then, alas, stood up on her bed, threw her foot bindings over the rafter, and hanged herself. Truly: The enamored branches having failed to intertwine beneath the mandarin duck curtain;

Her resentful soul is the first to find its way to the realm of the Nine Springs.³⁹

The two maidservants, who had dozed off, awoke to find the lamp guttering out and were getting up to trim the wick when they suddenly saw their mistress suspended over the bed. Frightened into a state of panic, they ran next door to call Ch'un-mei, saying, "Our mistress has hanged herself."

P'an Chin-lien hurriedly got up and came over to see for herself. She found the woman, dressed completely in scarlet, hanging down, stiff and straight, over the bed. She and Ch'un-mei promptly cut the foot bindings by which she was suspended and laid her down. Only after they had administered artificial respiration for some time did she spit up a mouthful of colorless saliva and regain consciousness.

"Run back to the rear compound and ask your master to come here," Chin-lien said to Ch'un-mei.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was in Meng Yü-lou's room, drinking wine, not having gone to bed yet. Before this happened, Meng Yü-lou had been remonstrating with him, saying, "How can you bring her into your household and then not darken her doorstep for three days in a row without arousing ill feelings? It makes it look as though we give this one thing priority over everything else, and insist upon our rights of seniority, begrudging her even one night of your company."

"Let her wait a full three days, then I'll go," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You don't know her. That whore's got a tendency to: Wolf down the rice in her bowl,

While keeping one eye on the pot.⁴⁰

If you think about it, she has nothing to reproach me for. From the time her husband died, right up to the present, we've been on the closest of terms. What promises didn't she make to me? And then, at the last minute, she up and married that Dr. Chiang Chu-shan. As though I were no match for that scoundrel! So now, what's she running after me for?"

"You have every right to be upset," said Yü-lou. "But she also was imposed upon."

As they were talking, they heard the sound of knocking at the inner gate. Yü-lou sent Lan-hsiang to see who it was, and she reported that Ch'un-mei had come to fetch her master because the Sixth Lady had hanged herself in her room.

Meng Yü-lou lost no time in urging Hsi-men Ch'ing on his way, saying, "I told you you ought to go look in on her, but you paid no attention. It's not surprising something like this has happened."

Thereupon, with lighted lanterns, they set out for the front compound to see for themselves. When Wu Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh heard what had happened, they also got up and went to her room. They found Chin-lien holding Li P'ing-erh up in a sitting position and asked, "Sister Five, have you given her any ginger extract yet?"

"When I first got her down, I gave her some," Chin-lien replied.

Li P'ing-erh choked for some time before she was able to cry audibly. Only then did Yüeh-niang and the others feel as though: The stone on their heads had finally fallen to the ground, so they could tuck her back in bed and return to their own rooms to get some rest.

It was not until noon or thereabouts the next day that Li P'ing-erh was able to get down some congee and broth. Truly: Her body was like the moon at the fifth watch as it is swallowed by the hills;

Her life was like a lamp at the third watch as it begins to run out of oil.⁴¹

"Don't you believe that whore," said Hsi-men Ch'ing to Li Chiao-erh and the others, "she's only putting on that suicide act to scare us. I'm not going to let her get away with it. Wait and see. This evening I'm going to go into her room and get her to stage another hanging for my benefit before I believe her. And if she balks at the idea, I'll give her a good taste of the riding crop. That lousy whore! Who does she take me for, anyway?"

When his womenfolk heard these words, they all broke into a sweat on Li P'ing-erh's behalf.

That evening, sure enough, they saw Hsi-men Ch'ing conceal a riding crop in his sleeve and head for her room. Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien ordered Ch'un-mei to lock the door and not let anyone in, while they took up positions by the postern gate that led into Li P'ing-erh's courtyard and eavesdropped to see what was happening inside.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the woman was lying facedown on her bed, crying, and that she made no move to get up when she saw him come in, he was more than a little annoyed. The first thing he did was to chase her two maidservants into an empty room and tell them to stay there. Then he sat down on a chair, pointed his finger at the woman, and reviled her, saying, "Whore! If you were really sorry for what you did, what need was there to come to my house to hang yourself. You should have stuck it out with that stunted little cuckold of yours. Who asked you to come here? I haven't done you any harm, so what are you pissing those tears out of your cunt for? I've never seen anyone hang themselves before. Today you can put on a command performance for my benefit."

Thereupon, he pulled out a length of cord and threw it in her face, ordering the woman to hang herself. Li P'ing-erh remembered what Chiang Chu-shan had told her, that Hsi-men Ch'ing was: The foreman of the wife-beaters,

The leader of the lotharios.

"What did I ever do in a previous incarnation to deserve such a fate?" she thought to herself. "Today, with my eyes wide open, I've plunged right into the fiery pit all over again."

The more upset she became the harder she cried.

This made Hsi-men Ch'ing even angrier. "Get down off that bed," he ordered. "Take off your clothes and get down on your knees."

The woman was dilatory about taking off her clothes, until Hsi-men Ch'ing turned her over on the surface of the bed, pulled the riding crop out of his sleeve, and gave her a few strokes with the whip. Only then did she take off all her clothes, above and below, and, trembling with fright, kneel down before him on the surface of the bed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down again and proceeded to subject the woman to a thorough interrogation, from beginning to end, saying, "I told you, clearly enough, to wait a little while, because I was tied up by something at home. So why did you ignore my request and rush into a marriage with that scoundrel, Dr. Chiang Chu-shan? If you'd married anyone else, it wouldn't have bothered me. But that stunted little cuckold! What could he do for you? You brought him across your threshold and then supplied the capital to set him up in business, opening a shop right under my nose, in order to take away my livelihood."

"I've already told you," the woman said, "how much I regret what I did, but it's too late to do anything about that now. It was only because you left me and didn't come back that I began to go crazy with longing. The garden of that distaff relative of the imperial family named Ch'iao, which abuts on the rear of my compound, is haunted by fox spirits. At the third watch in the middle of the night they constantly: Assumed names and appropriated identities, appearing to me in your guise in order to sap my vitality, and departing only when the day dawned and the cock crowed. If you don't believe me, just ask Old Feng or the two maidservants. They'll corroborate my story.

"As time passed, my vitality was so sapped that I gradually approached the brink of death and would certainly have perished before long. It was only then that Dr. Chiang Chu-shan was engaged to see me and, like a fool, I: Fell right into the paste pot,⁴² and allowed the scoundrel to take advantage of me. He said that you were implicated in some affair and had gone off to the Eastern Capital. It was only for lack of an alternative that I went down the road I did.

"How could I have known he was the sort of scoundrel who:

Even if he lost his head, would leave a stump of debts behind?

Before I knew it, his creditors were banging on the gate and he was:

Haled before the judge and exposed in the courtroom.⁴³

There was nothing I could do but:

Swallow my anger and keep my own counsel.

It cost me several taels of silver to do it, but I sent him packing without delay."

"I hear you tried to get him to make out a complaint against me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "over all those things of yours I have in storage. If so, what are you doing in my house today?"

"Why you! It ought to go without saying," the woman said. "If I ever did any such thing, may my body rot completely away!"

"Even if you had," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it wouldn't scare me. They say that:

If you have the means, you can change husbands at will.

But I'm not about to let you get away with that sort of thing. I might as well tell you the truth. Those two guys who beat up the doctor: Thus and thus, and

So and so,
were acting on my instructions. I had only to:

Put in motion one of my schemes, in order to fix that scoundrel so he had:

No place to run.
All I would have to do is:
Resort to one of my devices, in order to put you, too, in a position to be:
Haled before the judge."

"I know it was all a trick of yours," the woman said, "but take pity on me. If I'm left all by myself in some deserted place, it will be the death of me, that's all."

As she spoke, Hsi-men Ch'ing's wrath was gradually assuaged.

"Whore!" he demanded. "Come over here. Let me ask you. How do I stack up compared to that scoundrel, Dr. Chiang Chu-shan?"

"How can he be compared to you?" the woman said.

"You're the sky;
He's a shard of brick.
You're higher than the Thirty-third Heaven;
He's lower than the Ninety-ninth Hell.

Quite aside from the fact that you are:

Chivalrous by nature and open-handed with your wealth,
Have a voice like plangent bronze and tinkling jade,⁴⁴
Command a clever and articulate tongue,⁴⁵
Dress in silks and wear brocades,⁴⁶ and Are ever attended by three or five servants;⁴⁷ thereby showing yourself to be:

A man above other men;
even the delicacies that constitute your daily fare are such things as he would never see, were he to live for hundreds of years. How can he be compared to you? You're just what the doctor ordered. Ever since I experienced love at your hands, by day and by night all I do is long for you."

This last statement had such an effect on Hsi-men Ch'ing that:

His delight knew no bounds.

Throwing aside the riding crop, he helped the woman to her feet and allowed her to get dressed, after which he took her onto his lap and said, "My child, what you say is true. What does that scoundrel know about anything? To him: A saucer may look as big as the sky."

With that, he called for Ch'un-mei and told her, "Set the table at once and then go back to the rear compound and fetch us some food and wine as quick as you can."

Truly:

To the east the sun is shining, to the west
there are clouds;
Just as you think it will never clear, it is already clear.⁴⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 20

MENG YÜ-LOU HIGH-MINDEDLY INTERCEDES WITH WU YÜEH-NIANG; HSI-MEN CH'ING WREAKS HAVOC IN THE VERDANT SPRING BORDELLO

In this world one has a role to play for three score years and ten;
What need is there both day and night to overtax one's spirits?
The affairs of this world in the end
bring naught but regret;
The fleeting luxury that beguiles the eye is wont to prove unreal.
Poverty and want, wealth and distinction,
are allocated by Heaven;
Success and failure, glory and luxury,
are but dust in a crack.
So why not let yourself go, enjoying pleasures as they come;
Rather than waiting for the gray hairs to invade your temples?¹

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing was so affected by the few: Soft-spoken sentiments and tender words, addressed to him by Li P'ing-erh in her bedroom that:

His anger turned to joy.²

After he had helped her to her feet and allowed her to get dressed, the two of them fell to: Hugging and embracing each other,

As inseparable as they could be.

Meanwhile, he called Ch'un-mei into the room and told her to set the table and then go to the rear compound to fetch some wine.

To resume our story, ever since Hsi-men Ch'ing went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters, P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou had been standing outside the postern gate eavesdropping upon the events within. The door of Li P'ing-erh's room was closed, but Ch'un-mei was waiting in attendance, all by herself, in the intervening courtyard. Chin-lien had taken Yü-lou by the hand, and the two of them were gazing through the cracks in the gate to see what they could observe. They saw that her room was lit by lamp and candle light, and could tell that the two were talking inside, but were unable to overhear what was being said.

"We're not as well off as that lousy little piece Ch'un-mei," said Chin-lien. "She can hear everything perfectly."

Ch'un-mei listened surreptitiously outside the window for a while and then strolled over toward the gate.

"What's going on inside the room," Chin-lien demanded in a whisper.

When Ch'un-mei heard the question, she came over and relayed the story to the two auditors on the other side of the gate, saying, "Father told her to take off her clothes and get down on her knees, but she wouldn't take her clothes off, so Father got angry and gave her a few strokes with the riding crop."

"Did she take them off when he whipped her?" asked Chin-lien.

"Only when she realized how angry he was," said Ch'un-mei, "was she frightened enough to take her clothes off and kneel down before him on the bed. Father's interrogating her right now."

Meng Yü-lou, who was afraid Hsi-men Ch'ing might overhear them, said, "Sister Five, let's go over to the other side," and proceeded to pull Chin-lien around to the postern gate on the west side of the courtyard. It was early in the third decade of the eighth month and the moon had just come up. Chin-lien cracked melon seeds with her teeth as the two of them stood there in the dark shadows and chatted together, while they waited for Ch'un-mei to come out with a further report.

"Our sister must have thought she was in for a tasty treat," Chin-lien said to Yü-lou. "The only thing she wanted was a chance to move in here, and now: Before being able to so much as shake her head,³ she's had to face this initiatory ordeal, and brought down these strokes of the whip on herself. As for that totally inconsiderate good-for-nothing of ours, as long as you go along with him he may be all right, but: He's just like hot taffy;

Whether you try to twist it or whether you don't, you get stuck either way.⁴

Remember what happened to me when that slavey of a concubine tried to nail me with her talebearing? And then there was that prostitute from the quarter. No matter how circumspect I tried to be, she got him to give me a hard time. How I cried over it! As for you, Sister, how long have you been here, anyway? You still don't know what you're up against."

Not long after the two of them had begun their conversation, the postern gate was heard to open and Ch'un-mei came out on her way to the rear compound.

Unexpectedly, her mistress, who was standing in the dark shadows, demanded, "You little piece, where are you off to?"

Ch'un-mei laughed, but continued on her way.

"You crazy little piece," said Chin-lien. "Come over here. I want to ask you something. What are you in such a hurry for, anyway?"

Only then did Ch'un-mei stop and give an account, thus and so, of what had happened.

"First she cried, and then did a lot of talking," she said, "until Father so far relented that he lifted her up and embraced her. Then he had her put her clothes back on and told me to set the table. Right now, I'm on my way to the rear compound to fetch some wine for them."

When Chin-lien heard this, she turned to Yü-lou and said, "That lousy shameless good-for-nothing!

The thunder may have been loud, but

The raindrops didn't amount to anything.⁵

To hear him tell it, he was going to give her a real thrashing, raise royal hell with her; but when it came to the crunch, nothing happened at all. I can see it now. I'll bet you anything, when she brings the wine, he'll have Ch'un-mei serve it. The lousy little piece! You'd think she didn't have any maidservants of her own. If you go fetch his wine for him, when you get to the rear compound that slavey of a concubine, Hsüeh-o, is likely to start shooting off her cunt about it the way she did before. I've had enough of that, thank you."

"As long as Father sent me, what's it all to me?" said Ch'un-mei, as she went off with a giggle.

"That little piece of mine is the limit," said Chin-lien. "When I give her a regular job to do, she's so slow to get a move on, you'd think she was dead. I don't know why it is, but whenever there's some; Pussyfooting errand,⁶ to be run for anyone else, she's ready to:

Stick her head into any cranny,⁷ to get a crack at it, and takes off like a flash. You know perfectly well she's got two maidservants of her own, but you'll run your legs off in their stead. What's it to you? That little piece of mine is like: The radish peddler who tags along after the salt vendor:

forever horning in where she doesn't belong."⁸

"Why do you suppose it is?" said Yü-lou. "If I tell my own senior maidservant, Lan-hsiang, to get to work on something, she may look like she's going to, but she doesn't. While if her master puts her up to any piece of mischief, she not only obeys, but goes off like a flash too."

As they were talking, who should suddenly turn up from the rear compound but Yü-hsiao, who said, "I see the Third Lady is still here. I've come to fetch you."

"You crazy little bitch! You gave me quite a start," exclaimed Yü-lou, who then went on to ask, "Does your mistress know you're here?"

"I put my mistress to bed some time ago," said Yü-hsiao. "I was coming out to the front compound to see what was up, just now, when I ran into Ch'un-mei, on her way back to fetch some wine and appetizers."

"What happened after the master went into her room?" she then went on to ask.

"When he went into her room," Chin-lien interjected, "it was the same old story:

Like the ugly lady with the pointed head who tried to improve matters by banging it against the privy wall:

She's got everything shipshape."

Yü-hsiao had to ask Yü-lou again for an explanation, and she told her all that had happened.

"You don't mean to say, Third Lady," exclaimed Yü-hsiao, "that he really made her take off her clothes and get down on her knees, and then gave her five strokes with the riding crop?"

"He only started whipping her when she refused to get down on her knees," said Yü-lou.

"So he whipped her over her clothes," said Yü-hsiao. "If he'd whipped her without them, how could her fair white skin ever have endured it?"

"You crazy little bitch," laughed Yü-lou. "You're really sensitive enough to:

Empathize with the sorrows of the ancients."⁹

As they were talking, who should appear but Ch'un-mei and Hsiao-yü, with the wine and appetizers. Ch'un-mei had the wine and Hsiao-yü was carrying a square box with the food. They headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's room.

"You lousy little piece!" said Chin-lien. "I don't know why it is, but whenever you get wind of a job like this, you seem to think it's: Like a rat stationed in the clouds:

The 'furry pest' Heaven has to offer."¹⁰

"Well, make your delivery and get it over with," she ordered. "And let her own maidservants look after her from now on. Don't you pay any further attention to them. I've got something for you to do."

Ch'un-mei merely giggled and went inside with Hsiao-yü. Once there, they laid the wine and food out on the table and then came outside again, leaving Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un in the room to wait on them.

When Yü-lou and Chin-lien had finished questioning them, Yü-hsiao said, "Third Lady, let's go back to the rear compound," and the two of them went off together.

Chin-lien told Ch'un-mei to lock the postern gate and then went back to her room to spend a solitary night. But no more of this. Truly: What a pity that, in its perfect fullness,

the moon of this night;

Should shed its pure radiance on other gardens,

so near and yet so far.¹¹

Eavesdroppers Discuss Li P'ing-erh's Feat of Reconciliation

We will say no more, for the moment, about P'an Chin-lien's solitary night, but turn instead to Hsi-men Ch'ing and Li P'ing-erh. The two of them: Indulged their mutual affection,

Drinking wine and talking together, until the middle of the night before they:

Spread the kingfisher-colored quilt,

Laid out the mandarin duck pillows,

Got into bed and prepared to sleep.

Indeed:

Under the flickering lamplight,
They remind one of phoenixes singing a duet within a mirror;
Enveloped in fragrant incense,
They resemble butterflies doing a pas de deux among the flowers.

Truly:

This evening let the silver lamp burn brightly as it will;
They're still afraid this tryst of theirs is nothing but a dream.¹²

There is a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that testifies to this:

Her eyebrows lightly penciled,
her comb stuck askew;
She has no heart to continue doing her embroidery.
Deep within cloudy windows,
in misty chambers;

Her orchidaceous heart studies to please.

Beautiful as can be,
Ever more lovely;
She is a goddess incarnate,
unknown to this world.
From now on she can abandon that lovesick refrain;
Brocade itself is no fit simile for such a consummation.¹³

The two of them slept until lunchtime the next day. Li P'ing-erh was just getting up to look in the mirror and comb her hair when who should appear but Ying-ch'un, who had been to the kitchen in the rear compound. She was carrying four saucers of fancy appetizers: one of squash and eggplant julienne in a sweet sauce, one of Chinese cabbage vinaigrette, one of smoked pork, and one of minced shad preserved in fermented red mash. In addition there was a bowl of boiled squab and another of junket flavored with yellow leeks. These were accompanied by two silver-mounted bowls of fresh white fragrant nonglutinous rice and two pairs of ivory chopsticks.

The woman had rinsed out her mouth and joined Hsi-men Ch'ing in drinking half a cup of wine when she turned to Ying-ch'un and said, "Decant some of that Chin-hua wine¹⁴ in the silver flagon that was left over from yesterday."

Goblets were set out and she kept Hsi-men Ch'ing company as they drank two bumpers apiece before she washed her face and completed her toilet. She then proceeded to open up her trunks and display her valuables, jewelry, and clothing for Hsi-men Ch'ing's benefit. She brought out the necklace of one hundred large, Western Ocean pearls that she had originally appropriated from the household of Privy Councilor Liang Shih-chieh and showed it to him. She also produced an onyx cap button in a gold setting, which she said had belonged to the late eunuch director. Detached from its cap and put on the scales, it turned out to weigh four mace and eight candareens. Li P'ing-erh suggested to Hsi-men Ch'ing that he take it to a silversmith and have it made into a pair of pendant earrings for her.

She also brought out a fret of gold filigree that weighed nine ounces and asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Do the First Lady and the others have frets like this one or not?"

"Some of them do have frets of silver filigree," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but none of them has anything as elaborate as this."

"I'd better not wear it, then," the woman said. "Take it to the silversmith for me, to be melted down, and then have him make me a pin for holding my chignon in place, in the shape of nine golden phoenixes holding strands of pearls in their beaks. With whatever's left over, have him make me a tiara of jade, encased with gold, representing 'the goddess Kuan-yin in her full glory' like the one the First Lady wears in front of her coiffure."

Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted these commissions, combed his hair and washed his face, put on his clothes, and prepared to go out.

"There's no one to look after the other house," said Li P'ing-erh. "Whatever you do, you ought to go by there to check things out and assign someone to take care of it in T'ien-fu's place so he can come and serve here at home. Mother Feng, the old good-for-nothing, is getting so dodderly I don't feel right leaving her there all by herself."

"I'll do just as you say," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, as he put the fret and the cap button into his sleeve and headed for the door.

He was on his way out of the compound when he was unexpectedly accosted by P'an Chin-lien, who was standing by the postern gate on the east side of the courtyard with her hair in disarray and an unwashed face.

"Brother, where are you off to?" she demanded. "At this hour of the morning you look: Day-blind enough to catch a sparrow in the eye."

"I've got an errand to run," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You crazy good-for-nothing," said Chin-lien. "Come back here. What are you in such a hurry for, anyway? I've got something to say to you."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw how importunate she was, he had no alternative but to come back and allow himself to be led into her room.

The woman sat down on a chair and, taking his two hands in hers, said, "I'll only be wasting my breath on you. Are your legs on fire, you crazy three-inch good-for-nothing? No one's going to: Stew you in a pot and eat you."¹⁵ What are you so anxious to get away with, anyway? Come over here. I want to ask you something."

"That's enough, you little whore!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Why be so importunate? I've got an errand to run. I'll tell you when I get back."

As he spoke he started outside, but the woman felt his sleeve and, detecting something heavy in it, said, "What's this? Take it out and show it to me."

"It's the wallet I carry my silver in," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The woman didn't believe him and, sticking her hand into his sleeve to see for herself, pulled out the fret of gold filigree.

"This is her fret, isn't it?" she said. "Where are you taking it?"

"She asked me whether any of you had frets like this one," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I told her you didn't. So she wants me to take it to the silversmith to be melted down and made into another two pieces of jewelry for her to wear."

"What does this fret weigh," asked Chin-lien, "and what does she want it made into?"

"It weighs nine ounces," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She wants it made into a nine-phoenix pin and a tiara of jade, encased with gold, representing 'the goddess Kuan-yin in her full glory,' like the one the First Lady wears in front of her coiffure."

"A nine-phoenix pin," said Chin-lien, "would only take three ounces and five or six mace of gold, at the most. And as for that tiara of the First Lady's, I've weighed it myself, and it only comes to one ounce and six mace. Whatever you do, have him use what's left over to make another nine-phoenix pin, just like hers, for me."

"She wants the setting of that 'Kuan-yin in her full glory' to be solid and sturdy," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Even if it were made solid and sturdy," said Chin-lien, "it wouldn't take more than three ounces. At the very least, barring any monkey business, he ought to be able to squeeze two or three extra ounces of gold out of it, which would be enough to make a pin for me."

"You little whore!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you care about is gaining petty advantages for yourself. You've got to have your finger in every pie."

"My son," said Chin-lien, "you would do well to heed your mother's words. If you don't get that pin made up for me, I'll have something further to say to you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing put the fret back in his sleeve, laughed, and started out the door.

"Brother," joked Chin-lien, "you've met your match at last."

"What do you mean I've met my match?" demanded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"If you haven't met your match," said Chin-lien, "how come, last night:

The thunder may have been loud, but

The raindrops didn't amount to anything?

You were threatening to give her a real thrashing and make her hang herself. But this morning all she had to do was pull out a fret in order to: Make a ghost at the millstone out of you.¹⁶

You dog of an oily mouth! There's nothing you won't do for her."

"You little whore!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, as he finally made his exit. "All you ever do is talk nonsense."

To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang was sitting in her room with Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh when they suddenly heard a servant outside calling for Lai-wang, but unable to find him. Who should it turn out to be but P'ing-an, who lifted aside the portiere on the threshold.

"What do you want him for?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"Father is waiting impatiently for him," said P'ing-an.

Yüeh-niang took her time in responding, before finally saying, "I've sent him on an errand."

It so happens that earlier that morning Yüeh-niang had sent him to Nun Wang's monastery to deliver a votive gift of incense, oil, and white rice.

"I'll simply tell Father you've sent him on an errand," said P'ing-an.

"You crazy slave!" Yüeh-niang retorted angrily. "Tell him whatever you like."

P'ing-an was so taken aback by her response that he went out without daring to utter another word.

Yüeh-niang turned to Yü-lou and the others and said, "If I say anything about it, he claims it's none of my business. If I don't say anything, I get so frustrated I could burst. He's brought that person into our household, bag and baggage, so why doesn't he just sell off that house of hers and be done with it? What's the point of all this rot about: Ringing bells and beating drums,¹⁷ in order to protect the place? In any case, she's already got that Old Mother Feng of hers there, so the most we need to do is send an unmarried page boy over to spend the nights. Does he think the house is going to walk away on him? After all: If you're going to be a wet nurse, You've got to handle the shit that goes with the job.

But no one else but Lai-wang and his wife will do, despite the fact that she's suffering from: Seven ailments and eight pains.¹⁸

If she should happen to come down with something and take to her bed over there, who would look after her?"

"Elder Sister," said Yü-lou, "you are my senior, and I may be speaking out of turn, but you are the mistress of the household. The fact that you and our husband are not on speaking terms makes it difficult for any of the rest of us to know what to do and leaves the servants with nowhere to turn. The way our husband has been carrying on the last few days: Alienated from this one and abusive of that, indicates that he, too, is completely at loose ends. Wouldn't you be willing to consider, for our sake, saying a few words to him and making it up somehow?"

"Third Sister Meng," said Yüeh-niang, "you'd better get those ideas out of your head. I haven't picked any quarrel with him. He's simply making a show of his temper for no reason at all. I don't care how long a face he pulls, that's not going to get me to give him another look. He's been calling me an undutiful whore behind my back. How have I been undutiful, I'd like to know? It's only now, after I've allowed him to bring six or seven bedmates into the place, that he's discovered how undutiful I am. It's always been true that: If you wish to get along, say what people want to hear;

If you try to be honest, you'll only arouse antagonism.¹⁹

"As for my husband, originally, when I did what I could to talk you out of marrying her, I was thinking only of your own best interests. Since you had already stashed away all those valuables of hers, and bought her husband's house into the bargain, if you were then revealed to have designs upon his wife, and it had come to the attention of the authorities, they would have taken a dim view of it. On top of which, her mourning period wasn't even over yet, so you really couldn't very well marry her, I said.

"How was I to know that behind my back the trap had already been sprung? Every day:

Betrothal gifts were exchanged between them,²⁰ while I was the only one kept in the dark. They might as well have:

Put a water crock over my head.²¹

One day he claimed he was 'spending the night in the quarter,' and the next day he claimed he was 'spending the night in the quarter.' How was I to know that all he wanted was to get her into his own house so he could 'spend the night in the quarter' the more conveniently?

"He's so susceptible to other people's:

Showy glamor and gaudy airs,²²

they can:

Conjure dragons and depict tigers,

as a cover for their:

Two faces and three knives,²³

and he thinks they're:

As wonderful as can be.²⁴

Meanwhile, people like myself, who try to be honest, but whose:

Good advice proves bitter to the taste,²⁵ can't even get his attention, and end up being treated like enemies. Truly:

Though the preceding carriages have overturned
by the thousands;
The carriages that follow continue to overturn
in the same way.
No matter how clearly one may point out
the safest route;
One's honest words are misconstrued
as ill-meant advice.

"If you won't pay any attention to me, I won't demand anything of you. So long as you don't begrudge me three meals a day, I'll make do as though I no longer had a husband at all, and live the life of a widow here in my room. The rest of you had better let me do as I like. It's none of your business."

This speech of Yüeh-niang's left Yü-lou and the others at a loss for words for some time.

At this juncture, who should appear but Li P'ing-erh, who had combed her hair and made herself up in order to come to the master suite and offer Yüeh-niang and the others the customary ceremonial tea. She was wearing a silk blouse of scarlet brocade that opened down the middle, over a long trailing skirt of kingfisher-blue figured silk, and was accompanied by Ying-ch'un, bearing a silver pitcher of hot water, and Hsiu-ch'un, with a box of tea. Yüeh-niang ordered Hsiao-yü to bring her a seat and had her sit down. A little later Sun Hsüeh-o also came in, and after Li P'ing-erh had served tea to each of them in turn they all sat down together.

P'an Chin-lien, who had a sharp tongue, broke the ice by saying, "Sister Li, come over here and kowtow to your elder sister. To be frank with you, our elder sister and Father have not been on speaking terms with each other for quite a while now, all on your account. We've just spent half the day interceding with her for your sake. Some day soon you really ought to prepare a feast for them and see if you can't get the old couple to make it up somehow."

"I'll do just as you say, Sister," said Li P'ing-erh.

Thereupon, she knelt down on the floor in front of Yüeh-niang and:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying;

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder;

kowtowed to her four times.

"She's only pulling your leg, Sister Li," said Yüeh-niang.

Turning, then, to Chin-lien, she continued, "Fifth Sister, you can all give up your efforts to persuade me. I've already sworn an oath. If I live to be a hundred, I'll never be reconciled to him."

As a result of this, none of them dared bring it up again.

Chin-lien had picked up a small brush and was standing beside Li P'ing-erh, smoothing her coiffure with it, when she noticed that she was wearing in her hair a gold openwork pin in the shape of a cricket and an ornamental comb decorated with the motif of pines, bamboos, and plum blossoms, the "three cold-weather friends," in gold filigree.

"Sister Li," she said, "you really oughtn't to wear anything as intricate as this cricket pin. It's likely to get tangled in your hair. Something like that gold-enchased 'Kuan-yin in her full glory' that our elder sister wears in her coiffure would be better. It's more solid and sturdy."

Li P'ing-erh replied quite innocently, "I plan to get the silversmith to make one just like it for me."

A little later, Hsiao-yü and Yü-hsiao came up to replenish her tea and took advantage of the occasion to tease her.

Yü-hsiao began by asking, "Sixth Lady, what office in the Imperial City was that old eunuch director of yours originally attached to?"

"He started out as director of the Firewood Office in the Imperial Palace," said Li P'ing-erh, "and served in the Imperial Bodyguard. Later on he was promoted to the position of grand defender of Kuang-nan."

"It comes as no surprise, then," laughed Yü-hsiao, "that yesterday you seemed to be so intimately acquainted with the stick."

"Last year the community heads and elders from all the villages outside the city walls were looking for you everywhere," chimed in Hsiao-yü. "They wanted you to go to the Eastern Capital on their behalf."

Li P'ing-erh, who was still a bit slow on the uptake, asked, "Why were they looking for me in particular?"

"They said you really knew how to abase yourself effectively in pleading for flood relief," laughed Hsiao-yü.

"Yesterday:

You were like the old biddy from the countryside on a pilgrimage to the Temple of the Thousand Buddhas," resumed Yü-hsiao.

"You kept on kowtowing as if there were no end in sight."

"The other day, it is reported," Hsiao-yü continued, "the emperor sent four border patrol agents²⁶ to ask if you would consent to go abroad in order to make a marriage alliance with the Huns. Is that really so?"

"I didn't know anything about it," said Li P'ing-erh.

"They said you had an irresistible way of saying 'Huney,' " laughed Hsiao-yü.

These sallies reduced Yü-lou and Chin-lien to helpless laughter.

"You crazy little stinkers!" Yüeh-niang finally intervened. "Go on about your business. Haven't you anything better to do than tease her?"

By this time Li P'ing-erh was so embarrassed her face had become a patchwork of red and white blotches. She was so ill at ease she didn't know whether to get up or stay put, but finally escaped to her own quarters.

Some time later, Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her room to tell her that Silversmith Ku had agreed to make the jewelry to her specifications.

In the course of consulting with her, he said, "Tomorrow we'll send out invitations asking the male friends of the family to come to a wedding reception on the 25th. We can scarcely avoid sending an invitation to Hua the Elder."

"His wife came to the third-day feast," said Li P'ing-erh, "and was anxious that he be invited. It doesn't matter. You might as well go ahead and invite him."

"As for the other house," she continued, "I guess Old Mother Feng can handle it, after all. If you would just send someone to take turns with T'ien-fu spending the night over there, that ought to take care of it. There's no need to make Lai-wang move in. My elder sister in the master suite says his wife is in such poor health she won't be able to go with him."

"I didn't know anything about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He proceeded forthwith to summon P'ing-an and instructed him, "You and T'ien-fu take turns, on alternate days, spending the night at the house on Lion Street." But no more of this.

To make a long story short, in no time at all it was the 25th, the day of the wedding feast for male friends and relatives in Li P'ing-erh's honor. The main reception hall was decorated with flowers, and four singing girls as well as a troupe of tumblers and acrobats were engaged for the occasion. The brothers-in-law, Hua the Elder and Wu K'ai, were seated at the head table. Wu Yüeh-niang's younger brother, Wu the Second, and her eldest sister's husband, Mr. Shen, were seated at the second table. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta were seated at the third table. Sticky Chu and Blabbermouth Sun were seated at the fourth table. Cadger Ch'ang and Heartless Wu were seated at the fifth table. Welsher Yün and Scrounger Pai were seated at the sixth table. Hsi-men Ch'ing took his place as host with his managers, Fu Ming and Scurry-about Pen, and his son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, arrayed to either side.

Before the feast, shortly after noon, Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, Tung Yü-hsien, and Han Chin-ch'uan arrived in their sedan chairs and were entertained by Yüeh-niang in the master suite. The male guests, upon their arrival, were seated in the newly erected summerhouse and served tea. After everyone had arrived, they moved into the main reception hall where the tables were already set up, with place cards indicating who was to sit in the positions of greater and lesser honor at each table.

The appetizers consisted of wildfowl wrapped in pastry and a soup of eight ingredients. The first main course was roast goose. As the food was being served, the musicians struck up a tune and the tumblers put on a performance, which turned out to be a comic farce of the genre known as hsiao-lo yüan-pen.²⁷ After they went off, the two boy actors, Li Ming and Wu Hui, came on to play and sing for the company. They were followed by an instrumental interlude, after which the four singing girls came in to ply the guests with wine.

At this juncture, from his place at the table, Ying Po-chüeh spoke up, saying, "Today is our elder brother's wedding feast. Though it may not be my place to do so, I have screwed up the courage to request that our new sister-in-law be invited out so we may pay her our respects. That would put the seal on our intimacy. What I think may not matter too much, but your esteemed kinsman Hua the Elder, your two brothers-in-law, and Mr. Shen are all here today. What else did they come for?"

"My insignificant concubine is far too unworthy to receive such an honor," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Pray excuse her."

"That's no way to talk," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "You promised us beforehand. Were it not for our sister-in-law, why should we have come? Moreover, our sister-in-law's esteemed kinsman, Hua the Elder, is here."

At first only a friend,

Now he is our kinsman.

It's not as though she were being invited out to meet a stranger. What is there to worry about?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed but did not make a move.

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "don't laugh. We've all brought our reception fees with us. We're not asking her to come out and meet us for nothing."

"You dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you ever do is talk nonsense."

Unable to resist these repeated importunities any longer, he called over Tai-an and told him to convey the request to the rear compound.

After some time, Tai-an reappeared and reported, "The Sixth Lady begs to be excused."

"That's enough of your monkey business, you little dog-bone," said Ying Po-chüeh. "You think you can fool me by pretending to go inside and then coming up with such a tale? You may swear as much as you like, but if you stick to your story, I'll have to go back there myself."

"You don't mean to suggest I'd try to fool the likes of you, do you?" protested Tai-an. "Go ahead back, then, and see for yourself."

"You think I wouldn't dare?" said Ying Po-chüeh. "After all, the garden is familiar territory. Suppose I go inside and drag out the whole lot of your mistresses, how would that be?"

"That big pug of ours is something fierce," said Tai-an. "I'd hate to see you lose your balls."

Ying Po-chüeh made a great show of jumping up from his place, chasing after Tai-an, and giving him a couple of kicks.

"A fine little dog-bone you are!" he laughed. "You know how to get at me all right. Now go back there again, as quick as you can, and invite her out. If you fail, it'll cost you twenty of the best with the cane."

This performance caused everyone, including the four singing girls, to burst into laughter.

Tai-an returned to the host's position at the foot of the hall and stood there watching his master, without making a move.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, finding himself:

At a loss for what to do next,

had no alternative but to call Tai-an over and instruct him, "Tell the Sixth Lady to get herself ready and come out to meet the guests."

After Tai-an had been gone for some time he came out again and asked Hsi-men Ch'ing to go inside. The servants of the guests were then herded outside and the inner gate was closed. The four singing girls went back to the interior to supply a musical accompaniment for Li P'ing-erh's entrance. Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien did their best to encourage her, helping to smooth her coiffure and put on her jewelry, before pronouncing her ready to go out.

Brocaded rugs and embroidered carpets were laid down in the reception hall, whereupon:

Amid the fragrance of orchid and musk,

To the strains of strings and woodwinds, conducted on her way by the four singing girls, the woman made her appearance at last.

She was wearing a full-sleeved robe of scarlet variegated silk over a skirt of sand-green material, sprigged with gold-stemmed and green-leaved flowers. Behold: Her waist is encircled by,

A lady's girdle inset with plaques of green jade;

Her wrists are enclosed in,

Gold bangles that double as sleeve-weights.

On her breast there lies,

An amulet suspended from a necklace;

By her skirt is heard,

The tinkling of girdle pendants.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's Cronies Make a Fuss over His New Bride

On her head,
Pearls and trinkets rise in piles;
Beside her temple,
A jeweled hairpin is half askew.
Gold rings with amethyst pendants,
Hang low beneath her ears;
Phoenix pins with dangling pearls,
Jut from either side of her chignon.

Her powdered face makes a perfect ground on which to display beauty marks;
Her beige skirt only enhances the sight of her tiny red mandarin duck shoes.
It is just as though Ch'ang-o has come down
from her palace in the moon;
She is exactly like the Goddess of Witches' Mountain deigning to grace the feast.

The four singing girls, playing the p'i-p'a, psaltery, and three-stringed banjo, clustered around her as she saluted the company with a formal kowtow: Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying.

There was not a man present who did not make haste to rise from his place and return her salute.

To resume our story, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li Chiao-erh clustered around Wu Yüeh-niang behind a hanging screen in the reception hall to see what they could hear and see of the proceedings. They heard the singing girls perform the song to the tune "Clever Improvisation" that begins with the words: How pleased we are by your success, and then continues:

Heaven has made this perfect match;

Like male and female phoenix
are husband and wife.

They then proceeded to the next song in the suite, to the tune "Flirtatious Laughter," which begins with the words: Gayly laughing we celebrate this happy occasion,

By raising our phoenix goblets on high.
To the sound of ivory clappers, silver psaltery,
and jade flute,
Let them bring on in cups and platters,
The fruits of sea and land to grace
the auspicious feast.

The song concluded with the words:

May they live happily together as husband and wife forever and ever.²⁸

At this point Chin-lien turned to Yüeh-niang and said, "Elder Sister, listen to what they're singing. She's only a concubine, after all. That really isn't an appropriate song suite to sing on a day like this. If they're to be like fish in the water, and 'live happily together as husband and wife for ever and ever,' where does that leave you?"

Now although Yüeh-niang was a good person by nature, when she heard these words she couldn't help being somewhat dismayed and feeling resentful in her heart. She also observed the way in which Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and the rest of the company carried on when Li P'ing-erh came out to greet them. It seemed as though they: Wished they had more mouths than nature had provided,²⁹ the better to praise her with.

"This sister-in-law of ours," rhapsodized Ying Po-chüeh, is truly something:

Seldom seen in the universe,³⁰
Without peer in this world.³¹

Quite aside from the fact that she is:

Compliant and virtuous by nature, and Dignified and stately in demeanor;³²

she cuts such a striking figure that in all the world you could hardly hope to find the like. Who else but our elder brother deserves to enjoy such good fortune? We who have been privileged to see her today will have been the gainers though we should die tomorrow."

At the conclusion of this peroration he called out to Tai-an, "Make haste to escort your mistress back to her quarters. I fear we may be overtaxing her. It isn't worth the risk."

When Wu Yüeh-niang and the others overheard this speech they cursed him unremittingly for a rot-talking, glib-tongued jailbird.

After an appropriate time Li P'ing-erh prepared to withdraw. The four singing girls, observing that she had money at her disposal, all made up to her, saying: Ma'am this and ma'am that, as they adjusted her trinkets and straightened her clothes for her. In fact:

There was no length to which they would not go.³³

When Wu Yüeh-niang returned to the master suite she felt very much out of sorts. Who should appear in her room at this juncture but Tai-an and P'ing-an, bearing a lot of complimentary gifts of cash, bolts of material, articles of clothing, and other expressions of regard on a pair of trays.

Yüeh-niang wouldn't even look at them, but said angrily, "You lousy jailbirds! Take them up to the front compound, why don't you. What do you want to bring them in here for?"

"Father told us to bring them into your room," said Tai-an.

Yüeh-niang told Yü-hsiao to take care of them, and she tossed them onto the bed.

Before long, her eldest brother, Wu K'ai, after finishing the second course of the banquet, came into the rear compound to pay his sister a visit. When Yüeh-niang saw her brother come into the room, she hastily proceeded to greet him with a kowtow: Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze, and then sat down with him.

"My wife imposed on your hospitality the other day," said Wu K'ai. "And I'm much obliged to your husband for sending along a sampling from the feast. When she got home she told me that my brother-in-law and you were not on speaking terms, and I had made up my mind to come say something to you about it, even before receiving your husband's invitation today.

"Sister, if you persist in this course, all the good feeling you have built up in the past will be lost. It has always been true that: Foolish men fear their wives, but

Virtuous women fear their husbands.³⁴

The 'three obediences' and 'four virtues,'

Are the norms that govern female conduct.³⁵

From now on, Sister, don't try to interfere with anything he wants to do. I dare say my brother-in-law would never do anything really wrong. Only by playing the role of a 'Mr. Yea-sayer'³⁶ can you show what a dutiful wife you are."

"No doubt if I'd been a more dutiful wife I wouldn't have aroused such antagonism in the first place!" said Yüeh-niang sarcastically. "Now that he's got this rich baby of his, a poor officer's daughter like myself might just as well be dead for all he cares. It's none of your business. Leave it to me. Let him do as he pleases. You lousy ruffian! Since when have you been so concerned about me, anyway?"

As she spoke, Yüeh-niang broke into tears.

"Sister," said Wu K'ai. "It's not right of you to carry on this way. You and I are not that sort of people. You really ought to put a stop to it immediately. If the two of you are on good terms with each other, it makes it much more propitious for relatives like myself to come visiting."

He remonstrated with her for a while, after which Hsiao-yü came in to serve tea. When they were done with the tea, Yüeh-niang told Hsiao-yü to set the table and invited her brother to stay and have some wine with her.

"Needless to say, Sister," said Wu K'ai, "I'm already stuffed with wine and food from the feast. I just came in to pay you a visit."

Wu K'ai sat a little longer until a page boy was dispatched from the front compound to invite him to rejoin the party, whereupon he said his farewells and followed him back outside. Thereafter, the company continued to drink until after the lamps were lighted before finally breaking up. The four singing girls each received a gold lamé handkerchief and five mace of silver from Li P'ing-erh that day and went home in a happy state.

From this time on, Hsi-men Ch'ing spent several nights in a row in Li P'ing-erh's room. This might have been tolerated by the rest of his womenfolk, but P'an Chin-lien was in high dudgeon about it. She did her best to provoke ill feeling between Wu Yüeh-niang and Li P'ing-erh by criticizing the former behind her back and alleging that she was intolerant of others. Li P'ing-erh innocently fell into Chin-lien's toils, addressing her as Elder Sister and becoming more intimate with her than ever. Truly: On first meeting one should express no more than three-tenths of one's thoughts;

Never under any circumstances should one disclose the whole content of one's heart.³⁷

From the time that Hsi-men Ch'ing brought Li P'ing-erh over his threshold, in the course of doing which he had picked up two or three dubious increments to his property, his affairs became more prosperous than ever. On his country estate outside the walls and in his residential compound: Everything was put on an entirely new footing.

The rice and millet overflowed his granaries,

His mules and horses became teeming herds,

His slaves and servants were arrayed in ranks.³⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing changed the name of Li P'ing-erh's page boy, T'ien-fu, or Heavenly Blessing, to the more elegant Ch'in-t'ung, or Lute Boy, which had formerly been the designation of that servant of Meng Yü-lou's who had been driven out of the house for his suspected adultery with P'an Chin-lien. He also bought two new page boys, whom he named Lai-an and Ch'i-t'ung. The four maidservants, Ch'un-mei from P'an Chin-lien's quarters, Yü-hsiao from the master suite, Ying-ch'un from Li P'ing-erh's quarters, and Lan-hsiang from Meng Yü-lou's quarters, were dressed in identical outfits of clothing and jewelry and sent out to an anteroom on the western side of the front courtyard to be instructed in the arts of singing and performing on musical instruments by Li Chiao-erh's younger brother, the musician Li Ming. Ch'un-mei learned to play the p'i-p'a, Yü-hsiao the psaltery, Ying-ch'un the three-stringed banjo, and Lan-hsiang the two-stringed barbarian fiddle. Every day Li Ming was regaled with: Three teas and six repasts,³⁹ and he received five taels a month as wages.

Hsi-men Ch'ing also had a twelve-foot-wide segment of the frontage of his residence opened up, and he weighed out two thousand taels of silver to his manager, Scurry-about Pen, with which to start a pawnshop on the premises. His son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, was given charge of the keys of both shops and made responsible for collecting unpaid debts, but he did not handle the stock. Scurry-about Pen kept the accounts and weighed out the merchandise, while the manager, Fu Ming, was in overall charge of both the pharmaceutical business and the pawnshop, with responsibility for assessing the silver and buying the stock. The second floor of P'an Chin-lien's belvedere was used as a warehouse for the pharmaceuticals, and the second floor of Li P'ing-erh's dwelling was lined with shelves for the accommodation of the articles of clothing and jewelry, antiques, books, paintings, and curios pledged by customers of the pawnshop.

The outlay of silver in the pawnshop on any given day was considerable. Every day Ch'en Ching-chi got up early and went to bed late. He carried the keys and went over the receipts and expenditures with the manager. He wrote a good hand and was quick at arithmetic. When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw all this, he was as pleased as could be.

One day, while they were sharing a meal in the front reception hall, he said to him, "Son-in-law, the fact that you show such aptitude for business here in my household would be a source of great comfort to your father in the Eastern Capital if he only knew about it. I, too, have found someone I can trust. As the saying goes: If you have a son, rely on your son;

If you lack a son, rely on your son-in-law.⁴⁰

In consideration of what you and my daughter are to me, if I should happen to die without a son of my own, all this property of mine might someday be yours."

"Your son has suffered the misfortune," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "of seeing his family implicated in legal trouble. Distantly separated from his father and mother, he has sought refuge here with his parents-in-law and has been fortunate enough to find favor in their sight.

My obligations to you are so great,

I can hardly repay them dead or alive.

But I am still young and ignorant. My only hope is that you will both be patient with me. How could I presume to expect anything more?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that he had a way with words and was intelligent and quick-witted, he was more pleased with him than ever. From that time on, he relied on him to handle all the correspondence that came in or out of the household, in matters great or small, in the form of letters, invitations, lists of presents, and so forth. When guests came, he was always invited to help entertain them, and whenever Hsi-men Ch'ing drank tea or ate a meal his company was felt to be indispensable.

How could he have known that this young scamp was really: A needle in a wad of cotton;

A thorn in the flesh?⁴¹

Or that he was given to:

Constantly peeping through embroidered curtains to steal a peek at Chia Wu;

Frequently invading the innermost chambers to purloin the perfume of Han Shou?⁴²
There is a poem that testifies to this:

A winsome son-in-law on the "eastern couch"⁴³
is much to be desired;
How much the more so if he is in his prime,
a prepossessing youth.
When guests are entertained he always finds a place at the table;
As a matter of course he is given free run of the postern gates.
In both front compound and rear courtyard⁴⁴
he flirts egregiously;
Under the guise of foolish frolicking
he hides his treachery.
However much you may sing his praises for being "half a son";
In the final analysis his bones and flesh form no link with your own.

Days and nights speed by like arrows;
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.
Before one has finished enjoying the mid-autumn moon,
The chrysanthemums are blooming on the eastern hedge.
High in the sky the desolate wild geese wing their way south;
Before you know it, snowflakes cover the ground.

One day, during the third decade of the eleventh month, Hsi-men Ch'ing's club convened for a drink in the home of his friend Cadger Ch'ang, but the party began to break up early. Before even waiting for the lamps to be lit, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to go, along with Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, and Sticky Chu, and the four of them set off on horseback together. No sooner had they emerged from Cadger Ch'ang's gate than, lo and behold: Dense masses of dark clouds, appeared in the heavens and, all of a sudden:

Fluttering and swirling,
A skyful of snowflakes came drifting down.

"Brother," said Sponger Ying, "if we were to go home at such an hour as this our families would hardly be prepared to receive us. I know it's been some time since you've been into the licensed quarter to see Li Kuei-chieh. Today, just as 'Meng Hao-jan Braved the Snow to Look for Plum Blossoms,'⁴⁵ we ought to take advantage of the fact that it's snowing to go pay her a visit."

"Brother Ying the Second is right," said Sticky Chu. "Every month, whether you're kept away by wind and rain or not, you shell out twenty taels of silver to maintain her as your mistress. If you don't even bother to visit her, she's certainly having an easy time of it."

Allowing himself to be persuaded by this barrage of:

First a word from you,
Then a sentence from me, on the part of his three companions, Hsi-men Ch'ing, there and then, redirected his horse into East Street and headed in the direction of the licensed quarter. By the time they arrived at Li Kuei-chieh's establishment it was already getting dark. They found the lamps and candles in the reception room already lit and a maidservant busy sweeping the floor. After the old lady and Li Kuei-ch'ing had come out to greet them, four folding chairs were set out and they sat down.

"I'm afraid Kuei-chieh arrived late at your house the other day," said the old procuress, "and imposed on your hospitality. Thank you also for the handkerchief and trinkets your Sixth Lady was kind enough to give her." "She fared none too well, I fear," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I didn't want to keep them too late, so as soon as the guests left, I sent them home."

As he spoke, the madam ordered tea to be served, and when they were done with the tea, a maidservant set the table and furnished it with appropriate appetizers.

"What's become of Kuei-chieh?" Hsi-men Ch'ing finally asked.

"Kuei-chieh has been at home waiting for you for days on end, Kinsman," the madam said, "but you have not seen fit to pay her a visit. Today just happens to be her fifth maternal aunt's birthday, and she sent a sedan chair for her, so she's gone out to help celebrate her aunt's birthday."

Gentle reader take note: It so happens that in this world Buddhist monks, Taoist priests, and singing girls are three professions of which it may be said: If they do not see the color of your money,

They will not open their eyes.
Despising the poor and toadying to the rich;⁴⁶
Prevarication and trickery,
Are two things they cannot do without.

The fact is that Li Kuei-chieh had not really gone out to help celebrate her fifth maternal aunt's birthday. In recent days, seeing that Hsi-men Ch'ing was remiss in coming to see her, she had taken up with a certain Ting the Second, whose sobriquet was Ting Shuang-ch'iao, the son of Mr. Ting, the silk merchant, from Hang-chou. Having disposed of a thousand taels worth of silk, he was staying at an inn in the vicinity and was in the habit of coming into the licensed quarter to patronize the prostitutes without his father's knowledge. His first move had been to offer ten taels of silver and two sets of heavy Hang-chou silk clothing for Li Kuei-chieh's favors, as a consequence of which he had spent the last two nights with her. Only a moment ago, he had been drinking with Li Kuei-chieh in her room when Hsi-men Ch'ing had unexpectedly arrived. The old procuress had hurriedly bundled Kuei-chieh and her customer off to a little-used room in the third courtyard at the back of the house to get them out of the way.

At this juncture, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who took the madam's story at face value, said, "Well, old lady, even if Kuei-chieh isn't here, bring on the wine and we'll await her return at our leisure."

The old procuress retired to the kitchen and did her best to expedite the proceedings, so that wine and delicacies, along with additional appetizers, were quickly forthcoming and soon covered the surface of the table. As for Li Kuei-ch'ing: The bridges on her psaltery were ranged like wild geese;

The songs that she performed were set to new melodies;
as she endeavored to entertain them. The company was soon busy:

Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits.

Just as they were settling down to enjoy their drinks, Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to go to the back of the house to relieve himself. This was one of those occasions on which: Something was destined to happen.

Suddenly he became aware of the sound of people laughing in an anteroom on the eastern side of the courtyard. As soon as he had finished relieving himself he went up to the window of the room in question and stole a peek. What should he see inside but Li Kuei-chieh drinking wine in the company of a southerner who was wearing a square-cut scholar's cap. Before he knew it: A fire blazed up in his heart.⁴⁷

He strode back to the front of the house and, with a single movement of his hand, turned over the table at which his companions were drinking, smashing the saucers and cups to smithereens. He then called out the four page boys who had accompanied him to look after the horse, P'ing-an, Tai-an, Hua-t'ung, and Ch'in-t'ung, and: Without permitting any further explanation, ordered them to smash up the doors, windows, walls, beds, and curtains of the Li family establishment.

Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, and Sticky Chu did their best to restrain him, but to no avail. Hsi-men Ch'ing continued to protest, again and again, that he was going to drag out that jailbird of a southerner and that painted face, truss them up together with a single length of rope, and lock them up in his gatehouse.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Wreaks Havoc in the Verdant Spring Bordello

Now Ting the Second was not a brave man, and when he heard the rumpus that was being kicked up outside he was so frightened he hid under the bed in the inner room and called out to Kuei-chieh to save him.

"Phooey!" said Kuei-chieh. "You can depend on my mother, whatever happens. It doesn't amount to anything. Let him blow off steam if he wants to, but no matter how he blusters, you stay where you are."

To resume our story, when the old procuress saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had made a wreck of the place: Neither hurriedly nor hastily, she made her appearance, hobbling along with the aid of a stick, and said a few inconsequential words to smooth things over. This had the effect of making Hsi-men Ch'ing even angrier and, pointing his finger at her, he began to curse. There is a song to the tune “Courtyard Full of Fragrance” that testifies to this: Madam, you are not a good sort of person.

Welcoming the new and seeing off the old,⁴⁸
You live off beauty by prostituting it.
With specious words you would deceive me,
Faultfinding here and eulogizing there.⁴⁹
In your house alone I must have spent,
At least a thousand taels of yellow gold.
You sell dog meat advertised as mutton.⁵⁰
I'll tell you what you really are:
One of those vixens who bewitch people,
Whose every wile is absolutely false.

The madam responded in kind:

Good sir, let me tell you something.
If you stop patronizing my daughter,
I'll find a replacement for you.
My whole house looks only to her,
For its means of livelihood.
If we are to feed and clothe ourselves,
We are dependent on her for firewood and rice.
There is no excuse for your raving like thunder.⁵¹
You may object that we are lacking in good faith,
But you forget your own deficiencies;
She's not your wedded wife by aid of go-between.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard her reply, he became even angrier, and almost came to blows with the old lady. This was only prevented thanks to the strenuous efforts of Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, and Sticky Chu, who had to intervene physically in order to restrain him.

After creating this great disturbance, Hsi-men Ch'ing swore an oath never to cross the threshold of the Li family establishment again and then mounted his horse and rode home through the snow. Truly: To sleep with every casual flower, when they number in the millions;

Is not as good a plan as going home to share a bed with your wife.
Even though, beside your pillow, she may leave something to be desired;
She will sleep with you until the morrow dawns without demanding money.⁵²

Or again:

Such women do no weaving and their menfolk do not plow;
The flaunting of their beauty is their only stock in trade.
Though your wealth be measured by the peck or by the cartload;
It will not suffice to fill the madam's bottomless pit.

Or again:

Their false feelings and specious sentiments resemble the real thing;
With deceptive phrases and clever words⁵³
they put on a good show.

How many otherwise intelligent gentlemen have been done in by them?
Only after death will their tongues be plucked out in Hell.⁵⁴

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 21

WU YÜEH-NIANG SWEEPS SNOW IN ORDER TO BREW TEA; YING PO-CHÜEH RUNS ERRANDS ON BEHALF OF FLOWERS

Troubled in her sorrowing heart,
she murmurs to herself,
“This good affinity has turned out to be a bad affinity.”¹
In retrospect she rails against that “willow” in the quarter;²
Though shamefaced to confront the “lotus” of the Jade Well.³
Only because his spring dalliance has been carelessly revealed,
Have the phoenix mates been forced to go their separate ways.
Who is able to dip up the waters of the River of Heaven,
That they may wash their former sins completely away?⁴

THE STORY GOES that by the time Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home from the quarter it was already the second watch. When the page boys had succeeded in getting someone to open the front door he dismounted and:

Trampling the scattered fragments of alabaster and jade, made his way as far as the inner gate which led into the rear compound. He found the gate standing half open though there was:

Not a human sound to be heard,⁵ from the courtyard within.
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,
“There's something strange about this.”

Thereupon Hsi-men Ch'ing stealthily took up a position behind the whitewashed spirit screen just inside the gate in order to see what was up. No sooner had he done so than he saw Hsiao-yü come out and set up a table in the courtyard beneath the loggia that ran along one side.

It so happens that Wu Yüeh-niang, ever since the falling out with her husband that had resulted in their no longer being on speaking terms with each other, had been in the habit of fasting on the seventh, seventeenth, and twenty-seventh days of each month. On these occasions she would pay obeisance to the dipper and burn incense at night, praying to Heaven that it would protect her husband and grant him an early change of heart so that he could devote himself to the regulation of the household and the begetting of an heir in order to accomplish:

The plan of a lifetime.⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing was quite unaware of this. He continued to look on as Hsiao-yü finished setting out the incense table. Before long Yüeh-niang emerged from her quarters, carefully attired, and proceeded into the courtyard where she ignited a full censer of incense.

Looking up at the sky and making a deep bow she prayed, “Your humble servant, nee Wu, has been joined in wedlock with Hsi-men Ch'ing. However, because my husband is enamored of the ‘mist and flowers’; though yet in the prime of life, he remains without an heir. Wife and concubines, there are six of us in all, but none of us has borne a child, so that we lack anyone to continue the care and worship of the ancestral graves. Day and night I worry about this lest we be left with no recourse. Therefore, without my husband's knowledge, I have sworn an oath that on the seventh, seventeenth, and twenty-seventh of each month, beneath the moon and stars, I shall offer up a prayer to the ‘three luminaries,’ beseeching them to protect my husband and grant him an early change of heart, that he may abandon his extravagant ways and devote himself wholeheartedly to family affairs. That one of his six consorts, no matter which, should soon bear him a son, in order to accomplish:

The plan of a lifetime, is my sincerest wish.”

Truly:

As she slips out of her chamber the night air is cool;
Fragrant mist fills the courtyard,
the moon glimmers bright.
Bowing to Heaven, she spills out all her heartfelt desires;
Quite unaware that anyone might be listening beyond the wall.

Nothing might have happened if Hsi-men Ch'ing had not overheard this, but having heard Yüeh-niang's prayer:

From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,

"It turns out I've been mistaken in my resentment toward her all this time. Everything she said was inspired by concern for my welfare. She and I really are husband and wife after all."

Suiting action to words, he strode out from behind the whitewashed spirit screen and embraced Yüeh-niang. His wife, who had just finished with the incense burning and never expected him to show up on such a snowy night, was so startled that her first impulse was to flee back to her room. But Hsi-men Ch'ing prevented this by embracing her with both arms.

"Darling," he said, "I had absolutely no idea that you've really been inspired by concern for me. I've been wrong about you all this time I've been giving you the cold shoulder. By now, I'm afraid, it's rather late to repent."

"You must have lost your way in the snow," said Yüeh-niang. "I dare say these really aren't the quarters you're looking for, anyway. You're barking up the wrong tree. I'm that 'undutiful whore,' remember. Since there's nothing between us, where do you get that stuff about concern for you? What reason should you have to pay any further attention to me? If we were never to see each other again:

For a thousand years or all eternity,
it would be all right with me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing took Yüeh-niang by the hand and pulled her into the room where he proceeded to look her over by lamplight. She was wearing her usual attire: a scarlet jacket of Lu-chou silk that opened down the middle, and a skirt of a soft yellow material. On her head she wore a sable toque over her chignon and, in front of her coiffure, a tiara of gold representing "Kuan-yin in her full glory," setting off to perfection:

Her silver salver face, modeled in plaster, carved of jade;
The clouds over Ch'u peaks, her cicada chignon and raven tresses.

How could Hsi-men Ch'ing have been anything but captivated?

Without further ado, he made a deep bow before Yüeh-niang, saying, "I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, have been so deluded for a time that I have failed to heed your sound advice and flouted your good intentions. Truly:

Though I have eyes I have failed to identify the 'Jade of the Ch'u Mountains';
And have treated it as though it were no more than an ordinary stone.⁷

It is after the event that one recognizes a gentleman;⁸
Then and only then does the good man become known.

All I can do is hope that you'll forgive me."

"I'm not the one you've set your heart on," said Yüeh-niang. "No matter what I do, I don't seem to be able to suit your fancy. Since when did I ever offer you any sound advice? Just leave me alone in my room here to:

Fend for myself.⁹

There's no need for you to pay any attention to me. There isn't room for you in here, anyway. You'd better get out of here before I have the maids throw you out."

"I've had:

A bellyful of anger,¹⁰

out of the blue today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and came home through the snow just to tell you about it."

"Whether you get angry or not is no concern of mine," said Yüeh-niang. "Far be it from me to try to control your conduct. Why don't you go tell it to someone who does?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Yüeh-niang refused to give him so much as a look, he bent his knees, adopted the posture of a dwarf, and knelt down on the ground before her.

Sticking out his neck like a chicken on the chopping block,¹¹

he began to plead with her, saying, "Darling this," and, "Darling that."

Yüeh-niang could abide it no longer and said, "If you're really going to carry on that shamelessly, I'll call the maid." As good as her word, she called out for Hsiao-yü.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw Hsiao-yü coming in, he promptly leapt to his feet and, casting about for an excuse to get her out of the room, said, "The snow outside must have covered the incense table by now. Why don't you go bring it inside?"

"I've already brought it in," said Hsiao-yü.

Yüeh-niang couldn't help laughing. "What a shameless character," she said. "Even the maids have to put up with your barefaced effrontery."

Hsiao-yü went out and Hsi-men Ch'ing once again got down on his knees to plead with his wife.

"If I didn't care for the opinion of the world,"¹² said Yüeh-niang, "it would serve you right if I paid you no heed for another hundred years."

Only after this speech did Yüeh-niang consent to sit down with her husband and order Yü-hsiao to serve him some tea. Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon told her the whole story, how that day, after the meeting of the club at Ch'ang Shih-chieh's place had broken up, he had allowed himself to be persuaded by Ying Po-chüeh and the others to pay a visit to the Li family establishment, and how, thus and so, they had gotten into an altercation.

"I had the page boys tear the Li place apart," he said. "If the others hadn't intervened, I would have done worse. I've sworn an oath never to cross the threshold of the quarter again."

"Whether you go there or not is no concern of mine," said Yüeh-niang. "I wouldn't presume to tell such a simpleton what to do. But as long as you're shelling out the hard cash to maintain her as your mistress, if you don't even bother to visit her, you can be sure she'll manage to take on someone else. Where people in that profession are concerned:

You can tie up their bodies, but

You can't tie up their hearts.

Do you really think you can put your seal on her and make it stick?"

"What you say is true enough," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, he started to undress, sent the maids out of the room, and proposed to go to bed with Yüeh-niang and seek his pleasure with her.

"If I let you into the kitchen,

You'll only make a pig of yourself," said Yüeh-niang. "It's concession enough if I allow you into my bed tonight. If you've got anything else in mind, forget it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by exposing his organ to Yüeh-niang.

"It's all your doing," he joked. "You've made him so angry he's having a dumbstruck fit."

"What do you mean 'he's having a dumbstruck fit'?" demanded Yüeh-niang.

"If he's not having a dumbstruck fit," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how come his eye is bulging so wide, but he can't get a word out?"

"You must be delirious," responded Yüeh-niang. "What makes you think I've got even half an eye for the likes of you?"

At this point Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Without permitting any further explanation, lifted Yüeh-niang's two fresh white legs onto his shoulders, inserted his organ into her vagina,¹³ and gave free rein to:

The oriole's abandon and the butterfly's pursuit.

Entranced by the clouds and intoxicated by the rain,

They are not yet willing to call a halt.¹⁴

Truly, it is a case of:

Among the crab apple boughs, orioles dart quickly to and fro;

Between the halcyon hued rafters, swallows parley incessantly.¹⁵

Before they knew it they arrived at that stage in which:

The transfusing touch of the magic rhinoceros horn

Produces a pleasure that cannot be exceeded.

Her musky tongue is partially protruded,

The fragrance of her rouge pervades his lips.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing's excitement was at its height he softly besought Yüeh-niang to call him "Daddy." Yüeh-niang accordingly:

Beneath lowered curtains, on their shared pillow,¹⁶

Responded as voluptuously as anyone could ask,¹⁷ calling him "Darling" without cease.

That night the two of them indulged:

The passions evoked by clouds and rain,

Joining their heads and twining their necks, within the bed curtains. Truly:

When feelings converge, one is apt to forget what happens to a brocade girdle;

When overcome by excitement, who cares about the dropping of a golden hairpin?

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Coiffure in disarray, hairpins askew,¹⁸
she is deeply stirred;
Her passions in full sway, she dreads
the interminable night.
At evening, all alone, she stands before her dressing mirror;
Not bothering to paint her eyebrows into pale spring peaks.¹⁹

That evening husband and wife enjoyed themselves together. But no more of this.

To resume our story, the next day, bright and early in the morning, Meng Yü-lou paid a visit to P'an Chin-lien's quarters. Before going in she called out, "Is that slavey, Number Six, up yet?"

"Mother's just gotten up. She's doing her hair," said Ch'un-mei. "Won't you come in and sit down, Third Lady?"

Meng Yü-lou went inside and found Chin-lien sitting in front of her dressing mirror combing her fragrant clouds of hair.

"I've come to tell you about something that's happened," she said. "Do you know about it yet?"

"In an out-of-the-way corner like this," said Chin-lien, "how would I ever hear about anything? Really, what's up?"

"When Father got home last night during the second watch," said Yü-lou, "he went into the master suite and made it up with Mistress Wu. He spent the night in her room."

"We tried so hard to persuade her," said Chin-lien, "and she kept repeating that she'd never make it up with him in a hundred or two hundred years. Now she's wantonly taken the initiative by foisting herself upon him without any further urging."

"I only found out about it this morning," said Yü-lou. "My senior maid, Lan-hsiang, overheard the page boys talking about it in the kitchen. It seems that yesterday Father and Ying the Second were having a drink at Li Kuei-chieh's house in the quarter when they caught the whore out at something and smashed the place to pieces. He came home through the snow in high dudgeon and when he reached the inner gate found the First Lady burning night incense. He must have overheard something that brought about a reconciliation between them."

"According to her maid, the two of them talked away the night together. She said Father got down on his knees to the First Lady, calling her 'Mother,' and that the First Lady herself put on such a show it was enough to give you the creeps. I guess if she chooses to carry on that way there's nothing more to be said about it. But if it had been anyone else, you can be sure she would have been ticked off for her wantonness."

"It's lucky for her she's a principal wife," said Chin-lien, picking up where Yü-lou had left off. "Who knows what she's capable of?"

She's such a practiced old hand.

If you're going to burn night incense you ought to do your praying silently. Whoever heard of making a performance out of it only in order to attract your husband's attention? The very idea! Without any urging, to go and make it up with your husband on the sly. It would have been more becoming of her to tough it out with him. She's forever hypocritically protesting her own virtue."

"It's not just a case of hypocritically protesting her own virtue," said Yü-lou. "She really wanted to make it up with him, but couldn't bring herself to admit it. She may have claimed to be:

A crazy wife who will never give in,

but that was only because she was afraid that if she allowed us to intercede we might:

Engage in idle tittle-tattle,²⁰ at her expense after the fact, saying that, 'when the two of you had that altercation it was only thanks to our intervention that you were reconciled.' Instead of which, the one of them happened to come home in high dudgeon from the quarter just when the other was burning night incense. A perfect coincidence! Truly:

In seeking a match they dispensed with both go-between and witness;

Secretly tying their love-knot together
all by themselves.

"Right now you and I must contrive some way to prevent her from hogging all the credit. As soon as you've done with your hair, go tell Li P'ing-erh about it. If the two of us each come up with five mace of silver, we ought to be able to get Li P'ing-erh to contribute a tael, since she was the occasion of the whole to-do in the first place. Then we can throw a party today. On the one hand, it will give us a chance to offer a toast to the couple, and on the other hand, it will provide a fitting occasion for the master and mistress of the household to appreciate the snow and enjoy themselves for a day. Why not?"

"You're right," responded Chin-lien. "I wonder if Father has any prior commitments today."

"During a heavy snow like this, what commitments could he have?" said Yü-lou. "When I came over here the two of them hadn't even stirred. The door to the master suite had just been opened and Hsiao-yü was taking in the water."

Chin-lien hastily finished doing her hair and accompanied Yü-lou over to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. They found her still in bed.

"The Third Lady and the Fifth Lady have come to see you," Ying-ch'un reported.

Yü-lou and Chin-lien went inside, saying, "Sister Li, you've really got it made. Still abed at such an hour.

The lazy dragon is just beginning to uncoil itself."

Chin-lien stuck her hand in under the quilt and discovered an incense burner for fumigating the bedclothes in the shape of a silver globe.²¹

"Sister Li has laid an egg," she said, pulling aside the covers as she spoke and revealing the white flesh of the body that lay within.

Li P'ing-erh made haste to get into her clothes.

"That's enough of your tricks, Fifth Sister," said Yü-lou. "Sister Li, it's time you got up. There's something we've come to tell you about. Yesterday, thus and so, Father and our elder sister were reconciled. Each of us is going to put up five mace of silver. You ought to give a little more since you were the occasion of the trouble between them in the first place. It's snowing heavily today and we really ought to do something to appreciate the snow. So we thought we'd throw a party and invite Father and our elder sister, to spend some time with us. What do you say?"

"I'll be happy to contribute whatever you suggest," said Li P'ing-erh.

"A tael ought to be sufficient," said Chin-lien. "Weigh it out so we can go back to the rear compound and see what we can get from Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o."

Li P'ing-erh put on her clothes and bound her feet, telling Ying-ch'un, in the meantime, to open the trunk and get out the silver. She came up with a piece which Chin-lien put in the scale and found to weigh one tael, two mace, and five candareens.

Yü-lou suggested that Chin-lien stay and keep Li P'ing-erh company while she did her hair. "I'll go back to the rear compound myself and see what I can get from Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o," she said.

Chin-lien looked on as Li P'ing-erh washed her face and worked on her hair. Nearly two hours elapsed before Yü-lou returned from the rear compound.

"If I'd only known, I never would have undertaken this business," she complained. "It's something that concerns us all, and yet you'd think I was trying to get something for nothing out of her. The little whore said, 'I'm so out of favor our husband doesn't bother to come into my room anymore. Where would I get any silver from?' When I insisted, she wouldn't come up with so much as a mace. I pled with her for half the day before she produced this silver hairpin. Put it in the scale and see how much it weighs."

Chin-lien did as she was told and it was found to weigh only three mace and seven candareens.

"What about Li Chiao-erh?" she asked.

"At first she said, 'I don't have anything of my own,' " reported Yü-lou. " 'Although the money for household expenses may pass through my hands every day, everything has to be accounted for. I only receive enough to defray actual costs. There isn't anything left over.' I had to argue with her half the day before I got anywhere. 'How can you say you don't have any money to spare when you're in charge of the household expenses,' I demanded. 'It's not as though the rest of us are any better off. Are you claiming that:

The summer sun just happened to skip your door?

It's something that concerns us all, but you're just not going to cooperate. So much for that!' I had to stalk off in a huff before she was embarrassed enough to send the maid after me and come up with something at last. All this trouble for no reason at all!"

Chin-lien took Li Chiao-erh's contribution and put it in the scale. It came to just four mace and eight candareens.

"That simulating whore!" she cursed. "No matter what happens, even without any other funny business, she simply will not give full value, but is always just a little short."

"She's quick enough to get out the big scale with its yellow yard and weigh out the money²² when it's for herself," said Yü-lou, "but if you want to get anything out of her, it's like trying to extract it from her bones. Nobody has a good word to say for her."

When they had toted up the money, which came to three taels and one mace in all, including the contributions of Yü-lou and Chin-lien, they sent Hsiu-ch'un to fetch Tai-an.

Before anything else, Chin-lien asked him, "When you were out with Father yesterday, what was the altercation at the Li place all about?"

Tai-an told them the whole story. "They had a meeting of their club at Ch'ang Shih-chieh's house, but it broke up early, and Father ended up accompanying Messrs. Ying and Hsieh to Li Kuei-chieh's place. The madam reported that she was not at home, having gone to her fifth maternal aunt's house to celebrate her birthday. Who would have thought that, some time later, when Father went to the back of the establishment to relieve himself, he found the painted face and a Southerner drinking wine together and realized she had been giving him the slip. He was so enraged that:

Without permitting any further explanation,

he ordered us to tear the whore's place apart and would have had the Southerner and the painted face locked up together in the gatehouse had Ying the Second and the others not intervened. Father then got on his horse and came home in a huff, swearing along the way that he would take steps to settle the whore's hash."

"That lousy whore!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "I'll bet she thought she had:

A permanent grip on the honey jar,
but now, somehow or other:

It's ended up smashed to pieces."²³

"Did Father really say that?" she asked Tai-an.

"Would I have the nerve to deceive you?" he replied.

"You lousy jailbird," said Chin-lien. "Even if he does neglect her, she is your master's mistress, after all. Since when are you entitled to curse her? I remember how it was at the outset, whenever I asked you to do anything you used to claim you were too busy. 'Father has sent me to deliver some money to Auntie Kuei's place,' you used to say, giving such a sweet inflection to the words 'Auntie Kuei.' Now that she's fallen out of favor and your master's angry with her, even you start calling her a whore. Just wait and see if I don't tell your father about it the next chance I get."

"Ai-ya, Fifth Lady," exclaimed Tai-an.

"The sun must have risen in the West today,"²⁴ that you should be taking her part for a change. If Father hadn't called her a whore on the way home, do you think I would have dared do so?"

"If your father cursed her, that's his business," said Chin-lien. "Does that entitle you to do so?"

"If I'd known you were going to give me such a hard time about it, Fifth Lady," said Tai-an, "I never would have mentioned it to you."

"That's enough out of you, you little jailbird," said Yü-lou. "Here are three taels and one mace of silver, with which we want you and Lai-hsing to go buy some things for us, thus and so. We're planning to give a party today and invite your father and the First Lady to join us, so we can enjoy the snow and have a drink together. If you can manage to give us a break on the squeeze, I'll get the Fifth Lady not to tell your father what you said."

"If you send me on an errand," said Tai-an, "would I have the nerve to take any squeeze?"

Thereupon, together with Lai-hsing, he went off to buy the provisions.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had just gotten up and was performing his ablutions in the master suite when he saw Lai-hsing coming through the snow on his way to the kitchen with a chicken, a goose, and other comestibles, while Tai-an came in carrying a jug of Chin-hua wine.

"Who's that stuff for, that the servants are bringing in?" he asked Hsiao-yü.

"The ladies of the house are giving a party today," said Hsiao-yü. "They're going to invite you and the First Lady to join them in order to enjoy the snow."

"Where does that Chin-hua wine come from," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"The Third Lady gave me the money to buy it," said Tai-an.

"Ai-ya," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We've got plenty of wine in the house already. What need is there to go out and buy any more?"

"Take the key to the anteroom on the west side of the front courtyard," he instructed Tai-an, "and bring back two jugs of the high-quality jasmine wine you'll find there. We can mix some of this wine in with it."

Thereupon, in the living room of the master suite that opened onto the rear courtyard:

Standing screens and brocaded windbreaks like Shih

Ch'ung's²⁵ were set up;

Warming drapes of oiled paper sprigged with plum blossoms were suspended.

Braziers were filled with animal-shaped briquettes;

All the appurtenances of a feast were duly arrayed.

It was not long before the necessary preparations in the kitchen were completed and Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh came to invite Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang to join them.

Thereupon, Li Chiao-erh served the drinks, Meng Yü-lou held the flagon, P'an Chin-lien proffered the side dishes, and Li P'ing-erh also got down on her knees beside them. The first drink was offered to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Taking the cup in his hand, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, with a laugh, "My children, you've gone to a lot of trouble just to please the old man. A bow will suffice."

P'an Chin-lien, who was always quick on the uptake, interjected, "That's enough of your airs, my son. Do you think anyone here is going to kowtow to you while you remain on your feet? You're just like:

The ramshorn scallion that grows by the southern wall;

The longer it stays there the hotter it gets."²⁶

If you don't get down on your knees you'll:

Forfeit a myriad years worth of fodder."²⁷

If it weren't for our elder sister, who do you think would be kowtowing to you today?"

Thereupon, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had been offered the first drink, the cup was refilled to the brim and Yüeh-niang was asked to assume the place of honor so that a drink could be offered to her in turn.

"None of you spoke a word about it," said Yüeh-niang. "Who would have thought you would go to so much trouble on my account?"

"It doesn't amount to anything," laughed Yü-lou. "We just thought we'd offer a cup of watery wine to our patriarch and matriarch after this heavy snow, to help them dispel their gloom. Sister, please be seated and accept our salutations."

Yüeh-niang refused to permit this and insisted on kowtowing to them in return.
“Unless you agree to be seated,” said Yü-lou, “the rest of us will refuse to get up from our knees.”
They bickered back and forth about it for some time before Yüeh-niang agreed to accept half a kowtow from them.
“Elder Sister,” said Chin-lien, in jest, “it’s only right that you should be forewarned. You may consent to forgive him this once, out of consideration for us, but if he should do anything of the kind to offend you again, we’ll wash our hands of the whole affair.”

Then, turning to Hsi-men Ch’ing, she continued, “What do you think you’re doing, remaining in your seat up there:
Playing the fool and putting on airs?
Why aren’t you down on your knees, offering Sister a cup of wine, and apologizing for your misconduct?”

Hsi-men Ch’ing merely laughed but did not move from his seat.
After Yüeh-niang was finally induced to accept the proffered drink, she got up from her place, ordered Yü-hsiao to hold the flagon, and poured a drink in return for each of her sisters. Only Sun Hsüeh-o received the wine on her knees. The others all accepted theirs with the ceremony appropriate to sisters of equal standing.

Thereupon, Hsi-men Ch’ing and Yüeh-niang occupied the seats of honor at the head of the table, while Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P’an Chin-lien, Li P’ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh ranged themselves on either side.

“Sister Li,” said Chin-lien, “you really ought to offer our elder sister a cup of wine yourself, since you were the occasion of the whole to-do in the first place.

You hardly have to be as stiff as wood, like Old Lin.”²⁸

Li P’ing-erh actually rose from her seat and was going to follow Chin-lien’s suggestion, but Hsi-men Ch’ing stopped her, saying, “Don’t pay any attention to that little whore, she’s only fooling. We’ve already been presented with a round of drinks. There’s no need for any more.”

Only then did Li P’ing-erh desist.

Thereupon, Ch’un-mei, Ying-ch’un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang, the four household musicians, struck up a tune on their instruments, the p’i-p’a, psaltery, three-stringed banjo, and mandola. They sang the southern-style song suite that begins with the tune “Pomegranate Blossoms” and opens with the words:

It was the night of their assignation,²⁹

etc., etc.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing heard this, he asked, “Whose idea was it to sing this particular suite?”

“The Fifth Lady told us to sing it,” said Yü-hsiao.

Hsi-men Ch’ing gave P’an Chin-lien a look, saying, “You little whore! You can’t resist the temptation to:

Fool with the branches and tug at the leaves,³⁰ can you?”

“Who am I to tell them what to sing?” said Chin-lien. “You’re just picking on me again.”

“Why don’t we ask our son-in-law to join us for a bit?” said Yüeh-niang, and, suiting her action to her words, she dispatched a page boy to the front compound to convey the invitation.

Before long Ch’en Ching-chi showed up and bowed to each member of the party before taking a seat next to Hsi-men Ta-chieh. Yüeh-niang ordered Hsiao-yü to provide him with a place setting. Now that the whole family was assembled:

Animal-shaped briquettes replenished golden braziers;

The finest wine of Yang-kao vintage was decanted.³¹

As they enjoyed the wine, Hsi-men Ch’ing glanced outside the rolled-up bamboo blinds and saw that the snow was falling heavily. It looked just like:

Shredded cotton wadding,³² or

Wildly dancing pear blossoms.³³

Truly, it was a magnificent snow. Behold:

Initially resembling willow catkins,

Gradually it turns into goose down.

Scarcely audible, it reminds one of crabs moving across the sand;³⁴

In rich profusion, it is like shattered alabaster piled on the pavement.³⁵

With every move one makes,

One’s clothes catch six-pointed stars;

At every other moment,

One must brush away the bee’s whiskers.³⁶

Now it flurries, now it stops;

The Dragon Lord is yet rehearsing

the steps of his dance.

The power of spring remains weak;

The Jade Maiden is still entranced producing her whirlwind.

Enhancing jasper terraces, Jade dragon's-scales appear to pervade the firmament.³⁷
Brushing powdered foreheads, White crane's-feathers seem to settle gently to earth.³⁸

Truly:

Congeaing upon "towers of jade," its cold raises goose bumps;
Wavering before "silver seas," its dazzle creates a blur.³⁹

When Wu Yüeh-niang saw how much snow had accumulated on the T'ai-hu rockery⁴⁰ in front of the spirit screen, she got up from her place, told Hsiao-yü to fetch the tea jar, and proceeded in person to sweep up enough snow to brew some Phoenix Tablet Sparrow Tongue tea from Chiang-nan for the company.⁴¹ Truly:

Foaming whitecaps of brick tea,
break in white jade cups;
The pure bouquet of vintage wine, bursts from the golden flagon.⁴²

As they were enjoying the tea, who should come in but Tai-an, who reported, "Li Ming has come. He's waiting in the front compound."

"Tell him to come in," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long, Li Ming appeared. After performing a kowtow to the assembled company, he made a leg as well, and then stood deferentially to one side.

"You've arrived in the nick of time," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Where've you been?"

"Nowhere in particular," said Li Ming. "I've been teaching a couple of youngsters at Eunuch Director Liu's house near Wine Vinegar Gate in the Northern Quarter. I thought I'd look in on them today, but then remembered that the young ladies at your place haven't got some of their songs quite right yet, so I came over here to see what I could do."

Hsi-men Ch'ing handed him what was left of the cup of tea, flavored with osmanthus and kumquats, that he had been drinking from, saying, "When you've finished with that, stick around and perform a song suite for us."

"Whatever you say," said Li Ming, retiring an appropriate distance to drink his tea.

When he had finished, he came forward, tuned the strings of his psaltery, and:

Commencing to sing in full voice;
Facing forward with his feet together, launched into the song suite on winter that begins with the tune "Spring in the Metropolis" and opens with the words:

A cold wind has overspread the land,⁴³

etc., etc.

Wu Yüeh-niang Sweeps Snow in Order to Brew Tea

When Li Ming had finished singing, Hsi-men Ch'ing called him over in order to reward him with a drink of wine. He told Hsiao-yü, who was holding a round-handled chicken-crop flagon with a curved spout, to pour a full measure into a peach-shaped cup of silver-mounted cloisonné. Li Ming knelt on the ground and drank off three full cups. Hsi-men Ch'ing also selected from the delicacies on the table a saucerful of bulging white steamed buns, a bowl of clam broth flavored with leeks and marinated bamboo shoots, a platter of large slices of fat jellied goose, as well as saucersful of savory cured coney, steamed dried shad, and squab baked in junket, and handed them to Li Ming on a tray.

Li Ming retired an appropriate distance and gobbled it all down in:

Three mouthfuls and two swallows.⁴⁴

When he had licked the platter clean and wiped his lips with a napkin, he came back and stood at attention beside the latticework partition.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then told him all about what had happened at Li Kuei-chieh's place the day before.

"I didn't hear a word about it," said Li Ming. "I haven't been over there very often recently. If you stop to think about it though, it's not really Kuei-chieh's fault. It's all the doing of our old madam, Li the Third. You mustn't be too upset about it. I'll give her a real telling off the next time I see her."

That day, the party continued until the first watch, and the wife and concubines of the household had a good time together. Ch'en Ching-chi and Hsi-men Ta-chieh were the first to leave, going straight back to their quarters in the front compound. After that, when the wine was about to run out, Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded Li Ming with another drink and sent him on his way.

"If you go over there," said Hsi-men Ch'ing in parting, "don't say anything about having been here today."

"I understand," replied Li Ming.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered a servant to see him to the door and the front gate was closed for the night. Wife and concubines then went their separate ways, but Hsi-men Ch'ing spent another night with Yüeh-niang in the master suite. There is a poem that testifies to this:

A marriage affinity bound with red cord⁴⁵ is not to be doubted;
Having had to burn their door-bars for fuel,
they are of one mind.⁴⁶
Like fish and water, perfectly suited,⁴⁷ from this time forth;
Their mutual feelings will surely sustain a lifetime of bliss.⁴⁸

To resume our story, by the next day the snow had cleared. Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta had been induced by the offer of a roast goose and a jug of wine to act as emissaries for the Li family establishment, which was worried that Hsi-men Ch'ing might be moved by anger to attempt the ruination of their house. They therefore showed up in order to respectfully invite Hsi-men Ch'ing to accompany them into the quarter and accept the proffered rites of propitiation.

Yüeh-niang had finished her morning toilet and was eating a breakfast snack with Hsi-men Ch'ing when who should come in but the page boy, Tai-an, with the report that Master Ying and Master Hsieh had come to visit and were waiting in the reception room out front.

Hsi-men Ch'ing put down the piece of pastry in his hand and was halfway out the door when Yüeh-niang stopped him, saying, "Who knows what those two ghost-snatching demons have come for? You might just as well finish your breakfast before rushing off to meet them. Let them cool their heels outside a while. What are you in such a fearful hurry to get out of here for, anyway? There's no telling where they'll drag you off to in the snow."

"Tell the page boy to bring the pastry out front," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll share it with the two of them."

So saying, he got up and started out of the room.

"When you're through eating," Yüeh-niang instructed him, "don't allow yourself to be inveigled into going off somewhere with those two. After a heavy snow like this, you really ought to stay home and relax for a change. Tonight we're going to celebrate the eve of Meng Yü-lou's birthday."

"I understand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, he went out to meet Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta, who greeted him with a bow, saying, "Brother, after you went home in a huff the other night, we really gave them a hard time. 'All this while,' we said, 'our brother's been:

Spending his money and wasting his goods, here in your house. Even if he hasn't been around much lately, that's no reason for you to change your tune. After all, if you let your painted-face take up with some Southerner on the sly:

Enemies are apt to meet in narrow straits.⁴⁹

If he catches them red-handed, how could he be anything but angry? And, quite aside from our brother's anger, we can hardly be expected to countenance such goings on ourselves.'

"Mother and daughters alike, we really told them a thing or two. They're all thoroughly embarrassed about the whole thing. Early this morning they invited us over to their place and got down on their knees to us with a good deal of weeping and wailing. They're so worried about what you might do in your anger that they've prepared a cup of watery wine and want you to come back so they can make it up to you."

"I'm no longer angry," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I'm not going back into the quarter anymore."

"It's only right that you should be annoyed," said Ying Po-chüeh. "If you stop to think about it though, it's not really Kuei-chieh's fault. That Ting the Second was actually a patron of her elder sister, Li Kuei-ch'ing, and never made any overtures to Kuei-chieh. It all originated out of the fact that his father's boatload of goods was moored next to the boat of a National University student, named Ch'en, who is a fellow townsman of his. This Ch'en, whose sobriquet is Liang-huai, only arrived two days ago. He's the son of Administration Vice Commissioner Ch'en who formerly served in the Palace Library.

"This Ting the Second had engaged to pay ten taels of silver for a party at the Li place in order to entertain his fellow townsman Mr. Ch'en. He had just stopped by to deliver the money when we showed up, and Kuei-chieh, unable to think of any other means of avoiding an awkward situation, concealed the presence of the Southerner by hiding him in the rear part of the compound, where you happened to catch sight of him.

"The truth of the matter is that he has never laid a hand on Kuei-chieh. Today, mother and daughters alike:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths,

Kowtowing and performing obeisances, begged the two of us to do whatever we could to induce you to pay them a visit so they could explain this misunderstanding to you yourselves and perhaps alleviate some of your anger."

"I've already made a vow to my wife that I would never set foot in the place again," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's not that I'm still angry or anything like that. You can tell them that they have no cause for further concern. I've got some matters to attend to at home today, so I really can't go."

This reply threw his two visitors into such consternation that they fell to their knees and spoke with one voice, saying, "Brother, how can you say such a thing? It may not matter for you not to go, but since they have asked us to intercede on their behalf, it would look as though we had so little influence with you that we couldn't even get you to accede to an invitation. All you have to do is show up and sit for a while and then come home if you like."

By the time the two of them finished with their pitch:

As though their lives depended on it,
they had talked Hsi-men Ch'ing into giving his assent.

Before long, a table was set up and their host invited them to share the remainder of his breakfast pastry with him. When they had finished eating, soon thereafter, Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an to fetch his outdoor clothes.

Yüeh-niang, who was sitting with Meng Yü-lou when he came in, asked Tai-an, "Where's your father off to?"

"I have no idea," said Tai-an. "He only told me to come fetch his clothes."

"You lousy jailbird!" Yüeh-niang railed at him. "You think you can keep me in the dark, do you? If your father gets home late today, I'll hold you personally accountable. We're celebrating the eve of the Third Lady's birthday tonight, so you'd better get him home in plenty of time. If you wait until:

The sky is black and the earth is dark,
I'll see that you get a good beating, you lousy jailbird, if I have to do it myself."

"Why should you beat me, Mother?" said Tai-an. "What have I got to do with it?"

"I don't know why it is," said Yüeh-niang, "but as soon as he heard those two gaffers had come, he took off as though his life depended on it. We were eating breakfast at the time, but he dropped his bowl and headed out the door on the spot. Who knows where they may drag him off to:

Parading the campground and disturbing the dead, or when he'll ever get home."

It was the twenty-sixth day of the eleventh month, the eve of Meng Yü-lou's birthday, and a family party had been prepared for the occasion. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing accepted the invitation of his two friends to accompany them into the licensed quarter. The Li family establishment had already prepared a regular feast in their main reception room and engaged two singing girls to help with the entertainment. Li Kuei-chieh and Li Kuei-ch'ing, all dressed up for the occasion, met their guests at the door. The old procuress came out and knelt down to offer her apologies for the misunderstanding. The two sisters served the wine and Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta stood to either side, keeping up a steady stream of jokes and wisecracks.

"I wore away half the skin on my lips in getting your lover to come see you," said Ying Po-chüeh to Kuei-chieh. "And now you've no further use for me and don't even offer me a cup of wine. You've only got eyes for your lover, I can see. If he'd kicked up a fuss and refused to come, just now, not only would you have cried yourself blind and been reduced to making your living as an itinerant singer, but nobody would have cared a straw about you anymore. It's only my skills as a mouthpiece that have saved you from such a fate."

"You crazy beggar!" Kuei-chieh railed at him. "You're delirious. I'd only be wasting my breath on you. So you think I'd be reduced to being an itinerant singer, do you?"

"Just look at the way the lousy little whore carries on," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"After the sutra has been recited,

She takes the stick to the monk.⁵⁰

At this rate, she won't acknowledge anyone in the future. When he wouldn't come, you were all aflutter; but now that he's here:

Your wing feathers are dry enough for flight.⁵¹
Come over here and give me a kiss to fend off the cold."

Ying Po-chüeh Runs Errands on Behalf of Flowers

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,
he embraced her by the neck and gave her a kiss.

"You crazy chunk of knife-bait!" laughed Kuei-chieh. "Don't knock the wine all over Father."

"Little whore!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "I can see through your tricks. Right now you're so concerned about your lover, 'Don't knock the wine all over Father,' you say, giving such a sweet inflection to the word 'Father.' Am I nothing but a stepchild, that you haven't a word for me?"

"If I called you anything," said Kuei-chieh, "it would be 'my child.' "

"Come over here," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I've got a joke to tell you. A crab and a frog once swore brotherhood together and made a wager that whichever of them could jump over a ditch should be the elder brother. The frog made it to the other side in a hop or two. Just as the crab was about to jump, two girls came along to draw water and trussed him up with a piece of string to take home with them when they were through. They forgot about him when they were ready to leave, however, and neglected to take him. When the frog saw that his companion had not followed him he came back to see what had happened and asked, 'What's been keeping you?' 'I would have made it across,' said the crab, 'if I hadn't been tied up in knots by those two little whores.' "

Thereupon, the two sisters both took out after Ying Po-chüeh while Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed himself silly. They continued to enjoy themselves:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade,

Laughing and joking at each other's expense.

But no more of this.

To resume our story, back at home Wu Yüeh-niang had prepared a feast, partly in return for the one to which she had been treated the day before, and partly in order to celebrate the eve of Meng Yü-lou's birthday. Her sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, Aunt Yang, and two Buddhist nuns had been invited for the occasion and were seated in the master suite. As they waited the sun eventually set, but still there was no sign of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Yüeh-niang was becoming extremely agitated.

At this point, P'an Chin-lien, tugging Li P'ing-erh by the hand, said to Yüeh-niang with a giggle, "Elder Sister, since he still hasn't shown up, why don't the two of us go out to the front gate and look out for him?"

"Who's got the patience to look out for him?" said Yüeh-niang.

Chin-lien also took Meng Yü-lou by the hand, saying, "Let the three of us go out to look for him together."

"I want to hear the joke the abbess is about to tell," said Yü-lou. "Let's wait till she's done before we go."

Only then was Chin-lien induced to stay.

As they sat in a circle around the two nuns to hear what jokes they would tell, she said, "We only go for meaty fare. Don't give us any of that vegetarian stuff."

"Let them tell us whatever they want," said Yüeh-niang. "Don't be so demanding."

"Elder Sister," said Chin-lien, "you may not realize it but the abbess here can really tell a joke if she wants to. The last time she was here in the rear compound we refused to let her off and she came up with a whole string of good ones."

Then, turning to the abbess, she said, "If you've got any, let's have them."

At this point,

Neither hurriedly nor hastily,

Nun Wang, who was sitting on the k'ang, said, "A certain man was walking down the road when he encountered a tiger who wanted to eat him. 'Spare my life,' said the man, 'for the sake of my eighty-year-old mother who has no one else to look after her. Or else come home with me. I've got a pig there I could let you eat.' The tiger accordingly spared him and accompanied the man back to his home, where he told his mother about it. His mother, who was making bean curd at the time, couldn't bear to relinquish the pig, so she said to her son, 'Why don't you give him a few pieces of bean curd to eat?' 'You don't understand, Mother,' the son replied. 'He's not accustomed to vegetarian fare.' "

"That's no good," said Chin-lien. "We don't want to listen to any more of that vegetarian stuff. Let's have some meatier fare."

Nun Wang then told them another one. "A certain family with three daughters-in-law was celebrating the birthday of the head of the household. First it was the turn of the senior daughter-in-law to offer her father-in-law a cup of wine. 'Sir,' she said, 'you're just like a magistrate.' 'How am I like a magistrate?' the father-in-law asked. 'When you sit up there like that,' the daughter-in-law replied, 'everyone in the whole household is afraid of you. How can you say you're not like a magistrate?' Next it was the turn of the second daughter-in-law to offer a cup of wine. 'Sir,' she said, 'you're just like a yamen lictor of tigerlike ferocity.' 'How am I like a yamen lictor of tigerlike ferocity?' the father-in-law asked. 'When you shout a command,' the daughter-in-law replied, 'everyone in the whole household trembles. How can you say you're not like a yamen lictor?' You're really giving me a hard time,' the father-in-law said. Finally it was the turn of the third daughter-in-law to offer a cup of wine. She stepped forward and said, 'Sir, you're not really like a magistrate or like a lictor.' 'Then what am I like?' the father-in-law demanded to know. 'Sir,' said the daughter-in-law, 'you're just like a head yamen clerk.' 'How am I like a head yamen clerk?' the father-in-law asked. 'If you're not like a head yamen clerk,' the daughter-in-law replied, 'how is it that you have the run of all six chambers?' "⁵²

Everyone laughed at this joke.

"You bald-pated rascal!" said Chin-lien. "You've managed to get us all into it. What sort of a yamen clerk would have the nerve to venture into every chamber? The bald-pated dog would be lucky to escape with his nether regions in one piece."

After this exchange, Chin-lien, Yü-lou, and Li P'ing-erh went off to the front gate together to look for Hsi-men Ch'ing, but he was nowhere to be seen.

"What's Father doing away from home on such a snowy day?" asked Yü-lou. "I wonder where he's gone."

"If you ask me," said Chin-lien, "he's sure to be at that whore Li Kuei-chieh's house in the quarter."

"But he smashed the place up he was so upset with her," said Yü-lou. "He swore an oath never to set foot in it again. Why should he go back there? Let's make a bet on it. I'm sure he's not at her place."

"Sister Li can be our witness," said Chin-lien. "Are you willing to shake on it? I say he's gone to her house today. It was day before yesterday that he trashed the whore's place. Yesterday that cuckold Li Ming came here to size up the situation. Today Ying the Second and that Hsieh fellow showed up at the crack of dawn, like ghost-snatching demons, and dragged him off with them. My guess is that the old procuress and that whore have:

Laid plans and hatched a scheme,⁵³ in order to get him back there again. If they're able to work their wiles on him, somehow or other, and succeed in propitiating him, they'll have a chance to:

Relight the furnace and restore the account.

Who knows how long he'll be tied up, or what the probabilities are as to whether he'll come home or not; but our elder sister just keeps waiting for him."

"Even if he doesn't come home," said Yü-lou, "he ought to send a page boy back to let us know about it."

As they were talking, who should come by but a vendor of melon seeds, so the two of them, standing in the gateway, bought some melon seeds and stood there cracking them in their teeth. All of a sudden, they caught sight of Hsi-men Ch'ing coming toward them from the east, and the three ladies beat a hasty retreat.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was on horseback, sent Tai-an ahead of him on foot, saying, "See who it is standing there in the gateway."

Tai-an ran forward a step or two and reported, "It's the Third Lady, the Fifth Lady, and the Sixth Lady, buying melon seeds at the gate."

In due course, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, dismounted, and walked back through the inner gate that led to the rear compound. Meng Yü-lou and Li P'ing-erh had gone ahead to the master suite to tell Yüeh-niang of his arrival, but Chin-lien lay in wait for him, concealing herself in the black shadow behind the whitewashed spirit screen.

When he encountered her, Hsi-men Ch'ing was startled and said, "You crazy little whore! Coming upon you so suddenly gave me quite a start. What were you all doing out at the front gate?"

"You have a nerve to ask," said Chin-lien. "Where have you been all this time, that you should only be coming home now, leaving your mothers with nothing to do but wait for you at the door?"

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived in the master suite. Yüeh-niang had prepared a feast for the occasion which was laid out on the table with everything:

Straight and proper.⁵⁴

She told Yü-hsiao to hold the flagon and Hsi-men Ta-chieh to serve the wine. Hsi-men Ch'ing was served first, after which, when all of the sisters had been served in turn, they sat down at their places. Ch'un-mei and Ying-ch'un played and sang for them in the lower part of the room.

After they had eaten for a while, the first course was cleared away and the sweetmeats in honor of Meng Yü-lou's birthday were served, consisting of forty saucersful of delicacies of every kind.

The finest vintage poured from the flagon,⁵⁵

Iridescent liquid overflowed the cups.

Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, was induced to occupy the seat of honor but retired to her room during the first watch because she did not like to drink too much wine. Wu Yüeh-niang and the sorority of concubines, however, continued to keep Hsi-men Ch'ing company, throwing dice:

Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits.

When it was Yüeh-niang's turn to call the game, she said, "If you want me to set the rules for this round, the scoring will be based on domino combinations. Each player in turn must come up with the name of a song tune, the names of two domino combinations, and a line from the Hsi-hsiang chi (The romance of the western chamber),⁵⁶ strung together so as to make some semblance of sense. He or she must then throw the dice and drink a cup of wine as a forfeit if any of the numbers thrown correspond to those in the domino combinations he or she has named."

Yüeh-niang went first, saying, " 'The Sixth Lady,' like a 'Drunken Yang Kuei-fei,'⁵⁷ drops her 'Eight-pearled Bracelet.'⁵⁸ 'Gossamer strands catch on the rose-leaved raspberry trellis.'⁵⁹

When she threw the dice, none of the numbers corresponded to those in either of the domino combinations she had named.

Next it was Hsi-men Ch'ing's turn. He said, " 'The Beautiful Lady Yü,' observing 'Ch'u and Han Contend for Supremacy,'⁶⁰ feels threatened by 'The Regular Cavalry.'⁶¹ 'Beside my ears gongs and drums resound to the skies.'⁶²

Sure enough, when he threw the dice he got the combination called "The Regular Cavalry" and had to drink a cup of wine as a penalty.

Li Chiao-erh came next. She said, " 'The Water Nymphs,' because 'Two Gentlemen Intrude upon Peach Blossom Spring,'⁶³ are startled out of their idyll in which 'Flowers Blossom and Butterflies Fill the Branches,'⁶⁴ As a result, 'Fallen red petals cover the ground, their rouge now cold.'⁶⁵

When she threw the dice, she escaped unscathed.

Then came Chin-lien, who said, " 'The Old Crone' 'Ventures among the Flowers in Her Dotage,'⁶⁶ thereby flouting 'The Three Bonds and Five Constants,'⁶⁷ 'If not arrested for seduction, it will be for robbery.'⁶⁸

Sure enough, when she threw the dice she got the combination called "The Three Bonds and Five Constants" and had to drink a cup of wine as a penalty.

Next it was Li P'ing-erh's turn. She said, " 'Decorous and Pretty,' she 'Mounts a Ladder to Gaze at the Moon,'⁶⁹ waiting until 'The Spring Equinox, when Day and Night are Equal in Length.'⁷⁰ At that time, 'Separated from him by the intervening wall, she might have turned to stone awaiting her husband.'⁷¹

When she threw the dice, she escaped unscathed.

Then came Sun Hsieh-o, who said, " 'The Pockmarked Young Man,' on seeing 'The Flock of Crows Attack the Phoenix,'⁷² only succeeds in tripping up 'The Wild Goose with the Broken Leg.'⁷³ 'I'll be damned if I do and damned if I don't.'⁷⁴

When she threw the dice, she escaped unscathed.

Finally, it was the turn of Yü-lou to finish the round. She said, " 'Nien-nu Is Charming.' Propping up the drunken 'Red Doublet Four,'⁷⁵ she trails 'The Hem of Her Brocaded Skirt.'⁷⁶ How often will she enjoy 'Spring breezes and moonlit nights amid gold lame bed curtains.'⁷⁷

Sure enough, when she threw the dice she got the combination called "Red Doublet Four."

Yüeh-niang completed her round as mistress of ceremonies by saying to Hsiao-yü, "Pour some wine for the Third Lady."

Turning to the latter, she continued, "You'd better drink three large cups. This evening it's your turn to spend the night with the bridegroom."

Addressing herself then to Chin-lien, Li Chiao-erh, and the rest, she said, "As soon as she's finished her wine, we must all see the two of them to their bridal chamber."

"If that is Elder Sister's decree," said Chin-lien, "how could we dare not to comply?"

This badinage reduced Yü-lou to a state of utter confusion.

Not long thereafter, the wine was finished and Yüeh-niang and the others escorted Hsi-men Ch'ing as far as the door of Yü-lou's chamber before going their separate ways. Yü-lou invited them to come in and visit for a while, but none of them would stay.

"My child," teased Chin-lien, "see that the two of you get a good night's rest. Your mother will come back to see you in the morning. Don't be naughty now."

Then, turning to Yüeh-niang, she continued in the same vein, "Kinswoman, my child is still a youngster. For my sake, if anything comes up, give her the benefit of the doubt."

"Slavey Six," said Yü-lou:

"The best vinegar takes time to ferment.

I'll have something to say to you tomorrow."

"As for me," said Chin-lien, "I'm like:

The go-between who has to climb the stairs:

Quite inured to such alarms."

"My child," said Yü-lou. "Won't you stay a little longer?"

"We're only outsiders, after all," said Chin-lien, "from the other side of the wall."

Thereupon, along with Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ta-chieh she set out to return to the front compound. Just as they reached the inner gate, Li P'ing-erh lost her footing on a slippery patch of ground and fell down.

Chin-lien made a big to-do about it, calling out, "Sister Li, you might as well be blind. With every move you make you come a cropper. When I tried to catch you, one of my own feet slipped into the snow and now my shoe is all muddy."

Yüeh-niang overheard this, and said, "It must be that pile of snow by the inner gate. I've told the page boys to take care of it more than once, but the lousy slaves simply won't cart it away. It's no wonder someone has taken a spill."

Then, turning to Hsiao-yü, she said, "Take a lantern and escort the Fifth Lady and the Sixth Lady back to the front compound."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, in Yü-lou's room, said to her, "Just take a gander at that lousy little whore. She steps in the mud, trips someone up, and then has the nerve to suggest that the other party has gotten mud on her shoe. She invariably picks on someone who's unlikely to give her any lip in return. It's just like her, little whore that she is. I'm sure it was she, yesterday, that put the maidservants up to singing:

It was the night of their assignation."

"What was the point of that particular song suite?" asked Yü-lou.

"What she meant to suggest," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is that my wife's encounter with me was not really just a coincidence, but something done by design; as though she was burning incense at night in the expectation that I would discover her in the act."

"Sister Six seems to know every song in the repertory," said Yü-lou. "The rest of us don't understand such things."

"You don't know what that whore is capable of," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All she ever does is engage in backbiting at other people's expense."

We will say no more, for the moment, about how Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in Yü-lou's room, but turn instead to P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh.

The two of them chatted as they walked along, Chin-lien addressing her companion sometimes as Sister Li and sometimes as Sister Hua. They accompanied Hsi-men Ta-chieh as far as the inner gate that led into the front courtyard, where she returned to her quarters. Hsiao-yü, holding a lantern, then escorted the two of them into the garden.

Chin-lien was already half drunk. Taking Li P'ing-erh by the hand, she said, "Sister Hua, I'm a little tipsy today. Be good enough, whatever happens, to accompany me into my room."

"You're not drunk, Sister," said Li P'ing-erh.

Before long, they arrived at Chin-lien's quarters, and Hsiao-yü was sent back to the rear compound. Chin-lien invited Li P'ing-erh to sit down and have some tea.

"You were talking just now," said Chin-lien, "about that time when you were unable to enter the household. Who do you suppose you have to thank for the present situation? Who would ever have thought that today we'd be sisters:

Walking along the same gangplank?⁷⁸

I don't know how much unpleasantness I had to put up with on your account, or all the things that were said about me behind my back. As for my good intentions, they are known only to Heaven. That's all there is to it."

"I know how much trouble you went to," said Li P'ing-erh.

"Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

"As long as you're aware of it," said Chin-lien, "we can be on talking terms with each other."

In a little while, Ch'un-mei served the tea and, after finishing it, Li P'ing-erh took her leave and went back to her own quarters, while Chin-lien went to sleep by herself. But no more of this. Truly:

Just as it seems that, first to last,

there is nothing to regret;

No sooner are the branches formed than they begin to proliferate.⁷⁹

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 22

HSI-MEN CH'ING SECRETLY SEDUCES LAI-WANG'S WIFE; CH'UN-MEI SELF-RIGHTEOUSLY DENOUNCES LI MING

If you're clever, you'll be considered labored, if you're awkward, idle;¹
If you're good, you'll be disdained as weak,
if you're bad, callous.
If you're rich, you'll meet with envy,
if you're poor, disgrace;²
If you're diligent, you'll be thought grasping,
if you're economical, stingy.
If you deal with things consistently,
you'll be scorned as simple;
If you adapt yourself to circumstances,³ you'll be suspected of deceit.
If you think about it, it is hardly possible to satisfy anyone;⁴
The role of human being is an arduous one, to be a man is hard.⁵

THE STORY GOES that the next day Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P'an, and other female guests had all assembled to celebrate Meng Yü-lou's birthday. Yüeh-niang presided over the party, which took place in the reception room in the rear compound. This would all have been well enough had it not given rise to a certain incident.

Because Lai-wang's wife had finally died of consumption, Yüeh-niang had recently found a new wife for him. Her maiden name was Sung and she was the daughter of the coffin seller, Sung Jen. She had originally been a maidservant in the household of Assistant Prefect Ts'ai but had lost her position there because of a scandal, and then married a cook named Chiang Ts'ung, or Sauce and Scallions. This Chiang Ts'ung was often hired for temporary duty in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, and Lai-wang, who was sent to his home to fetch him, early and late, thus became acquainted with his wife. The two of them sometimes drank wine together and bandied words, with the result that Lai-wang succeeded in seducing her.

One day, unexpectedly, Chiang Ts'ung got into a quarrel with his fellow kitchen workers over the division of their pay. This turned into a drunken brawl in the course of which knives were drawn and Chiang Ts'ung was stabbed to death. His assailant succeeded in scaling the wall and making good his escape. His widow begged Lai-wang to intercede with Hsi-men Ch'ing, who sent a note to the vice magistrate of the district, with the result that the offender was apprehended, convicted of a capital crime, and executed in atonement for the death of Chiang Ts'ung.

Later on, Lai-wang deceived Yüeh-niang into believing that the widow had been the wife of a small householder and was good at needlework, and he persuaded her to lay out five taels of silver, two suits of clothes, four bolts of blue and of red fabric, and a few hairpins, bracelets, and the like, in order to acquire her as a new wife for him. Because her given name was Chin-lien, Yüeh-niang thought it would be awkward to have two people of the same name in the household and had her change her name to Hui-lien.

This woman was born in the year of the horse and was two years younger than Chin-lien, which made her twenty-five years old that year.⁶ She possessed:

A clear off-white complexion.
Her figure was neither plump nor thin;
Her stature was neither short nor tall.

Her bound feet were even smaller than Chin-lien's. She was:

Clever by nature,
Highly adaptable,
Adept at adorning herself,
As able at making waves as a dragon or tiger;

In fact:

A champion among seductresses,
A leader of the homebreakers.

If one were to summarize her accomplishments, she was able to:

Stand leaning idly against the doorjamb,⁷
Following each passerby with her eyes;
Lean cheek on hand or bite her nails,
Adjusting her attire for no good reason;
Sitting or standing, swing her legs,
Singing to herself in a husky voice;
Open windows and thrust apart shutters,
With needle poised, losing herself in thought;⁸
Smile expectantly before speaking,
Betraying the fact she is having an affair.⁹

When she first arrived, she took her part in the kitchen work along with the other servants' wives and made no effort to doll herself up, or even think about doing so. Later on, after she had been there a month or more, she began to notice the way in which Yü-lou, Chin-lien, and the others were tricked out, and responded accordingly. She built up the chignon under her fret until it became higher and higher, affected a bouffant hairdo, and adorned her temples with two long spit curls. As a result, when she:

Served tea or served water,¹⁰ to her employers, she began to catch Hsi-men Ch'ing's eye.

One day he formulated a plan according to which he would send Lai-wang to Hang-chou with five hundred taels of silver in order to arrange the manufacture of brocaded python robes for presentation to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching on the occasion of his birthday, as well as the purchase of clothing for all four seasons to supply the future needs of his own household. The round trip ought to take as much as half a year. His departure was arranged for around the middle of the eleventh month, and he accordingly set out at that time to travel by cart on the overland route. Hsi-men Ch'ing was determined that sooner or later he would have a chance to make a play for his wife.

It was now the day of Meng Yü-lou's birthday, and Yüeh-niang was entertaining the female guests in the reception room in the rear compound. Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to be at home, not having any outside engagements that day.

"Set up a separate table for him in the master suite," Yüeh-niang instructed Yü-hsiao, "and see that he is served a full complement of wine and food, including soup, rice, and savories."

Through the hanging blind Hsi-men Ching observed Sung Hui-lien serving wine to the guests at the party, wearing a red crepe jacket that opened down the middle over a skirt of violet silk.

Feigning ignorance, he asked Yü-hsiao, "Who is that in the red jacket?"

"It's Lai-wang's new wife, Hui-lien," replied Yü-hsiao.

"Why on earth is she wearing a violet skirt with a red jacket?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It's most unbecoming. Tell your mistress in the future to find her a skirt of some other color that will match better."¹¹

"That violet skirt is one she borrowed from me," said Yü-hsiao.

This reply put a stop to the matter for the time being and, before long, Meng Yü-lou's birthday was over.

One day, Yüeh-niang paid a visit to the home of Ch'iao Hung, a well-to-do commoner who lived across the street from them, in order to celebrate a birthday. That afternoon, Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to come home somewhat tipsy. He arrived at the inner gate just as Hui-lien was on her way out, and the two of them ran smack into each other.

Hsi-men Ch'ing impulsively reached out with one hand, embraced her by the neck, and gave her a kiss, murmuring as he did so, "My child, if you'll allow me to have my way with you, you can have anything in the way of jewelry or clothing that you wish."

The woman said not a word, pushed aside Hsi-men Ch'ing's hand, and continued on her way to the front compound.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived in the master suite he told Yü-hsiao to deliver a bolt of blue silk to Hui-lien's room and, thus and so, to say to her, "The other day Father saw you serving wine at the party wearing a violet skirt along with a red jacket, a combination that was most unbecoming and really didn't do you justice. I told him that the violet skirt was one you had borrowed from me. He opened up the clothes cabinet, just now, and took out this bolt of silk which he sent me to give you in order to make into a skirt."

Hui-lien opened it up and saw that it was a bolt of turquoise blue silk, figured with roundels of flowers from each of the four seasons and pairs of magpies face-to-face, a rebus for the words "happy reunion."

"If I make this up," said Hui-lien, "Mother is bound to notice it and ask where it came from. What then?"

"Father will tell Mother what he's done," said Yü-hsiao. "You have nothing to worry about. Father also said that if you go along with him in this matter he'll buy you whatever you want. He'd like to have a tryst with you today while Mother's not at home. What do you think?"

On hearing this proposition the woman smiled slightly but did not immediately say anything.

"When does Father plan to come?" she finally asked. "Shall I wait for him here?"

"Father says it would be awkward if he were seen going into your room by the page boys," said Yü-hsiao. "He wants you to slip secretly into the grotto under the artificial hill in the garden. There's never anybody there so it's a suitable place for a tryst."

"I fear the Fifth Lady or the Sixth Lady might get wind of it," the woman said. "That would be embarrassing."

"The Third Lady and the Fifth Lady are playing a board game in the Sixth Lady's quarters right now," said Yü-hsiao. "You can go ahead. The coast is clear."

Now that the arrangements were complete, Yü-hsiao went back to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing. The two principals then proceeded to the grotto where they consummated their affair while Yü-hsiao stood at the garden gate to act as a lookout.

It so happened that Chin-lien and Yü-lou were playing a board game in Li P'ing-erh's quarters when who should appear but Hsiao-luan, who had come to fetch Yü-lou, saying, "Father has come home."

The party then broke up and Yü-lou returned to the rear compound. Chin-lien went to her own quarters and made up her face, after which she also set out for the rear compound. As she came through the inner gate, she encountered Hsiao-yü standing outside the door of the master suite.

"Is your father inside?" she asked.

Hsiao-yü made a negative gesture with her hand and pointed toward the front compound. Chin-lien understood at once and made her way back toward the postern gate that led into the garden where the artificial hill was located. There she found Yü-hsiao barring her way. Suspecting that it was she who had been dallying there with Hsi-men Ch'ing, she tried to force her way through, which reduced Yü-hsiao to panic.

"Fifth Lady, you can't go in there," she said. "Father's in there and he's busy."

"You crazy little bitch!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "As if I were afraid of your father!"

Whereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation, she marched into the garden and proceeded to search it from one end to the other. When she reached the grotto under the artificial hill, which had been given the name Hidden Spring Grotto,¹² the couple within had just brought their transaction to a conclusion. The woman, hearing someone coming, had just managed to refasten her skirt and start outside when she ran into Chin-lien and turned crimson with embarrassment.

"You lousy little stinker! What do you think you're doing here?" Chin-lien demanded.

"I came to look for Hua-t'ung," the woman replied and then, under her interlocutor's gaze, disappeared in a cloud of dust.

Chin-lien went inside where she found Hsi-men Ch'ing in the act of fastening up his trousers.

"You lousy shameless good-for-nothing!" she railed at him. "You've been up to your tricks in here with that slave of a whore in broad daylight. I should've boxed that whore's ears for her, but she managed to get away. So you're the Hua-t'ung she was looking for, are you. Tell me the truth. How many times have you made out with that whore? If you don't level with me, just wait till Elder Sister gets home in a little while and see if I don't tell her all about it. If I don't beat that slave of a whore's face till she looks like a bloated pig, I might as well quit. Here we all are, bored enough to scream as it is, and she comes along and wants to horn in on the action. Well I'm not the one to let her get away with it."

"You crazy little whore!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Keep your voice down. Do you want everyone to know about it? I'll tell you the truth. Thus and so, today included, I've only made out with her once."

Hsi-men Ch'ing Secretly Seduces Lai-wang's Wife

"Once? Twice? I don't believe you," said Chin-lien. "But if you think you can continue to carry on your tricks with that slave of a whore while:

Deceiving spirits and stupefying demons,¹³ you've got another think coming. If I ever find out about it, then forgive you me, but I'll have something to say to the two of you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and made his exit.

When Chin-lien returned to the rear compound she overheard the gossiping maidservants saying, "When Father came home today he sent Yü-hsiao to the front of the compound with a bolt of blue silk wrapped up in a kerchief, but we don't know whom it was intended for.”

Chin-lien realized that it had been a present for Lai-wang’s wife, but she kept the information to herself, not even mentioning it to Meng Yü-lou.

Hui-lien, for her part, endeavored every day to get on the right side of Chin-lien by cooking special treats for her, offering to help with her needlework, or playing up to her in disingenuous ways while she was engaged in board games with Li P’ing-erh. Chin-lien, too, when there was no one else about, would facilitate Hui-lien’s liaisons with Hsi-men Ch’ing as a means of further ingratiating herself with her husband.

From the commencement of Hui-lien’s affair with Hsi-men Ch’ing, quite aside from the clothing, handkerchiefs, jewelry, breath-sweetening lozenges, and the like, with which he kept her supplied on the sly, she was observed to have ready money by the tael at her disposal, with which she bought ornamental trinkets and cosmetics at the front gate of the compound. Gradually it became apparent that she was no longer dressing the way she used to do. Hsi-men Ch’ing also spoke to Yüeh-niang about her, suggesting that since she made such good soup she ought to be relieved of her duties in the main kitchen and assigned to share the responsibility with Yü-hsiao for looking after the small stove behind the master suite, boiling tea water and supplying snacks for Yüeh-niang’s consumption, and helping her with her needlework, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Gentle reader take note: The head of a household ought never to engage in compromising intimacies with the wives of his slaves or servants. Sooner or later such conduct:

Confuses the distinction between high and low,
Opens the door to surreptitious abuses, and Poses a threat to public morality, until the situation gets out of hand. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Since Hsi-men Ch’ing, in his lust, ignores distinctions of status;
It is inevitable that his concubines will compete for his favor.
How can he bear to treat Yüeh-niang as though she does not exist;
While disrupting the bonds of society by seducing his servant’s wife?

One day, on the eighth day of the twelfth month, Hsi-men Ch’ing got up earlier than usual, having prearranged with Ying Po-chüeh to go together to attend the funeral procession of the wife of Prefectural Judge Shang, who lived on Main Street. He told the page boys to prepare two horses and was waiting for Ying Po-chüeh, who had not yet arrived, when Li Ming appeared in order to give another lesson to Ch’un-mei and the other three household musicians. Hsi-men Ch’ing was sitting by the stove in the main reception room at the time, and he ordered that Ch’un-mei, Yü-hsiao, Lan-hsiang, and Ying-ch’un, all four of them, should get dressed up and come out front so he could look on as Li Ming gave them their lesson. His son-in-law, Ch’en Ching-chi, was also there to keep him company.

They embarked on the song suite the first number of which, to the tune “Powdery Butterflies,” begins with the words:

“Three Variations on the Plum Blossom,”¹⁴ and had not yet finished it when Ying Po-chüeh came in the door, accompanied by his eldest son, Ying Pao, carrying his father’s felt bag.

Ch’un-mei and her three companions started to return to the rear compound, but Hsi-men Ch’ing called them to a halt, saying, “After all, it’s only old Ying the Second. Come pay him your respects, why don’t you. There’s no need to hide.”

He and Po-chüeh saluted each other with a bow and were about to sit down when he ordered the four of them, “Come over here and kowtow to old Ying the Second.”

Ch’un-mei and the others turned to face the guest and kowtowed to him before withdrawing a few steps.

Ying Po-chüeh hurriedly bowed to each of them in turn and complimented his host, saying, “You have all the luck, Brother. What fine young ladies the four of them have all turned out to be.

Like bulrushes, each one is prettier than the last.

I’m afraid I’m somewhat at a loss, though, having come out today empty-handed. I found myself so:

Pushed and pressured, this morning that I neglected to bring anything along with me. I’ll have to give them a little something for rouge and powder on another day.”

Shortly thereafter, Ch’un-mei and the others, having paid their respects, went inside, and Ch’en Ching-chi bowed to the visitor and sat down.

“What kept you so long today?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“I don’t even like to talk about it,” said Ying Po-chüeh. “My eldest daughter has been sick for some time and has only recently begun to get better. My wife is concerned about her and has invited her to come home and relax for a few days. I’ve been tied up until now arranging with Ying Pao to engage a sedan chair for her and buying a few things for her visit. I’m a bit late I’m afraid.”

"I've been waiting for you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Let's have some congee and be on our way."

"Go fetch some congee from the rear compound for us to eat," he then instructed a page boy.

When Li Ming saw Ying Po-chüeh he came up and greeted him by falling to one knee.

"I haven't seen you for some time, Li Ming," said Po-chüeh.

"Well, here I am," said Li Ming. "I've been working at Eunuch Director Hsü's place in the Northern Quarter the last couple of days and only just came over here."

As they spoke, two page boys set up a table and fetched the congee for them to eat. There were four salty main courses and ten side dishes. The main courses had been slow boiled and consisted of a bowl of ham hocks, a bowl of squab, a bowl of steamed junket flavored with potherb mustard greens, and a bowl of chicken wonton. These served to accompany three silver-mounted bowls of congee made from nonglutinous rice, which had been cooked with hazelnuts, pine seeds, chestnuts, fruit kernels, rose hips, and crystallized sugar.

Hsi-men Ch'ing joined Ying Po-chüeh and Ch'en Ching-chi in consuming this repast and then called for small silver cups and filled them with Chin-hua wine. When they had each had three cups there was still more than half a flagon of wine left over and Hsi-men Ch'ing told Hua-t'ung to take it, along with the table that contained the remainder of their breakfast, into an antechamber and offer it to Li Ming.

He then put on his outdoor clothes and set off with Ying Po-chüeh to join the funeral procession for the wife of Prefectural Judge Shang, leaving Li Ming to consume the leftovers in the anteroom on the western side of the front courtyard.

No sooner had Yüeh-niang's maidservant, Yü-hsiao, together with Lan-hsiang and the others, seen Hsi-men Ch'ing out the door than they began:

Horsing around till they were all in a heap, in the side chamber in which they were awaiting their lesson. After a while they trooped across to Hsi-men Ta-chieh's room on the other side of the courtyard and continued their horseplay there. Ch'un-mei alone remained where she was, and Li Ming proceeded to give her a lesson on the p'i-p'a.

Li Ming had had something to drink. Ch'un-mei's sleeve opening was wide and her hand became caught in it. When Li Ming reached over to help extricate her hand he pressed it more heavily than necessary. Ch'un-mei was immediately incensed and began to tell him off in no uncertain terms.

"You lousy cuckold!" she railed at him. "What do you think you're doing squeezing my hand and making a pass at me? You lousy dead duck of a cuckold! You don't know who it is you're messing around with. Here you are being plied with:

The best wine and the finest meat,¹⁵ and it only brings out more clearly the fact that you have the soul of a cuckold. Squeeze my hand, will you? You lousy cuckold!

You've stuck your spade in the wrong place, this time. Ask around and you'll soon find out if I'm the sort of person to play your tricks on. Just wait till he gets home and I tell him about it. You lousy cuckold! You'll be:

Driven away from this door for good,¹⁶ with the aid of a stick. I suppose you think that without your cuckold's services we couldn't learn how to sing. As though there weren't another cuckold to be had in the licensed quarter! Well the muck's on you, you cuckold!"

Calling him a cuckold a thousand times, if not ten thousand times, Ch'un-mei railed at him until Li Ming picked up his things and fled, as though:

Whether his fate were governed by metal or by water,
There was no place for him to hide.¹⁷

Truly:

With two hands he tore open the road between life and death;
Flopping over and leaping out through the gate to perdition.¹⁸

Li Ming fled in consternation, and Ch'un-mei headed back toward the interior of the compound in a rage, cursing as she went. Chin-lien was in her room playing a board game with Meng Yü-lou, Li P'ing-erh, and Sung Hui-lien when she heard Ch'un-mei come in, uttering imprecations as she came.

"Who are you railing at, you lousy little piece?" asked Chin-lien. "Who's been bothering you?"

"You know perfectly well who it is," Ch'un-mei said angrily. "It's not to be borne. When Father was about to leave he told a page boy, out of the kindness of his heart, to take what was left of the dishes on the breakfast table and the remainder of the congee and offer them to that cuckold Li Ming. Yü-hsiao and the others were also there:

Horsing around till they were all in a heap.
It was a case of:

You push me,
I push you,

and:

Showing their teeth and making faces,¹⁹

Ch'un-mei Self-righteously Denounces Li Ming

at that cuckold as though they'd lost all sense of decorum. After clowning around for a bit, they all trooped off to Hsi-men Ta-chieh's room on the other side of the courtyard.

"No sooner did that cuckold see there was nobody about than he gave my hand a squeeze, as hard as he could, gazing at me with a drunken simper. As though I'd let him get away with something like that! When he saw me raise a hue and cry and start to give him what for, he snatched up his things and ran for it. I should've boxed that cuckold's ears for him. The lousy cuckold! You'd better learn to:

Suit your conduct to the person you're dealing with.

I'm not the sort of wanton baggage who is:

Neither fish nor fowl,²⁰ that would be likely to put up with the tricks of a cuckold like you. I'll beat your cuckold's face until it's black and blue."

"You crazy little piece," said Chin-lien. "What does it matter whether you continue your lessons or not? You've gotten so angry your face is all sallow. Just wait till your father comes home and tell him about it. He'll give the lousy cuckold his walking papers and that will be the end of it. Who does he think he is, anyway? He's only a paid entertainer, after all. Does that give the cuckold the right to make a pass at my maid? I know all about that lousy cuckold."

His crock of bad karma is already full."²¹

"It's just his bad luck," said Ch'un-mei. "No doubt he's relying on the fact that he's the Second Lady's brother. But who's afraid of the Second Lady? I suppose he thinks if she has it in for me she can just order me five strokes with the cane, or something like that."

"If you stop to think about it," chimed in Sung Hui-lien, "he's only a musician who's been hired to come here and teach his stock in trade. What business does he have making a pass at a girl of good family?"

For every coin you receive from your patron,

You should be as grateful as to your parents.

Not to mention the fact that every day you're regaled with:

Three teas and six repasts."

"And on top of all that," said Chin-lien, "he demands his wages before he leaves. He's being paid at the rate of five taels of silver per month. You lousy cuckold!"

You're sacrificing at the wrong grave."²²

Just ask around among the page boys in the household and see if any of them have the nerve to show their teeth and grin at Ch'un-mei, or give her any lip. If they caught her in a good mood, they might get off with a curse or two. But if they caught her in a bad mood, she'd have them dragged in front of the master and given a beating for their pains. In fact, if it comes to that, she's quite capable of brazening it out with the master himself. You really picked the wrong person this time. You lousy cuckold! You've run out of luck. You may have gotten her ginger up, but you don't even know how hot she can make it for you yet."

"And what were you up to?" she continued, turning to Ch'un-mei. "When Father left, you could have come inside and nothing would have happened. What on earth did you stay in that side room with him for, and give that cuckold the opportunity to make a pass at you?"

"It was all because Yü-hsiao and the others were only interested in horsing around:

Falling into a heap with laughter,

and didn't want to come in," said Ch'un-mei.

"You mean to say the three of them are still in the side chamber out there?" asked Yü-lou.

"They've all gone over to Hsi-men Ta-chieh's room on the other side of the courtyard," said Ch'un-mei.

"I'll go see what's going on," said Yü-lou, getting up and suiting her action to her words.

Sometime later, Li P'ing-erh also returned to her quarters and sent Hsiu-ch'un out to summon Ying-ch'un.

That evening, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home, Chin-lien gave him a word for word account of the incident, with the result that he ordered Lai-hsing not to let Li Ming into the house in the future. Now that access was denied him, he didn't dare come around any more. As far as Li Ming was concerned, truly:

Though his deeds were done in the past,

The chickens would come home to roost.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

By hiring a tutor to teach his maids to sing,

he flaunted his munificence;

Every day, in the deserted courtyard,

they fiddled with their sound boxes.

Who would have thought that Li Ming would be driven from his post;

Thereby raising Ch'un-mei's reputation as high as the skies?

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 23

YÜ-HSIAO ACTS AS LOOKOUT BY YÜEH-NIANG'S CHAMBER; CHIN-LIEN EAVESDROPS OUTSIDE HIDDEN SPRING GROTTO

THESE IS a lyric to the tune "Moon on the West River" that goes:

In conduct, heedless of Heaven's principles;
His actions disregard established norms.
Doing just as he pleases, he is ever ready to deceive;
Relying on clout, he scorns others and reveres himself.

He goes out in embroidered robes on a fine steed;
He returns to enjoy the damsels of Wu and Yüeh.
But gold and jade do not furnish a secure foundation;
Even they are not immune to the vicissitudes of fortune.

The story goes that:

The twelfth month ended and spring began,
It was the festival of the New Year.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was out paying courtesy calls and Wu Yüeh-niang was away on a visit to the home of her elder brother, Wu K'ai. That noon Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien were in Li P'ing-erh's rooms playing a board game with her.

"What should we bet on the outcome today?" asked Yü-lou.

"Let's play three games," said Chin-lien, "and make the loser fork out five mace of silver and stand us all a treat. We can spend three mace on Chin-hua wine, the other two on a pig's head, and get Lai-wang's wife to braise it for us. They say she really knows how to braise a pig's head and can do it to a turn with a single stick of firewood."

"Our elder sister is not at home," Yü-lou pointed out. "What should we do about that?"

"We can always save a portion for her," said Chin-lien, "and have it sent to her room. It's all the same thing."

When they had finished talking about it the trio set out their pieces and proceeded to play three games. Li P'ing-erh was the loser and forfeited five mace of silver. Chin-lien sent Li P'ing-erh's maid, Hsiu-ch'un, to summon Lai-hsing and turned the money over to him, telling him to buy a jug of Chin-hua wine and a pig's head along with four trotters.

"Take them to the kitchen in the rear compound," Chin-lien instructed him, "and get Lai-wang's wife, Hui-lien, to braise them immediately. Then have her deliver them to the Third Lady's room and wait for us there. We'll be over in a jiffy."

"Sister Six," said Yü-lou, "it would be better to have her put them in a box when she's done and bring them back here for us to eat. If we move to the rear compound Li Chiao-erh and Sun Hsüeh-o will see what's going on and we'll have to worry about whether or not to invite them to partake."

Chin-lien acceded to Yü-lou's suggestion.

It wasn't long before Lai-hsing came back to deliver the wine and pig's head he had purchased to the kitchen. Hui-lien was in the rear compound just then, sitting with Yü-hsiao on the stone stylobate outside the master suite, playing jacks.

"Sister Hui-lien," Lai-hsing said to her, "the Fifth Lady and the Third Lady have a request to make of you. They sent me out to buy some wine and a pig's head, along with the trotters, all of which are now sitting in the kitchen. They'd like you to braise them till they're properly done and then deliver them to the Sixth Lady's quarters in the front compound."

"I don't have the time," replied Hui-lien. "I'm busy stitching shoe soles for the mistress. Anyone can do the braising for you. Why insist on singling me out for the job?"

"Braise them or not, whichever you please," said Lai-hsing. "It's up to you now. I've got something else to do." Saying which, he walked nonchalantly out without more ado.

"You'd better leave off and do that braising as requested," said Yü-hsiao. "You know what sort of a mouth the Fifth Lady has. The next thing you know we'll have another ruckus on our hands."

"How on earth does the Fifth Lady know I can braise pig's head?" laughed Hui-lien. "Why should she insist on singling me out to do the job for her?"

Thereupon she got up, went into the kitchen, dipped out a wokful of water, trimmed the pig's head and trotters carefully, shoved a single long stick of firewood into the stove, mixed a large bowlful of oil, soy sauce, and star anise in just the right proportions to add to the brew, and then fitted the lid of the pewter braising pan tightly in place. In less than two hours the pig's head was braised to the point that:

The skin was separated and the flesh falling apart.

Redolently fragrant:

All five flavors were fully represented.¹

Arranging her handiwork on a large platter with accompanying saucers of chopped ginger and garlic, Hui-lien got a page boy to put it in a square box and deliver it to Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound while she opened the jug of Chin-hua wine and prepared it for serving.

Li P'ing-erh Loses a Board Game and Stands a Treat

Meng Yü-lou set aside a generous plateful of the finest meat and a flagon of Chin-hua wine for Yüeh-niang's benefit and ordered a maidservant to take them to the master suite. The three women then sat down around the table and proceeded to pour themselves some wine. Just as they were enjoying their repast, who should walk into their presence with an ingratiating giggle but Hui-lien.

"My mistresses," she said, "try a little of this pig's head. Did I manage to braise it to your satisfaction today?"

"The Third Lady has just been praising your skill," said Chin-lien. "This pig's head is as tender as can be," she said.

"Is it really true," Li P'ing-erh asked, "that you only used a single stick of firewood?"

"To tell you the truth," Hui-lien replied, "it doesn't even take a whole stick of firewood. If I'd used the whole stick the meat would have fallen away from the bones."

"Fetch a large winecup," Yü-lou said to Hsiu-ch'un, "and pour out a cupful of wine for your sister to drink."

Li P'ing-erh promptly ordered Hsiu-ch'un to do as she was bidden while she herself filled a saucer with meat from the pig's head and handed it to Hui-lien, saying, "You made it yourself. Have a taste and see what you think."

"I know you don't like things to be overly salty," said Hui-lien, "but I'm afraid I went a little too easy on the soy sauce. It's all right, I guess, but the next time I braise anything for you I'll be able to do it better."

Thereupon:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,
she kowtowed to them three times and only then took up a position standing beside the table and joined them in their drinking.

That evening, when Yüeh-niang returned home and the womenfolk of the household came to greet her, Hsiao-yü brought out the portion of pig's head they had sent over and showed it to her mistress.

"We were playing a board game for stakes in Sister Li's place today," said Yü-lou, "and won a pig's head from her. We set aside part of it for you."

"That seems just a bit unfair," said Yüeh-niang. "Everyone wants to be a winner. It's hardly right that a single loser should have to bear the brunt. Why don't we plan to do it this way instead? It's only appropriate that during the holiday season each of us sisters ought to take her turn playing hostess to the rest. We can engage Big Sister Yü to entertain us during the evenings. What is there to prevent it? Wouldn't that be better than insisting on having winners and losers and making one person pay the piper? What do you think of my suggestion?"

"Elder Sister's suggestion is a good one," they all said with one voice.

"Tomorrow is the fifth day of the first month," said Yüeh-niang. "Let me start things off. I'll send a page boy to engage the services of Big Sister Yü."

Thereupon Li Chiao-erh opted for the sixth, Meng Yü-lou took the seventh, and P'an Chin-lien took the eighth.

"I'm getting off easy," said Chin-lien. "That's the eve of my birthday so I'd have to throw a party anyway. This way I can:

Kill two birds with one stone."²

When they asked Sun Hsüeh-o she made no reply for quite a while.

"Let her be," said Yüeh-niang. "Don't try to pressure her into anything. Let Sister Li take the next day."

"The ninth is Sister Six's birthday," said Yü-lou. "I'm afraid Old Mrs. P'an and your elder brother's wife will be here."

"Since we won't be free on the ninth," said Yüeh-niang, "we'll get Sister Li to do her stint on the tenth, that's all."

With that they all felt that everything had been decided.

To make a long story short, Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home on the fifth, having gone to a social engagement at a neighbor's house. Wu Yüeh-niang hosted a feast in the master suite, at which Big Sister Yü provided the musical entertainment, and all the womenfolk drank merrily and made a day of it before the party broke up.

The next day it was Li Chiao-erh's turn, after which came Yü-lou's and then Chin-lien's, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

In no time at all it was Chin-lien's birthday and Old Mrs. P'an and Yüeh-niang's elder brother's wife came to participate in the celebration.

Finally the tenth came and it was Li P'ing-erh's turn to play the role of hostess. She sent Hsiu-ch'un to the rear compound to invite Sun Hsüeh-o to join the party twice. Each time Hsüeh-o said that she was coming but failed to show up.

"Just as I said, I didn't think she would come," remarked Yü-lou, "but Sister Li keeps insisting on inviting her. She actually said to someone, 'You people with the money can take turns standing each other treat for ten days if you like. But don't expect the likes of me to:

Chase barefoot after the donkey's hooves.'

The way she put it, leaving aside the insult to the rest of us, would seem to imply that she takes our elder sister to be a donkey's hoof."

"As long as that worthless baggage knows enough to stick to her place," said Yüeh-niang, "there's no need for us to pay any attention to her. Don't bother to keep on inviting her."

Thereupon the wine was served and everyone assembled in Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound for the feast. Big Sister Yü was there to provide the musical entertainment. Yüeh-niang's elder brother's wife and Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, were also present, making altogether a party of eight.

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home, having gone out to a social engagement.

"If your father comes home and wants a drink," Yüeh-niang said to Yü-hsiao, "you might as well serve it to him in the master suite."

Yü-hsiao nodded her assent.

Who could have anticipated that Hsi-men Ch'ing would arrive home early that afternoon. Yü-hsiao came forward and helped him off with his outer clothes.

"Where has Yüeh-niang gotten to?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They're all at the Sixth Lady's place in the front compound," Yü-hsiao replied, "drinking wine with Wu K'ai's wife and Old Mrs. P'an."

"What kind of wine are they drinking?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It's Chin-hua wine," replied Yü-hsiao.

"We've still got that crock of jasmine blossom wine that Ying Po-chüeh sent over as a New Year's present," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We might as well open it up and give it a try."

Accordingly he instructed Yü-hsiao to broach the jasmine blossom wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing tasted it, remarking as he did so, "It's just the thing for your mistresses to drink," and told Yü-hsiao and Hsiao-yü to lug it to Li P'ing-erh's place in the front compound.

When Hui-lien, who was standing beside Yüeh-niang just then in order to pour for her, caught sight of Yü-hsiao delivering the wine, she adroitly hastened over to take the jug from her. Yü-hsiao took the opportunity to tip her a wink and give her a pinch on the hand, the significance of which was not lost on the woman.

"Who sent you to deliver the wine?" Yüeh-niang asked Yü-hsiao.

"Father sent me," Yü-hsiao replied.

"How long has your father been home?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"He only just arrived," said Yü-hsiao. "He asked what kind of wine you were drinking and when I said it was Chin-hua wine he told me to take this crock of jasmine blossom wine that Master Ying the Second gave us and bring it out for you to drink."

"If your father wants anything himself," Yüeh-niang said, "set up a table for him in the master suite. There are some ready-made dishes on hand that you can serve him."

Yü-hsiao nodded her assent and returned to the rear compound.

Hui-lien continued standing in attendance at the party for a while and then said disingenuously, "Let me go back to the rear compound and fetch some tea for you to drink."

"Tell your sister," Yüeh-niang instructed her, "that there's some Liu-an tea³ in the cabinet in the master suite. You can steep a pot of that and bring it back for us to drink."

That woman took off for the rear compound so fast that her feet:

Beat out a festive paradiddle as she went.⁴

She found Yü-hsiao standing in the doorway of the master suite. After fetching the tea for her she made a meaningful moue, at which the woman lifted aside the portiere and walked right into Yüeh-niang's parlor.

What should she see there but Hsi-men Ch'ing, sitting in a chair and drinking wine. Without more ado she went up to him and proceeded to park her posterior in his lap, whereupon the two of them fell to kissing and sucking each other's tongues. While, down below, the woman grasped his organ in her hand, up above, she took a sip of wine and transferred it into the mouth of her companion.

"Father," the woman said to him, "if you've got any breath-sweetening lozenges give me a few more. The ones you gave me the other day are all gone."

"I also owe several mace to Auntie Hsüeh for trinkets," she went on to say. "If you've got any money handy give me a little so I can pay her."

"There ought to be a tael or two left in my wallet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Go ahead and take it."

As he spoke Hsi-men Ch'ing endeavored to unfasten her trousers.

"It won't do," the woman said. "I'm afraid someone might come along and see us."

"Don't go out front today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Stay in the rear compound and we can have some real fun together tonight."

The woman shook her head, saying, "The rear compound reminds me of what happens when:

The wagons from the Firewood Office block the road:

There are too many sticks about.

We'd better make it the Fifth Lady's place again. That would be:

Two under full four words."⁵

Thereupon Yü-hsiao resumed her place outside the door of the master suite to act as lookout and permitted the two of them to dally with each other as they pleased.

As the saying goes:

Even if you only talk along the road,

There may be someone lurking in the grass.

All their precautions did not prevent Sun Hsüeh-o from happening along from the back of the compound and overhearing the sound of laughing voices from inside the master suite. At first she thought it was Yü-hsiao engaged in badinage with Hsi-men Ch'ing, but who could have anticipated that Yü-hsiao turned out to be sitting on the veranda. On seeing this she came to a halt.

Yü-hsiao was afraid that she might go into the room, so she immediately endeavored to divert her by saying, "The Sixth Lady from the front compound is expecting you. Why don't you go along and have something to drink?"

"I'm totally out of favor," Hsüeh-o snorted sardonically.

"Plant a mulberry in a marshland, and Nobody will climb it.

Mount a person on a racehorse, and Nobody will overtake him.

Where would I get the wherewithal to take my turn with the rest of them in standing each other treat for ten days?

I'm such a menial underling,

I can't afford my underthings."

Her monologue was brought to a halt by an audible cough from Hsi-men Ch'ing inside the room which induced Hsüeh-o to take herself off to the kitchen.

Yü-hsiao lifted aside the portiere and the woman, once she saw the coast was clear, nimbly stepped out and headed toward the rear of the compound to take care of the tea.

In no time at all Hsiao-yü came in from outside and called out, "Sister Hui-lien, the mistress wants to know how come you went to get the tea and never came back with it."

"The tea's ready," the woman said. "I'm just waiting for the fruit kernels to flavor it with."

Before long, with Hsiao-yü carrying the cups and raised saucers and Hui-lien lugging the teapot, they went straight back to the front compound.

"How come it took you so long to get the tea?" demanded Yüeh-niang.

"Father was drinking wine in the parlor," said Hui-lien, "so I didn't dare go in myself. I had to wait while Sister fetched the tea leaves and the fruit kernels were peeled."

Thereupon everyone was served with tea, after which Hsiao-yü collected the cups and raised saucers and returned to the rear compound.

Hui-lien stood there, leaning against the table, and looked on as Yüeh-niang and the others threw dice.

"Mistress," she said, deliberately raising her voice, "your double ones and double sixes make the combination 'Heaven and Earth Separated,' so you've beaten the Fifth Lady."

"Sixth Lady," she said next, "your double sixes and double fours make the combination 'Brocade Screen' and add up to twenty spots, whereas the Third Lady's one, three, and double fives only add up to fourteen spots, so she loses."⁶

This irritated Yü-lou so much that she said, "For a servant's wife like you to:

Stick your beak in and wag your tongue,⁷ while we're playing dice together is completely out of place."

These few words put the woman in a situation where she could neither:

Stand her ground, nor Rise up to go, without embarrassment. The blood flew to her cheeks and she was compelled to beat a hasty retreat. Truly:

Even if one could draw off all the water

of the West River,

It would hardly suffice to wash away

this day's shame.⁸

The womenfolk continued their drinking until lamplighting time, when whom should they see but Hsi-men Ch'ing lifting aside the portiere and coming into the room.

"You're certainly making a day of it," he said with a laugh.

Wu K'ai's wife jumped up, saying, "Brother-in-law has arrived," and hastily offered him her seat.

"Why don't you continue to do your drinking in the rear compound?" said Yüeh-niang. "We're all women here and you're a man. What's the idea of barging in on us this way?"

"If that's the way you want it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll go elsewhere."

Thereupon, suiting his action to his words, he went over to Chin-lien's quarters. Chin-lien made haste to follow him there and saw that he was half drunk.

Taking hold of Chin-lien, he said, "Little oily mouth, I've got a favor to ask of you. I'd really like to keep Hui-lien overnight in the rear compound, but there's no convenient place there. Do you think you could make room for us to spend the night at your place? How about it?"

"I'd only be wasting my breath on you," retorted Chin-lien. "That's enough of your delirious nonsense. You can screw around with her wherever you like, her and her simpering ways, without having to do it at my place. I don't have any place to put her. And even if I were willing to go along with you, Ch'un-mei, that lousy little piece, would never consent to have her here. If you don't believe me, I'll call that little piece, Ch'un-mei, in here and you can ask her yourself. If she agrees, I'll go along with you, even if it means her staying in my own bedroom."

"If neither of you will agree," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that's that. I'll go spend the night with her in the grotto underneath the hill in the garden. Order one of your maidservants to take a set of bedding there and light a brazier or we'll never be able to stand the cold."

"I'd just be wasting my breath on you," Chin-lien couldn't help laughing. "That lousy slave of a whore! You'd think she was the mother that bore you. You're another Wang Hsiang, braving the frigid cold of the twelfth month and lying on the icy surface of that stone bench to prove your filiality."⁹

"You crazy little oily mouth!" Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at her. "Stop making fun of me. Enough is enough. Whatever happens, get a maidservant to light a brazier for us."

"You go ahead," said Chin-lien. "I know what to do."

That evening, when the party for the women of the household broke up, Chin-lien actually did order Ch'iu-chü to bundle up some bedding and carry live coals out to make the necessary preparations in Hidden Spring Grotto, as the whitewashed "snow cave" under the artificial hill was called.

Hui-lien accompanied Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, and Yü-lou as far as the inner gate that separated the front and rear compounds.

"Mistress," she said disingenuously at this point, "I won't accompany you any further, but go back up front."

"That's all right," said Yüeh-niang. "Go back up front and get some sleep."

After seeing Yüeh-niang and the others safely inside, the woman remained standing for a while outside the inner gate. As soon as she was sure there was no one about she disappeared under the artificial hill in a puff of smoke. Truly:

There is no need for King Hsiang to wear out his longing eyes;
The Goddess of Witch's Mountain delivers the clouds and rain herself.¹⁰

When Sung Hui-lien passed through the garden gate, thinking that Hsi-men Ch'ing might not be inside yet, she did not put on the latch and thus left the door standing closed but unlocked. When she arrived in Hidden Spring Grotto, however, whom should she see but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had preceded her and was already:

Sitting there with candle in hand.¹¹

Once inside the woman became aware that:

A cold wind assailed her,¹² and
The couch was thick with dust.

Thereupon she drew two sticks of incense out of her sleeve, lit them from the candle in the lantern, and stuck them in the ground. Even though there was a brazier of burning charcoal on the floor it was cold enough to make her shiver. The woman first unrolled the bedding on the bench and then laid a sable robe, cut like a Ch'an monk's cassock, on top of it. Then the two of them:

Closed tight the double-leaved door,
Got into bed and prepared to sleep.

Hsi-men Ch'ing took off his outer garments and sat on the bench in his white satin tunic, cut like the robe of a Taoist priest. Removing the woman's trousers, he took her onto his lap with her two legs splayed to either side and abruptly inserted his organ into her vagina. The two of them embraced each other and devoted themselves wholeheartedly to the task at hand.

They remained quite oblivious of P'an Chin-lien who, as soon as she ascertained that the two of them were:

Safely in the harbor,
took off her headdress in her room:

Lightly moved her lotus feet, and crept stealthily toward the garden to see if she could overhear what the two of them said to each other in private. When she reached the postern gate she gave it a shove and, finding it open, proceeded to enter with:

Slow and surreptitious step.

Not fearing lest:

The dank green moss should chill her "wave-tripping" stockings; or
The thorns on the flowers do an injury to her skirt or jacket,

she proceeded with:

Skulking step and furtive stance, to take up an eavesdropping position beneath the moon window of Hidden Spring Grotto.

She saw that the lanterns and candles were still alight and overheard the woman saying to Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh, "You're just the sort of benefactor who'd:

Donate ice to a homeless shelter in the dead of winter.

Is there no limit to the discomfort you'll put up with, you old beggar? Do you mean to say you can't come up with a better place for a tryst than this Cold Ice Hell?¹³ I'd better:

Put a rope in my mouth so if I freeze to death, You'll have something to haul me out with."

"It's frigid in here!" she continued. "Let's go to sleep. What are you so intent on examining my feet for anyway? You'd think you'd never seen anyone with small feet before. The only thing is I don't have any shoe uppers. Couldn't you contrive to buy me a pair somehow? I see other people making shoes all the time, but I can't make any for myself."

"My child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that's no problem. Tomorrow I'll buy you several mace worth of different patterned uppers. Who would have thought your feet are even smaller than the Fifth Lady's?"

"There's no comparison," the woman said. "The other day I tried on one of her shoes and found that I could wear it over my own. But it's not size that matters so much as the stylishness of the shoe."

When Chin-lien heard this from her vantage point outside the room she muttered to herself, "That slave of a whore! I'd better listen a little longer and see what else she has to say."

Thereupon she continued to eavesdrop for some time and overheard the woman asking Hsi-men Ch'ing, "How long is it since you married that fifth 'object of Ch'iu Hu's roving eye'¹⁴ of yours? Was she a virgin when you married her, or had she been married before?"

"She'd been married before," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"No wonder:

She's such a practiced old hand,"

Chin-lien Eavesdrops outside Hidden Spring Grotto

the woman said. "So, once she'd caught your eye, it was a case of:

Cohabitation amid the dewdrops."

Nothing might have happened if Chin-lien had not overheard this, but having heard it, she got so angry where she stood outside the room that her two arms went soft on her and it was some time before she could stir from the spot.

"If that slave of a whore is allowed to carry on this way," she said to herself, "it won't be long before she pushes the rest of us aside."

She would have raised a rumpus then and there but was afraid of arousing Hsi-men Ch'ing's nasty temper, the end result of which might be only to enhance the whore's status. On the other hand, if she allowed her to get away with it, she feared that the woman could not be called to account in the future.

"The thing to do," she thought to herself finally, "is to leave her a clue so she'll realize that she's been overheard and then settle accounts with her tomorrow."

Thereupon she went out by the postern gate, pulled a silver hairpin from her head and stuck it through the hasp so that the door was locked from the outside, and then returned to her room in high dudgeon and went to bed for the night. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.¹⁵

Bright and early the next morning, Hui-lien was the first to get up, hurried into her clothes, and went out without doing her hair. She noticed that the postern gate was unlatched and felt a sudden pang of consternation. When she tried the door, however, she shook it for half a day but could not get it to open. She ran back to tell Hsi-men Ch'ing, who called to Ying-ch'un in the adjacent courtyard to open it for her. When she saw that the gate had been locked with a hairpin she recognized it as one of Chin-lien's and realized that she must have been eavesdropping on her the night before.

Feeling as though she were:

Carrying a spectral fetus,¹⁶

the woman hurried out to the front of the compound and was just opening the door to her living quarters when whom should she encounter but P'ing-an, who emerged from the privy and greeted her with a knowing grin.

"You crazy jailbird!" Hui-lien said to him. "Who do you think you're showing your teeth to with such a grin?"

"Sister," said P'ing-an, "it seems that even a smile is enough to drive you mad."

"At the crack of dawn," retorted Hui-lien, "what is there to laugh about for no good reason?"

"I'm laughing at you, Sister," said P'ing-an, "because it seems that:

Not having had a bite for three days,

You've got flowers before your eyes.¹⁷

My guess would be you didn't manage to make it home at all last night."

On hearing these words, the woman's face turned red and she started to curse, saying, "You lousy, scurrilous jailbird! You've been seeing things. Just what night was it that I didn't sleep in my own room or show up at home?"

If you throw a tile into the air,

It's got to come down to earth."

"I noticed that your door was locked on the outside only a minute ago," said P'ing-an. "You can scarcely weasel out of that."

"I got up early this morning," Hui-lien asserted, "and went to the Fifth Lady's place. It was only just now I was able to come back out. Where've you been all this time, you jailbird?"

"I hear the Fifth Lady has asked you to pickle crabs for her," said P'ing-an, "because of your reputation as a leg-splitter. No wonder she sent you out to the front gate to watch the winnowers at work. They say you've mastered the art of rotating your tongue the way they rotate their winnowing sieves."

This sally really got under the woman's skin. Snatching up a door-bar, she chased P'ing-an around the courtyard, cursing as she went.

"You lousy, delirious jailbird! Just wait and see whether I tell about this or not. You'll get something to remember me by, never fear. Have you lost all sense of decorum, or what?"

"Ai-ya, Sister!" exclaimed P'ing-an. "Take it easy, will you! Just who are you going to tell about it? Of course, I know you've flown to a higher branch than the rest of us."

Hui-lien was so aggravated all she could do was continue to chase after him with the door-bar.

Who could have anticipated that at just this juncture Tai-an should stride out through the portiere of the pawnshop and seize the door-bar in his hand, saying, "Sister, what are you trying to beat him for?"

"Why don't you ask that grinning devil of a jailbird?" replied Hui-lien. "He's got me so angry with his:

Ridiculous blatherskite,

that my arms have gone soft on me."

P'ing-an seized the opportunity to make himself scarce.

Pushing the woman before him, Tai-an said to her, "Sister, don't:

Let your temper get the better of you.

You'd better go home and do your hair."

The woman then reached into the gourd purse at her waist, took out three or four candareens of silver, and gave them to Tai-an, saying, "Could I trouble you to pick up a large bowl of broth and two kinds of prepared ingredients for a pot-au-feu? You can put the broth right into my saucepan."

"That's no problem," said Tai-an. "I'll go take care of it."

Accepting the money with one hand, he hurriedly washed his face and then saw to the preparation of the pot-au-feu. The woman gave a bowlful to Tai-an and ate a bowlful herself. Only then did she comb her hair, lock the door, and go report for duty at Yüeh-niang's quarters in the rear compound.

This done, she made her way to Chin-lien's place where she found her sitting at the mirror in the process of performing her morning toilet. Hui-lien played up to her punctiliously by standing deferentially to one side, offering to hold the mirror for her as she brushed her hair, and fetching the water for her to wash her hands with. Chin-lien did not so much as look at her or pay her the slightest attention.

"I've rolled up your sleeping shoes and foot bindings," said Hui-lien. "Shall I put them away for you?"

"Let them be," said Chin-lien. "Leave them where they are. I'll have the maidservant come in and put them away."
"Ch'iu-chü!" she then called out. "The lousy slave. Where could she have gotten to?"
"Ch'iu-chü's sweeping the courtyard," said Hui-lien, "though Sister Ch'un-mei is over there doing her hair."
"Don't worry about it," said Chin-lien. "Let them be. You'd better leave them for the maidservants to put away. After all, they've been in contact with these:

Crooked-hooved clodhopping feet, of mine. I wouldn't want you to soil your hands with them. You'd do better to save your attentions for your father. You seem to be the only sort of person capable of pleasing him. The rest of us are all guilty of:

Cohabitation amid the dewdrops.
We're all 'remarried goods.' You're the only one, Sister, to have entered the household in a real bridal palanquin, to be his legitimate wife, the true 'object of Ch'iu Hu's roving eye.' "

These words had the effect of striking the woman's sore spot from the night before. Thereupon, falling to her knees, she said, "Mother, you're one of my mistresses, after all. If you don't see fit to:

Lift high your gracious hand,¹⁸
I would have no place to stand for even an instant. From the very outset, without your generous consent, I would never have presumed to accede to Father's demands. Even the First Lady in the rear compound is really no more than a figurehead. It's you who have done the most for me. You don't suppose I'd dare take liberties with you, do you? You can investigate as much as you like. If I have ever taken any liberties with you by so much as a word, may I come to a bad end. May I develop a boil in every hair follicle."

"That's not the point," said Chin-lien. "I'm:
Not the sort of person to let dust be thrown in her eyes.
So long as my husband wants you, you don't suppose I'd stoop to competing for him, do you? But I'm not going to let you get away with any of your mischief or:

Idle words and idle chatter, in front of him. If you think you can trample the rest of us underfoot, leaving you with a free field in which to kick up your heels, Sister, let me tell you, you'd better get any such thoughts out of your head."

"Look into it further, Mother," protested Hui-lien. "I've never dared take any liberties with you. I fear you must have misheard me last night."

"My foolish sister," said Chin-lien. "Do you think I'd have the patience to eavesdrop on you? Let me tell you something. Not even ten wives could hope to satisfy a man's every desire. Even though your father has these several wives of his at home, every time he chooses to entertain a powdered face outside, when he comes back he conceals nothing from me, but gives me a word for word account of everything that happened. Ask around a bit. You'll find that even back when he and the Sixth Lady were so close that they seemed to:

Breath through the same nostrils,¹⁹
there was nothing he didn't tell me about their doings when he got home. And you're not even in the same league with her."

This speech had the effect of reducing the woman to silence. She stood around the room for a while and then went out. As she was going through the enclosed passageway beside the inner gate she ran into Hsi-men Ch'ing and accosted him, saying, "A fine fellow you are! You're about as much good at keeping things to yourself as a greased chute! You've gone and spilled every word I said to you yesterday, and today I've had to stand the gaff. Whatever I say to you in the future, keep it to yourself, even if you have to keep it till it rots. What can you have been thinking of to tell such things to anyone else? That mouth of yours is:

Nothing but a leaky trough.²⁰
Even if I have something to say, I'll never tell you anything again."
"What are you talking about?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I don't know anything about it."
The woman merely gave him a look and stalked off toward the front of the compound.

In the past this woman had always possessed a glib tongue. She was in the habit of hanging around at the front gate: Buying this and buying that.²¹

She addressed the manager, Fu Ming, familiarly as Brother Fu; Ch'en Ching-chi as Brother-in-law; and Pen the Fourth as Old Four. Since commencing her affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing she had become even bolder in public than before. In fact:

Engaging in badinage and repartee,
She was completely without restraint.²²

For example, she might say, "Brother Fu, allow me to salute you. Would you be so kind as to keep your eye out for any peddler of cosmetics that might come by the front gate."

Manager Fu was a decent sort and would actually keep on the lookout for her around the front gate and, if he saw a peddler come by, stop him and call her out to make her purchases.

Tai-an made a point of teasing her about this by saying, "Sister, the cosmetics man went by early this morning. If you had only been out early enough with the steelyard you might have weighed out as much as you liked."

"You lousy monkey!" the woman railed at him. "It's the Fifth Lady and the Sixth Lady from inside who commissioned me to buy face powder for them. What do you mean by your talk of weighing it out with the steelyard, as if I were buying three catties of rouge or two catties of powder? Those whores would really have to lay it on thick to get through quantities like that. Just wait and see whether I tell you or not when I go back inside."

"Ai-ya, Sister!" exclaimed Tai-an. "Whatever I do, you try to overawe me with the Fifth Lady."

Before long she came out again, saying, "Pen, Old Four, would you be so kind as to keep your eye out for any peddler of costume jewelry that might come by the front gate. I'd like to buy a pair of plum blossom and a pair of chrysanthemum hair ornaments."

Pen the Fourth, neglecting his business, made a special point of keeping a lookout for her and, when a peddler of costume jewelry did come by, stopped him and called her out to make her purchases. The woman stood inside the inner gate, opened up the peddler's box, and picked out two pairs of large artificial flower ornaments to wear in the hair over her temples, as well as two purple, shot satin, gold lame handkerchiefs, costing in all a total of seven mace and five candareens of silver.

The woman reached into her pocket, groped out a fragment consisting of about half a silver ingot, and asked Pen the Fourth to cut it for her and weigh out the seven mace and five candareens that she owed the vendor. Pen the Fourth was engaged at that moment in writing up the accounts, but he dropped what he was doing, came over to where she was standing, squatted down on the ground, and began to chisel away at the silver for her.

Who should come up just then but Tai-an, who said, "Let me chisel it for you, Sister."

He took the silver in one hand, but instead of chiseling it, subjected it to a close examination.

"You're not chiseling it, you lousy monkey!" said the woman. "What do you expect to find by examining it so closely? You mean to say you didn't hear the dog biting an intruder in the middle of the night? It's stolen silver."

"I wouldn't say it was stolen," said Tai-an. "But it does have a familiar look about it. In fact, I'd say it came out of Father's wallet. It looks to me like this silver is the half ingot left over when Father had a piece cut to pay off that Southerner who sells square-cut scholar's caps in the Lantern Market the other day. My memory is:

As certain as certain can be."²³

"You lousy jailbird!" the woman protested. "There are look-alikes aplenty even among the people of this world. How could Father's silver have ended up in my hands anyway?"

"How should I know what transactions were involved?" laughed Tai-an.

At this, the woman ran after him and gave him what for with her fists. In the end, the page boy chiseled off seven mace and five candareens worth of silver and gave it to the vendor of the costume jewelry but kept the remaining silver in his hand and refused to return it.

"You lousy jailbird!" exclaimed the woman. "If you dare walk off with my money, I'll call you a brave man."

"I wouldn't take anything of yours," said Tai-an. "Why don't you give me a little of what's left over and I'll buy us something to eat?"

"You lousy monkey!" the woman said. "Hand it over and I'll give you something."

When she had thus tricked Tai-an into surrendering his spoils, she merely tossed him a fragment weighing four or five candareens, stuffed the remainder into her pocket, and went straight back inside the compound.

From this time on, she was constantly to be seen at the front gate, buying fabric samples, costume jewelry, handkerchiefs, and the like, by the tael; or even going so far as to purchase four or five pints of melon seeds at a time and distribute them among the maids of the various apartments to share with their mistresses. Her coiffure was adorned with a pearl headband and gold lantern earrings, of glittering aureate hue. Beneath her upper garments, she wore red trousers of Lu-chou silk with drawnwork kneepads. In her wide sleeves she carried breath-sweetening lozenges flavored with osmanthus, while three or four sachets of pomander were suspended at her waist. Her expenditures of this kind averaged two or three mace of silver a day, all of which had been given to her by Hsi-men Ch'ing on the sly. But there is no need to describe this in detail.

From the time Chin-lien revealed the fact that she had seen through her devices, this woman started to haunt Chin-lien's room on a daily basis, playing up to her with every trick at her disposal. She prepared tea and boiled water for her, stitched shoes and did needlework:

Fetching things, whether they were wanted or not; and Doing things, whether they were called for or not.

With regard to her real job in Yüeh-niang's quarters in the rear compound, all she did each day was to put in a pro forma appearance and then come out to Chin-lien's place in the front compound. Every day she made a threesome with Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh to play board games or dominoes. If Hsi-men Ch'ing happened to show up while the woman was present, Chin-lien saw to it that she stood at his side to pour the wine and then sat down beside him as one of the company. As a result she was able to regale herself every day with:

Unlimited quantities of meat and wine.

Chin-lien did all this solely in order to ingratiate herself with her husband while Hui-lien, for her part, became completely dependent on her patronage. Truly:

The wanton willow catkins dance wherever the wind carries them;

The fickle peach blossoms float wherever the water takes them.²⁴

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Chin-lien, desirous of favor, deploys
a devious stratagem;
Hui-lien, temporarily reprieved, invades her master's bed.
The crowing hen fails to anticipate imminent disaster;
Once the catastrophe has occurred
there is no going back.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 24

CHING-CHI FLIRTS WITH A BEAUTY ON THE LANTERN FESTIVAL; HUI-HSIANG ANGRILY HURLS ABUSE AT LAI-WANG'S WIFE

Candles in silver sconces burn high,¹ as inebriation reigns;
The party has become convivial,
laughter is frequent.
Lissome waists dance superbly like the "willow" in the quarter;²
Sandalwood lips sing lightly of "Spring in the Imperial Park."
Wafts of perfume invade his clothes,
as though intentionally;
Flowerlike ornaments fall to the ground,
to be noiselessly retrieved.
Were it not for this telltale detail of breeze-borne romance;
How would Han Shou ever have awakened from his drunken trance?³

THE STORY GOES that:

The first full moon of the new year in Heaven,
Is the evening of the Lantern Festival on earth.
Hsi-men Ch'ing had the reception hall in his home prepared for the occasion by:
Suspending decorated lanterns, and Spreading out silken tablecloths.
It was the sixteenth day of the first month and a feast was laid on for the:
Jollification of the entire family.
In front they were protected by:
Standing screens and brocaded windbreaks like Shih Ch'ung's.
The scene was illuminated by:
Three hanging lanterns suspended on ropes of pearls.
To either side there were arrayed:
Many standing lanterns of exquisite workmanship.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Wu Yüeh-niang occupied the places of honor, while the other members of the household, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, arranged themselves on the two sides. All of them were dressed in brocaded clothing with white satin jackets and blue skirts, except for Wu Yüeh-niang, who wore a full-sleeved robe of scarlet brocade and a sable cloak over a flower-sprigged skirt, while on her head:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;
A phoenix hairpin was half askew.

Ch'un-mei, Yu-hsiao, Ying-ch'un, and Lan-hsiang, the four household musicians, stood in attendance playing the psaltery and sounding the clappers as they performed Lantern Festival songs. A separate table was set up on the eastern side of the room for Hsi-men Ch'ing's son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi.

The usual:
Three soups and five courses,
were served.

Dainties were prepared of the rarest kind,
Fruits were provided just in season.⁴

Hsiao-yü, Yüan-hsiao, Hsiao-luan, and Hsiu-ch'un came and went to pour the wine.

Lai-wang's wife, Sung Hui-lien, was unable to participate in the party, but sat on a chair beneath the loggia, cracking melon seeds with her teeth. She waited until someone at the feast ordered more wine and then, raising her voice, called out, "Lai-an! Hua-fung! The mistress needs more heated wine for the party. Fetch it, and be quick about it. The lousy jailbirds! Not a single one of them is available to wait on them. I don't know where they could have gotten to."

Who should appear at this juncture but Hua-t'ung, who came in carrying the heated wine. Hsi-men Ch'ing took him to task, saying, "You lousy slave! Not a single one of you is available to wait on us. Where could you have gotten to? You lousy slave! You're lucky to escape a beating."

The page boy came out and complained to Hui-lien, "Sister, just who had gone off anywhere, that you should tell tales to the master, make such a fuss about it, and provoke him to curse me?"

"When they called for wine up there," said Hui-lien, "who told you not to be here to wait on them? What's it got to do with me? If he doesn't curse you, who should he curse?"

"The ground around here was nice and clean," said Hua-t'ung, "but now the whole area is covered with your melon seeds. If the master sees it, I'll get cursed all over again."

"You lousy jailbird!" said Hui-lien.

"Like a loan taken out in the sixth month,

You'll get paid back soon enough.⁵

What's the big deal? If you had to:

Carve the eyes of a Buddhist idol,⁶ or something difficult like that, your complaint might be justified. If you don't want to sweep them up, leave them where they are. I'll have another page boy do the sweeping. And if Father should ask me about it, I'll just tell him what happened."

"Ai-ya, Sister!" exclaimed Hua-t'ung. "Take it easy, will you! What do you want to quarrel with me for, anyway?"

Thereupon he fetched a broom and swept up the melon seeds for her. Sung Hui-lien continued to sit outside, cracking melon seeds with her teeth, as before. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing, from his vantage point at the head of the feast, noticed that his son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, was out of wine and called this to P'an Chin-lien's attention. The latter hastily came down from her place, poured out a full cup of wine, and offered it to Ching-chi with a giggle, saying, "Son-in-law, your father has commanded it. Whatever you do, drain this cup of wine for me."

While accepting the wine, on the one hand, Ching-chi took the opportunity to give her a prolonged sidelong glance, on the other, saying, "Fifth Lady, please make yourself easy. Let me drink it at my leisure."

Contriving to cast Ching-chi into the shadow by interposing her body between him and the lamplight, the woman held the wine in her left hand until Ching-chi reached for it and then proceeded to give the back of his hand a pinch with her right hand. Ching-chi continued, for his part, to direct his gaze at the rest of the company while, at the same time, giving Chin-lien's little foot a playful kick under the table.

The woman smiled and said in a low voice, "You crazy oily mouth! If your father-in-law were to see what you're up to, what would you do?"

Gentle reader take note: The two of them had no thought for anything but their own surreptitious fun and games and remained quite oblivious to the presence of the woman, Sung Hui-lien, who observed their every move so clearly through the latticework in the window that she might well have exclaimed:

"Is it not delightful?"

Truly:

Ching-chi Flirts with a Beauty on the Lantern Festival

Those actually involved are befuddled;⁷
It is the bystander who sees clearly.⁸

Although the people at the feast had not noticed anything, Hui-lien was enabled by the apertures in the window lattice and the light of the lamp to see every detail.

From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she thought to herself,

“Ordinarily, around the likes of us, she’s always careful to protest her own virtue. Who would have thought that on the sly she’s been carrying on an affair with that young scamp all the time. Now that I’ve caught her out at something, if she ever gives me a hard time in the future, I’ll have something to say to her.”

Truly:

From a white rose blooming in someone's garden,
She has secretly purloined
two or three sprigs.
Hidden within her silken sleeves
they cannot be seen;
Their fragrance is first detected by the butterflies.

After the wine drinking had continued for some time, a servant from Ying Po-chüeh's place unexpectedly arrived with an invitation that Hsi-men Ch'ing come over to enjoy the lanterns and have a drink.

"You all:

Enjoy yourselves to your heart's content,"

Hsi-men Ch'ing enjoined Yüeh-niang. "I'm going over to Brother Ying the Second's place for a drink."

The two page boys, Tai-an and P'ing-an, accompanied him when he left.

Yüeh-niang and her sisterhood of wives continued to enjoy the pleasures of the feast for a while when, behold:

The silver river is clear and shallow;
The pearly dipper sparkles and glitters.⁹
The perfect orb of a resplendent moon rises in the east,
Illuminating the courtyard till it is as bright as day.

Among the women there were some who:

Returning to their rooms, changed their clothes.

Some who:

Underneath the moon, adjusted their coiffures.

And some who:

By glow of lantern light, stuck flowers in their hair.

The trio composed of Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh, who were also joined by Hui-lien, went out in front of the reception hall to watch Ch'en Ching-chi set off the fireworks, while Li Chiao-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh followed Yüeh-niang's lead in returning to the rear compound.

"Father's not at home today," Chin-lien remarked to her two companions. "Why don't we ask our elder sister if we can go out for an excursion in the streets?"

Hui-lien, who was standing by their side, interjected, "If you do go, take me along with you."

"If you want to come too," said Chin-lien, "go back to the rear compound and ask the First Lady about it. Ask the Second Lady too and see if she wants to go. We'll wait for you here."

Hui-lien hastened off to the rear compound.

"She's not up to the job," said Yü-lou. "I'd better go along and make the request myself."

"I'm going back to my room to put on something more to wear," said Li P'ing-erh. "It'll be cold by the time we get back. It's likely to be late at night."

"Sister Li," said Chin-lien. "If you've got an extra cloak handy, bring one out for me to wear. It will save me a trip back to my room."

Li P'ing-erh nodded her assent and went off on her errand. This left Chin-lien all by herself to watch Ching-chi set off the fireworks. When she saw that no one else was about, she stepped right up and gave him a pinch, saying with a smile, "Son-in-law, if that thin clothing is really all you've got on, you must be cold aren't you?"

But she had failed to notice that the head servant, Lai-chao's, boy, Little Iron Rod, was giggling and dancing about right in front of them, tugging at Ching-chi's clothing and begging, "Master Son-in-law, give me some firecrackers to set off."

Ching-chi was afraid the boy would interrupt the proceedings, so he could hardly wait to give him a couple of "Lantern Festival crackers"¹⁰ and thus induce him to go outside and play.

Thereupon:

Engaging in badinage and repartee,

he proceeded to flirt with Chin-lien, saying, "If you've noticed what thin clothing I've got on, what are you going to do about it? How about giving me something of your own to wear?"

"You lousy short-life!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "You've gotten away with enough as it is. You were playing footsie with me just now, and I didn't say anything about it. And now you've got the colossal nerve to ask me for something of mine to wear. I'm not the one you're after. Why should I give you something of mine to wear?"

"If you refuse, that's all there is to it," said Ching-chi. "What's the idea of trying to scare me with such trumped up charges?"

"You lousy short-life!" responded Chin-lien. "You're just like:

The sparrow on the city battlements:

A creature quite inured to such alarms."

As they were speaking, Yü-lou came out again, along with Hui-lien, and reported to Chin-lien, "The First Lady is feeling poorly in her present condition and Hsi-men Ta-chieh is not in the mood, so they won't come. The rest of us are to go ahead as long as we try to be back by a reasonable hour. Li Chiao-erh's legs are bothering her, so she won't come. When Sun Hsüeh-o saw that our elder sister wasn't coming, she was afraid Father would be annoyed with her if he happened to come home and also refused to go out."

"So none of them want to come," said Chin-lien. "You and I and Sister Li might as well go by ourselves then. If Father comes home while we're out, let him curse anyone he wants to. Better yet, let's get that little piece Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao from the master suite, Lan-hsiang from your place, and Ying-ch'un from Sister Li's place, and take them all along with us. Then if Father comes home and wants to know what's going on, she'll have even more explaining to do."

Hsiao-yü came up, at this juncture, and said, "Since my mistress isn't going, let me go along with the rest of you."

"Tell your mistress you're coming," said Yü-lou. "We'll wait for you up front."

After some time, Hsiao-yü came back out after asking Yüeh-niang's permission with a happy giggle on her face.

Thereupon the three women were ready to set out with their crowd of male and female retainers in tow. The two page boys, Lai-an and Hua-t'ung, accompanied them with hanging, gauze-covered lanterns. The son-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, stood on the mounting platform setting off fireworks and igniting firecrackers to amuse the ladies.

"Master Son-in-law," Sung Hui-lien said to him, "whatever happens, wait a minute for me, will you? The ladies are taking me with them on their ramble. I'm going to my room to do up my hair. I'll be right back."

"But we're ready to start right now," Ching-chi protested.

"If you don't wait for me," said Hui-lien, "I'll be annoyed with you for the rest of my life."

Thereupon she went to her room where she changed into an outfit consisting of a jacket of green silk material, shot with red, that opened down the middle, over a white drawnwork skirt. She also did up her hair in a red, gold lame kerchief, pasted three gold-flecked turquoise beauty patches on her fore-head, and put on a pair of gold lantern earrings.

Thus attired, she came out to join the rest of the party in the traditional Lantern Festival custom of "walking off the hundred ailments."¹¹

By the light of the moonbeams,

They appeared to be goddesses.

The three ladies were all wearing white satin jackets and brocaded vests. On their heads:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;

setting off their:

Powdered faces and ruby lips.

Ch'en Ching-chi and Lai-hsing, one on the left and the other on the right, set off:

"Slow-blooming lotus blossoms,"

"Golden thread chrysanthemums,"

"Ten-foot high orchids," and "Brighter than moonlights,"¹²

as they proceeded on their way.

When they emerged into the marketplace on the main street, behold:

The fragrant dust never settles,

The revelers swarm like ants,¹³

Firecrackers thunder,

Lantern lights shimmer,

The din of flutes and drums resounds,

The merrymaking is at its height.

The bystanders to left and right were treated to the spectacle of a contingent of gauze-covered lanterns lighting the way for a bevy of men and women, all of whom were:

Sporting red and trailing green.¹⁴

Assuming that they came from the household of some noble family, they:

Scarcely dared to gaze upon them,¹⁵ and Endeavored to keep out of their way.

One moment Sung Hui-lien was saying, "Master Son-in-law, set off a rocket¹⁶ for me, will you?"

The next moment she was saying, "Master Son-in-law, set off some 'Lantern Festival crackers' for me, will you?"

One moment she was dropping some item of her costume jewelry and then picking it up again.

The next moment she was losing her shoe and then leaning against a certain party while she fiddled with it.

Trying first this and then that, her sole concern was to carry on a flirtation with Ch'en Ching-chi.

Meng Yü-lou could abide it no longer and took her to task, demanding, "How come you're the only one who keeps losing her shoe?"

"She's afraid it's muddy underfoot," said Yü-hsiao, "so she's wearing a pair of the Fifth Lady's shoes over her own."

"Tell her to come here and let me see," said Yü-lou. "Can she really be wearing the Fifth Lady's shoes?"

"She did borrow a pair of my shoes the other day," said Chin-lien. "Who would have thought the preternatural bitch would put them on over her own?"

Hui-lien thereupon hitched up her skirt for Yü-lou's benefit and revealed that she was, indeed, wearing two pairs of red shoes on her feet, underneath ankle leggings the ends of which were tied in place with lengths of sand-green cord. Yü-lou did not say another word on the subject.

Before long they had traversed the main street and arrived in the Lantern Market.

"As long as we're here," Chin-lien said to Yü-lou, "why don't we go pay a visit to Sister Li's house on Lion Street?"

Thereupon, they instructed Hua-t'ung and Lai-an to go in front with their lanterns and then proceeded to wend their way along Lion Street. The page boys went ahead and knocked on the gate.

Old Mother Feng had already gone to bed for the night. There were two young girls that were being offered for sale as indentured servants sleeping on the same k'ang with her. Old Mother Feng bestirred herself to open the door and usher in the crowd of lady visitors. After which she poked up the fire in the brazier, put on the teakettle, picked up a jug, and started out into the street to fetch wine for the company.

"Wait a minute, Old Feng," said Meng Yü-lou. "There's no need to go out after wine. We've had more than enough to eat and drink at home. If you've got any tea handy, just pour us a cup or two, that's all."

"If you're going to serve people wine," said Chin-lien, "the least you could do is order up a feast to go with it."

"Old Mother," said Li P'ing-erh, "a mere bottle or two will be;

Hardly enough to discolor the water.¹⁷

That will never suffice. You'll have to lay in a full jug or two."

"She's only kidding," said Yü-lou. "There's no need to go out for anything. Just serve us some tea."

Only then did the old woman come to a standstill.

"Old Mother," said Li P'ing-erh, "why don't you come over to my place for a visit once in a while? I really have no idea what you do with yourself all day over here."

"Mistress," the old woman said, "you can see for yourself. I've got these two karmic encumbrances on my hands with nobody else to look after them."

Yü-lou then asked, "Who is putting the two serving girls up for sale?"

"One of them," the old woman replied, "was a chambermaid in a household in the Northern Quarter. She's twelve years old, and they only want five taels of silver for her. The other was the wife of a retainer in the household of Usher Wang of the Court of State Ceremonial. Her husband ran away so her master has impounded the fret indicating her status as a married woman and had her taken away to be put up for sale. He wants ten taels of silver for her."

"Let me tell you something, Old Mother," said Yü-lou. "I know someone who's in the market for such wares, and you ought to be able to turn a tidy profit for yourself."

"Third Lady," said the old woman, "who have you got in mind? Tell me who it is."

"At the present time," said Yü-lou, "the Second Lady has only Yüan-hsiao to wait upon her, so she's shorthanded. She's looking for a more mature serving girl to work for her. You might as well offer to sell her the older of these two."

"How old is this girl?" she went on to ask.

"She was born in the year of the ox," the old woman replied, "so this year she should be sixteen."

As they spoke, the tea was brought in and everyone had some to drink. Ch'un-mei, Yü-hsiao, and Hui-lien took the opportunity to make a complete tour of the premises, from front to back. They also went up to the second-story room that overlooked the street, pushed open the windows, and surveyed the scene.

Ch'en Ching-chi pressed them, saying, "It's already late. As soon as you've had your look, we'd better start on our way home."

"You crazy short-life!" protested Chin-lien. "You're pushing us so hard:

Our arms and legs never stop moving.

What's the rush?"

Thereupon, it was not until Ch'un-mei and the others had been called downstairs that they were ready to start. Old Mother Feng accompanied them out the door.

At this juncture Li P'ing-erh bethought herself to ask, "Where has P'ing-an gotten to?"

"He hasn't shown up yet today," the old woman replied. "Though it's:

The third watch in the middle of the night,
he'll keep me waiting up to:

Open the gates and close the doors,¹⁸ for him."

"Today," pointed out Lai-an, "P'ing-an accompanied Father to Second Master Ying's place."

"Old Mother," Li P'ing-erh enjoined her, "just lock up and go to bed. Most likely he won't even show up and you won't have to lose any sleep. Come over to the house and report to me first thing in the morning. You're as bad as:

The abbot of the Stone Buddha Monastery.¹⁹

Every time you're asked to officiate you make excuses."²⁰

"Don't I know who my mistress is?" the old woman exclaimed. "I'd never presume to make excuses to you."

"Old Mother," said Li P'ing-erh, "There's no need for you to:

Bandy words about it."²¹

Just see that you deliver that serving girl to the Second Lady first thing in the morning."

At the conclusion of this exchange they watched as the old woman closed the outer gate. Only then did the flock of men and women set out for home.

As they approached their own gateway they became aware of the voice of Auntie Han, the wife of Mohammedan Han, who rented a room on the street front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's property. Her husband was on night duty with the staff of the eunuch in charge of the local Imperial Stables. While at home alone she had joined some neighbors in "walking off the hundred ailments" and returned to her dwelling in a drunken state, only to learn that late that night someone had cut his way through her front door and stolen her dog. Some other things were missing too. She was sitting right in the street engaged in a drunken tirade.

The flock of women had no sooner come to a halt than Chin-lien directed Lai-an, "You go call Auntie Han over here so we can find out what's going on."

Before long she was haled before them and asked, "What's all this about?"

Auntie Han:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily,

Stepping forward and saluting them with folded hands, bowed twice and said, "If you three ladies will be so good as to listen, I'll tell you all about it from the beginning. There is a song to the tune 'Playful Children' that testifies to this:

It was an auspicious occasion in an era of great peace, the night of the Lantern Festival,"

etc., etc.

When Yü-lou and the others had heard her out, they all reached into their sleeves and came up with some small change and holiday delicacies to give her. They then summoned Lai-an and instructed him, "Tell Master Ch'en to see that she gets home all right."

Ch'en Ching-chi's sole concern at the moment was to carry on a flirtation with Hui-lien, so he refused to help her on her way.

Chin-lien then directed Lai-an to see that she got home safely and instructed him, "Tell her to come to the house first thing in the morning to do the laundry. I'll speak to your father about it and get him to take appropriate measures on her behalf."

At this, Auntie Han returned home with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.

Yü-lou and the others had barely passed beyond Auntie Han's door when who should they see but the wife of Pen the Fourth, wearing a red jacket, a jet silk vest, and a jade-colored skirt, with her hair done up in a gold lame kerchief.

She stepped forward with a giggle and said, "Many felicitations. Where have you three ladies been on your excursion? If you see fit to do so, deign to enter my humble abode and permit me to offer you some tea."

"We only stopped just now because of that youngster's bawling," said Yü-lou. "We felt obliged to ask her what was going on. Thank you for your hospitality, but it's already late and we'd better not come in."

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Pen the Fourth's wife. "You three ladies are:

Waxing supercilious before you enter the door.²²

No doubt you find it laughable enough that such mean folk as ourselves can come up with a cup of tea."

She dragged them into the house as though her life depended upon it. It so happened that there were representations of the Goddess Kuan-yin delivering sentient beings from the eight disasters,²³ and of His Holiness Kuan Yü, the God of War,²⁴ on ritual display outside the dwelling. A lantern in the shape of a snowflake was suspended over the front door. When they lifted aside the portiere they found her thirteen-year-old daughter, Chang-chieh, inside. There were two gauze-covered lanterns standing on a dining table on which a complete complement of seasonal delicacies were arrayed.

Having offered the three ladies a seat, she hastily called Chang-chieh over to kowtow to the visitors and serve them tea. Yü-lou and Chin-lien gave her a pair of artificial flowers apiece and Li P'ing-erh pulled a handkerchief out of her sleeve and also presented her with a mace of silver to buy melon seeds with. This pleased Pen the Fourth's wife so much that she kowtowed in gratitude again and again. But she was unable to detain them any longer.

Yü-lou and the others got up and made their departure. When they arrived at the main gate of their residence the page boy, Lai-hsing, was there to greet them.

"Has your father come home or not?" Chin-lien asked him.

"Father hasn't come home yet," Lai-hsing responded.

The three ladies lingered at the gateway to watch as Ch'en Ching-chi set off three "ten-foot high chrysanthemums," a single "great smoky orchid," and a single "gold lamp on a silver stand."²⁵ Only then did they return to their quarters inside the compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing did not arrive home until the fourth watch. Truly:

Once drunk, one does not even know that night has fallen;

Let the bright moon set, if it will,
behind the western chamber.²⁶

To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi had seized the opportunity provided by "walking off the hundred ailments" to flirt with Chin-lien and the other women all along the way. Moreover, from the manner in which he and Lai-wang's wife, Sung Hui-lien, were:

Talking back and forth,
it was obvious that by now both of them had the same idea in mind.

The next morning, when Ching-chi had finished his ablutions, he did not report to the shop but headed straight for Wu Yüeh-niang's quarters in the rear compound. Whom should he find there but Li Chiao-erh and Chin-lien, who were seated around the bed table on the k'ang, keeping Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, company. Tea had just been served. Yüeh-niang had withdrawn into her Buddhist chapel to burn incense. The young scamp stepped forward, saluted the company with a bow, and sat down.

"Son-in-law, a fine person you are!" Chin-lien said to him. "Yesterday, when you were asked to take Auntie Han home, you refused to budge, and we had to send the page boy to do the job instead. Moreover, you were constantly:

Engaging in badinage and repartee, with that servant's wife. Who knows what you were up to? When your mother-in-law is through burning her incense, just wait and see whether I tell her about it or not."

"How can you say such things?" rejoined Ching-chi. "Yesterday your son very nearly:

Came down with a crick in the back.²⁷

I accompanied you the whole way on your excursion and then we went to the house on Lion Street. How many li is it there and back do you suppose? I was already worn out with all the walking, and then you wanted me to take on Mohammedan Han's wife as well. So what if you did have to get the page boy to see her home? I'd barely gotten to sleep before it was daylight again. It was all I could do to crawl out of bed this morning."

As they were speaking, Yüeh-niang came back from her incense burning and Ching-chi made her a bow.

"What was Auntie Han doing yesterday," Yüeh-niang demanded, "indulging in such a drunken tirade?"

"She had been out walking off the hundred ailments," Ching-chi explained, "when someone cut his way through her front door and took her dog. So she sat down right in the street, weeping and wailing and cursing away. This morning when her husband came home he gave her a good drubbing, as a result of which she isn't up even yet."

"It's lucky we came along when we did and persuaded her to go inside," said Chin-lien. "Otherwise, if Father had come home and run into her, what sort of impression would that have made?"

When they had finished speaking, Yü-lou, Li P'ing-erh, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh all went into Yüeh-niang's room to have some tea. Ching-chi also took tea with them.

Afterwards, when they went back to their quarters, Hsi-men Ta-chieh had a few things to say to Ching-chi.

"You death-defying jailbird!" she railed at him. "What were you doing:

'Engaging in badinage and repartee,' with Lai-wang's wife? If word of any such thing were to come to Father's attention, even if that whore escaped unscathed, you'd be lucky to find a place to die in!"

That day Hsi-men Ch'ing had spent the night in Li P'ing-erh's room and was late getting up. Who should appear at this juncture but Battalion Commander Ching Chung, who had just been promoted to a concurrent position as military director-in-chief of another jurisdiction and had come to pay a courtesy call. Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had just arisen from bed, hastily combed his hair, put on his hairnet, straightened his clothes, and came out to entertain his guest in the main reception room, simultaneously dispatching P'ing-an to the rear compound to fetch some tea.

Sung Hui-lien was in the courtyard outside the master suite just then, engaged in a game of jacks with Yü-hsiao and Hsiao-yü for the privilege of spanking the loser.²⁸ They had been:

Horsing around till they were all in a heap.

Hsiao-yü was riding astride Yü-hsiao, who was face down on the ground, and laughing as she cursed her, saying, "You lousy whore! You've forfeited a spanking and now you won't let yourself be spanked."

She then called out to Hui-lien, "Come over here and hold on to one of the whore's legs. If she doesn't want a spanking I'll give her a poke."

Just as they were in the midst of their fun, who should appear but P'ing-an, who called out, "Sister Yü-hsiao, Old Man Ching is in the front compound and I've been sent to fetch the tea."

Yü-hsiao didn't pay any attention to him but continued her playful tussle with Hsiao-yü as though nothing had happened.

P'ing-an pressed his case, saying, "He's been sitting out there all this time already."

"You crazy jailbird!" interjected Sung Hui-lien. "If Father wants tea, go ask whomever's on duty in the kitchen for it. Why hang around here bothering us? We're only responsible back here for preparing the tea for the master suite. It's not our job to take care of the front compound."

P'ing-an accordingly went to the kitchen where the person on duty that day was Lai-pao's wife, Hui-hsiang.

"You crazy jailbird!" Hui-hsiang protested. "I've got my hands full with the cooking in here. Just go ask for two cups of tea back at the master suite. Why insist on getting your tea from me?"

"I've already been back there," said P'ing-an, "but they wouldn't give me any tea. Sister Hui-lien said, 'That's the responsibility of whoever's on duty in the kitchen. Go ask her for it.' She wouldn't do anything about it."

"That lousy slattern!" Hui-hsiang cursed. "I suppose she's made up her mind that she's to be on the staff of the master suite while I'm preordained to slave in the kitchen. I'm in the midst of preparing the food for the whole household, and I also have to stir-fry some vegetarian fare for the First Lady. How many hands do you think I've got to spare? If you think about it, all she has to do is pour out the tea, but she insists on singling me out for the job. As though I were at her beck and call! If the tea never gets served, so be it. I'm certainly not going to take care of it."

"Old Man Ching has been sitting out there all this time already," protested P'ing-an. "Sister, hurry up and give me some tea to take out to him. If you delay any further you'll bring Father's curses down on your head."

Thereupon, while:

This place tried to foist the job on that;

That place tried to foist the job on this, until nothing got done for half a day. By the time P'ing-an had waited for Yü-hsiao to supply condiments and teaspoons and was finally able to bring the tea out, Director Ching had been sitting in the reception room for a long time. He tried to make his departure more than once, but Hsi-men Ch'ing would not let him go. Then the tea turned out to be so cold it was not fit to drink. Hsi-men Ch'ing roundly cursed P'ing-an and had to order him to replace the original tea before Director Ching finally drank it and went his way.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came back inside he demanded to know, "Who was it who made the tea today?"

"It was made by the person on duty in the kitchen," said P'ing-an.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to Yüeh-niang's room in the master suite and complained to her, "What sort of tea was that to serve to a guest today? Go to the kitchen, find out what servant's wife is on duty, and then bring her out here for interrogation and give her a few strokes with the bamboo."

"It should be Hui-hsiang on duty today," said Hsiao-yü.

"That splay-legged whore is asking for it!" Yüeh-niang said in some consternation. "How can she continue to turn out that sort of tea?"

At the same time she sent Hsiao-yü to fetch Hui-hsiang, made her kneel down in the courtyard, and asked how many strokes she should be given.

"It was only because I was busy cooking," Hui-hsiang protested, "and had to stir-fry your vegetarian fare into the bargain, that I had my hands full and the tea got a little cold."

Yüeh-niang berated her for a while and then permitted her to get up.

"From now on," she commanded, "whenever your father has guests to entertain in the front compound, let Yü-hsiao and Hui-lien make the tea back here. Whoever is on duty in the kitchen should only be responsible for preparing the food and tea for the household as a whole."

When Hui-hsiang returned to the kitchen she was:

Unable to contain her chagrin.²⁹

She only waited until Hsi-men Ch'ing had left the premises before coming back in a rage to seek out Hui-lien. Pointing her finger at her, she launched into a tirade of abuse.

"You lousy whore! I hope you're satisfied, that's all. I suppose you're preordained to be in favor and serve on the staff of the master suite while I'm just to be a woman who slaves in the kitchen. You insisted on the page boy's singling me out to make the tea. As though I were at your beck and call! As for you and me:

The rice is already cooked.³⁰

You know it and I know it.³¹

The cricket won't eat the flesh of a warty toad,

Because both inhabit the same spadeful of earth.³²

In any case, if you're not Father's concubine, that's all there is to it; and even if you are his concubine, I'm not afraid of you."

"You're completely off the mark," retorted Hui-lien. "If you didn't make the tea right and Father took exception to it, what's that got to do with me? How dare you come here and vent your spleen on me?"

When Hui-hsiang heard these words she became more enraged than ever and railed at her, "You lousy whore! How is it that when you did your best to get me a caning just now I wasn't ordered to be beaten after all? When you were working for the Ts'ai family, the lovers you took couldn't be counted, and now that you're here, you're still up to your old tricks."

"If I've taken a lover, you've never seen it," replied Hui-lien. "Don't talk such stinking rot. And as for you, Sister, you're not exactly:

An immaculate nun,³³ yourself."

"Who says I'm not an immaculate nun?" retorted Hui-hsiang. "And if I chose to put my legs in the air, I'd do a better job of it than any whore like you, I can tell you. I didn't choose to start this tale-telling, but where men are concerned:

If you've had one, you've had a bushelful.³⁴

There isn't a man out at the front of the compound you haven't been after. You may think nobody knows what you're up to behind their backs. The way you talk when you think you're safe, even the ladies of the house mean nothing to you, let alone their inferiors."

"What have I said behind anyone's back?" demanded Hui-lien. "And who means nothing to me? You can give me as hard a time as you like. I'm not afraid of you."

Hui-hsiang Angrily Hurls Abuse at Lai-wang's Wife

"You've got someone to stand up for you," replied Hui-hsiang. "That's why you're not afraid."

The two of them were still mixing it up when Hsiao-yü fetched Yüeh-niang, who ordered them apart. "You lousy little stinkers! Why don't you go about your business? What are you mixing it up over, anyway? If your master gets wind of it there'll be another ruckus for sure. The last time there was no caning administered, but if you carry on any longer there will be."

"If I get a single stroke," said Hui-lien, "I'll hook that whore's guts out right through her mouth before I'm ready to call it quits! I'll put my life up against yours any day; what's it to me, even if we both have to leave the house?"

So saying, she marched off to the front compound.

After this, Sung Hui-lien's conduct became more outrageous than ever. Relying on her clandestine affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing, she:

Took no further account,³⁵ of anyone in the household, high or low. Every day she could be found hobnobbing with Yü-lou, Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Ch'un-mei in their daily pastimes.

That same day Old Mother Feng brought over the twelve-year-old serving girl, as she had promised. She took her to Li P'ing-erh's quarters first, to be looked over, and then escorted her to Li Chiao-erh's place. Li Chiao-erh bought her for five taels of silver in order to serve in her apartment. But no more of this.

Truly:

The plum blossom licentiously displays its springtide feelings;
Undaunted by the threat of Aunt Feng's³⁶
stern commands.³⁷

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Outside the palace a craze for hunting, inside a craze for sex;³⁸
If one dabbles a bit in such things, what's the harm in it?
In the morning he rides forth upon an embossed saddle;
At nightfall he returns to scent of rouge and powder.³⁹

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 25

HSÜEH-O SECRETLY DIVULGES THE LOVE AFFAIR; LAI-WANG DRUNKENLY VILIFIES HSI-MEN CH'ING

Amid terraces and kiosks of prominent houses a myriad blossoms bloom;
Manipulating the ropes of their swings girls vie voluptuously.
The morning sun lends added warmth to their new brocades;
The spring breeze gusts congenially across old gates and walls.
By jade flagstones orchid shoots may grow,
in many a beauteous pair;
But crimson bed curtains should enclose a single preferred spray.
How laughable that the domestic doe should breed domestic doom;
The women's quarters, from this time on,
know no behavioral norms.

THE STORY GOES that:

The Lantern Festival having passed,
The Ch'ing-ming Festival¹ was at hand.

Ying Po-chüeh called on Hsi-men Ch'ing that morning to extend an invitation and found him already entertaining Ch'ang Shih-chieh at breakfast in the summerhouse in the garden. They looked on as a considerable number of silversmiths who had been called in for the purpose plied their trade in front of them. Sun Kua-tsui had offered to stand treat and had invited them all to join him in a festive excursion to the suburbs.

Before this Wu Yüeh-niang had already had the frame for a swing constructed in the garden. Now that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home and the ladies were at leisure, she led her sisters into the garden to try it out and thus dispel the ennui of the spring day.

Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou were the first to sit down on the swing and try it together. After they had enjoyed it for a while they got off and suggested that Li Chiao-erh and P'an Chin-lien take their places. Li Chiao-erh begged off on the grounds that she was too heavy to work the swing and suggested that Li P'ing-erh should take a turn with Chin-lien.

After they had swung for a while, Yü-lou called out, "Sister Six, how about joining me in doing a standing swing? Don't anybody laugh. Just see how we do."

Thereupon, the two women:

Grasping the gaudy ropes with their jade hands,
Stood themselves erect upon the painted board.

Yüeh-niang told Sung Hui-lien to stand underneath to push the swing for them and she was joined in this task by Ch'un-mei. Truly, it is a case of:

Red-rouged powdered face facing red-rouged powdered face;
Jade-white creamy shoulders next to jade-white creamy shoulders.
Two pairs of jadelike wrists tug and then retug;
Four tiny golden lotuses are tossed and then retossed.²

Chin-lien, who was the uppermost of the pair, was:

Falling into a heap with laughter.

"Sister Six," Yüeh-niang called out to her. "There's nothing wrong with your laughing so hard up there, but if you were to slip and fall:

It would be no laughing matter.”³

As she spoke, who could have anticipated it, but the painted board was slippery and it was hard to maintain a steady footing on it in high-heeled shoes. All they heard was a clattering sound, and Chin-lien came tumbling off the swing. Fortunately she managed to catch hold of the frame and save herself from a severe fall, but she nearly dragged Yü-lou off with her.

“I warned you not to laugh so hard, Sister Six,” said Yüeh-niang. “It serves you right to have fallen off.”

Then she turned to Li Chiao-erh and the others and continued, “The one thing not to do when swinging is to laugh. What’s the point of laughing too hard, anyway? Your legs are sure to go soft on you and off you fall. Back when I was still a girl in my own home, the family of Censor Chou next door had a garden in which they had set up a swing. It was just like this on a day during the festival season in the third month that their daughter, Miss Chou, along with three or four of us other girls, were playing on the swing. We too were laughing uncontrollably, and Miss Chou slipped off and landed astride the painted board, which ruptured her hymen. Later, when she got married, the groom’s family claimed she was not a virgin, repudiated the match, and sent her back to her family. From now on, when you swing, avoid laughing above all else.”

“Meng the Third isn’t up to snuff,” said Chin-lien. “Let me and Li P’ing-erh do a standing swing together.”

“The two of you be careful now,” said Yüeh-niang.

She ordered Yü-hsiao and Ch’un-mei to stand to their right in order to push the swing for them.

Just as they were about to start, who should come in from outside but Ch’en Ching-chi, who said, “So you ladies are in here playing on the swing, are you?”

“Son-in-law, you’ve arrived in the nick of time,” said Yüeh-niang. “You can push the swing for the two ladies. The maidservants aren’t strong enough to do it properly.”

As for Ching-chi, it was just like the time:

When the old monk neglected to ring the bell:⁴

This was just the signal he’d been waiting for.

Thereupon,

Quickening his pace and hiking up his clothes, he stepped forward and said, “Let me push the swing for the two ladies.”

Then, pausing to tuck Chin-lien’s skirt in place, he said, “Steady on your feet, Fifth Lady. Your son-in-law will give you a push.”

The swing flew up into the air, so that they looked just like a pair of immortals in flight.⁵

When she saw how high the swing was going, Li P’ing-erh called out apprehensively, “It’s not straight. Son-in-law, you’d better give me a push too.”

Somewhat flustered, Ch’en Ching-chi replied, “Don’t be so demanding. If you let me take my own time I can manage you both. If you go on at this rate, first one of you calling for me and then the other, it will bring on a case of consumption, and I won’t have the stamina to do the job.”

Thereupon, he proceeded to adjust the bottom of Li P’ing-erh’s skirt, exposing the extremities of her scarlet underdrawers, as he gathered it into a bunch.

“Son-in-law,” Li P’ing-erh said, “Take it easy. My legs are going soft on me.”

“You shouldn’t call for more if you’re not up to serious drinking,” said Ching-chi. “Only a moment ago you were making such a fuss my head was spinning.”

“Sister Li, you’re stepping on my skirt,” complained Chin-lien. “It’s a wonder you haven’t pushed me right off the swing.”

The two of them continued to swing for some time and then stepped down.

Ch’un-mei and Hsi-men Ta-chieh then took a turn.

Ladies Enjoy the Swing on a Spring Day

Finally, Yü-hsiao and Sung Hui-lien were induced to try a standing swing together. Hui-lien grasped the gaudy ropes with her hands, stood straight up with her feet firmly planted on the painted board below, and without asking anyone to give her a push caused the swing to soar up into the clouds, and then suddenly fly down again. Truly, they were just like a pair of immortals in flight, a captivating sight.

When Yüeh-niang saw this, she said to Meng Yü-lou and Li P'ing-erh, "Just look! That chambermaid can really swing."

As she spoke, a gust of wind caught Hui-lien's skirt, exposing her scarlet underdrawers of Lu-chou silk, tucked into sand-green leggings, adorned with fine variegated silk embroidered kneepads, the ends of which were tied in place with pink cord.

Yü-lou pointed this out to Yüeh-niang, but she only laughed, cursed, "What a lousy preternatural creature," and let it go at that.

Yüeh-niang and the others continued to enjoy their swinging. But no more of this.

At this point the story divides into two. Let us now return to the story of Lai-wang, who had gone to Hang-chou to arrange the manufacture of the garments for presentation to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching on the occasion of his birthday. He had now returned, in charge of numerous saddlebags and trunks full of valuables. Leaving his cargo at the dock, he went ahead in order to announce his arrival.

When he reached the gate, he tied up his horse and went inside, dusted himself off, stowed away his gear, and headed for the rear compound. The first person he saw was Sun Hsüeh-o, who was standing in the doorway of the master suite.

He made her a bow and Hsüeh-o greeted him, all smiles, saying, "Good. You've come home. You must be tired from:

The wind and the frost on your journey.⁶

It's not that long since I've seen you, but you've gotten swarthier and put on weight."

Lai-wang then asked, "Where are the master and mistress?"

"Your father has been invited by Ying the Second and that bunch to join them in an excursion outside the South Gate," said Hsüeh-o. "Your mother and Hsi-men Ta-chieh are in the flower garden playing on the swing."

"Ai-ya!" said Lai-wang. "What do they want to do that for? Swinging is a pastime introduced by the northern barbarians.⁷ Southerners don't do it. The women there, in the third month of spring, merely amuse themselves by comparing botanical specimens."

Hsüeh-o then went into the kitchen and poured out a cup of tea for him, asking as she did so, "Have you eaten or not?"

"I don't want anything to eat right now," said Lai-wang. "As soon as I've seen the mistress, I'll go back to my room and wash up."

Then he went on to ask, "How come I don't see my wife around the kitchen?"

Hsüeh-o gave a sardonic laugh, and said, "Your wife is no longer your wife of old. She's risen to quite another plane. Nowadays she spends all her time palling around with the ladies of the household, playing at board games with them, or jacks, or dominoes. She scarcely condescends to do any work in the kitchen."

While they were talking, Hsiao-yü had gone into the garden to report to Yüeh-niang, saying, "Lai-wang's here."

Yüeh-niang came back from the front of the compound and sat down. Lai-wang stepped forward and kowtowed to her, after which he stood to one side. She asked him about the events of his journey and rewarded him with the gift of two bottles of wine.

After a while his wife, Sung Hui-lien, showed up and Yüeh-niang said, "That's enough for now. You must be tired. Go back to your room and wash up and have a rest, so you'll be ready to report to your father when he gets home."

Lai-wang then went back to his room. Hui-lien handed him the key and he opened the door. She dipped up some water for him to wash his face and clean up with and brought in his bag.

"You lousy black jailbird!" she said. "It's not that long since I've seen you, but you've certainly put on a lot of weight."

She helped him change his clothes and fixed something for him to eat. He took a nap, and by the time he got up it was already sunset.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, Lai-wang came to see him and reported, "The garments for presentation to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching on his birthday, and the clothes for the family, have all been successfully procured in Hang-chou. They have been packed in four trunks and transported on a government boat. All that remains is to hire bearers and see them through customs."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted and gave him the silver to pay the bearers. The next morning Lai-wang arranged to have the trunks carried into the city, had them properly stowed away, and settled accounts with his master. Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded him with five taels of silver for his personal use and continued to employ him, as before, as a purchasing agent for the household.

Lai-wang had done some business of his own on the side and surreptitiously presented Sun Hsüeh-o with two satin handkerchiefs, two pairs of figured ankle leggings, four boxes of Hang-chou powder, and twenty cakes of rouge.

Hsüeh-o secretly confided to him, "Ever since you went away, during the last four months or so, your wife has been carrying on an affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing. It all started with Yü-hsiao playing the role of pander and delivering a gift of silk. They've used Chin-lien's quarters as their nest, meeting at first in the grotto underneath the artificial hill in the garden, and then, later, actually going to it in her room. They're at it all day long:

Sleeping from morning to night,

And then from night to morning.⁸

He gives her clothing and jewelry, trinkets and silver, which she carries around with her in a big bag. She gets the page boys to buy things for her at the front gate at the rate of two or three mace of silver per day."

"No wonder," said Lai-wang, "her trunk is full of clothing and jewelry. When I asked her about it, she said the mistress had given them to her."

"It's not your mother that gave them to her," said Hsüeh-o. "It's your father who gave them to her."

Lai-wang made a mental note of what she had said.

That night, he went into the rear compound and had a few cups to drink. When he returned to his room, as the saying goes:

Wine releases the words stored in the gut.

On opening her trunk and coming across a bolt of blue silk of unusually fine design, he asked his wife, "Where'd this silk come from? Who gave it to you? Tell me the truth immediately."

His wife:

Not understanding the true state of affairs,⁹ put on a smile and replied, "You crazy louse of a jailbird! What are you asking about that for? It's just a bolt of silk that the mistress in the rear compound gave me when she saw I didn't have a proper jacket to wear. I put it away in the trunk and haven't had time to make it up yet. Really, who do you think would give me such a thing?"

"You lousy whore!" Lai-wang cursed. "You think you can still fool me with such tricks, do you? Who was it who really gave it to you?"

"And where did this jewelry come from?" he went on to ask.

"Phooey!" the woman replied. "You crazy jailbird! Who doesn't have a mother and father?"

Even if you sprung from a crack in a rock, you'd have a nest.

Even if you were born from a date stone,
you'd have a pit.

Even if you were sired by a clay figurine,
it must have been animate.

Even if you were begotten by a stone tablet, you'd still have a base.

How can anyone who is human lack relatives or relations? These hairpins and combs were lent to me by my maternal aunt. Who do you suppose gave them to me? How can you be so:

Barefaced and red-eyed?¹⁰

You'll be seeing things till the day you die, you jailbird!"

At this point Lai-wang gave her a blow with his fist that nearly knocked her off her feet.

"You lousy whore! Still shooting off your mouth, are you? I know someone who's actually seen you engaging in hanky-panky with that degenerate pig or dog. I know all about how that maidservant Yü-hsiao played the role of pander and delivered a gift of silk to you; how the two of you made out together in the front garden; how, later on, you moved the scene of operations into that whore P'an's room where you could carry on openly; and how you keep it up all day long till you're fucked out. You lousy whore! And you have the nerve to come around me with all that highfalutin talk!"

The woman then broke into tears, saying, "You'll come to a bad end, you lousy jailbird! What do you think you're doing, coming home and beating me up? What business of yours have I ruined?"

Those may be words but they don't make utterances.¹¹

If you throw a brick or a tile into the air,
It's got to come down to earth.

Some backbiting:

Bad-mouthed and evil-tongued,¹² person, bent on:

Making something out of nothing, must have put you up to abusing your old lady. Well your old lady's not the sort of unbacked commodity to be trifled with.

Even if you abuse a person to death,
You'd better have clear-cut grounds.

Who says so, anyway? If you don't believe me, just ask around a bit about that Sung girl. If I've slipped up in any way, you might as well turn my name Sung on its head. Would I dare open my mouth to accuse anyone else of anything? That whore and that cuckold have the nerve to bad-mouth me, do they? And as for you, you lousy jailbird:

Before you even get wind of anything,
You're ready for the rain.¹³

The only thing that ought to matter is the truth.¹⁴

If someone told you to kill a person, I suppose you'd just kill him."

With these few words, Lai-wang was reduced to silence.

After some time, he said, "It's not that I intended to beat you. It's just that I've allowed that bastard to get the better of me."

"As for that bolt of blue silk," Hui-lien continued, "I might as well tell you all about it. It was during the eleventh month last year, on the Third Lady's birthday, that the mistress noticed I was wearing a violet jacket along with a skirt I had borrowed from Yü-hsiao that didn't match. 'That's most unbecoming,' she said. 'What a way to dress! It won't do.' It was on that occasion that she gave me this bolt of silk. But who's had the time to make it up? Someone who didn't know the facts must have made up this tale about me. But they don't know who they've got to contend with. Your old lady's not the sort to let anyone off easy. Tomorrow I'll give them a sample of what I can do in the way of a good cursing out. I might as well put my life on the line since nobody's willing to stick up for me."

"As long as you haven't done anything, forget it," said Lai-wang. "Why pick a quarrel with anyone for no good reason? Just make up the bed for me, and be quick about it, so I can get some sleep."

As the woman unfolded his bedding, she muttered, "You'll drop dead in your tracks someday, you crazy jailbird! Once you've had your snootful of that 'saffron soup,'¹⁵ you just sack out and enjoy yourself, leaving your old lady to curse you to your fucking face for nothing.”

Thereupon, by the time she had turned Lai-wang over on the k'ang, with his face to the wall, he was:

Snoring thunderously.

Gentle reader take note: Most of the adulterous women of this world, no matter how smart their husbands are, even if they are tough enough to chew nails, can get around them with a few phrases that:

Misstate wrong as right,¹⁶

so effectively that nine out of ten of them are deceived. Truly:

Like the bricks in the privy:

They're both hard and smelly.¹⁷

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Hui-lien's illicit affair enables her to monopolize her master;

Lai-wang, while in a state of drunkenness, abuses his wife.

Hsüeh-o secretly divulges Chin-lien's share in arranging the tryst;

Thereby giving rise to open hostilities in the bosom of the family.

Sung Hui-lien succeeded in placating Lai-wang, and the night passed without further event.

The next day she went to the rear compound and interrogated Yü-hsiao as to who had given the game away but did not succeed in finding out anything. All she could do was to utter an indiscriminate tirade, but Hsüeh-o did not acknowledge her guilt.

One day, the impending catastrophe occurred in the following way. Yüeh-niang sent Hsiao-yü to fetch Hsüeh-o, and she looked all over without being able to find her. As she was going past Lai-wang's door in the course of her search, she saw Hsüeh-o coming out of his room and assumed that she must have been talking to his wife. But who would have thought that when she returned to the kitchen she found Hui-lien there engaged in cutting meat?

Some time later, Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the front compound engaged in a parley with Ch'iao Hung, his neighbor from across the street, who asked him to intervene on behalf of the Yang-chou salt merchant, Wang Ssu-feng, who had been incarcerated in Ts'ang-chou by the military commissioner and was willing to promise him two thousand taels of silver if he would ask Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching to have him released as a personal favor. As soon as he had finished with Ch'iao Hung, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for Lai-wang, and he was seen to come running out of his room. Truly:

Concealed by the snow, the presence of the egrets

is not seen until they fly;

Hidden by the willows, the existence of the parrots is not known until they speak.

As a result of this, everyone knew that Hsüeh-o had been engaging in hanky-panky with Lai-wang.

One day Lai-wang got drunk and started angrily railing against Hsi-men Ch'ing in the presence of the servants and page boys in the front compound.

“I know all about it,” he said. “When I was away from home he went after my wife. He sent Yü-hsiao to her room with a bolt of blue silk as an inducement and contrived to get her into the garden so he could have his way with her. And I know how, later on, they set it up so they could:

Sleep together all night long, and how P'an Chin-lien provided cover for them. Well, so much for that. But he'd better not fall into my hands, that's all I can say, or it'll be a case of:

A white blade going in, and

A red blade coming out.¹⁸

For better or for worse, I might as well kill that whore named P'an into the bargain. After all, I've only got one life to lose. You just watch and see:

What I can say,

I can do.¹⁹

Come to think of it, when that whore named P'an was still in her own house, she killed off her first husband, Wu the Elder. And when her brother-in-law Wu Sung came back and lodged a complaint against her, who was it she had to thank for going off to the Eastern Capital to fix things up for her and getting Wu Sung condemned to military exile? Now that she's got:

Both feet on level ground again, you'd think she'd be content to enjoy it, but instead she encourages my wife to commit adultery. My enmity for her is as big as the sky. As the saying goes, one must either:

Refuse to do something;

Or not stop at anything.

If they cross my path again, they'll have me to reckon with.

If you're willing to risk death by slow slicing,
You can afford to tackle the emperor himself."

Lai-wang Drunkenly Vilifies Hsi-men Ch'ing

Lai-wang was completely oblivious to the fact that:

Even if you only talk along the road,
There may be someone lurking in the grass.

It did not occur to him that every word he said would be overheard by his fellow servant Lai-hsing.

Now this Lai-hsing was originally a native of Kan-chou, in the far northwest, who had been brought back as a servant by Hsi-men Ch'ing's father, Hsi-men Ta, after he made a trip there to engage in the woolen trade. As a consequence, his name had been changed to Kan Lai-hsing. Twelve or thirteen years had gone by since then, and he had married and had children. Hsi-men Ch'ing customarily employed him as a purchasing agent for the foodstuff required by the household, a lucrative position. Recently, on account of his affair with Lai-wang's wife, Sung Hui-lien, Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken the job of purchasing agent away from him and given it to Lai-wang. As a result, Lai-hsing was on bad terms with Lai-wang, and a deadly enmity had grown up between the two men. On hearing these words of Lai-wang's, his:

Sense of grievance and desire for revenge,²⁰ could not help being activated.

Thereupon, he set out for P'an Chin-lien's quarters to tell her what he had heard. Chin-lien was sitting with Meng Yü-lou at the time.

On seeing Lai-hsing lift aside the portiere and come in, Chin-lien asked him, "What have you come for? Whose place has your father gone off drinking to today?"

"Today," said Lai-hsing, "Father and Ying the Second have gone outside the South Gate to attend a funeral. Right now, there is something I want to tell you about. But you must keep it to yourself. Don't tell anyone I told you."

"What is it?" asked Chin-lien. "Go ahead and speak. It doesn't matter."

"It's nothing but this," said Lai-hsing. "It's really intolerable. Lai-wang went out somewhere and got stinking drunk yesterday. Then he spent the rest of the day cursing in the front compound:

Making all kinds of threatening noises,
Pointing at the pig but cursing the dog.

He even tried to pick a fight with me, but I kept out of his way and paid no attention. Right in front of the whole household, high and low, he cursed Father and you."

"The lousy jailbird!" said Chin-lien. "What did he say about me?"

"I hardly dare tell you," said Lai-hsing. "The Third Lady is here; it's not as though she were anyone else. That rascal said that Father had deliberately gotten him out of the way so he could go after his wife; that he had sent Yü-hsiao to her room with the gift of a bolt of silk (she could testify to the truth of this allegation); that you had provided cover for them and inveigled his wife into your room where they made out together:

Sleeping from morning to night,
And then from night to morning.

He's had a knife made for himself and threatens to kill Father and you, saying it would be a case of:

A white blade going in, and
A red blade coming out.

He also said that back when you were still in your own house you had poisoned your husband, and that you had him to thank for going off to the Eastern Capital to fix things up for you, thereby saving your life. He said that you were now:

Requiting kindness with enmity,²¹
by encouraging his wife to commit adultery.

"As far as I'm concerned:

If you don the black livery of a servant,
You must cling to even the blackest post.²²

If I didn't come and warn you, sooner or later, that rascal might do you in."

When Meng Yü-lou heard Lai-hsing's story it was:

Just as though she had been dunked in a tub of ice water.

She was quite dumbfounded. As for Chin-lien, nothing might have happened if she had not heard about this, but having heard these words:

Her powdered face became suffused with red,²³
Her silver teeth were ground to smithereens.

"That criminal slave!" she cursed. "I've had:

No grudge against him in the past,
No enmity against him in the present.²⁴

If his master saw fit to play around with his wife, why should I be dragged into it? If I permit that slave to remain in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, I might as well not be his wife. So he thinks I owe my life to him, does he?"

Then she instructed Lai-hsing, "You can go, for now. When your father comes home, if he should ask you about this, be sure you tell him just what you told me."

"How can you talk that way?" said Lai-hsing. "It's not as though I'm traducing him, or anything.

If I've got a sentence,
I'll say that sentence.²⁵

No matter what Father asks me, I'll tell it the same way."

When he had finished speaking, Lai-hsing went back to the front compound.

Meng Yü-lou then asked Chin-lien, "Is it really true that Father could have done such a thing?"

"What's the point of asking anything about that shameless good-for-nothing?" exclaimed Chin-lien. "A fine woman she is! No wonder he finds himself in a position to be threatened by a slave. She was formerly employed in another household, where she underwent a full:

Nine calcinations and eighteen firings, as a slave of a whore at her master's hands. Originally, when she was at Assistant Prefect Ts'ai's place, she got caught colluding with her mistress in a case of adultery, as a result of which she had to leave and marry the cook Chiang Ts'ung. When she catches sight of a man, she can't help waving her hand.

If she's had one, she's had a bushelful.
There isn't much she doesn't know about anything.

"That lousy ruffian of ours:
Deceiving spirits and stupefying demons, did send Yü-hsiao to her with a gift of silk to make a jacket out of. If I know her, if she ever has the guts to wear it in public, I'll call her a real lady.

"It all happened last winter. I meant to tell you about it at the time but never got around to it. It was on that day when our elder sister had gone to a birthday party at our neighbor Ch'iao Hung's place. You remember, we were all in the front compound playing a board game when a maidservant came in and said that Father had come home, so the party broke up.

"Later, as I came through the inner gate on my way to the rear compound, I saw Hsiao-yü standing in the veranda. When I asked her if Father was inside, she made a negative gesture with her hand. When I retraced my steps as far as the garden, I ran into that little bitch, Yü-hsiao, standing at the postern gate. It so happens that she was acting as a lookout for the two of them, but I hadn't caught on yet. When I tried to go into the garden she barred my way and wouldn't let me proceed, saying that Father was inside. I gave her a piece of my mind, saying, 'You lousy little bitch! Since when have I been afraid of your father?' It was then I began to suspect he was up to some funny business with her. Who would have thought that when I went inside I found the two of them going at it in the grotto underneath the artificial hill. When the woman saw me come in, her face turned crimson with embarrassment and she beat a hasty retreat. When Father saw me he was quite at a loss for words, and I told him off for being such a shameless creature.

"Afterwards that woman came to my room and groveled around on her knees, begging me not to tell Mother about it. Later on, in the first month, Father wanted me to put that whore up in my own quarters so he could spend the night with her there, but both Ch'un-mei and I gave him a real talking to. Since when have we ever abetted him in getting so much as a glimpse of her shadow? That lousy death-defying slave! Don't you try to drag me into it. You say I put them up to it, do you? That slave of a whore with her simpering ways! As though I'd let them get up to their dirty tricks in my own room! And even if I hadn't raised any objections, that little piece Ch'un-mei of mine would never have consented to such a thing."

"No wonder," said Yü-lou, "the lousy little stinker's been putting on such airs. When I find her sitting anywhere, she makes as though she's going to stand up, but doesn't do it. Who could have known she was up to such tricks behind our backs?

"If you stop to consider it, Father really oughtn't to play around with her. After all, it's not as though there aren't any other women to be had. If you give your slave an excuse to raise a rumpus about it outside, what does it look like? It won't sound any too good when it gets abroad."

"The fact is," said Chin-lien, "left or right:
He doesn't have his own boots on straight.

You play around with the wife of a slave, and the slave seduces your own concubine behind your back. You only end up taking turns in your skulduggery. That slavey of a concubine is forever telling tales. She's done it a thousand times, if not ten thousand times. Right now, even if I give her a slap on the mouth, she won't be able to say anything."

"Do you think we'd better tell Father about this," Yü-lou asked Chin-lien, "or not tell him about it? Our elder sister isn't likely to do anything. If that rascal really means what he says, and we don't say anything about it, and Father doesn't know what's going on, he could end up falling prey to him someday. Truly:

When the mindful plot against the unmindful,
How can the unprepared cope with the prepared?²⁶
Sister Six, you really ought to say something about it. Truly:
You may break off a switch to beat the donkey,
So long as you don't injure the redbud tree."²⁷

"I wouldn't let that slave get away with anything," said Chin-lien, "even if he had begotten me!"
Truly:

If you do nothing in your lifetime to make people raise their eyebrows;
There should be no one in the world prepared to gnash his teeth at you.²⁸

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Lai-wang, while in his cups, recklessly
vilifies his master;
Lai-hsing, harboring resentment, stirs up
the wind and waves.
Chin-lien, upon hearing the truth about herself revealed,

Grinds her silver teeth to smithereens,²⁹
in a fit of rage.

That evening, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home, he found Chin-lien in her room with her:
Cloudy locks in disarray, and her Fragrant cheeks wrinkled from sleep, while her eyes were bleary with weeping. When he asked the reason for this, she told him all about Lai-wang's drunken tirade and his threats to kill his master.

"Now there's Lai-hsing," she said, "who personally heard him cursing you, one day, and uttering these threats against you. If you stop to think about it, while you were plotting to seduce his wife behind his back, he simply turned around and took your own concubine behind your back.

You don't have your own boots on straight.
If that rascal should kill you, it would only serve you right. But what's it got to do with me, that he should want to kill me into the bargain? If you don't do something about it right away, some night, sooner or later, since:

Men don't have eyes in the backs of their heads,³⁰
I fear he may get the better of us."

"Who's been engaging in hanky-panky with that rascal?" Hsi-men Ch'ing demanded to know.

"There's no need to ask me," said Chin-lien. "Just ask Hsiao-yü in the master suite and you'll find out."

"It's not the first time that slave has taken liberties with me," she went on.

"He said that to begin with I had poisoned my husband, and that after you married me it was only thanks to his efforts that my life had been saved. He's been out making these allegations in front of people. It's a good thing I haven't:

Produced a son, or
Borne a daughter.

If I had:

Produced a son, or Borne a daughter, that lousy slave's allegations wouldn't bear listening to. He'd say things like, 'Originally, before your mother established her position in the household, it was only thanks to your father's string-pulling that her life was saved.' Such allegations would not redound to your credit. You may be devoid of shame, but I won't stand for it. What would I want to go on living for?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing, heeding:

The words of his spouse,³¹ went to the front of the compound, sought out Lai-hsing, found a place where they could be alone, and interrogated him about the whole incident, from beginning to end. The servant gave him a word for word account of the affair. Then he went to the rear compound and took Hsiao-yü's testimony, which did not conflict with what Chin-lien had said.

"It's true," she said, "that on such and such a day I saw Hsüeh-o coming out of Lai-wang's room when his wife was not there. That's really what happened."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was enraged and gave Sun Hsüeh-o a beating. It was only after repeated intercessions by Yüeh-niang that he stopped, but he ordered that all her jewelry and finery should be taken away, and that she should henceforth only be allowed to work in the kitchen along with the servants' wives and no longer be permitted to appear in society. Now that this matter has been explained, we will say no more about it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing subsequently sent Yü-hsiao to call Sung Hui-lien into the rear compound and privately interrogated her.

"Ai-ya, Father!" the woman protested. "Needless to say, he never said any such thing. I'd be ready to swear an oath to that effect on his behalf. He may have had a cup or two too many to drink, but he would hardly have the:

Seven heads and eight galls,
to curse you that way behind your back. If he should:

Live off King Chou's largesse,
And yet call King Chou a villain,³²

on whom could he depend to make a living?

"Father, you shouldn't be so ready to believe what people say. Just let me ask you, who did you hear this story from, anyway?"

This speech of the woman's had the effect of reducing Hsi-men Ch'ing to silence. When pressed for an answer, he replied, "It was Lai-hsing who told me about it. He said he'd been getting drunk every day and, according to the wind-borne words' he had heard, he'd been going around outside cursing me."

"Lai-hsing," retorted Hui-lien, "because you gave the job of purchasing agent to this guy of mine, has been saying we took it away from him, depriving him of the opportunity to make any more money out of it. On account of this grudge against my husband, he's made up this story out of whole cloth and spit this mouthful of blood on him. And you fell for it. Was there ever such an injustice? But I'm not going to let him get away with it.

"Father, do as I say. Don't keep my husband around at home any more. When he's here he only gets into trouble. Give him a few taels of silver as capital and send him out to engage in trade somewhere where he can be:

Free as he pleases,³³

Far away from home.³⁴

Don't keep him around here where he's got time on his hands. It has always been true that:

A full stomach and warm body give rise to disorder;

Hunger and cold conduce to thoughts of thievery.³⁵

How could he not get up to mischief? If he were not around, but out on the road somewhere, it would be a lot more convenient whenever you had anything to say to me."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this he was utterly delighted and said, "My child, what you say is true enough. I had originally intended to send him to the Eastern Capital in charge of the birthday gifts for Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, but since he just returned from a trip to Hang-chou I felt it wouldn't be right to send him on another mission so soon and decided to send Lai-pao instead. After what you've told me, I'll send him off in the next few days after all. When he gets back, I'll consign a thousand taels of silver to him and send him off with a manager to Hang-chou to engage in the silk trade. How would you feel about that?"

The woman was delighted by this, and said, "Father, if you only do that, it would be great. Don't keep him around at home anymore. The best thing you can do with him is to:

Keep the horse to a steady pace."³⁶

As she spoke, Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that there was no one about, pulled her over, and gave her a kiss. The woman responded by sticking her tongue into his mouth, and the two of them fell to sucking each other's tongues.

"Father," the woman said, "you promised you were going to have a proper fret made up for my hair. How come you haven't had it made yet? If I'm not to wear it now, when am I to wear it? I suppose I'll have to keep on wearing this excuse of a hairpiece from one day to the next."

"That's no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll send eight taels of silver over to the silversmith's tomorrow so he can pull it into wire for you."

"I'm afraid your mother may ask about it," Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say. "How will you reply?"

"That's no problem," the woman said. "I'll have a story ready for her. I'll just say I borrowed it from my aunt's place to wear for a while. What is there to be afraid of?"

The two of them talked together for some time and then went their separate ways.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down in the reception hall and summoned Lai-wang into his presence.

"Get your clothes and your gear together," he said. "The day after tomorrow, the twenty-eighth day of the third month, I'm going to send you off to escort my shipment of birthday gifts for Grand Preceptor Ts'ai. And when you get back, I'm going to send you on another business trip to Hang-chou."

Lai-wang was delighted by this and readily consented. He returned to his room to get his gear together and then went out to buy a few things.

As soon as Lai-hsing heard what had happened he came and reported it all to Chin-lien. Upon inquiry, Chin-lien was told that Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the summerhouse in the garden and went there but did not find him. All she found was Ch'en Ching-chi, who was supervising the packing of the python robes and bolts of fabric.

Before this time Hsi-men Ch'ing had hired silversmiths to come to his residence and create a piece in which four male figurines were depicted holding up a representation of the character for long life. Each of the silver figures in this work was more than a foot high, and it was very skillfully wrought. In addition, there were two gold pitchers in the shape of the character for long life, two sets of jade cups in the shape of peaches, and two python robes of heavy scarlet variegated silk that had been manufactured in Hang-chou. All that was lacking were two bolts of jet abaca linen and two python robes of light scarlet silk, which he had been unable to purchase anywhere.

"On the second floor of my place over there," said Li. P'ing-erh, "I've got a number of python robes that haven't been made up yet. Let me go take a look."

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing joined her, and they went up to the second floor of her belvedere to have a look. She pulled out four items, two bolts of jet abaca linen and two python robes of light scarlet silk with variegated insignia and brocade borders, ten times better in quality and design than the ones from Hang-chou. Hsi-men Ch'ing was as pleased as could be. These were the materials that Ch'en Ching-chi was having packed up in the summerhouse.

"Where's your father?" Chin-lien asked him. "And what are you packing?"

"Father was here just a minute ago," said Ching-chi. "He's gone up to the second floor of the Sixth Lady's place. I'm packing up the birthday gifts for Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital."

"Who's being sent to deliver them?" Chin-lien asked.

"I heard that yesterday Father ordered Lai-wang to go," replied Ching-chi. "No doubt he's sending Lai-wang."

Chin-lien was just stepping down off the stylobate to head for the garden when she ran into Hsi-men Ch'ing and pulled him into her room.

"Who are you sending to the Eastern Capital tomorrow?" she asked.

"Lai-wang and my manager, Wu Tien-en," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There's that matter of the thousand taels of silver to fix things up for the salt merchant, Wang Ssu-feng. That's why I'm sending two people."

"You may do as you please," the woman said. "You don't pay attention to anything I say, but listen only to the one-sided words of that slave of a whore. Whatever she does is only designed to cover up for her husband. He's already uttered threats against you on more than one occasion. He may well decide to go for broke, abandon his wife to you, appropriate your goods, and abscond somewhere:

Just as easy as you please,³⁷

without giving you a second thought. You may be willing to take your own losses, however gratuitous, but it's too bad about that thousand taels of silver that belongs to somebody else. Never fear, you'll have to compensate him. As for what I say:

Mull it over in your mind; then

Do as you please, do as you please.

"Whatever that woman has had to say for some time now has only been spoken on behalf of that slave of yours. Simply because you covet that wife of his, it's no good keeping him at home, and if you send him away on business it's no good either. If you keep him at home, you'll run the risk, sooner or later, of letting down your guard. If you send him away somewhere and he makes free with your capital, first off, you'll not be in a very good position to accuse him of anything. If you really want to have that slave's wife to yourself, you'd better first contrive to have that slave:

Driven away from this door for good.

As the saying goes:

If one cuts the weeds without pulling up the roots,

New sprouts will grow up as before;

If one cuts the weeds and pulls up the roots,

New sprouts will never grow again.³⁸

For your part, then, you'd have nothing to worry about, and the woman, too, would be able to:

Resign herself to her fate."³⁹

The effect of this speech on Hsi-men Ch'ing was such that:

It was as though he had just been awakened from a drunken stupor.⁴⁰

Truly:

A few words serve to disclose the proper path to a gentleman;

A single speech suffices to awaken the sleeper from his dream.⁴¹

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 26

LAI-WANG IS SENT UNDER PENAL ESCORT TO HSÜ-CHOU; SUNG HUI-LIEN IS SHAMED INTO COMMITTING SUICIDE

Be careful, whatever you do, never to say,
 "It doesn't matter";
No sooner have you said, "It doesn't matter," than it will matter.
Those who always strive for precedence resort to evil devices;
Words that are uttered in due turn have a more enduring savor.
A surfeit of tasty foodstuffs will end up making you sick;
Pleasurable events, once over, are sure to result in disaster.
Rather than having to seek for medicine
 after you are sick;
It would be better to take preventive steps before falling ill.¹

THE STORY GOES that on hearing Chin-lien's argument, Hsi-men Ch'ing changed his mind.

The next day Lai-wang got his gear together and stood ready to start packing the saddlebags and set off on his journey to the Eastern Capital. He waited around until noon but saw no sign of any activity.

What should he see at this juncture but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who came out to the front compound, summoned Lai-wang into his presence, and said, "I was thinking it over last night and concluded that since you've hardly been back any time at all from your trip to Hang-chou, if I were to send you off to the Eastern Capital now it would be too hard on you. It would be better to let Lai-pao go in your stead and give you a chance to get a few days of rest here at home. I'll look around in the near future for some new business I could open on the street front of my property and put you in charge of it."

It has always been true that:

 The owner may do with his property as he likes;
 The customer may choose whether or not to buy.²

How could Lai-wang presume to protest? All he could do was to accept the situation.

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon turned the birthday gifts, the valuables and silver, the saddlebags and letters all over to Lai-pao and his manager, Wu Tien-en, who set off for the Eastern Capital on the twenty-eighth day of the third month. But no more of this.

Lai-wang went back to his room, enraged that his master had decided not to put him in charge of escorting the birthday gifts but to send Lai-pao instead. He managed to get falling-down drunk in his room, uttering all kinds of nonsense, taking it out on Sung Hui-lien, and threatening to kill Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hui-lien gave him a piece of her mind.

"Don't you know that:

 The dog that bites does not show its teeth.³
 Those may be words but they don't make utterances.
 Walls have cracks,
 Fences have ears.⁴

Now you've had your snootful of that saffron soup, just sack out and sleep it off."

She managed to get him to bed, and he fell asleep.

The next day she went to the rear compound and induced Yü-hsiao to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing to come out and see her. The two of them went to a secluded spot beneath the rear wall behind the kitchen to have a talk, while Yü-hsiao stood at the back gate to act as a lookout for them.

The woman complained vociferously to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Father, what kind of a man are you? Originally you said you would have him go, but now you've changed your tack and decided to send someone else. You've got:

 The mind of a ball:
 Bobbing down, bobbing up.⁵

You're like:

A walking stick made of rush:
Not to be relied upon.⁶

If you were to:

Build a temple and put up a flagpole:
It would sway back and forth like the Lord of Vacillation himself.

Your prevarications are really just as noisome as your farts. I won't believe anything you say from now on. I argued it all out with you, but it doesn't seem to have had any effect whatever."

"That's not it at all," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a laugh. "If it hadn't been for one thing, I would have sent him; but I was afraid he wasn't quite as familiar with the household of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai in the Eastern Capital, so I sent Lai-pao instead. I'll keep him here and find something for him to do on the street front of the property."

"Tell me," the woman demanded, "just what sort of business will you find him to do?"

"I'll have him engage a manager," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and open a wineshop by the front gate."

When the woman heard this she was utterly delighted and, going back to her room, told Lai-wang about it, word for word. They only awaited Hsi-men Ch'ing's further instructions.

One day Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down in the front reception hall and summoned Lai-wang into his presence. Six packages of silver had been placed on the table.

"My child," he said, "when you got back from Hang-chou recently you were quite worn-out. I would have sent you to the Eastern Capital, but I was afraid you weren't completely familiar with the household of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, so I sent Lai-pao and manager Wu instead. Today I'm turning over to you these six packages of silver, three hundred taels in all, so you can engage a manager and open a wineshop by the front gate. You ought to be able to pay me some interest on a monthly basis and still make a profit on it."

Lai-wang promptly prostrated himself on the floor and kowtowed.

Taking the six packages of silver back to his room, he said to his wife, "He's:

Done a complete about-face.

He's offering me this business in order to placate me. Today he's turned over these three hundred taels of silver to me and wants me to engage a manager and open a wineshop for him."

"You crazy louse of a black jailbird!" the woman said. "And you only got angry when I told you that:

One spadeful of earth won't dig a well:⁷

Things take a little time to make.

How is it that today you're going into business after all? I only hope you'll:

Abide by your lot and behave yourself,⁸ and stop getting drunk and giving vent to all that:

Ridiculous blatherskite."

"Put the silver into the trunk," Lai-wang said to his wife. "I'm going out to look for a manager."

Thereupon, he went out to look for a manager. He continued his search until evening but failed to find a manager and came home very drunk, where his wife put him to bed.

This was one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

He had not been asleep very long when, sometime in the first watch as people were just settling down for the night, a hubbub arose in the rear compound and cries of "Catch the thief!" were heard. His wife nudged Lai-wang awake and, although he was still stupefied with drink, he crawled to his feet, reached for the quarterstaff he kept at one end of the bed, and set off for the rear compound to chase the thief.

"It's late at night," his wife expostulated. "You'd better find out what's going on. You ought not to just rush into the situation."

Lai-wang said:

"One maintains troops for a thousand days,

For the one day on which they are needed."⁹

How can one hear there's a thief on the premises without giving chase?"

Thereupon, with his quarterstaff at the ready, he raced through the inner gate in large strides.

What should he see but Yü-hsiao, standing on the stylobate of the reception hall and calling out in a loud voice, "A thief has got into the garden!"

Lai-wang headed straight for the garden. When he got as far as the postern gate by the anterooms on the side of the courtyard, he was taken by surprise as a bench came flying out from the black shadows and tripped him up. What should he see next but a knife falling to the ground with a clatter nearby. From either side four or five page boys came rushing out, calling loudly, "Catch the thief!" Converging upon Lai-wang, they proceeded to take him into custody.

"But I'm Lai-wang!" he exclaimed. "I came to catch the thief. How can you turn things upside down by seizing me?"

His assailants:

Without permitting any further explanation,

With two strokes of a stick for every step, drove him to the reception hall. What should he see there but Hsi-men Ch'ing, sitting in state in the main reception hall which was:

Ablaze with lamps and candles.

"Bring him up here," Hsi-men Ch'ing called out.

Kneeling down on the floor, Lai-wang said, "I heard there was a thief on the premises, so I came in to catch the thief. How can you end up seizing me instead?"

Lai-hsing then placed the knife in front of him so Hsi-men Ch'ing could see it.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was highly incensed and cursed him, saying:

"Of all living beings man is the most difficult to save."¹⁰

This rascal is really a murderer. When I saw you come back from your trip to Hang-chou, I turned over three hundred taels of silver to you so you could go into business. Why, then, should you sneak into the interior of my home late at night with the intent to murder me? If that were not your intent, what did you have this knife for? Bring it here so I can have a good look at it by lamplight."

It was a thick-bladed, fine-edged knife that tapered to a piercing point and was as sharp as frost.

On examining it, Hsi-men Ch'ing became angrier than ever and shouted to his attendants, "Take him to his room and bring back those three hundred taels of silver."

The crowd of menservants thereupon escorted him to his room.

When Hui-lien saw them she began to cry out loud, saying, "He went into the rear compound to catch the thief. How can you seize him for a thief?"

Then, turning to Lai-wang, she said, "I told you not to go, but you didn't pay any attention; and now, sure enough, you've allowed yourself to be made the instrument of someone else's revenge."

She opened the trunk and took out the six packages of silver, which were taken back to the reception hall. Hsi-men Ch'ing opened them by the light of the lamps and found that only one of them contained silver. The others all contained ingots of pewter or lead.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was highly incensed and demanded, "How could you hope to get away with such a substitution? Where's my silver gotten to? The sooner you tell me the truth the better for you."

Lai-wang wept, saying, "Father was kind enough to give me the opportunity to go into business. How could I dare take such a liberty as to substitute anything for your silver?"

"You had this knife made," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and wanted to kill me with it. The knife is right here as evidence. How can you make any further excuses?"

Then he called for Kan Lai-hsing and had him kneel down and give his evidence.

"Didn't you, on such and such a day," Lai-hsing said, "openly state, in the front compound in front of everybody, that you were going to kill Father, because you were so angry that he was no longer steering any business your way?"

Lai-wang could only sigh.

His mouth dropped open, and
He was unable to close it.

Summoning his menservants, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to them, "Since the goods and the weapon are in evidence, tie him up and lock him in the gatehouse. Tomorrow I'll have a formal complaint drawn up and turn him over to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission."

Who should appear at this point but Sung Hui-lien, who came running into the reception hall in such a state that:

Her clouds of hair were in disorder, and
Her clothes were in disarray.

Kneeling down to perform an obeisance to Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Neither correctly nor precisely, she said, "Father, this business is all your doing. He went inside to chase the thief with the best of intentions, and you've had him seized as though he were a thief! I put those six packages of silver of yours away myself, and:

The original seals have not been tampered with."¹¹

How could any substitution have been made for no good reason? You can't just bury someone alive like this without offending against Heavenly principle. If he has committed some offense, just give him a beating appropriate to the offense. Where are you sending him off to with such a fuss?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw her:

His anger turned to joy, and he said, "My child, it has nothing to do with you. You can get up. This unreasonable and outrageous behavior of his has been going on for sometime. Now he has secreted a knife on his person and tried to kill me. You knew nothing about it, so you can relax. It's not your affair."

Then he turned to the page boy Lai-an and ordered him, "Quickly now, help your elder brother's wife back to her room; and don't do anything to upset her."

Hui-lien remained on her knees and refused to get up, saying, "Father, how can you be so cruel!

If you won't do it for the priest's sake,
do it for the Buddha's.

When I plead with you this way, won't you accede to my request? As for him, although he does drink too much, he would never do such a thing.”

She pestered Hsi-men Ch'ing until he was frantic and ordered Lai-an to help her to her feet and coax her back to her room.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing wrote a personal note about the matter and instructed Lai-hsing to be prepared to testify as a witness, to take the formal complaint with him, and to escort Lai-wang to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. He was to say that on such and such a day, while in his cups, he had secreted a knife on his person and, late at night, made an attempt on the life of his master; and also that he had substituted base metal for the silver he had been given, etc.

Just as they were about to set out, who should appear but Wu Yüeh-niang, who:

Lightly moved her lotus feet, and came out to the main reception hall, where she repeatedly urged clemency on Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, “If a slave does anything wrong, why don't you punish him at home and make an end of it? Why should you want to make such a fuss and have him:

Haled before the judge and exposed in the courtroom?”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words he:

Opened wide his two eyes, and shouted at her, “You're only a woman who doesn't understand anything. The slave intended to kill me and yet you urge me to forgive him!”

Thereupon, disregarding Yüeh-niang's plea, he ordered his minions to escort Lai-wang to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.

All that Yüeh-niang could do was to retire in confusion and go back to the rear compound, where she said to Meng Yü-lou and the others, “Right now in this household:

Chaos is king.

The nine-tailed fox fairy has appeared in the world.¹²

I don't know whose words he's been taken in by that he should drive a servant out of the household for no good reason. Even if you're going to falsely accuse him of being a thief:

The only thing that ought to matter is the truth.

What justification is there for:

Pasting a paper coffin on someone?¹³

He's really acting like an irrational, good-for-nothing, benighted ruler!”

Sung Hui-lien knelt down in front of her and wept.

“Child,” said Yüeh-niang, “you can get up. There's no need to weep. Your husband, in any case, cannot be convicted of a capital crime. Even people guilty of manslaughter sometimes get off. That lousy ruffian has:

Swallowed a soul-disorienting drug.¹⁴

Nothing we say is worth listening to. We're like:

Women serving in the army:

Merely taking up space.”¹⁵

Yü-lou said to Hui-lien, “Your father is just at the height of his rage. Later on we'll approach him gradually and try again to dissuade him. You'd better calm down and return to your room.”

Let us put this aside for a moment and say no more about it, but return to the story of how Lai-wang was escorted to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. Hsi-men Ch'ing had already sent Tai-an ahead to deliver “a hundred piculs of white rice” to Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling and Battalion Commander Ho Chin. Only after they had accepted this gratuity did they take their seats in the tribunal.

Lai-hsing handed up Hsi-men Ch'ing's formal complaint, which stated that Lai-wang, having previously accepted a sum of silver with which to start a business:

On seeing the money developed ideas,¹⁶ and substituted base metal for the silver; whereupon, fearing that his master would discover the imposition, he had late at night secreted a knife on his person and intruded into the inner reception hall with the intent of killing his master, etc. On perusing the complaint, Hsia Yen-ling and Ho Chin were greatly incensed and had Lai-wang haled before them to answer the charges.

“I hope Your Honor will look carefully into the matter,” pled Lai-wang. “If you permit me to speak, I will presume to speak. If you don't permit me to speak, I will not presume to speak.”

“You rascal,” said Judicial Commissioner Hsia, “the evidence of your guilt is clear. There's no getting around it. You'd better tell me the truth lest I put the screws on you.”

Lai-wang gave a full account of how Hsi-men Ch'ing had initially deputed someone to tempt his wife, nee Sung, with a bolt of blue silk, how he had then flirted with and seduced her, and how he was now deliberately framing him in order to get him out of the way so he could have sole possession of his wife.

Judicial Commissioner Hsia shouted to his minions to slap the prisoner across the mouth, saying, “You slave! You've betrayed your master. This woman of yours was provided for you by your master to be your wife. He also entrusted capital to you so you could start a business. While you:

Not thinking to repay your obligation,¹⁷

instead got drunk and broke into his sleeping quarters late at night, secreting a knife upon your person with the intent to murder him. If every slave were like you, the people of the empire would not dare to employ servants.”¹⁸

Lai-wang continued to claim he was being dealt with unjustly until Judicial Commissioner Hsia called up Kan Lai-hsing to testify against him. At this, Lai-wang:

Though he had a mouth, had nothing further to say.

Truly:

Though he was master of all the Heavenly arts,
He could not avert the calamity before his eyes.¹⁹

Judicial Commissioner Hsia thereupon ordered his minions to bring out the largest grade of ankle-squeezers. These were applied to Lai-wang, and, after they were tightened in place, he was given twenty strokes with a heavy bamboo. They beat him so severely that:

The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and Fresh blood flowed down his legs.

The lictors were then ordered to take him away and put him in the lockup.

Lai-hsing and Tai-an went home and reported what had happened to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was utterly delighted.

He gave orders to his servants, as follows, “None of you is to deliver any bedding or food to Lai-wang in prison. Even the fact that he was beaten; I don't want any of you coming home and telling his wife about it. Just say that he was not beaten a single stroke in the yamen, and that after he's been held for a few days they'll let him go.”

The servants all assented, saying, “We understand.”

Sung Hui-lien, from the time that Lai-wang was taken away:

Did not comb her hair,
Did not wash her face,
Allowed her features to become fallow,
Did not straighten her skirt,
Scuffed around with her slippers on backwards,
Wept behind closed doors, and Consumed neither tea nor food.²⁰

Hsi-men Ch'ing became frantic about it and sent Yü-hsiao and Pen the Fourth's wife to her room, again and again, to try to reason with her.

“You ought not to take it so hard,” they said to her. “Because of the way he got drunk and misspoke himself, Father has just had him locked up for a few days to teach him a lesson. It won't be long before he'll let him out again.”

Hui-lien did not believe them. She sent the page boy Lai-an to deliver food to him in prison and when he returned interrogated him about it, but he repeated the same story.

“When Elder Brother went before the magistrate,” he said, “he was not beaten a single stroke. He ought to be home in a day or two. He said for you to stay home and not to worry about it.”

Only after hearing these words did Hui-lien stop crying. Every day, she:

Lightly painted her moth eyebrows,²¹
Judiciously applied rouge and powder, and came out and went about her business. Hsi-men Ch'ing frequently came and went outside the door of her room.

From beneath the bamboo blind the woman called to him, saying, “There's nobody else here. Won't you come in and sit down for a while?”

Hsi-men Ch'ing slipped into the room and the two of them had a tête-a-tête together.

Hsi-men Ch'ing deceived her, saying, “My child, you can relax. For your sake I wrote a note to the officials so that he has not been beaten a single stroke. They're going to keep him locked up for a few days to teach him a lesson, but he ought to be out in a day or two, after which he can resume his business as before.”

The woman put her arms around Hsi-men Ch'ing's neck, saying, “My own daddy! Whatever you do, for my sake, give him a hard time for a few days and then let him out again. I don't care whether you have him open a business for you or not. Once he gets out this time, I'll see to it that he stops drinking altogether. No matter whether you:

Send him near or send him far, he can hardly refuse to go. Or better yet, if you feel the situation is too inconvenient, find another wife for him. That would settle the matter as far as he's concerned, and I would no longer feel that I belonged to him forever.”

“Dear heart,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “what you say is true. One day soon I'll buy the Ch'iao family's property across the street and fix up a three-room house for you to live in. Once you've moved in over there the two of us can:

Enjoy ourselves to our heart's content.”

“Darling,” the woman said, “Whatever you propose to do will be all right with me.”

When they had concluded their parley they closed the door of the room.

It so happened that during the summer months the woman was in the habit of going without her underdrawers, so she only had on a pair of skirts. On the occasion of this encounter with Hsi-men Ch'ing, all she had to do was to lift her skirts out of the way and they could fall to it. She kept a breath-sweetening lozenge in her mouth at all times.

Thereupon:

Untying her girdle pendant, she discloses the jade of the Nymph of the Hsiang River;²² Distending her ruby lips, she displays the cloves of the Han dynasty Secretariat.²³

Her pair of wild ducks flies to his shoulders;²⁴
As they consummate a bout of clouds and rain.

The woman unfastened the white silver-striped silk drawnwork scent bag with four dangling tassels that hung at her waist—it was filled with pine and cypress seeds, rose petals, and aromatic lysimachia from Annam and was adorned with a drawnwork eight-character inscription reading:

Winter and summer forever green,
Delicate, fragrant, beautiful, and lovely—and had Hsi-men Ch'ing tie it to his own waist-string. He was as pleased as could be with this and only wished the two of them could:

Swear fealty in life and death,
Unable to tear themselves apart.

Reaching into his sleeve he fished out one or two taels of silver and gave it to her to buy sweetmeats with.

As they dallied with each other in her room he repeatedly reassured her, saying, "There's no need to worry. I'm afraid you'll only worry yourself sick. Tomorrow I'll write a note to His Honor Hsia and have him released."

After they had spoken for a while, Hsi-men Ch'ing was afraid someone would come by and hurriedly took his leave.

The woman, having obtained this promise from Hsi-men Ch'ing, went to the rear compound where, in speaking to the maidservants and wives, she did not succeed in preventing some intimation of it from leaking out in her words and expression.

Meng Yü-lou soon found out about it and came to tell P'an Chin-lien what she had heard, saying, "Father has determined, sooner or later, to release Lai-wang and find another wife for him. He's going to buy the Ch'iao family's residence across the street, move her over there, set aside a three-room house for her to live in, and buy a maidservant to wait on her. He's going to have a fret of silver filigree and other jewelry made for her as well."

Word for word she recounted the whole story. "She'll be on an equal status with you and me. What sort of behavior is that? And our elder sister won't do anything to prevent it."

Nothing might have happened if P'an Chin-lien had not heard about this, but having heard about it:

Anger swelled her breast but there was no place to put it;
The red of her two cheeks was further augmented with red.

"So he's really going to accede to her demands?" she said. "I refuse to believe it. I'll tell you right now, if I let that slave of a whore become Hsi-men Ch'ing's seventh concubine—and this is no idle boast—you might as well turn my name P'an on its head!"

"If our husband ignores the proprieties," said Yü-lou, "and his legitimate wife won't do anything about it:

We may be able to run, but we can't fly,
Where can we hope to get to?"

"You're really hopeless," said Chin-lien. "What's this life worth anyway!

Though you live to be a hundred, you'll only be butchered for your meat.

If he doesn't go along with me, I'll put my life up against hers any day; what's it to me?"

"I don't have the stomach to cross him," laughed Yü-lou. "If you've got what it takes, I'll stand by and watch you take him on."

To make a long story short, that evening Hsi-men Ch'ing took a seat in his study in the Kingfisher Pavilion in the garden and was about to send for Ch'en Ching-chi to get him to draft a note for him to Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, instructing him to release Lai-wang, when Chin-lien suddenly showed up, leaned over the writing desk, and asked, "What note are you having your son-in-law draft for you, and who is it addressed to?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Could not conceal the situation,²⁵

and told her all about how he intended to have Lai-wang punished with a few strokes and then released.

The woman stopped the servant, saying to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Don't send for your son-in-law."

Then she sat down beside him and said, "You only pretend to be a real man while all the time you're just a good-for-nothing who:

Adjusts his rudder to the wind,²⁶ and Pushes the boat along with the current.²⁷

You ignore everything I took the trouble to say to you and go along with that lousy slave of a whore's every whim. No matter what lengths you go to:

Mixing granulated sugar with honey, for her to eat every day, she will still only hanker after that husband of hers. Now if you insist on releasing that slave, you really can't very well take on his wife without giving him a pretext to use against you. If you keep her around the house under such circumstances she'll be:

Neither fish nor fowl.

What sort of status will you assign to her? If you treat her as your concubine, that slave will still be in the way. If you treat her as the wife of your slave, you've been indulging her too inappropriately. She's been:

Assuming privileges above her station,²⁸ for everyone to see, making a real spectacle of herself. Even if you found another woman for that slave so you could appropriate his wife; in the future, if the two of you were sitting together someplace and that slave came in to report something, how could he help being angry when he saw you two together? When the woman saw him, should she stand up or remain seated? Just to start out with, this alone wouldn't look right. If it got around, not only would your neighbors and relatives laugh at you, but even the members of your own household, high and low, would not be able to take you seriously.

Truly:

If the ridgepole is not straight,

The rafters will be crooked.²⁹

"If you are really determined on this business you're acting like someone who:

Swears he wants to be a loach, but

Is afraid of getting mud in his eyes.³⁰

You would do better to be:

Once ruthless, ruthless to the end,³¹ and polish off this slave once and for all. Then you could embrace his wife with an easy mind."

With these few sentences she succeeded once again in persuading Hsi-men Ch'ing to change his mind.

A note was written and dispatched to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, directing Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling to settle the case against Lai-wang within three days. He was subjected to a severe interrogation during the course of which he was squeezed and beaten until he was scarcely recognizable. The two judicial commissioners, as well as the inspectors, the detectives, the orderlies, and even the turnkeys in the jail, both high and low, had all been paid off by Hsi-men Ch'ing to see that the prisoner was treated severely rather than leniently.

Among them there was a chief clerk in charge of the files whose name was Yin Chih, or Good Deed.³² He was a native of Hsiao-i³³ district in Shansi province and was an exceedingly benevolent and honest man. Because the officials of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, both high and low, had accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's bribes and colluded in framing the prisoner so that he could appropriate his wife, they had indicted him for the serious crime of "a servant coveting his master's property and attempting to murder him with knife in hand."³⁴

Yin Chih thought to himself:

"One must have some regard for Heaven's principles.³⁵

Officials, too:

Raise sons and raise daughters,

Hoping that they will grow to adulthood."³⁶

He repeatedly refused to make out the papers that would enable Lai-wang to be brought to trial and argued the case with the judicial commissioners face to face. However, the two judicial commissioners had both been bought off by Hsi-men Ch'ing. The result was an impasse that made it difficult to proceed any further. Moreover, Lai-wang had no money of his own to distribute in the jail, so he was subject to mistreatment. Fortunately for him, Yin Chih took pity on the fact that he had:

Suffered injustice and harbored resentment, and was without resources of his own, and ordered the jailers in the prison to treat him leniently and look out for him.

Yin Chih succeeded in delaying the disposition of the case for several days, but eventually:

His obligations canceled each other out, and Lai-wang was given forty strokes of the bamboo in the courtroom and sentenced to be remanded under penal escort to the jurisdiction of Hsü-chou, his native place. It was determined that seventeen taels of the misappropriated silver had already been spent and the remainder, along with the five packages of pewter or lead, were turned over to Hsi-men Ch'ing's retainer, Lai-hsing, to be returned to their rightful owner. A note was written by the authorities and dispatched to Hsi-men Ch'ing to inform him of the outcome of the case.

It was ordered that the prisoner should set out under penal escort that same day. The judicial commissioners issued the necessary papers on the bench, and two guards were deputed to bring Lai-wang before the court. He had already been beaten to a pulp. He was subsequently fastened into a cangue, which was duly sealed, and the guards were ordered to set out that same day for Hsü-chou and turn him over to the authorities there.

Lai-wang was in a pitiable state. He had been incarcerated for half a month or so without any money of his own. As a result his body was lacerated, his clothes were tattered, and he had nowhere to turn.

Weeping unceasingly, he appealed to his guards, saying, "With all due respect to you two brothers, I've just been the victim of a miscarriage of justice. As a result:

I haven't a candareen to my name,

Nor so much as an inch of cloth.

If I am to come up with something in the way of remuneration for you two, I've got no place to raise it. If you will only take pity on me and escort me to my master's residence, my wife is there and also a boxful of my clothes. If I can get them out and sell them off, I should be able to realize enough to compensate you for your trouble and make things a little easier for us on the road."

The two guards said, "You don't know what you're up against. Since it's your master, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who is responsible for your predicament in the first place, what likelihood is there that he would consent to relinquish your wife or your boxes? Don't you have any other relatives or friends? Out of consideration for Master Yin, we might be willing to:

Deceive our superiors but not our inferiors,³⁷
and take you there to raise some money or rice for the expenses of the trip. Who's expecting anything else in the way of remuneration from you?"

"My two brothers," said Lai-wang, "for pity's sake, just take me as far as the gate of my master's house and I'll beg two or three neighbors to put in a good word for me.

If there isn't a lot, there'll be a little."³⁸

"All right," said the two guards, "we'll escort you as far as his gate."

Lai-wang first applied at the house of Ying Po-chüeh, but Po-chüeh pretended not to be at home. He then asked Hsi-men Ch'ing's close neighbors, Chia Jen-ch'ing, or False Feelings, and I Mien-tz'u, or Ostensibly Benign,³⁹ if they would intercede on his behalf for the return of his wife and things. Hsi-men Ch'ing did not appear himself but sent out five or six page boys with sticks to prevent them from making any further disturbance outside his gate. Chia Jen-ch'ing and I Mien-tz'u were thoroughly mortified. His wife, Sung Hui-lien, who was in her room at the time, was kept as completely in the dark as if she had been:

Locked tight in an iron bucket, and didn't know a word about it. Hsi-men Ch'ing gave orders that any page boy who leaked information on the subject would be sentenced to twenty strokes with the bamboo.

The two guards then escorted Lai-wang to the house of his father-in-law, the coffin seller, Sung Jen, where Lai-wang, thus and so, tearfully told him the whole story. Sung Jen sent him off with a single tael of silver and came up with one string of copper cash and a peck of rice for the two guards in the way of traveling expenses.

It was the first decade of the fourth month when, weeping and wailing, Lai-wang set out on his journey away from Ch'ing-ho district along the highroad toward Hsü-chou. The wounds from his beating had broken open, and he lacked sufficient funds for the trip. He was miserable indeed. Truly:

Lai-wang Is Sent under Penal Escort to Hsi-chou

If one is only able, somehow,
to preserve his foolish life;
He will be happy to go hungry
for the rest of his days.
There is a poem that testifies to this:

The file clerk, in investigating this case,
maintained the utmost impartiality;
He was successful in rescuing Lai-wang from the toils of incarceration.

Though he was condemned to penal escort
all the way back to Hsü-chou;
The sickly verdure recovered its health upon exposure to the genial breeze.⁴⁰

We will say no more about how Lai-wang was sent under penal escort to Hsü-chou.

To resume our story, Sung Hui-lien remained at home looking forward every day to her husband's release. The page boys continued to be dispatched as before in order to deliver food to him, but as soon as they got outside they ate it themselves.

When they returned Hui-lien would interrogate them, and they reported, "Brother ate the food. Nothing is happening in the jail. Otherwise he would have been released by now. For the last several days their honors the judicial commissioners have not come to the yamen to conduct business. He should be home in another day or two."

Hsi-men Ch'ing also deceived her, saying, "I've sent someone to take care of it. He should be out before long."

The woman believed this to be true.

One day, she overheard "wind-borne words" to the effect that Lai-wang had been let out of jail and escorted to the front gate where he had asked for his box of clothes and then gone off somewhere or other. The woman asked about this several times but the page boys wouldn't tell her anything.

Then she happened to see Tai-an, who was bringing Hsi-men Ch'ing's horse back to the house, and asked, "How's your brother Lai-wang doing in jail, and when will he get out?"

"Sister-in-law," said Tai-an, "I might as well tell you. By this time my brother must have reached the River of Flowing Sands."⁴¹

When Hui-lien demanded to know what he meant, Tai-an, though he:

Never, ever, should have done it,⁴² told her, thus and so, "He was beaten forty strokes and remanded under penal escort to the jurisdiction of Hsü-chou, his native place. But you must keep it to yourself. Don't tell anyone I told you."

If the woman had not heard about this, nothing might have happened, but having heard these words, which she recognized to be the truth, she closed the door to her room and began to cry out loud, saying, "My husband, since you've been in this household what business of his have you ever ruined that he should want to:

Paste a paper coffin on you, and conspire against you behind your back? Since you've been a slave of his you haven't even stashed away so much as a decent article of clothing for yourself. So now it's only fitting that you should be traduced into being packed off:

Far away from home,
leaving me in a pretty predicament. While you're on the road:

I don't know whether you're alive or dead,
I can't tell whether you'll survive or perish.⁴³

They might as well have:

Put a water crock over my head,
for all I knew about it."

She wept for a while and then took a long towel, fastened it to the lintel over her bedroom door, and hanged herself.

Who could have anticipated that Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," whose room was adjacent to hers, happened to have come back from the rear compound and heard her crying for a while, after which there was a period of silence, finally succeeded by the sound of panting. She knocked on the door of her room and called to her, but received no response. Becoming panic-stricken, she got the page boy, P'ing-an, to pry open the window and shin himself inside. Finding the woman, dressed in her everyday clothes, neatly suspended in the doorframe, he cut her down and opened the door, after which they administered artificial respiration and poured ginger extract into her mouth.

It was not long before news of the event reached the rear compound and Wu Yüeh-niang, leading Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Li P'ing-erh, Yü-hsiao, and Hsiao-yü, all came to see what had happened. Pen the Fourth's wife also came to have a look. "The Beanpole" was sitting on the ground holding her in an upright position. She was making choking noises but was still unable to cry audibly. When Yüeh-niang spoke to her she only hung her head, drooling saliva and phlegm from her mouth, and did not respond.

"You're being a silly child," said Yüeh-niang. "If you had anything to complain about, it would have been better to speak up. Why should you feel that you had to resort to this way out?"

She then asked "The Beanpole," "Have you given her any ginger extract yet?"

"I've just given her some," said "The Beanpole," "and she swallowed it."

Yüeh-niang told Yü-hsiao to help prop her up and then personally appealed to her, "Hui-lien, my child, no matter what it is you've got on your mind, you'd do better to blurt it out truthfully. It won't be held against you."

She continued appealing to her for some time, but the woman only sobbed inaudibly for a while and then began to cry out loud:

Clapping her hands and beating her palms.

Yüeh-niang told Yü-hsiao to help her onto the k'ang, but she refused to get onto it. After Yüeh-niang and the others had endeavored to placate her for some time, they returned to the rear compound, leaving only Pen the Fourth's wife and Yü-hsiao to keep her company in her room.

Who should appear at this juncture but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who lifted aside the portiere and came in.

Seeing that she was sitting, weeping, on the cold ground, he ordered Yü-hsiao, "Help her onto the k'ang."

"Mother told her to get up there just now," said Yü-hsiao, "but she refused to do so."

"What a stubborn child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You'll get a chill from the cold ground. If you have something to say, tell me about it. How could you do such a foolish thing?"

"Father," said Hui-lien, shaking her head, "a fine man you are! That's quite a stunt you've managed to pull off behind my back! You must have some regard for Heaven's principles. How can you express your confidence in someone and then subject him to such drastic measures? The trap had already been sprung, but you continued to keep me in the dark. If you were determined to get him out of the way, why didn't you get us both out of the way? What are you keeping me around for?"

An executioner who likes to play with his victims.⁴⁴

You're so inured to burying people alive that you can bring yourself to:

Kill a person off and then attend the funeral.

All day long you kept on deceiving me. One day you said he'd be released, and the next day you said he'd be released, until you had me believing that he would really be freed. If you were going to have him sent into exile, you could, at least, have let me know what you were up to. Secretly, without giving me so much as an inkling, to send him off so far away! You must have some regard for Heaven's principles. How can you express your confidence in someone and then subject him to such drastic measures? The trap had already been sprung, but you continued to keep me in the dark. If you were determined to get him out of the way, why didn't you get us both out of the way? What are you keeping me around for?"

"My child," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing with a smile, "it's got nothing to do with you. Why should I want to get you out of the way because that rascal was at fault? You just relax and leave it to me."

Then he said to Yü-hsiao, "You and Pen the Fourth's wife keep her company overnight. I'll send a page boy with some wine for you to drink."

When he had finished speaking, he went outside.

Pen the Fourth's wife, after some time, succeeded in getting her to sit up on the k'ang. She and Yü-hsiao sat down together with her and did their best to comfort her.

It so happened that Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the shop on the street front of the compound and asked Manager Fu for a string of cash, with which he bought a mace worth of deep fried cutlets, which he had put into a box, together with a bottle of wine, and ordered Lai-an to deliver it to Hui-lien's room.

"Father sent me to deliver these things for you to eat, Sister-in-law," he said.

When Hui-lien saw this, she cursed, "You lousy jailbird! Take them away at once before I throw them all over the floor."

First he beats a person with his big fists,

And then he rubs the bruises with his hand."⁴⁵

"You'd better keep them, Sister-in-law," said Lai-an. "If I take them back, Father will only beat me."

Thereupon, he set them down on the table and went out. Hui-lien jumped off the k'ang, grabbed the wine, and would have run out and thrown it after him, if "The Beanpole" had not stopped her.

As Pen the Fourth's wife was keeping watch and "The Beanpole" was biting her fingernails, who should appear but Pen the Fourth's daughter, Chang-chieh, who had come to fetch her mother, saying, "Father's just arrived home and wants something to eat."

Pen the Fourth's wife and "The Beanpole" went out as far as "The Beanpole's" door, where they found Hsi-men Tachieh and Lai-pao's wife, Hui-hsiang, talking to each other.

They asked Pen the Fourth's wife where she was off to, and she replied, "My husband's just arrived home and wants something to eat. I'll just look in there and then come back. I only came over to see what was happening, and then Father insisted that I stay and keep her company. How could I have known I'd get tied up and be unable to get away?"

"What could she have been thinking of," they went on to ask, "that led her to take this way out?"

"It's lucky for her I happened to come back from the rear compound," said "The Beanpole," picking up where Pen the Fourth's wife had left off. "I could hear her crying in her room and then I didn't hear anything. That disturbed me, so I tried to force my way through her door, but it wouldn't open. Then I called P'ing-an and got him to jump in through the window. It was only then that he succeeded in cutting her down. If he'd been a minute later she would have been a goner, like:

The bearded oldster who blew out the lamp,

Only to burn himself to death."⁴⁶

"When Father was in her room just now, what did she have to say?" asked Hui-hsiang.

Pen the Fourth's wife laughed, saying, "Who could have known that Lai-wang's wife would turn out to be such a peppery article? She gave him tit for tat, just as though they were equals. Who ever heard of a servant's wife carrying on so high-handedly?"

"This servant's wife," said Hui-hsiang, "is not like other servants' wives. She's more like a daughter-in-law who can hardly be wrested from her father-in-law's embrace. Who is there in this whole household, high or low, who is her equal?"

Having had her say, Hui-hsiang went home.

"Sister-in-law," said "The Beanpole," "Hurry back after you get home."

"Needless to say," replied Pen the Fourth's wife. "If I didn't come back, Father would be really upset with me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing had Pen the Fourth's wife and "The Beanpole" sit with Hui-lien during the daylight hours and Yü-hsiao sleep with her at night.

Little by little Yü-hsiao endeavored to talk her round, saying, "Sister Sung, you're an intelligent person. You ought to take advantage of the fact that you're in the prime of life, a flower that has just opened. The fact that your master loves you shows that your:

Affinities are mutually compatible.

Right now:

Though you may not measure up to your superiors,

You are more than a match for your inferiors.⁴⁷

To be attached to a master is better than to be attached to a slave. Now that he's gone, he's gone for good. It doesn't matter that much that you're so upset, but if you should cry yourself sick, you'd be risking your life. As the saying goes:

Whoever is a monk for a day,

Must strike the bell for a day.⁴⁸

After all, a reputation for chastity is hardly going to end up on your head."

When Hui-lien heard this, all she did was weep, refusing every day to eat either food or congee.

Yü-hsiao reported this to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who told P'an Chin-lien to go and speak to her in person, but Hui-lien remained adamant.

This annoyed Chin-lien, who said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "That lousy whore! All she cares about is her husband. She says a thousand times:

One night as man and wife gives rise to a hundred nights of love.⁴⁹

She says ten thousand times:

To walk a hundred steps with one another,

Is enough to develop a lingering affinity.⁵⁰

With a woman as chaste as that, what can you use to secure her affections?"

"Don't you believe those specious arguments of hers," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If she were really as chaste as all that, she would have remained faithful to the memory of the cook, Chiang Ts'ung, instead of consenting to marry Lai-wang."

He then proceeded to take his seat in the front reception hall and summoned all the page boys and menservants before him for an interrogation.

"Some days ago," he said, "when Lai-wang was sent away under penal escort, who was it who told his wife about it? Whoever is willing to identify the culprit, I will not beat so much as a single stroke. Otherwise, if I find out who it was, anyone who knew about it and did not confess will receive thirty strokes of the bamboo and be:

Driven away from this door for good."

Suddenly Hua-t'ung knelt down and said, "Your servant dares not speak."

"Speak up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it won't do you any harm."

"The other day," said Hua-t'ung, "when Tai-an was bringing Father's horse back to the house, I overheard Sister-in-law ask him about it in the enclosed passageway, and he was indiscreet enough to tell her."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them, he became enraged and shouted out for someone to go find Tai-an. Tai-an was quickly apprised of this and immediately went to seek refuge in Chin-lien's room, from which he refused to come out.

Chin-lien was washing her face when the page boy ran into her room, knelt down, and wept, saying, "Fifth Lady, save me!"

"You lousy jailbird!" Chin-lien upbraided him. "You came in so suddenly you gave me quite a start. What have you been up to this time?"

"It's because I told Sister-in-law how Lai-wang had been sent away," said Tai-an, "that Father wants to beat me. Whatever you do, Mother, put in a word for me. Otherwise, if I go out while Father is just at the height of his rage, I'll be as good as dead."

"You crazy jailbird!" said Chin-lien. "You're as frightened as a ghost. I wondered what it could be that should so:

Startle Heaven and shake the earth.⁵¹

But it turns out to be nothing but the affair of that slave of a whore. I order you to remain in this room and don't go out."

Thereupon, she hid him behind the door.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing found that he was unable to summon Tai-an into his presence, he raved like thunder in the front reception hall. He sent two page boys, one after another, to Chin-lien's room to look for him, but they were forced to leave, empty-handed, with Chin-lien's curses on their heads.

Finally, like a gust of wind, Hsi-men Ch'ing descended upon Chin-lien's room in person, with a riding crop in his hand, and demanded, "Where is that slave?"

Chin-lien paid no attention until Hsi-men Ch'ing had made a search of the premises, dragged Tai-an out from behind the door, and was about to beat him.

At this point, Chin-lien grabbed the riding crop out of his hand, threw it on top of the tester above the bed, and said,

"You shameless good-for-nothing! It's a wonder you have the face to play the master. That slave of a whore so hankered after her husband that she hanged herself, and you're so mortified you vent your spleen on a page boy. What's it got to do with him?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing was bug-eyed with rage.

"You go back to the front of the compound," Chin-lien said to the page boy, "and go on about your business. Don't pay any attention to him. If he tries to beat you again, he'll have me to contend with."

Taking advantage of this reprieve, Tai-an headed straight for the front of the compound. Truly:

With two hands he tore open the road
between life and death;
Flopping over and leaping out through the gate to perdition.

P'an Chin-lien, having witnessed several such instances of Hsi-men Ch'ing's preoccupation with Sung Hui-lien, thereupon:

Came up with a plan in her mind.⁵²

Going into the rear compound, she set out to provoke Sun Hsüeh-o, saying, "Lai-wang's wife has been talking about how you seduced her husband and told him what she was up to, with the result that Father became angry and had her husband gotten out of the way. When he gave you that beating the other day and took away your jewelry and finery, it was all because of her talebearing."

Sun Hsüeh-o, having been regaled with such an earful of venom, developed a heartful to match.

Taking her leave of Hsüeh-o, Chin-lien then proceeded, in one breath, to make her way to the front of the compound and do the same to Hui-lien, saying, "Sun Hsüeh-o has been talking in the rear compound about how when you were a slave employed by the Ts'ai family you were already an old hand at inveigling your master into adultery. If you hadn't been making out with your master behind your husband's back, he would never have been driven out of the household. She claims that those tears of yours are only crocodile tears."

Chin-lien's efforts stirred up a:

Sense of grievance and desire for revenge,
on both sides.

One day it was one of those occasions on which:

Something is destined to happen.

It was the eighteenth day of the fourth month, Li Chiao-erh's birthday, and Auntie Li and Li Kuei-chieh from the licensed quarter had come to help celebrate the occasion. Wu Yüeh-niang invited them to join the other female guests in the rear reception room for a feast. Hsi-men Ch'ing had accepted a social engagement elsewhere and was not at home.

Sung Hui-lien, having eaten breakfast and put in an appearance in the rear compound during the morning, slipped back to her room and slept until the sun began to sink in the west. One maidservant after another was dispatched from the rear compound to call her, but she ignored them all and refused to come out. This was just the pretext that Sun Hsüeh-o had been looking for.

Going to her room to call her, she said, "Sister-in-law, you must think you're Wang the Beauty,⁵³ you're playing so hard to get."

Hui-lien paid no attention to her but continued to lie on the bed with her face to the wall.

"Sister-in-law," Hsüeh-o continued, "no doubt you're thinking of your Lai-wang. It would have been better if you had thought about him a little earlier. If it hadn't been for you he wouldn't be dead. He'd still be here in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household."

On hearing these words, Hui-lien was reminded of what P'an Chin-lien had said to her.

Turning over and jumping out of bed, she said to Hsüeh-o, "There's no need for you to come here to work off your wanton rancor. If it was on my account that he was gotten out of the way, how come you were given such a beating and relegated to a position in which you can't even appear in decent society any more? You ought to consider yourself lucky people refrain from confronting you about it. Everyone should exercise some mutual forbearance. What need is there for you to stick your neck out and find fault with anyone?"

Hsüeh-o became enraged and cursed her, saying, "Why you adulterous whore of a lousy slave! Have you got the colossal nerve to criticize me?"

"If I'm a whore of a slave," retorted Hui-lien, "you're nothing but the mistress of a slave. If I've committed adultery, at least it was with my master; which beats your adultery with a slave. First you seduce my husband behind my back, and then you have the nerve to come around and kick up a fuss about me."

These few words were clearly designed to hit Hsüeh-o where it hurt, and they had the desired effect. Before Hui-lien could do anything to protect herself, Hsüeh-o stepped forward and slapped her full in the face, turning it bright red.

"How dare you strike me?" Hui-lien exclaimed.

Thereupon, she went for her assailant and the two of them started to tussle with each other. Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," hurriedly came over and tried to persuade them to break it up. Even after Hsüeh-o had been forcibly disengaged from her, the two of them continued to:

Reville each other without ceasing.⁵⁴

Wu Yüeh-niang came up and gave them a piece of her mind, saying, "Neither of you have the slightest regard for propriety. No matter whether there are guests present or not, you're willing to:

Turn the whole household upside down.⁵⁵

Just wait till your master comes home and see whether I tell him about it or not."

At this, Hsüeh-o stalked off to the rear compound.

Seeing that Hui-lien's hairdo had been pulled undone, Yüeh-niang said to her, "You'd better comb your hair as quickly as you can and come back to the rear compound."

Hui-lien did not say a word in reply but saw Yüeh-niang on her way and then went into her room, locked the door on the inside, and gave herself up to tears. She continued to cry until it was time to light the lamps. Everyone was busy with the feast for the female guests in the rear compound. Alas, the woman:

Unable to contain her chagrin, took out two of her foot bindings, fastened them to the doorpost, and:

Hanged herself until dead.⁵⁶

At the time of her death she was twenty-four years of age. Truly:

The good things of this world are none too enduring;
Colored clouds are prone to scatter and glass is brittle.⁵⁷

At just that time:

Strange as it may seem,⁵⁸ who could have anticipated that Yüeh-niang should pass right in front of Hui-lien's room as she was seeing off Auntie Li and Kuei-chieh. The door was closed and all was silent within, which made her feel rather apprehensive. As soon as she had seen Auntie Li and her daughter into their sedan chairs, she came back and pushed at Hui-lien's door and called to her but was unable to get it open. Becoming panic-stricken, she had a page boy jump in through the window as before. Truly:

The earthenware crock cannot avoid being broken on the well curb.⁵⁹

They cut the foot bindings by which she was suspended, laid her down, and administered artificial respiration for some time, but, though nobody knew just when it had happened:

Alas and alack,
she was already dead. Behold:
Her four limbs are cold as ice,
Her breath is an extinguished lamp.
Her fragrant soul is dim;

Sung Hui-lien Is Shamed into Committing Suicide

Already headed for the Terrace of Homeward Gazing Spirits.
 Her starry eyes are dark;
 Its spirits fled, her body lies on the bare ground.⁶⁰
 Who knows to what place her vital essences have flown;
 Unless they are in the flying clouds and the autumn waters?⁶¹

When Yüeh-niang realized that their efforts to revive her would prove unsuccessful, she was thrown into consternation and hurriedly sent the page boy, Lai-hsing, to ride on horseback outside the South Gate and ask Hsi-men Ch'ing to come home.

Sun Hsüeh-o was afraid that when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home he would:

Pull up the trees to investigate the roots, and end up putting the blame on her. So she went to the master suite and groveled around on her knees, imploring Yüeh-niang not to mention the fact that she had quarreled with her.

Although Yüeh-niang saw how frightened she was, she couldn't bring herself to let her off completely and said, "If you're as afraid as all that, wouldn't it have been better if you had both had a little less to say in the first place?"

That evening, however, when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, she only said, "Hui-lien was hankering after her husband and cried all day long. Then, when everyone was busy in the rear compound, we don't even know when exactly, she committed suicide."

"She was just a foolish woman," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who was not destined to be happy."

He sent a servant to the district magistrate, Li Ta-t'ien, with a written report of the incident, which stated:

The said woman was responsible for the silver utensils during a feast for female guests in the household of the deponent and was unable to account for a silver cup. Fearing that the master of the house would investigate and punish her, she hanged herself until dead.

He also presented the magistrate with thirty taels of silver. For this reason the district magistrate was anxious to do him a favor and routinely dispatched the clerk from the office of punishment, along with a number of coroner's assistants, who conducted a perfunctory examination of the corpse. Hsi-men Ch'ing then purchased a coffin, obtained a red death certificate, and deputed Pen the Fourth and Lai-hsing to deliver the corpse to the Ksitigarbha Nunnery outside the South Gate to be cremated.

They gave the workers at the crematory five mace of silver for the purchase of additional fuel, and they were just about to light the fire when, who could have anticipated that Hui-lien's father, the coffin seller, Sung Jen, having heard what had happened, should arrive on the scene and put a stop to the proceedings. He loudly proclaimed that an injustice was being perpetrated and that his daughter had died under suspicious circumstances.

"Hsi-men Ch'ing," he claimed, "must surely have endeavored to force his attentions upon her. My daughter, wishing to preserve her honor, refused to go along with him, and he has coerced her into committing suicide. I plan to lodge formal appeals to the governor and the surveillance commissioner. Who dares to cremate the corpse?"

The workers promptly dispersed, not daring to carry out the cremation. Pen the Fourth and Lai-hsing had no alternative but to leave the coffin in the nunnery and return to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Truly:

The Green Dragon and the White Tiger accompany each other;
Good fortune and bad fortune cannot be safely predicted.⁶²

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 27

LI P'ING-ERH COMMUNICATES A SECRET IN THE KINGFISHER PAVILION; P'AN CHIN-LIEN ENGAGES IN A DRUNKEN ORGY UNDER THE GRAPE ARBOR

The Azure Heaven over our heads he would wantonly defy;
Taking peoples' lives¹ to gain possession of their wives.
You must know that his thousands of crafty and evil schemes;
Will only result in putting his own household in jeopardy.
Excess and debauchery have always arisen from ill-gotten wealth;
Avarice and anger, if one but repents, need not prevent salvation.
The Lord of Heaven still sees fit to let man
propagate himself;
Despite the fact that human hearts remain so intractably perverse.²

THE STORY GOES that Lai-pao, on returning from his trip to the Eastern Capital, dismounted and went to the summerhouse to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"On arriving in the Eastern Capital," he said, "I first went to see the majordomo, Chai Ch'ien, who reports directly to the grand preceptor, and gave him your letter. Afterwards he took me to see the grand preceptor himself, who glanced at your communication and then had your presents taken inside. When this transaction was completed, he gave instructions that a letter should be written within a few days and dispatched posthaste to the grand coordinator of Shantung, Hou Meng,³ directing him to release the salt merchant, Wang Ssu-feng, and the others, twelve men in all, who have been incarcerated in Ts'ang-chou. Uncle Chai also sent his respects to you and said that he hoped you would come to the capital yourself for the grand preceptor's birthday on the fifteenth day of the sixth month, because there is something he would like to discuss with you."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this report he was utterly delighted. Lai-pao himself had profited from this trip to the tune of fifty taels of silver from the salt merchant Wang Ssu-feng. Hsi-men Ch'ing then sent him off to report the news to Ch'iao Hung. Who should appear at this juncture but Pen the Fourth and Lai-hsing. When they saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the summerhouse talking to Lai-pao, they waited to one side.

As soon as Lai-pao had gone off to Ch'iao Hung's house, Hsi-men Ch'ing asked Pen the Fourth, "Are you back already from taking care of the cremation?"

Pen the Fourth was too frightened to answer, but Lai-hsing came forward and:

Whispered into his ear in a low voice, thus and so, "Sung Jen showed up at the crematory, laid claim to the corpse, and refused to let it be cremated. His language was so discourteous I would not dare repeat it."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard about this, nothing might have happened, but having heard these words, he became enraged and cursed, "That dead duck of a 'bare stick'! How contemptible can you get!"

Turning immediately to a page boy, he said, "Go fetch my son-in-law to write a note for me."

He dispatched Lai-hsing to deliver the note to the district magistrate, Li Tat'ien, who forthwith deputed two lictors, with a length of rope, to haul Sung Jen before the bench, where he was charged with attempting a shakedown, relying on the corpse of the deceased in order to extort money. Right there in the courtroom he was put in the squeezers and given twenty strokes with the heavy bamboo, so severely that:

Fresh blood flowed copiously down his legs.

He was required to sign a legal recognizance forbidding him to make any further trouble for the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing. The local constable was also ordered to have the crematory workers, in the presence of someone from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, carry out the cremation forthwith and report back to the magistrate.

Sung Jen had been beaten so severely that his two legs were covered with wounds. When he returned home he developed an acute fever, contracted a seasonal ailment, and before a few days had passed:

Alas and alack,

he died. Truly, it was a case of:

A sleepy slugabed encountering the General of the Five Ways;
A cold and hungry demon running into Chung K'uei.⁴

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The greed and corruption of the district magistrate are truly lamentable;
On receipt of gold and silk he is prepared to commit any iniquity.⁵
Because of his daughter, Sung Jen is condemned to tread the road to the shades;
The resentful souls of the victims of injustice pervade the entire yamen.

No sooner had Hsi-men Ch'ing disposed of the case of Sung Hui-lien than he proceeded to get together three hundred taels of silver and engage Silversmith Ku, at the head of a considerable number of other silversmiths, to come to the summerhouse in his garden and create a piece in which four male figurines were depicted holding up a representation of the character for long life in honor of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's birthday. Each of the silver figures in this group was more than a foot high. He also had them manufacture two gold pitchers in the shape of the character for long life and obtained two sets of jade cups in the shape of peaches. It took less than half a month to get everything ready. Hsi-men Ch'ing unpacked the python robes that Lai-wang had had manufactured for him in Hang-chou but was still lacking a bolt of abaca linen and a python robe of light silk. He doled out the money and sent people looking for these items everywhere but was unable to find any of good quality and had to make do with the best they could find.

One day, on the twenty-eighth day of the fifth month, when the birthday presents had been properly packed up, he turned them over to Lai-pao and his manager, Wu Tien-en, and they departed from Ch'ing-ho district and set off for the Eastern Capital.⁶ But no more of this.

Two days later it was the first day of the sixth month, the beginning of the dog days of summer. Truly:

Great heat does not exceed that of the wei and shen days of the sixth month;
Great cold does not exceed that of the ch'ou and yin days of the twelfth month.⁷

The weather was extremely hot. It was that time when:

The "red raven" is at its zenith,
An umbrella of fire suspended in space,
Without half a speck of cloud cover,
Melting rock and liquefying metal.⁸

A poet of yore has left us a poem that describes this heat:

Chu-jung has come from the south, whipping his fiery dragon;
His flaming banners are all ablaze, turning the heavens red.
The sun's wheel is at its zenith, immobilized,
refusing to move;
The myriad nations feel as though they are in a red-hot furnace.
On the Five Peaks all verdure is parched,
the clouds obliterated;
The God of Waves, beneath the sea, is afraid his domain will dry up.
Will that evening ever come when the metallic autumn wind will blow;
And favor us by sweeping away the heat from the world below?⁹

Your narrator would remark that in this world there are three kinds of people who fear the heat, and three kinds of people who do not fear the heat. What are the three kinds of people who fear the heat?

The first kind of people who fear the heat are the farmers in the countryside. Every day they till their fields and tread their dikes, pushing the plow and dragging the harrow. In order to meet the deadlines for the semiannual agricultural taxes, they must relinquish whatever surplus grain is in their storehouses. During the dog days of summer, if there is no rain for their fields, their hearts burn within them as though afire.

The second kind are the merchants who must travel in pursuit of trade. They are away from home for years on end,¹⁰ peddling their safflower and gromwell, their beeswax and breath-sweetening lozenges.¹¹ On their shoulders they bear heavy burdens, with their hands they push cumbersome barrows. As they travel along the road, they become hungrier and hungrier, thirstier and thirstier. Their faces are bathed in sweat and saliva, their clothes are soaked through, and they cannot find so much as an inch of shade. Truly it is rough going.

The third kind are the soldiers on the frontier. Their heads burdened with heavy helmets, their bodies clad in iron mail, when thirsty they lick the blood from their swords, when tired they rest on the pommels of their saddles.¹² They campaign for years on end without being able to return home. Their clothes are infested with lice, their wounds suppurate, and not an unscathed patch of skin remains on their bodies.¹³

These are the three kinds of people who fear the heat. There are also three kinds of people who do not fear the heat.

The first of these are those who dwell within the inner precincts of the imperial palace. By their waterside rotundas and breezy pavilions, serpentine streams form pools and flowing springs make ponds. Large pieces and small pieces of ornamental jade are juxtaposed to objects sculpted out of reversed-pattern rhinoceros horn.¹⁴ By lapis lazuli balustrades are planted exotic fruits and rare flowers. In crystal basins are piled objects of agate and coral. On tables of inlaid crystal are arrayed inkstones from Tuan-ch'i, writing brushes with ivory stems,¹⁵ ink cakes that once belonged to Ts'ang Chieh,¹⁶ and note-paper designed by Ts'ai Yen,¹⁷ as well as crystal brush racks and white jade paperweights. When suffering from ennui, such men compose rhapsodies and indite poems. When affected by drink, they take naps in the southern breeze.

And then there are the nobility and distaff relatives of the imperial house, the members of wealthy households and prominent families. Every day is spent in their "snow caves" and cool pavilions. All day long they occupy their breezy studios and waterside retreats. Their hanging screens are made of raddled "shrimps' whiskers," their bed curtains are fashioned of woven mermaid silk. Jasmine-scented pomanders are suspended in their quarters. On their beds of inlaid mother-of-pearl are spread cool mats of ripple-patterned bamboo and coral pillows adorned with mandarin ducks. Punkahs are everywhere in motion to stir up the air. Ready at hand are basins of ice water in which lie soaking submerged plums and floating melons,¹⁸ red caltrops and snowy lotus roots, bayberries and Chinese olives, apples and water chestnuts. And there are also flowerlike beauties¹⁹ standing by to cool them with their fans.

And then there are the Taoist priests and Ch'an monks in their temples and monasteries, occupying their cloud-encroaching scripture halls and their skyscraping bell towers. In moments of leisure they resort to the abbot's cell to explicate the Way of Nirvana or recite The Scripture of the Yellow Court.²⁰ From time to time they visit their monastic gardens to pluck the peaches of immortality or exotic fruits. When suffering from ennui, they summon their acolytes and strum the zither athwart their knees in the shade of the pines. When affected by drink, they take along their chessboards and chat with their friends in the shade of the willows.

These are the three kinds of people who do not fear the heat. There is a poem that testifies to this:

The red sun blazes as if it would set everything afire;
In the fields below half the crops are withered and scorched.
The hearts of the farmers are like seething caldrons:
While in their belvederes the nobles
ply their fans.²¹

When Hsi-men Ch'ing got up and saw how hot it was, he decided not to go out that day but to stay at home, leaving his hair undone and merely throwing on a tunic,²² in order to avoid the heat. He went to his summerhouse in the garden, the Kingfisher Pavilion, and watched the page boys as they watered the flowers. What should he see, right in front of the Kingfisher Pavilion, but a planter of sweet-smelling daphne in full flower. Hsi-men Ch'ing had the page boy, Lai-an, fetch a small sprinkling can and looked on as he watered it.

At this juncture who should appear but P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh, dressed in their everyday garb of white silver-striped silk blouses and long trailing skirts of honey yellow silk brocade with a drawnwork motif of "phoenixes traversing the flowers." Li P'ing-erh was wearing a vest of scarlet abaca linen and Chin-lien one of pink, both of which were trimmed with purpled gold-spangled edging. Chin-lien was not wearing a formal headdress but had done her hair up into a casual "bag of silk" chignon in the Hang-chou style, fastened in place with a cloud-shaped ornament with kingfisher feather inlays. Two tufts of hair were allowed to escape at either temple, next to which, on the forehead of her powdered face, she had pasted three gold-flecked turquoise beauty patches, which served to further enhance her:

Powdered face and glossy hair,²³
Ruby lips and white teeth.²⁴

The two of them, holding hands and giggling to each other, suddenly arrived on the scene and saw Hsi-men Ch'ing supervising the watering of the flowers.

"So this is where you are," they said, "seeing to the watering of the flowers. Why, you haven't even done your hair yet!"

"Tell a maidservant to go fetch some water," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I can do my hair right here."

"Put your sprinkling can down," said Chin-lien to Lai-an, "and go back to my room. Tell one of the maidservants to bring some water and a comb, and be quick about it. Your father wants to do his hair here."

Lai-an assented and went off on his errand.

Chin-lien noticed the sweet-smelling daphne and was about to pick a blossom to stick in her hair when Hsi-men Ch'ing stopped her, saying, "Hands off, you crazy little oily mouth! I've got a blossom for each of you here."

It so happened that Hsi-men Ch'ing had already plucked a few partly opened blossoms from the sides of the cluster and had put them to soak in a turquoise gallbladder-shaped porcelain vase.

"My child," said Chin-lien with a laugh, "What do you mean plucking all these blossoms for yourself without presenting one to your mother?"

Thereupon, she snatched one of them, before he could give it to her, and stuck it in her hair. Hsi-men Ch'ing presented another one to Li P'ing-erh.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ch'un-mei, carrying a dressing mirror and comb, and Ch'iu-chü, with the water for him to wash his face in.

Hsi-men Ch'ing handed three of the blossoms to Ch'un-mei and instructed her, "Deliver these to Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, and Meng Yü-lou to wear in their hair, and ask the Third Lady to join us. Tell her I'd like to hear her play something for me on the moon guitar."

"Give the one for Meng the Third to me," said Chin-lien. "I'll deliver it to her. You can have Ch'un-mei deliver the ones for the First Lady and Li Chiao-erh and then come back. And give me one more of those blossoms for myself. Since I'm going to the trouble of calling the singing girl for you, I deserve another one."

"You go ahead," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll give it to you when you come back."

"My child, whoever taught you to be so disingenuous?" said Chin-lien. "You think you can trick me into calling Meng the Third for you, and then you won't give me a thing. I won't go. You'll have to give it to me first before I'll go for her."

"You lousy little whore!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Even in something like this you've got to have your finger in the pie."

Thereupon, he gave her another blossom, and Chin-lien stuck it in the hair beside her temple. Only then did she consent to go off to the rear compound, leaving Li P'ing-erh alone with Hsi-men Ch'ing in the Kingfisher Pavilion.

Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that beneath her light silk skirt she was wearing scarlet silk underdrawers that were:

Delicately translucent,²⁵

when she stood in the sunlight, exposing her:

Jade bones and icy flesh.²⁶

Before he knew it, his:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Seeing that:

There was nobody about,²⁷

he neglected to comb his hair, but bending Li P'ing-erh over a cool-surfaced summer bench:

Turned up her beige skirt,

Took down her red drawers, and, stooping over her back, proceeded to:

Poke up the fire on the other side of the mountains.

He kept at it for some time and had not yet ejaculated, as the two of them:

Enjoyed to the full the pleasures of connubial bliss.

Who could have anticipated that P'an Chin-lien did not actually go back to the rear compound to call Yü-lou but went only as far as the postern gate leading out of the garden and then turned over Meng Yü-lou's blossom to Ch'un-mei to deliver for her. She thought for a while and then retraced her steps, silently tiptoeing up to the latticework window of the Kingfisher Pavilion in order to eavesdrop on the events within. She continued to eavesdrop for some time and could tell that the two of them inside were just in the thick of things.

"Dear heart," she overheard Hsi-men Ch'ing saying to Li P'ing-erh, "Your daddy doesn't love anything else so much as this delectable white bottom of yours. Today you're letting your daddy enjoy it to the full."

After some time, she heard Li P'ing-erh say in a low voice, "My own daddy! Don't bang away at me quite so hard. I'm feeling poorly in my present condition. You were a little too rough with me the last time and left me with a pain in the lower abdomen that has only begun to get better in the last few days."

"What do you mean," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "when you say you're feeling poorly in your present condition?"

"I won't keep you in the dark any longer," said Li P'ing-erh. "I'm expecting and am already approaching my final month of pregnancy. So please go a little easy with me."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words he was utterly delighted and said, "Dear heart! Why didn't you tell me before? If that's the way it is, your daddy will be content to make only a casual game of it. Thereupon:

When pleasure reaches its height passions are intense;

Responding to her with abandon,²⁸

he gripped her around the hips with both hands and:

Ejaculated like a geyser.²⁹

The woman, from underneath, arched her hips, the better to receive his semen.

Some time elapsed, during which all that could be heard was Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Panting and puffing,
and the woman:

Cooing softly like an oriole.

All of this was so clearly overheard by Chin-lien from her vantage point outside the window that she might well have ejaculated:

"Is it not delightful?"

While she was still listening, who should appear but Meng Yü-lou, who suddenly arrived from the rear compound and said, "Slavey Five, what are you doing here?"

Chin-lien silenced her with a negative wave of the hand, and the two of them then proceeded to walk into the summerhouse together. Hsi-men Ch'ing was so flustered he hardly knew what to do with himself.

"I've been gone half the day," Chin-lien said to him, "and what have you been up to? It seems you haven't even combed your hair or washed your face yet."

"I've been waiting for a maidservant to bring the jasmine soap," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so I could wash my face."

"I'd just be wasting my breath on you," said Chin-lien. "You're so insistent on having that particular soap for your ablutions, it's no wonder your face has been scrubbed even whiter than a certain person's bottom."

Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this remark, but chose to ignore it.

Later, after he had done his hair and washed his face, he sat down with Yü-lou, and asked, "What have you been up to in the rear compound? Did you bring the moon guitar with you?"

"I've been in the master suite," said Yü-lou, "stringing pearls and other ornaments for Elder Sister to wear in her hair when she goes to the tea-present ceremony for her nephew Wu Shun-ch'en's bride-to-be, Third Sister Cheng, a few days from now.³⁰ Ch'un-mei has gone to fetch the moon guitar."

Before long, Ch'un-mei showed up and said, "I've delivered the blossoms to the First Lady and the Second Lady and they've acknowledged them."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then told her to prepare some wine for them.

It was not long before:

In basins of ice water there lay soaking,
Submerged plums and floating melons;
In cool pavilions he indulged himself,
Cuddling the red and hugging the turquoise.³¹

"Why don't you send Ch'un-mei to invite Elder Sister to join us?" said Yü-lou.

"She doesn't like to drink," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There's no point in inviting her."

The four of them then settled down to make a party of it. Hsi-men Ch'ing sat in the place of honor, and the three women ranged themselves to either side. Truly, it is a case of:

The finest vintage poured from the flagon,
The rarest delicacies graced the platter.

P'an Chin-lien refused to sit on her chair but sat down on a pea-green cool porcelain taboret instead.

"Sister Five," said Meng Yü-lou, "come over and sit on this chair. I'm afraid that cool taboret may give you a chill."

"It doesn't matter," said Chin-lien. "Old as I am, and without any fetus to chill, what is there to worry about?"

After a while, when:

Three rounds of wine had been consumed,

Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'un-mei to fetch the moon guitar for Yü-lou to play and the p'i-p'a for Chin-lien and said, "You two sing me the song suite that begins with the tune 'Cries of the Wild Geese in Flight' and opens with the words:

The Red Emperor holds sway, ablaze
in the Great Void."³²

Chin-lien refused, saying, "My child, whoever taught you to be so disingenuous? If we sing, the two of you will have nothing to do but enjoy yourselves. I won't do it, unless Sister Li also has an instrument to play."

"But she doesn't know how to play anything," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"If she can't play," said Chin-lien, "let her stand to one side and keep time with the clappers."

"This little whore!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All she ever does is pick nits."

He instructed Ch'un-mei to go fetch a pair of red ivory clappers and had Li P'ing-erh agree to hold them in her hand.

Then the two musicians, with Yü-lou's maidservant, Hsiu-ch'un, standing by to cool them with her fan:

Deftly extended their slender fingers,
Gently strummed the silken strings, and sang together, to the tune "Cries of the Wild Geese in Flight":

The Red Emperor holds sway, ablaze
in the Great Void.

When they had finished singing, Hsi-men Ch'ing presented each of them with a cup of wine.

As the party continued, P'an Chin-lien made herself conspicuous by the assiduity with which she gulped down ice water and devoured fresh fruit.

"Sister Five," protested Yü-lou, "how come you're consuming only fresh cold things today?"

"Old as I am," laughed Chin-lien, "there's nothing of any consequence going on in my belly, so why should I worry about eating cold or glutinous things?"

This so embarrassed Li P'ing-erh that her face became a patchwork of red and white blotches.

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave Chin-lien a look and said, "You little whore! All you ever do is talk nonsense."

"You've got too much to say yourself," said Chin-lien. "After all, I'm only like:

The bedridden old woman trying to eat cured meat:
I can only cope with a single shred at a time.

What's it to you, anyway?"

As they continued drinking, all of a sudden:
Clouds massed in the southeast,
Fog obscured the northwest.³³
Thunder rumbled indistinctly,³⁴ and A heavy downpour occurred, as a result of which the flowers and vegetation in front of the summerhouse were completely soaked. Truly:
The waters of the Yangtze, Yellow, Huai, and Chi Rivers
are newly augmented;
The emerald bamboo and the red pomegranate blossoms are rendered pristine.³⁵
Before long the rain stopped, the remnant of a rainbow hung suspended in the distant sky, and a glimpse of the sun reappeared in the west. Truly, it is a case of:
The passing of a fine rain imparts a sheen to the azure promontory;
The cooling of an evening breeze enhances the purity of the courtyard.
Who should appear at this juncture but Hsiao-yü, who came out from the rear compound looking for Meng Yü-lou.
“Elder Sister wants my help,” Yü-lou explained. “There are still some pearls and ornaments that need to be strung. I’d better go or she’ll be annoyed with me.”
“The two of us can go together,” said Li P’ing-erh. “I want to see how Elder Sister is doing with the stringing of the pearls and ornaments too.”
“Let’s give you a send-off,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.
Thereupon, he picked up the moon guitar and gave it to Yü-lou to play while he clapped his hands in accompaniment as they all sang together, to the tune “Liang-chou Prelude”:

As evening falls, rain passes over the southern pavilion,
Disordering the rouged surface of the pond.
Spring thunder rumbles indistinctly;
The rain is over and the clouds disperse.³⁶
For ten li, the fragrance of lotus blossoms pervades the senses;
The new moon is a solitary hook.
The beauty of this scene is infinite.
Emerging from the orchid-scented water,
Her evening makeup mussed,
It is dusk in the secluded courtyard, and she is too languid to sleep.

Chorus:

Sing “Golden Threads,”³⁷
Drain “azure funnels,”³⁸
By icy mountains and snowy balustrades,
prepare to feast.
How many people live to see
such times of peace?

They continued to sing to the same tune with a modified opening:

In the shade of the willows, the stridulation of the new cicada resounds, Flittering fireflies become visible as they invade the courtyard.
Somewhere the song of caltrop gatherers is heard,
Returning at evening in their painted boats.
Behold, the stars of the “Jade Rope” hang low,³⁹

Within red gates there is no sound.⁴⁰
This scene is even more to be envied.
Rising, he takes her by the silk-white hand,⁴¹
And straightens her coiffure.
The moon shines on the gauze-curtained bedstead,
but they are not yet asleep.

Chorus:

Sing "Golden Threads," Drain "azure funnels,"
By icy mountains and snowy balustrades,
prepare to feast.
How many people live to see
such times of peace?

They continued to sing to the tune "Higher Ever Higher":

Amid the ripples, mandarin ducks play,⁴²
Overturning the green lotus leaves;
Pure fragrance is wafted abroad as jeweled drops spatter.
A perfumed breeze fans,
The banks of the fragrant pond,
Beside the secluded pavilion.
Sitting here, quite unawares, one's spirits are refreshed.
What need is there for Gardens of Paradise or Isles of the Blest?

Chorus:

We only fear the west wind will once more
surprise us with autumn;
Before we know it, all unobserved, the flowing years have passed.⁴³

As they sang, before they knew it, they had arrived at the postern gate. Meng Yü-lou handed her moon guitar to Ch'un-mei and went back to the rear compound with Li P'ing-erh.

"Meng the Third," P'an Chin-lien called after her, "wait for me. I'm coming too."

She was about to abandon Hsi-men Ch'ing and go with the others, when he reached out and grabbed her with one hand, saying, "Little oily mouth, you may be slippery, but I'm not going to let you get away."

He gave her such a tug as he spoke that it was a wonder she didn't lose her footing.

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" said the woman. "I'm fully dressed. Haven't you seen enough of my arm by now? Tiresome child! The two of them are both gone. I wonder what you want to keep me around for."

"Let's get some wine," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and have a game of pitch-pot⁴⁴ here under the T'ai-hu rockery, just for the fun of it. Come, share three cups with me."

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" the woman exclaimed. "If we're going to play at pitch-pot, let's do it in the pavilion. Why do it here, of all places? If you don't believe me, just try it out on that little piece, Ch'un-mei. She won't even fetch the wine for you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'un-mei to run this errand for them, and Ch'un-mei relinquished the moon guitar to her mistress and went nonchalantly off without more ado.

The woman took the moon guitar in her hand and strummed at it a while, saying, "I've had Meng the Third teach me a few lines."

As she was playing she noticed that beside the T'ai-hu rockery there was a pomegranate blossom in full bloom after the rain.

Playfully plucking a sprig, she stuck it on one side of her cloudy locks,⁴⁵ saying:

"Not having had a bite for three days,
I've got flowers before my eyes."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he stepped forward and, hoisting her two tiny golden lotuses into the air, threatened mischievously, "You little whore! If I didn't care for the opinion of the world, I'd fuck you to death."

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" the woman retorted. "Cut the kidding. Wait till I get rid of this moon guitar."

Thereupon, she casually leaned the moon guitar against the side of the raised flower bed and said, "My child, the more demanding you get, the less likely you are to succeed. Just now you've been off screwing around with Li P'ing-erh and don't know how to cover your embarrassment. What do you want to pester me for?"

"You crazy slave!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you ever do is talk nonsense. Who's been up to anything with her?"

"My child," the woman said:

"No matter what you do, you cannot deceive the local tutelary god.

Who do you think your mother is, that you should try to deceive me? While I was off delivering that blossom in the rear compound, those were fine doings the two of you were up to."

"You crazy little whore!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Cut the nonsense."

Thereupon, bending her down beneath the flower bed, he gave her a kiss.

The woman promptly responded by sticking her tongue into his mouth.

"If you call me 'My own daddy,' " said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll forgive you and let you up."

The woman found him to be too much for her and said, "My own daddy!

I'm not the one you're after, so what are you pestering me for?"

As for the two of them, truly:

Inspired by sunshine, the oriole's tongue displays its virtuosity;
Moistened with rain, the flowery branch is more than ever enticing.⁴⁶

After the two of them had toyed with each other for a while, the woman said, "Why don't we go over by the grape arbor and play our game of pitch-pot there. Come on, let's go."

Thereupon, balancing the moon guitar on one arm as she walked, she played the concluding song to the suite that begins with "Liang-chou Prelude," to the tune "Higher Ever Higher":

On this clear evening, hearts are light;
it is gloriously cool;
Moonlight bathes the Pure Empty Hall on the Jasper Terrace.⁴⁷
Immortal lovers,
Spread tortoiseshell mats,
For yet another revel.
Let the silver arrows of the jade clepsydra press forward as they may,
The sounds of pipe and song will continue in the Crystal Palace.⁴⁸

Chorus:

We only fear the west wind will once more
surprise us with autumn;
Before we know it, all unobserved, the flowing years have passed.

Coda:

Light and darkness alternate swiftly,
like lightning flashes;
Even this wonderful evening is, alas,
drawing to its end.
Risk everything for pleasure, as song and laughter resound.⁴⁹

Day after day, a feast among the flowers;
Night after night, jade damsels as companions.
How long a span of life are we allotted?

What are we to do if not enjoy it?⁵⁰

The two of them walked along shoulder to shoulder. Before long they had made their way around the azure pool, skirted the banksia rose trellis, passed in front of the Kingfisher Pavilion, and arrived at the grape arbor. They opened their eyes wide and took a good look and, truly, it was a fine grape arbor. Behold:

On all sides are carved balustrades and stone masonry;
On every hand the emerald leaves
are densely massed.
Glaucous hues greet the eyes,
A thousand clusters of purple pellets
dangle like beaded tassels;
Autumn scents assail the nostrils,
Ten thousand banks of green cloud trail brocaded sashes.
Suspended “mare teats”:⁵¹
These crystal spheres contain carnelian juice;
Tumbling green pearls:
The gilded arbor is decked with emerald drapes.
These species have been transplanted from the Western Regions;
Their fragrance has been cultivated in the Sweet Springs Palace.⁵²

Truly:

In all four seasons it is embellished by rare blossoms on flowering trees,
The bright moon and clear breeze cannot be purchased at any price.⁵³

It so happened that when the two of them arrived underneath the grape arbor, they found that four cool porcelain taborets had been placed there with a bronze vessel for the game of pitch-pot to one side. Chin-lien leaned the moon guitar against one of the taborets and started to play pitch-pot with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

At this juncture, what should they see in the distance but Ch'un-mei bringing the wine and Ch'iu-chü totting a box of delicacies, with a bowl of iced fruit on top of it.

“You little piece!” the woman exclaimed. “You went off in a huff just a minute ago. How come, now, you’re delivering the goods after all?”

“We’ve been looking all over the place for you,” Ch'un-mei complained. “Who could have anticipated that you’d sneak over here?”

Ch'iu-chü put down her burden and left.

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened the box and found it divided into eight compartments with a different delicacy in each. One compartment contained goose gizzards and goose feet preserved in a fermented mash. One contained shreds of cured meat that had been pressed into laminated sheets and bundled together like the pages of a document. One contained preserved whitebait flavored with osmanthus. One contained split sun-dried pullet breasts and wings. One contained fresh lotus seeds. One contained fresh walnut meats. One contained fresh caltrops. And one contained fresh water chestnuts. There were also a small silver flagon of grape wine⁵⁴ with a spout shaped like the crop on the neck of a bird, two tiny gold cups in the shape of lotus seedpods, and two pairs of ivory chopsticks.

When these things had been set out on a low cool-surfaced table, Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman sat down across from each other and continued to amuse themselves at pitch-pot. They played the variations called “Crossing the Bridge,” “Inserting the Arrow Upside Down,” “A Pair of Wild Geese in Flight,” “Passing the Examinations and Qualifying for Office,” “The Two Ch'iao Sisters Read a Book,”⁵⁵ “Yang Kuei-fei Takes a Spring Nap,” “The Black Dragon Penetrates the Cave,” and “Rolling the Pearl Curtain Bottom Side Up.”⁵⁶

By the time they had played ten games or more, the woman had become quite drunk. Before she knew it:

Peach blossoms had bloomed upon her cheeks, and Amorous glances escaped the corners of her eyes.

Hsi-men Ch'ing still wanted to drink some medicated Five Spice Wine⁵⁷ and sent Ch'un-mei to fetch it.

“Little oily mouth,” Chin-lien said, “please do me another favor while you’re at it. Go to my room and bring a cool bamboo bed mat and a pillow. I’m completely pooped and would like to lie down here for a while.”

Deliberately affecting the coquetry of a spoiled child, Ch'un-mei said, “Enough is enough! Haven’t I already got my hands full with all these errands? Who’s got the energy to go fetch anything for you too?”

“If you don’t want to do it,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “just tell Ch'iu-chü to bring them here while you go after the wine.”

Ch'un-mei went off, shaking her head as she went.

After what seemed like half a day, Ch'iu-chü was the first to appear, holding a cool bamboo bed mat, a pillow, and a quilt in her arms.

"Put the bedding down," the woman instructed her, "and latch the garden gate on your way out. Then go look after the room, and don't come back unless I call for you."

Ch'iu-chü nodded in assent, put down the bedding, and went off straightaway.

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon stood up, took off his jade-colored silk tunic, hung it over the balustrade, and went over under the flower trellis beside the juniper hedge on the west side of the peony bed to relieve himself.

By the time he returned, the woman had already unrolled the cool bamboo mat and positioned the pillow and quilt to her satisfaction. She had stripped herself so that not a stitch of silk remained on her body, above or below, and was reclining face-up on the mat, wearing scarlet shoes on her feet, and cooling herself with a white silk fan that she held in her hand.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came back and beheld this sight, how could it help but:

Stimulate his lecherous desires?

Thereupon, exhilarated by the wine, he took off his own clothes, above and below, sat down on a cool porcelain taboret, and started out by titillating her clitoris with his toe. He titillated it to such effect that her vaginal fluids began to flow, like a snail secreting its slime.⁵⁸ He then took off the woman's red embroidered shoes, unwound her foot bindings, and amused himself by using them to suspend her two feet from the grape arbor overhead, so that she looked just like "A Golden Dragon Extending Its Claws." As a result:

Her vaginal orifice was greatly distended,

Her "Red Hook" was completely exposed, and

Her "Chicken Tongue" protruded from within.

Hsi-men Ch'ing started out by stooping over her and placing his jade chowrie handle⁵⁹ inside the mouth of her vagina,⁶⁰ thus demonstrating the position known as "Inserting the Arrow Upside Down." Supporting himself with one hand on her pillow, he proceeded to thrust with all his strength. He continued to thrust until her vaginal secretions flowed uninterruptedly, making a sound like a school of loaches plunging through the mud.⁶¹ The woman, from underneath, inarticulately called out, "Daddy!" unceasingly.

Just as they were approaching the height of bliss, who should appear but Ch'un-mei, who had come with the heated wine. As soon as she saw what was happening, she put down the wine flagon and fled straight to the top of the artificial hill, the highest point in the garden, where she leaned over a chess table in the Cloud Repose Pavilion and toyed with the chess pieces.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing looked up and saw where she had gone, he beckoned to her with his hand but was unable to induce her to come down.

"Little oily mouth!" he exclaimed. "If I can't get you down here, I might as well give up."

Thereupon, abandoning the woman, he set off in pursuit, but by the time he had run up the stone steps in great strides, all the way to the pavilion on the summit, Ch'un-mei had come down by way of a winding "sheep's-gut" path on the right side of the hill, passed through the whitewashed "snow cave" of Hidden Spring Grotto, and arrived at the Dripping Emerald Cavern halfway down in the "waist" of the hill, where the flowering vegetation was at its thickest.

Just as she was in the act of hiding there, Hsi-men Ch'ing unexpectedly caught sight of her and, embracing her around the waist as she stood in the shadows, said, "Little oily mouth! I've got you after all."

He then lightly picked her up and carried her down to the grape arbor where, saying with a laugh, "You must have a cup of wine," he proceeded to sit her down on his lap and the two of them passed a cup of it back and forth between them.

When Ch'un-mei saw that the woman's two feet were suspended from the arbor, she said, "What do the two of you think you're up to? In broad daylight too! If anyone should happen along and catch you in the act it would look most unbecoming."

"Was the postern gate closed or not?"⁶² Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"I put the latch on it when I came in," said Ch'un-mei.

"Little oily mouth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can look on as I play a game of 'pitching into the fleshly pot.' This variation is called 'Shooting the Silver Goose with a Golden Pellet.' You watch; for every pellet that hits the target I'll drink a cup of wine."

Thereupon, he reached into the bowl of ice water for a jade-yellow "imperial damson" plum⁶³ and pitched it at the orifice of the woman's vagina. He pitched three of these in a row and each of them struck the clitoris. Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly downed three cups of the medicated Five Spice Wine. He also had Ch'un-mei pour a cup of wine and give it to the woman to drink.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then inserted a damson plum into the woman's vagina and neither removed it nor proceeded to any further action, which had the effect of arousing the woman until:

Her amorous desires were in a tumult, and

Her vaginal fluids began to overflow, but she was too embarrassed to call out. Instead:

Her starry eyes grew dim, and

Her four limbs lay inert upon pillow and mat.⁶⁴

Finally she called out:

Her oriole's voice all aquaver,

"What a cruel lover! You'll do me to death yet."

Hsi-men Ch'ing paid no attention to her but told Ch'un-mei to stand by and cool him with a fan as he devoted himself to the wine. As the cups passed back and forth, he continued to drink until he ended up reclining faceup on a "Drunken Old Gentleman's" lounge chair and fell fast asleep.

As soon as Ch'un-mei saw that he was in a drunken stupor, she came over to make sure by giving him an experimental caress and then disappeared in a cloud of dust through the whitewashed "snow cave" on her way back to the rear compound. She heard someone calling to get in through the postern gate, and when she opened it, it turned out to be Li P'ing-erh.

No one disturbed Hsi-men Ch'ing's nap, and he slept for about two hours before waking up. When he opened his eyes he saw that the woman's two fresh white legs were still splayed to either side as they hung suspended from the grape arbor overhead.

Unable to restrain his lust,⁶⁵

he noticed that Ch'un-mei was no longer in evidence and, turning to the woman, said, "All right, I'll let you have it now."

Thereupon, he first fished the damson plum out of her vagina and made the woman eat it. Then he sat down on a pillow, pulled the bag of sexual implements out of the wallet attached to his silk jacket, and fastened in place first the silver clasp and then the sulfur-imbrued ring.⁶⁶

At first he only dallied back and forth in the mouth of her vagina, refusing to penetrate deeply, which had the effect of arousing the woman until she arched her back in response to his every movement, while crying out unceasingly, "Daddy, hurry up and get inside! You're driving this whore of yours crazy! I know you're upset with me on account of Li P'ing-erh and are deliberately pulling out the stops to teach me a lesson. After what you've put me through today, I won't dare defy you anymore."

"You little whore," laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "as long as you understand what's what, we can negotiate the better."⁶⁷

Thereupon, after titillating her clitoris a little further, he withdrew his organ, opened the bag from his wallet, picked out a glob of the aphrodisiac ointment called "Amorous Cries of Boudoir Beauties"⁶⁸ with his finger and thumb, and, daubing it in the mouth of his urethra, plunged the object into her vagina and gave a few thrusts with it. In no time at all his organ became proud and firm.

P'an Chin-lien Engages in a Drunken Orgy under the Grape Arbor

Its protuberances swelled and its head sprang up, as it became engorged with rage. Hsi-men Ch'ing:
 Bent his head the better to observe,
 The coming and going, thrusting and retraction;⁶⁹
 Savoring the sight as it went in and out.⁷⁰

As the woman lay beside the pillow:

Her starry eyes grew dim, and
 She moaned incessantly, inarticulately calling out, "My big-dicked daddy! What are you up to? Go all the way in and be done with it. The itch in the clitoris of the cunt of this whore of yours has entered into the marrow of her bones. Take pity on me and let me off for now."

In the mouth of this whore no expression, no matter how unspeakably obscene, was left unsaid.

As for Hsi-men Ch'ing, once he got started he was good for three or four hundred thrusts at a time. Supporting himself facedown on the pillow and mat with both hands, arching his back and exerting all his strength, responding to her movements and raising himself to the task, he retracted his organ as far as its neck and plunged it in all the way up to the root another hundred times or so.⁷¹ The woman, from underneath, used a napkin to wipe away her vaginal secretions, but they continued to flow, as a result of which the mat was completely soaked. Hsi-men Ch'ing alternately submerged and exposed the knob of his glans, moving back and forth and teasing her without mercy.

Turning to the woman, he said, "I'm going to demonstrate the position known as 'The Old Monk Rings the Dinner Bell.'"

All of a sudden, he arched his back and lunged forward, thrusting himself inside her until the tip of his organ penetrated all the way to her cervix. The cervix is the innermost recess of the vaginal chamber and contains a fleshy growth like the budding pistil of a flower. When the glans of his penis penetrates to this point without being deflected, the man will feel a melting sensation the pleasure of which is indescribable.⁷²

The woman was hurt and responded with a sudden upward buck of her body, as a result of which, what could be heard but a cracking sound as the sulfur-imbrued ring broke inside her. As for the woman:

Her eyes dimmed, her respiration slowed,
The sound of her breathing was barely audible,
The tip of her tongue became ice-cold, and
Her four limbs lay inert upon the mat.⁷³

Hsi-men Ch'ing became alarmed and hastily unfastened the foot bindings by which her feet were suspended from the arbor. He then fished the sulfur-imbrued ring and the "titillating bell" out of her vagina and broke them in two.

Thereupon, he helped the woman into a sitting position, and it was only after what seemed like half a day that:

Her starry eyes flashed open with surprise,⁷⁴ and she gradually came back to her senses.

She then turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, with coquettish tears,⁷⁵ "My own daddy! How could you be so cruel to me today? You almost cost me my life. From now on you must never do anything like that again.

It would be no laughing matter.

As it is:

My head feels so dizzy,
I hardly know where I am."⁷⁶

Noticing that the sun was already sinking in the west, Hsi-men Ch'ing hastily helped her on with her clothes and called for Ch'un-mei and Ch'iu-chü to put away the bedding and help him get her back to her room.

Ch'un-mei returned to the garden to oversee Ch'iu-chü as she cleared up the tableware from the feast. Just as she was about to close the garden gate, the head servant Lai-chao's son, Little Iron Rod, came scrambling out from underneath the flower trellis and pestered her for some fruit to eat.

"Where did you come from, you little jailbird?" said Ch'un-mei, giving him a few damson plums and peaches. "Your father's drunk. Hadn't you better get back to the front of the compound? If he sees you, I fear, you're likely to get a beating."

The little monkey took the fruit and went off straightaway. Ch'un-mei closed the garden gate and then went back to the room where she helped Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman as they:

Got into bed and prepared to sleep.

But no more of this. Truly:

In the morning he attends feasts in Golden Valley,⁷⁷

In the evening he favors beauties in ornate houses.

But do not consider these to be occasions for joy,

Time's flowing light only chases the sunset clouds.⁷⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 28

CH'EN CHING-CHI TEASES CHIN-LIEN ABOUT A SHOE; HSI-MEN CH'ING ANGRILY BEATS LITTLE IRON ROD

In tempestuous surroundings it is hard to maintain one's footing;
In one's way of coping with the world do not be too demanding.¹
Everything that happens goes wrong on account of haste;
One's heart should ever seek to find contentment in quietude.
Where the road is level one can proceed in greater safety;
When people's feelings are constant they will withstand scrutiny.
Just as it seems that, first to last,
there is nothing to regret;
No sooner are the branches formed than they begin to proliferate.²

THE STORY GOES that after Hsi-men Ch'ing had helped the woman into her room he took off his own clothes, above and below, wearing nothing but a short undershirt of thin floss silk and leaving the rest of his body stark naked. The woman wore nothing but a bodice of thin red silk. The two of them sat down:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh;
Refilled their empty cups, and Resumed drinking the fragrant wine.

Putting an arm around her powdered neck, Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded to drink with her, passing the same cup back and forth between them.

They could not have been more affectionate.

Looking at the woman out of the corner of his eye, he saw that:

Her cloudy locks were somewhat askew,³
Her creamy breasts were half exposed,⁴
Her captivating eyes were all a blur, so that She resembled a drunken Yang Kuei-fei.

With her slender fingers she toyed uninterruptedly with the organ that lay between his loins until:

The organ started up in response.⁵

It still had the silver clasp fastened around it, but, limp, flaccid, and limber:

It was tumid and long.⁶

"Are you still fooling around with him?" Hsi-men Ch'ing joked. "It's all your fault, earlier, for scaring him into such a dumbstruck fit."

"What do you mean by 'a dumbstruck fit'?" the woman asked.

"If he's not having a dumbstruck fit," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how come he's so flaccid and feverish that he can't even stand up for himself? You'd better get down on your knees and see what a little coaxing will do."

The woman gave him a laughing glance and then, squatting down and pillowing her head on one of his thighs, proceeded to tie the waist-string from his underpants around the base of his organ.

Taking it in her hand, she addressed it, saying, "You rascal, you! Just a little while ago you were so heady and wide-eyed you made me dizzy, and now you pretend to be having a dumbstruck fit and play dead."

After she had manipulated it for a while, she laid it against her powdered cheek and brushed it back and forth for some time before putting it in her mouth and sucking it.⁷ She then proceeded to explore the mouth of his urethra with the tip of her tongue, and in no time at all his organ became engorged with rage.

In the bursting melon-head the sunken eye grows round;
Trailing its side whiskers the body swells itself erect.⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat up on the pillow and ordered the woman to remain on all fours inside the gauze mosquito netting and suck away:

In order to augment his pleasure.⁹

Before long:

His lewd excitement was rekindled,¹⁰ and he engaged her in intercourse another time.

The woman pled with him, saying, "Daddy, let me off for now! Do you really mean to pester me again?"

That night the two of them:

Indulged their lusts without restraint.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The battle at its height, joy reaches its zenith,
the clouds and rain disperse.

Her captivating eyes are all a blur.

Holding the jade stalk in her hand, it remains as hard as ever.

She pleads with her talented gentleman,

"Take it easy just a bit!"

Urging each other to drain the golden cup to the dregs,¹¹

Both of them are passionate, "half drunk, half crazed."

Her snow-white jade body is visible through the bed curtains;¹²

Her mouth is like a cherry, her fingers are like reeds.

A single rivulet flows between them,

each drop distinct;

Their mutual feelings are enmeshed,¹³

deluded by lust.

Tossed first this way and then that,

fish nibble at the algae;

Slowly advancing and lightly retreating,

the cat devours the chick.

So long as the "divine turtle" does not disgorge

the water of its sweet spring;

How can the Goddess of the Moon be induced to temporarily disengage.

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day Hsi-men Ch'ing went out, and it was almost lunchtime before the woman got up. Taking off the pair of sleeping shoes she had on, she looked around for the pair of red ones she had worn the day before:

Trying first this and then that,

but was unable to find one of them.

She asked Ch'un-mei about it, and she said, "Yesterday, when Father and I helped you inside, it was Ch'iu-chü who brought in your bedding."

The woman called for Ch'iu-chü and asked her about it.

"Yesterday," Ch'iu-chü said, "I didn't see you wearing any shoes when you came in."

"What rubbish!" the woman said. "If I wasn't wearing any shoes when I came in, do you mean to say that I came in barefooted?"

"Mother," said Ch'iu-chü, "if you had your shoes on, why aren't they here in the house?"

"You lousy slave!" the woman cursed at her, "still playing the innocent, are you? But if it is here in the house, you'd better give it a thorough going over."

Ch'iu-chü searched everywhere, in all three rooms, on top of the beds and under the beds, but was unable to come up with the missing shoe.

"It seems this house of mine is haunted," said the woman. "Some demon has made off with this shoe of mine, I suppose. If you can't even keep track of the shoes I wear on my feet, what do I need a slave like you in the house for, anyway?"

"Maybe you've just forgotten," said Ch'iu-chü, "that you left it somewhere in the garden, and didn't have it on when you came in."

"No doubt I was screwed silly!" the woman said, "And didn't even know whether I had my shoes on my feet or not."

Then she called for Ch'un-mei and said, "Take this lousy slave into the garden and have her conduct a search. If she comes up with it, that will be that; but if she fails to come up with my shoe, make her kneel down in the courtyard with a stone balanced on her head.”

Ch’un-mei escorted her all over the garden, including the vicinity of the grape arbor, but, search as she would, there was not a shoe to be found. Truly:

It was just as if one of the six Ting gods¹⁴ had stolen it away;
Amid the reed catkins, by bright moonlight,
it was hard to find.¹⁵

After searching the entire garden, they returned empty-handed.

Ch’un-mei mocked her, saying, “You slave, you’re in the same pickle now as:

The go-between who lost her way: you’ve no occasion to speak; or Dame Wang who sold her grindstone: you’ve no way to grind your axe.”¹⁶

“It’s uncanny,” said Ch’iu-chü. “Who could have made off with Mother’s shoe? I didn’t see her wearing any shoes when she came in. I wouldn’t be surprised if when you opened the garden gate yesterday you let someone in who picked up Mother’s shoe.”

Ch’un-mei responded by spitting a thick glob of saliva in her face and cursing at her, “You lousy slave! You’ve been seeing things. And now you’re trying to drag me into it. When the Sixth Lady called to open the gate, I shouldn’t have opened it, I suppose! But you would have it that I let someone in. It was you who brought in her bedding and didn’t check things out properly, and you still have the nerve to shoot your mouth off.”

Ch’un-mei then escorted Ch’iu-chü back to the house and reported to her mistress, “She didn’t find the shoe.”

The woman told her to take her out to the courtyard and make her kneel down there.

Ch’iu-chü started to cry, saying, “Let me go make another search of the garden. If I fail to find it this time, Mother can beat me if she likes.”

“Don’t you believe her,” said Ch’un-mei. “The garden grounds have been swept as clean as can be. Even a needle could have been found there. What chance is there of turning up a shoe?”

“Wait till I fail to find it,” said Ch’iu-chü, “and then let mother beat me. Why do you have to keep on wagging your tongue on the sidelines?”

“All right,” the woman said to Ch’un-mei. “You go along with this slave and see where she goes to look for it.”

Ch’un-mei once again escorted her on a round of the garden, including the “snow caves” underneath the artificial hill, the flower beds, and the juniper hedge, but it was not to be found. Ch’iu-chü began to panic, and Ch’un-mei gave her a couple of boxes on the ear and started to drag her back to confront her mistress.

“There’s still that other ‘snow cave’ where we haven’t looked yet,” said Ch’iu-chü.

“You mean the Hidden Spring Grotto?” said Ch’un-mei. “That’s Father’s hideaway. And besides, Mother hasn’t been in there for some time now. I’ll watch while you take a look, but if you don’t come up with anything I’ll have something further to say to you.”

Thereupon, she escorted her into the whitewashed “snow cave” of the Hidden Spring Grotto. There was a couch facing the door with an incense table beside it, but Ch’iu-chü found nothing there and began to rummage in Hsi-men Ch’ing’s letter case.

“That letter case is where Father keeps his calling cards and stationery,” said Ch’un-mei. “How would Mother’s shoe get in there? You’re just up to your tricks, playing for time. If you muss everything up that way and he ever finds out about it, there’ll be another ruckus for sure. You splay-legged whore, you’re just asking for it.”

After some time, lo and behold, Ch’iu-chü exclaimed, “Isn’t this Mother’s shoe? It’s wrapped up in a paper bag together with some sticks of incense and lysimachia.”

She took it out and showed it to Ch’un-mei, saying, “How is it that I’ve come up with Mother’s shoe after all? And just now you were inciting her to beat me.”

Ch’un-mei looked at it and, sure enough, it was a scarlet flat-soled shoe.

“If it really is Mother’s,” she said, “how did it ever get into this letter case? It’s very strange indeed.”

Thereupon, they went back to see their mistress.

“So you have my shoe, do you?” the woman asked. “Where did it turn out to be?”

“It was in a letter case in Father’s hideaway in the Hidden Spring Grotto,” said Ch’un-mei, “that we found it. It was in with his calling cards and stationery, wrapped up together with some lysimachia and benzoin.”

The woman took it in her hand and then picked up her other shoe to compare with it. They were both embroidered shoes of scarlet silk, figured with flowers from each of the four seasons and the symbolic representations of the “eight treasures,” with flat, white satin soles, green heel lifts, and blue hook and eye fastenings. Only the chain stitching of the two shoes was slightly different. One was chain stitched with sand-green thread, and the other with turquoise-blue thread. Without careful scrutiny they could not have been told apart.

The woman tried them on her feet to test the fit and found that the newly discovered shoe was slightly tighter than the old one. Only then did she realize that it must have belonged to Lai-wang’s wife, Sung Hui-lien.

“Who knows when,” she thought to herself, “she must have given it to that lousy ruffian of ours. He didn’t have the nerve to bring it into the house so he surreptitiously hid it there. How could he have anticipated that it would be turned up by this slave?"

After looking at it for a while, she said, "This is not my shoe. You slave, you'd better get out there right away and kneel down as you've been told."

Turning to Ch'un-mei, she said, "Find a stone and make her balance it on her head."

Ch'iu-chü started to cry, saying, "If it isn't Mother's shoe, whose shoe is it? Even though I found the shoe for you, you still intend to beat me. If I'd been unable to find it, who knows what a beating I would have had."

"Hold your tongue, you lousy slave!" the woman cursed at her.

Ch'un-mei accordingly lifted up a large stone and balanced it on top of Ch'iu-chü's head.

The woman then changed into another pair of shoes and, feeling that the room was too hot, told Ch'un-mei to take her dressing mirror up to the Flower-viewing Tower so she could do her hair there. After doing her hair she intended to give Ch'iu-chü a beating. But no more of this.

To resume our story, that morning Ch'en Ching-chi had come in from the pawnshop to look for some clothing. When he got to the postern gate leading into the flower garden he encountered Little Iron Rod, who was playing there.

Seeing that Ch'en Ching-chi was carrying a pair of silver hairnet rings in his hand, the youngster asked, "Uncle, what's that you've got there? Let me have them to play with."

"This is a pair of hairnet rings that somebody pawned," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "They've come to redeem them, and I'm taking them out to return to them."

"Uncle," said the little monkey with an ingratiating smile, "Let me have them to play with. I'll give you something nice in exchange."

"A fine child you are!" said Ch'en Ching-chi. "These are things that somebody pawned. If you want, I'll find another pair for you to play with. What sort of nice thing have you got? Let me see it."

The monkey then reached inside his waistband, pulled out a scarlet embroidered shoe, and showed it to Ching-chi.

"Where'd it come from?" asked Ching-chi.

"Uncle," the monkey said with an ingratiating smile, "I'll tell you all about it. Yesterday I was playing in the garden and saw that Father had suspended the Fifth Lady's two feet from the grape arbor overhead and they were having quite a stormy time of it. Later, after Father had gone inside, I pestered Auntie Ch'un-mei for some fruit to eat and picked up this shoe under the grape arbor."

Ching-chi took it in his hand and saw that it was:

As curved as the new moon at heaven's edge,

As red as the fallen petal of a lotus blossom.

When he cradled it in his palm, it was:

Barely three inches long,

and he knew that it must be an object that had graced Chin-lien's foot.

"Give it to me," he said, "and tomorrow I'll find another pair of nice rings for you to play with."

"No fooling, Uncle," the monkey said. "Tomorrow I'll come and demand them of you."

"I'm not fooling you," said Ching-chi.

At this the monkey laughed and went off to play.

Ch'en Ching-chi tucked the shoe into his sleeve and thought to himself, "I've flirted with her more than once, and she always sounds ready enough; but when it comes to the point, she's proven elusive. Who would have thought that:

As providence would have it, this shoe should have fallen into my hands. Today I'll give her cinders a real stirring. Never fear, she's bound to come around."

Truly:

There is no need for the people of today to practice threading needles;

How could the Weaving Maid have the leisure to confer such dexterity?¹⁷

Ch'en Ching-chi, with the shoe in his sleeve, headed straight for P'an Chin-lien's quarters. When he had made his way around the spirit screen, what should he see but Ch'iu-chü kneeling in the courtyard.

"Young lady," he joked, "what have you done this time? It looks as though you've joined the New Army and have to spend your time lifting stones."

Chin-lien overheard this sally from her vantage point on the second floor and called to Ch'un-mei, saying, "Who is it who says she's lifting stones? I wouldn't be surprised if the slave's taken the stone off her head."

"It's your son-in-law," said Ch'un-mei. "Ch'iu-chü has still got the stone on her head."

"If it's you, Son-in-law," the woman called out, "there's no one else up here. Why don't you come upstairs."

The young scamp:

Quickening his pace and hiking up his clothes, raced up the stairs. What should he see but the woman, sitting on the second floor, with two windows open in front of her, over which bamboo blinds had been let down, gazing into her dressing mirror and doing her hair. Ch'en Ching-chi went right up beside her and sat down on a low stool.

He looked on as the woman combed lock after lock of her glossy black hair, which reached all the way to the floor. Then she bound it with a red silk ribbon and did it up in a "bag of silk" chignon, over which she placed a fret of silver filigree in such a way as to set off a coil of fragrant hair. She had placed a quantity of rose petals inside her fret, and two tufts of hair were allowed to escape at either temple. In fact she was so made up as to look like an avatar of the Goddess Kuan-yin.

In a little while, as he watched the woman complete her toilet, she put away her dressing mirror, rinsed her hands in a washbasin, put on her outer clothes, and called to Ch'un-mei, saying, "Bring our son-in-law a cup of tea."

While this was going on, Ching-chi merely smiled, without saying a word.

"What are you smiling for?" the woman finally asked.

"I'm smiling," said Ching-chi, "because I know that you've lost something."

"You lousy short-life!" the woman said. "If I've lost anything, what's it to you? And what do you know about it, anyway?"

"You see," said Ching-chi:

"Even my best intentions are treated like the entrails of an ass.

You'd rather mock me, would you? Well, if that's the way it is, I might as well go."

So saying, he got up and started down the stairs.

The woman grabbed hold of him with her hand, saying, "You crazy short-life! You can put on quite an act, can't you? Now that Lai-wang's wife is dead, you've no one to think about, and so you've contrived to remember your old mother."

"Go ahead and guess," she went on to say. "What is it that I've lost, do you think?"

Ching-chi pulled the shoe out of his sleeve and dangled it by its heel lift, saying with a laugh, "Look at this. Who does this goody belong to?"

"A fine short-life you are!" the woman said. "So it was you who made off with my shoe, causing me to beat my maidservant and search all over the place."

"Make a guess," said Ching-chi. "How do you suppose it came into my hands?"

Ch'en Ching-chi Teases Chin-lien about a Shoe

"Who else ever comes into my place?" the woman said. "You must have sneaked in here:
Like a furtive thieving rat,¹⁸ and made off with this shoe of mine."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," said Ching-chi. "Since when have I been in your place the last couple of days? How could I have stolen anything of yours?"

"A fine, lousy short-life you are!" the woman said. "Just wait till I tell Father about it. First you steal my shoe, and then tell me I ought to be ashamed of myself."

"All you ever seem able to do," said Ching-chi, "is try to use Father to scare me."

"You've got quite a nerve, don't you?" the woman said. "You knew perfectly well that Father was:

Playing at sevens and eights,¹⁹ with Lai-wang's wife, but you flirted with her anyway. As though that whore would share her favors with the likes of you! If it wasn't you who stole my shoe, how did it fall into your hands? The sooner you confess the truth and return my shoe, the better for you. It has always been true that:

When an object meets its owner,
It is sure to be repossessed.²⁰

If you dare utter so much as:

Half the word 'no,'²¹

I'll see to it that:

You'll die without a plot to be buried in."

"You're just like a plainclothes officer:

You've got a real knack for knavery,"²² said Ching-chi. "There's no one else here, so we can talk freely. If you want this shoe, you'll have to give me something in exchange for it. Otherwise, you couldn't beat it out of me with a steelyard."

"A fine short-life you are!" the woman said. "It's my shoe, and you ought to return it to me. What do you want in exchange for it, anyway?"

"Fifth Lady," said Ching-chi with a laugh, "if you give your son that handkerchief in your sleeve, your son will return your shoe to you."

"I'll find you another nice handkerchief tomorrow," the woman said. "Your father has seen this one often enough to recognize it, so it wouldn't do to give it to you."

"I don't want another one," said Ching-chi. "Even if you gave me a hundred, it wouldn't make any difference. My heart is set on this particular handkerchief."

"A fine short-life you are!" the woman said.

"You're such a practiced old hand,

I don't have the strength to contend with you any longer."

Thereupon, she reached into her sleeve and pulled out a fine, tasseled, white satin handkerchief, decorated with a drawnwork motif of:

Ts'ui Ying-ying Burning Evening Incense,²³ which also had a silver chatelaine with three pendant charms attached to it, and tossed it over to him. Ching-chi deftly caught it in his hands and made her a deep bow.

"You'd better keep it well hidden," the woman instructed him. "Don't let your wife see it. She's got a nasty tongue in her head."

"I understand," Ching-chi said, handing her the shoe, and then proceeded, thus and so, to give a full account of how "Little Iron Rod picked it up in the garden yesterday and this morning offered to exchange it for a pair of hairnet rings for him to play with."

When the woman heard this:

Her powdered face became suffused with red, as she Silently gnashed her silvery teeth.

"Look at this," she said. "That lousy little slave with his greasy hands has smudged my shoe till it's as black as lacquer. Just see if I don't get Father to give him a thrashing."

"You'll do me in yet," protested Ching-chi. "I don't care if he gets a beating as long as I'm not implicated. Whatever you do, don't say that I told you about it."

"As for sparing that little slave," the woman said, "I'd sooner spare a scorpion."

Just as they were in the midst of their conversation, they suddenly heard that the page boy, Lai-an, had come looking for Ch'en Ching-chi.

"Father's in the front reception hall," he reported, "and wants Uncle to go write some gift cards for him."

The woman hurriedly sent him on his way.

After coming downstairs, she told Ch'un-mei to fetch a bamboo cane so she could beat Ch'iu-chü.

Ch'iu-chü protested and refused to lie down, saying, "I found Mother's shoe, and now Mother still wants to beat me."

The woman showed her the shoe that Ch'en Ching-chi had just given her and cursed her, saying, "You lousy slave! You tried to pass off that other shoe as mine, but where did you put this one?"

When Ch'iu-chü saw it, she stared at it for some time but refused to acknowledge her mistake, saying, "What a strange business! How could Mother turn out to have three shoes?"

"You impudent slave!" the woman said. "First you try to palm somebody else's shoe off on me, and now you suggest that I'm a three-legged toad!"²⁴ How do you account for this shoe then?"

Without permitting any further explanation, she ordered Ch'un-mei to bend her over and proceeded to give her ten cuts with the cane.

Weeping and trying to protect her bottom with her hands, Ch'iu-chü turned to Ch'un-mei and said, "It was all your doing. When you opened the garden gate yesterday, you must have let someone in who picked up Mother's shoe. And now you're inciting Mother to beat me."

"It was you who brought in Mother's bedding and lost her shoe," Ch'un-mei cursed at her. "Mother has only given you these few strokes with the cane, and you have the nerve to try to blame someone else. It's a good thing it was only this old shoe. No doubt if it had been Mother's hairpin or earring that was lost, you'd be even more anxious to find a scapegoat. Mother has been lenient in letting you off so lightly. If it were up to me, I'd call in one of the page boys from outside and get him to give you twenty or thirty sharp cuts with the cane and see how you liked that."

This tirade reduced Ch'iu-chü to silence. There was nothing she could do but:

Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had summoned Ch'en Ching-chi to the front reception hall in order to take charge of sealing up a bolt of material and other gifts to be sent to Battalion Commander Ho Chin from the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, who had recently been promoted to the post of principal judicial officer in the Huai-an office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. His friends and relatives from the local Guard Battalion were all going to give him a farewell party at the Yung-fu Ssu, or Temple of Eternal Felicity. But no more of this.

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had sent off Tai-an to deliver the gifts, he joined Ch'en Ching-chi in having something to eat in the reception hall and then went back to Chin-lien's quarters. Chin-lien, though she:

Never, ever, should have done it, told him the whole story of how Little Iron Rod had picked up her shoe.

"You ill-bred good-for-nothing!" she railed at him. "It was your pointless shenanigans that led to that lousy death-defying little slave's being able to pick up my shoe in the first place. If he took it outside the compound, who knows who might have seen it. As soon as I found out about it, I managed to get it back from him. If you don't give him a couple of licks he'll soon be incorrigible."

Hsi-men Ch'ing didn't bother to ask how she had found out about it but made off in a fit of rage for the front of the compound. The little monkey, who was quite oblivious to the situation, was playing on the stone stylobate around the reception hall. Hsi-men Ch'ing grabbed hold of him by the tuft of hair on the crown of his head and assaulted him with both fists and feet. Not until he:

Hsi-men Ch'ing Angrily Beats Little Iron Rod

Howled like a stuck pig, did he desist.

The little monkey was left lying unconscious on the ground and remained so for quite a while until Lai-chao and his wife showed up in consternation and succeeded, after some time, in reviving him. They saw that the youngster's nose was bleeding and had to carry him back to their room. Only after prolonged interrogation did they ascertain that it was all because he had picked up Chin-lien's shoe and exchanged it for a pair of hairnet rings from Ch'en Ching-chi that the trouble had started.

Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," fuming with rage, went back to the kitchen in the rear compound and:

Pointing to the east while cursing the west,²⁵ gave vent to an indiscriminate tirade, saying, "You'll come to a bad end, you lousy whore and you cuckold's spawn! What have you got against my son? He's only twelve or thirteen years old. What does he know about anything? He doesn't even know where your cunt is located. But you go out of your way to incite your man into giving him a thrashing for no good reason, and beat him until his nose bleeds. Suppose you had killed him. It would have gone the worse for you, you whore and you cuckold. And what purpose of yours would that have served?"

Thereupon, having given vent to her tirade in the kitchen, she went up to the front of the compound and gave a repeat performance, continuing along the same lines for a whole day or two without stopping. Because Chin-lien was in her quarters drinking wine with Hsi-men Ch'ing, she still knew nothing about it.

That evening, when they went to bed for the night, Hsi-men Ch'ing noticed that the woman had on a pair of sand-green pongee sleeping shoes with scarlet heel lifts and said, "Ai-ya! What are you wearing those things on your feet for? They look weird and don't become you."

"I only have one pair of red sleeping shoes," the woman said, "and that little slave picked up one of them and soiled it for me. Where would I get a second pair?"

"My child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "make a new pair tomorrow and wear them on your feet. You don't know how much your daddy prefers the sight of you in red shoes. It excites me just to see them."

"You crazy slave!" the woman said. "So that's the way it is? But that reminds me of something I meant to bring up and then forgot."

So saying, she ordered Ch'un-mei, "Bring that other shoe here and let him see it. Do you recognize whose shoe this is?"

"I don't know whose shoe it is," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Just look at him!" the woman exclaimed. "Still playing the innocent!"

You may be a brown cat, but you've got a black tail.

Those are fine tricks you've been up to behind my back. You took this shoe off the stinking hoof of Lai-wang's dead wife, treasured it like the pearl on a piece of jewelry, and secreted it in your "snow cave" in the Hidden Spring Grotto, under the artificial hill in the garden, carefully tucked away with the stationery in your card case, wrapped up together with sticks of incense. As though it were some exotic rarity! It's really outrageous. No wonder that lousy whore went straight to the Avici Hell²⁶ when she died."

Pointing to Ch'iu-chü, she continued her tirade, saying, "That slave turned it up, thinking it was my shoe, and I had to give her a beating."

Then, turning to Ch'un-mei, she instructed her, "Throw it out of here, this minute."

Ch'un-mei tossed the shoe onto the floor and said to Ch'iu-chü, "Here's something you can wear if you want it."

Ch'iu-chü took it up in her hand, saying, "This shoe of Mother's is so small I'd be lucky if I could get a toe into it."

"You lousy slave!" the woman cursed at her. "Whose cunt of a mother are you talking about? She must have been your master's mother in an earlier incarnation. Otherwise, why should he treasure her shoe in such a way, as though it were a family heirloom to be passed on from generation to generation? The shameless good-for-nothing!"

Ch'iu-chü picked up the shoe and started out of the room, but the woman called her back, saying, "Fetch me a knife so I can chop that whore into pieces and throw them into the privy. I'll fix it so that lousy whore ends up:

On the far side of the mountains of Hell;

Never again to be reborn in human form."²⁷

Then she turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "The more it hurts you to see this, the more thoroughly I'll cut it up, just to show you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "You crazy slave! Why don't you call it quits? What do I care about it?"

"If you don't care," said the woman, "swear an oath on it. As for that whore:

Nobody knows where the dead end up going to."²⁸

So what are you still keeping her shoe around for? It must be that whenever you think of her, early or late, you want some memento to remind you of her. Meanwhile, for those of us who are properly married to you, you haven't a thought to spare. How can you expect anyone to be:

Of one heart and one mind,
with you under the circumstances?"

"That's enough, you crazy little whore!" laughed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You're always up to your tricks. When she was alive she never failed to perform what duty demanded of her where you were concerned."

Thereupon, putting an arm around her powdered neck, he gave her a kiss, and the two of them proceeded to engage in the game of clouds and rain together. Truly:

The spring beauty arouses the beholder,
complaisantly alluring;

The fragrant corolla attracts the butterfly,
in redolent surrender."²⁹

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Vainly expressing her fragrant heart, to whom is she to speak;

Where can she hope to find a fit repository for her longings?

Though her longings may come to an end,

her passion is unending;
Every day it returns to affect her during all twenty-four hours.³⁰

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 29

IMMORTAL WU PHYSIOGNOMIZES THE EXALTED AND THE HUMBLE; P'AN CHIN-LIEN ENJOYS A MIDDAY BATTLE IN THE BATHTUB

One has but a hundred years of autumn moons and spring flowers;
So one might as well relax one's frowning brows rather than repine.
Recite a few verses in order to dissipate
the worries of the world;
Pour a couple of cups of wine to while away
the fullness of youth.
When idle, play at board games in order to amuse oneself;
When depressed, pluck the inlaid zither to elevate your mood.
Of human affairs and the events of the times
take no heed;
Just make poetry and wine the preoccupations of your life.¹

THE STORY GOES that the next morning P'an Chin-lien got up early and sent Hsi-men Ch'ing on his way. Remembering that she wanted to make a new pair of red shoes for herself, she took her sewing box into the garden with her and sat down on the stylobate of the Kingfisher Pavilion, where she began to sketch the design to be embroidered on the vamps of her new shoes. She sent Ch'un-mei to invite Li P'ing-erh to join her.

When Li P'ing-erh arrived, she asked, "What's that you're sketching, Sister?"

"I want to make a pair of shoes," said Chin-lien, "out of scarlet iridescent silk, with flat white satin soles, the toes of which will be embroidered with the motif of 'A Parrot Plucking a Peach.'"

"I've got a square of scarlet variegated silk," said Li P'ing-erh. "I'll make a pair just like your's, except that I want high heels on mine."

Thereupon, she fetched her sewing box and the two of them sat down to work together.

When Chin-lien had finished sketching the pattern on one vamp, she set it aside, saying, "Sister Li, sketch the other one for me, will you? I'm going to the rear compound to fetch Sister Meng the Third. She told me yesterday that she was going to make a pair of shoes too."

She went straight to the rear compound. Meng Yü-lou was in her room, leaning on the bedrail, stitching away at a shoe that she held in her hand.

When Chin-lien came in the door, Yü-lou said, "You're up and about early today."

"I got up early," said Chin-lien, "and sent Father off to attend the farewell party for Battalion Commander Ho Chin outside the South Gate. I've arranged with Sister Li to do some needlework together in the garden while it's still cool in the morning. In a little while the sun will be too hot and we won't be able to continue. I've just finished sketching the design for one shoe and asked Sister Li to do the other one for me while I came straight over here to invite you to join us. The three of us can do our work together."

"What kind of shoe is that you're working on right now?" she went on to ask.

"It's that pair of jet silk shoes you saw me start on yesterday," Yü-lou replied.

"What a fine fellow you are," exclaimed Chin-lien. "You've managed to finish one of them already."

"I stitched that one yesterday," said Yü-lou, "and I've already done a good deal on this one."

Chin-lien asked to have a look at it and said, "What kind of decoration are you going to put on the toe?"

"I'm not to be compared with you youngsters," said Yü-lou, "with your flashy fashions. I'm too old for that. I'll have gold-spangled toes, with a motif of white mountains around them, stitched out with sand-green thread, white satin soles, and high heels. How does that sound?"

"All right," said Chin-lien. "Get your stuff together now. Let's go. Li P'ing-erh is waiting for us."

"Sit down," said Yü-lou, "and have some tea before we go."

"Let's not drink it here," said Chin-lien, "but take it with us and drink it there."

Yü-lou instructed Lan-hsiang to make the tea and deliver it to them in the garden. The two women then tucked the shoe vamps into their sleeves and set out for the front compound, holding hands as they went.

Wu Yüeh-niang was sitting in the veranda outside the master suite and asked, "Where are you going?"

"Sister Li sent me to fetch Meng the Third for her," said Chin-lien, "to help her sketch the design for a pair of shoes."

So saying, they went straight out to the garden where the three of them sat down together, pulled out their vamps, looked over each other's handiwork, and proceeded to compare notes. Before this, Ch'un-mei had already served them with tea; later on, tea was provided from Li P'ing-erh's quarters; and, finally, Lan-hsiang arrived with more tea from Meng Yü-lou's place, and the three of them drank it together.

"Sister Six," said Yü-lou, "what are you making flat-soled red shoes for? They don't look as nice as high-heeled shoes. If you're worried that wooden heels are too noisy, you can put felt on them, as I do, and they won't make a noise when you walk."

"They aren't for everyday wear," said Chin-lien. "They're sleeping shoes. It's all because I couldn't find one of my sleeping shoes, which turned out to have been stolen by that little slave, who soiled it into the bargain, that Father told me to make a new pair of shoes."

"Speaking of shoes," said Yü-lou, "and:

This is not just talebearing,² mind you, Sister Li is here to bear me witness; yesterday, all on account of this missing shoe of yours, which got picked up in the garden somehow or other by Lai-chao's son, Little Iron Rod, and which you mentioned to Father when you found out about it, he gave Little Iron Rod a thrashing. They say Father beat the monkey until his nose bled and left him lying on the ground unconscious for quite a while. This upset The Beanpole' so much that she indulged in an indiscriminate tirade in the rear compound, saying, That whore and that cuckold's spawn incited him into beating my son. That son of mine, who's still such a child he scarcely knows how to piss, what does he know about anything, that she should egg her man into giving him such a beating? It's a good thing he's still alive. If he'd been dead, that whore and that cuckold's spawn would never get away with it.' I didn't know at the time whom she was cursing as a whore and a cuckold's spawn. It was only later on, when Little Iron Rod came into the rear compound and Elder Sister asked him, 'Why did Father beat you?', that the youngster said, 'While playing in the garden I picked up a shoe and asked Uncle if I could exchange it for a pair of hairnet rings. I don't know who it was who told Father about it and got him to give me a beating. I'm looking for Uncle right now so I can ask him for those rings.' Having said which, he ran right out front again. So it turned out to be Ch'en Ching-chi that she was cursing as a cuckold's spawn. Luckily, the only person sitting there at the time was Li Chiao-erh. Hsi-men Ta-chieh didn't happen to be there. If she had heard it all, there would have been another ruckus, for sure."

"Did Elder Sister have anything to say about it?" asked Chin-lien.

"You might well ask," said Yü-lou. "Elder Sister had quite a lot to say about you. She said, 'Right now in this household:

Chaos is king.

The nine-tailed fox fairy has appeared in the world, and has got that benighted ruler so befuddled he'll be:

Banishing his son and divorcing his wife, before you know it. Just remember what she did to that servant, Lai-wang, who's no longer with us. He'd only just gotten back, as nice as you please, from a trip to the south, when she started telling:

First a tale to the east,

And then one to the west, about how his wife was carrying on with his master, how he was playing the thief all day long:

Brandishing knives and flourishing weapons,³ while she was busy committing adultery. She managed to frame him so effectively he was driven out of the household, whereupon she turned her attention to his wife and made her life so unbearable she committed suicide. And now, all on account of a single shoe, she's stirred up enough of a rumpus to:

Startle Heaven and shake the earth.

If it was your shoe, why didn't you keep it on your foot where it belonged? How did it get anywhere where that youngster could pick it up, in the first place? I'll bet it was only because she got drunk out in the garden and was up to something with that man of ours, contriving to be:

As stuck on one another as sugar candy, that she lost track of her shoe. And now, unable to cover her own embarrassment, she's made a scapegoat of that youngster and he's ended up getting a drubbing. And it's not even over anything important!"

When Chin-lien heard this, she exclaimed, "She should stop talking through her cunt! If murder isn't something important, what is? That slave was out to kill his master with knife in hand!"

Then, turning to Yü-lou, she continued, "Luckily, Sister Three, you're not to be deceived about that. The two of us both heard what Lai-hsing had to say and were scared as could be. And as for you, Elder Sister, you're his primary wife, and yet you dismiss it like that.

'If you won't do anything about it,

I won't do anything about it.'

She wouldn't have seen fit to do anything about it until that slave had murdered our husband. Meanwhile, the slave's wife was on duty in that rear compound of yours all day long, and you let her do as she pleased, without taking her to task; allowing her to:

Deceive her superiors and oppress her inferiors,⁴ picking fights with first this one and then that one. After all:

For every injustice there is a perpetrator;
For every debt there is a creditor.
If you can make accusations against me,
I can make accusations against you.

And when she hanged herself, you still didn't tell our husband the whole story. Luckily for you, by spending money and pulling strings the affair was successfully hushed up. Otherwise there never would have been an end to it. And you pretend to be so pure and:

Put such a good face on things.
After all:

What's so is so.⁵

If I put our husband up to it, so be it. As for that pair of slaves, husband and wife, if I hadn't been able to get them:

Driven away from this door for good, with the aid of a stick, what good would I be? No matter what happens:

No one is going to force me down a well."

When Yü-lou saw how angry Chin-lien had become, as:
Her powdered face became suffused with red, she admonished her, saying, "Sister Six, you and I are sisters. It's just as though we were the same person. When I hear something, how could I fail to tell you about it? But now that I've told you, you must keep it to yourself. Don't let it get about."

Chin-lien did not do as she was bid. That evening she waited until Hsi-men Ch'ing came into her room and then gave him a word for word account of what she had heard.

"Lai-chao's wife, 'The Beanpole,' has been cursing at us in the rear compound," she reported, "saying that you gave her child a beating, and threatening to make trouble for us."

Nothing might have happened if Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard this, but having heard it, he made a point of remembering it.

The next day he was going to expel Lai-chao and his family, all three of them, from the household. It was only owing to the repeated remonstrances of Yüeh-niang that he relented. But he would not permit them to reside any longer in the compound and packed them off to look after the house on Lion Street, relieving P'ing-an, who returned home to take charge of the main gate. Afterwards, when Yüeh-niang found out who was responsible, she was very angry with Chin-lien. But enough of this. Truly:

If you don't think thrice before doing something, you will later regret it;⁶
When people have occasion for self-satisfaction, it is time to repent.⁷

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the front reception hall and presided over the departure of Lai-chao and his family, all three of them, to look after the house on Lion Street.

One day he happened to be sitting in the front reception hall when P'ing-an, who was now in charge of the front gate, came in and reported, saying, "His Honor Chou Hsiu of the commandant's headquarters has sent around a physiognomist, called Immortal Wu, who is waiting at the gate to see you."

"Send in the man who brought him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing; and after the latter person had presented the commandant's card, he said, "Invite him to come in."

Before long, Immortal Wu floated ethereally in from the outside.

On his head he affected a black cotton Taoist cap,
On his body he wore a cotton robe and black sandals,
At his waist hung a yellow silk sash with two tassels,
In his hand he held a tortoiseshell-patterned fan.⁸

He appeared to be something over forty years of age.

His spirit was as pure as the hoary moon over the Yangtze River;
His visage was as ancient as a tall pine on the summit of Mount Hua.⁹
His demeanor was awe-inspiring,
His Taoist aura was imposing.¹⁰

It so happens that immortals are possessed of four unusual attributes:

Their bodies are like pines,
Their voices are like bells,
Their repose is like a bow,

Their movement like the wind.¹¹

Behold:

Master of the discriminating mirror of physiognomy,

Adept at interpreting the rules of Hsü Tzu-p'ing;¹²

By examining celestial phenomena he understands the yin and yang,

By perusing the Dragon Canon he can assess geomantic conditions.¹³

Profoundly conversant with the Five Planetary Features,¹⁴

Deliberating to himself upon the Three Fates;¹⁵

By scrutinizing the astrological circumstances,

He can determine the success or failure of a lifetime;

By observing the humor and the complexion,

He can decide the good or evil of one's allotted years.

If he is not Ch'en T'uan, the realized adept who sojourned on Mount Hua,¹⁶

He must be Yen Chün-p'ing, who sold fortunes in the market of Ch'eng-tu.¹⁷

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw Immortal Wu come in, he hastened down the steps to welcome him and escorted him into the reception hall. On meeting Hsi-men Ch'ing, Immortal Wu performed a low bow, saluted him in the Taoist manner by touching one hand to his forehead, and sat down.

A little later, after tea had been served, Hsi-men Ch'ing addressed his guest, saying, "I venture to inquire of Your Reverence:

What are your lofty name and elegant style,

What immortal realm do you hail from,¹⁸ and how do you come to be acquainted with His Excellency Chou Hsiu?"

Immortal Wu inclined his body slightly where he sat and replied, "My surname is Wu, my given name is Shih,¹⁹ and my Taoist appellation is Shou-chen. I am a native of Hsien-yu district in Chekiang province. In my youth I took instruction from a master and was ordained as a priest in the Purple Void Temple of Mount T'ien-t'ai. In the course of my peregrinations in the capital region I decided to seek the Way at Mount T'ai, which brought me into your distinguished vicinity. Commandant Chou asked me to treat his wife, who is suffering from an eye ailment, and has made a point of sending me to your honorable abode to proffer my services as a physiognomist."

"What schools of yin-yang do you practice, Reverend Sir," asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and what varieties of physiognomy do you profess?"

"I am roughly familiar with all thirteen schools²⁰ of Hsü Tzu-p'ing's method," replied Immortal Wu. "I am thoroughly conversant with the Ma-i hsiang-fa (The physiognomic technique of the Hemp-robed Master),²¹ and equally so with the divine oracles generated by the six recurrences of the jen stem in the sexagenary cycle.²² I constantly distribute medicine in order to cure people. Having no love of mundane wealth, I conform to the times and take the world as I find it."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard these words, he respected him all the more and praised him by saying, "Truly, you live up to the definition of an immortal."

Then he ordered his attendants to set out a table and provide vegetarian fare for Immortal Wu's entertainment.

"Commandant Chou sent me over here," said Immortal Wu, "and before I have had a chance to examine your physiognomy or read your horoscope, you offer me a vegetarian repast."

"You have come from a distance, Your Reverence," said Hsi-men Ch'ing with a smile, "and must not have had breakfast. It won't be too late for you to tell my fortune after having something to eat."

Thereupon, he joined Immortal Wu in a vegetarian repast. After the plates had been removed, the table was wiped clean, and a brush and inkstone were procured.

"May I begin by having a look at your horoscope?" said Immortal Wu. "After that I will physiognomize your respected countenance."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then told him the eight characters determined by the celestial stems and terrestrial branches for the year, month, day, and hour of his birth, saying, "I was born in the year of the tiger and am twenty-eight years old. My birth took place in the seventh month, on the twenty-eighth day, during the tzu hour that falls around midnight.

Immortal Wu silently:

Calculated on the joints of his fingers,²³ and, after some time, said, "Your horoscope, sir, indicates that you were born in a ping-yin year, during a hsin-yu month, on a jen-wu day, during the ping-tzu time period.²⁴ In that year the solar term 'White Dew' fell on the twenty-third day of the seventh month, so your horoscope begins in the eighth month of the year.

"For a person with this horoscope, the combination hsin-yu that designates the month of your birth corresponds to the horoscopic category 'injurer of the official.' Tzu-p'ing says of this situation:

When the 'injurer of the official' has done its injury
it serves to augment 'wealth';

When 'wealth' is 'flourishing' it begets 'the official'

bringing prosperity in its wake.²⁵

Your 'mansion of fate' corresponds to the branch shen. The symbol of your 'containing note' is 'earth on the city wall.'²⁶ The first of your 'decennial periods of fate'²⁷ began in your seventh year and was designated by the stem-branch combination hsin-yu, the second began in your seventeenth year and was designated by the combination jen-hsi, the third began in your twenty-seventh year and was designated by the combination kuei-hai, the fourth will begin in your thirty-seventh year and be designated by the combination chia-tzu, and the fifth will begin in your forty-seventh year and be designated by the combination i-ch'ou.

"As I interpret your horoscope, it indicates that:

You are destined to be distinguished and flourishing,
Your eight characters are splendid and remarkable,
If you do not achieve distinction you will gain glory.

However, your 'one-sided official'²⁸ is the element earth associated with the stem wu, and you were born in the seventh or eighth month, which means that your horoscopic 'body' is too 'flourishing.' Fortunately the stem *jen*²⁹ in the combination jen-wu that designates the day of your birth is associated with the element water and also consorts with the stem kuei, which is likewise associated with water.

When water and fire complement each other,³⁰
Thereby a mighty instrument may be forged.³¹

"You were born during the ping-tzu time period. When the stems ping and hsin occur in the same horoscope,³² it indicates that in the future you are sure to:

Hold a position of authority,
Enjoy lifelong prosperity,
Be both happy and secure,
Strike it rich, be promoted,
And beget a distinguished son.³³

You will be characterized by:

Upstanding firmness throughout your life, and Single-mindedness in the conduct of your affairs.

When happy, you will exhibit:

The genial atmosphere of the spring breeze.³⁴

When aroused to anger, you will become like:

A clap of thunder or a raging conflagration.

In the course of your life you will gain much wealth through marriage alliances and will not fail to wear the silk hat of an official. On your deathbed there will be two sons to accompany you to your grave.³⁵

"This year of your horoscope is a *ting-wei*³⁶ year. The stems ting and jen are 'harmonious,'³⁷ but at present the element fire associated with the stem ting is in its 'destructive' phase. But this is compensated for by the fact that:

What 'destroys' the 'self is its 'official' or 'devil,'³⁸

which in your case is the element earth that 'destroys' fire. This must portend the joy of:

An ascent to the clouds from the level ground,

and the glory of:

Appointment to office and augmented emolument.

Your present 'decennial period of fate' is designated by the stem-branch combination kuei-hai. The element earth associated with the stem wu, which is your 'one-sided official,' will be moistened by the element water associated with the stem kuei, which is sure to stimulate growth. In the near future you can be expected to benefit from the auspicious star and the horoscopic conjunction known as:

The Red Phoenix and Celestial Joy,³⁹ and
The portent of the 'black bears and brown,'⁴⁰ indicating the birth of a son. Moreover, since both your 'mansion of fate' and your 'post-horse'⁴¹ correspond to the branch shen, this event will occur before the end of the seventh month."

In the end what is my 'fatal limit' to be?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Will I suffer any calamities or not?"

"Sir," said Immortal Wu, "don't take offense at what I say, but it is unpropitious to have an excess of the yin element water in one's horoscope. Later, during the 'decennial period of your fate' designated by the combination chia-tzu, you may maintain your ascendancy over women, who represent the yin element, but will find yourself inconvenienced by the 'star of effluence,' and the adverse influence of the combination jen-wu that designates the day of your birth. The indications are that before your thirty-sixth year you will suffer from:

The calamity of spitting blood, and discharging pus, and
The affliction of desiccated bones and emaciated frame."

"What about my situation at the present time?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"In this year of your horoscope," said Immortal Wu, "the only problem is that the combination jen-wu that designates the day of your birth is adversely affected. The 'five devils' will make mischief in your household and may cause you some grief, but not enough to constitute a calamity. All these troubles will be dissipated by the visitation of the gods of felicity.”

“Are there any further setbacks in my fortune?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“Years follow in the wake of months, Months follow in the wake of days,” replied Immortal Wu. “It’s really hard to say.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing heard this he was utterly delighted.

“Sir,” he then went on to say, “how would it be if you were to physiognomize me?”

“Turn your respected countenance so that it faces straight ahead,” said Immortal Wu, “and I will take a look at it.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing adjusted his seat accordingly.

“It is a dictum in the art of physiognomy,” said Immortal Wu, “that:

Where mind exists without likeness,
Likeness will appear in accord with mind;
Where likeness exists without mind,
Likeness will disappear in accord with mind.⁴²

When I look you over, sir, the following principles apply:

One whose head is round and whose neck is short,
Is sure to be a person who enjoys good fortune.
One whose body is sturdy and whose muscles are strong,
Is certain to be an individual of heroic cast.
One whose forehead is high and prominent,⁴³
Will not lack clothing or emolument in his lifetime.⁴⁴
One whose chin is square-cut and full,
Will certainly acquire glory and honor in old age.⁴⁵

These are all among your good points, but there are also a few deficiencies, which I hesitate to mention.”

“Immortal sir,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “pray express yourself without constraint.”

“Be so good, sir,” said Immortal Wu, “as to take a couple of steps for my benefit.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing took a few steps, as requested.

Immortal Wu said, “It is true of you that:

If one’s gait is like a wind-tossed willow,⁴⁶
He is certainly fated to lose a wife.
If one’s canthi are marked by many lines,
He is destined to suffer enervation.⁴⁷
If one’s eyes do not weep, and yet
they fill with tears,
If one’s mind is untroubled, and yet his eyebrows are knit,⁴⁸
If he fails to suffer grievous losses,
He will surely sacrifice his own life.

Only after you have gained the ascendancy over your ‘wifely mansion’ will you be all right.”

“I already have,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“Be so good as to let me have a look at your hand,” said Immortal Wu.

Hsi-men Ch’ing extended his hand so that he could examine it.

Immortal Wu said:

“Wisdom and intelligence are manifest in skin and hair,
Sorrow and joy can be observed in hands and feet.⁴⁹
If one’s hands are fine, soft, plump, and smooth,
He is sure to enjoy good fortune, ease, and emolument.⁵⁰
If one’s two eyes are of different dimensions,
He is destined to be wealthy but untrustworthy.⁵¹
If one’s eyebrows project at both ends,
He will always be self-satisfied and happy.⁵²
If the bridge of one’s nose is crossed by three lines,
His substance will surely be wasted or squandered.⁵³
If the skin adjacent to one’s canthi is red or purple,
He will gain much wealth through marriage alliances.
If a yellow aura emanates from one’s upper brow,
He is sure to become an official within ten days.⁵⁴
If a red color appears beneath one’s left eye,
This year he is sure to beget a distinguished son.⁵⁵

But there is yet another item, which I hesitate to mention.

If the flesh under one’s eyelids is full and thick,

It is a sure indication of a lustful disposition.⁵⁶
If the pubic hair around one's anus grows rank,
He will merit a reputation for lasciviousness.⁵⁷

But fortunately for you:

The nose, as the indicator of one's wealth,
Governs the fortune of one's middle years.⁵⁸
The hollow under the lower lip, and the chin,
Control the success or failure of one's old age.⁵⁹

The hollow under the lower lip, and the chin, should be full and prominent;
The tip of the nose is the indicator of one's wealth and occupies the middle place.
The vicissitudes of a lifetime are all determined by fate;
The mysterious dictates of physiognomy brook no exceptions."

When Immortal Wu had finished his analysis, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Would you be so kind, immortal sir, as to physiognomize my wife and concubines?"

Having said which, he directed a page boy, "Go to the rear compound and ask the First Lady to come out."

Thereupon Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Li P'ing-erh, Sun Hsüeh-o, and company all followed the First Lady out to the front reception hall and eavesdropped on the proceedings from behind a hanging screen.

When Immortal Wu saw Yüeh-niang come out, he saluted her in the Taoist manner by touching one hand to his forehead. Not presuming to sit down in her presence, he stood to one side in order to observe her.

"Be so kind, my lady, as to turn your respected countenance so that it faces straight ahead," he said.

Wu Yüeh-niang redirected her gaze until she was looking right outside the reception hall.

After Immortal Wu had scrutinized her for a while, he said, "As for you, my lady:

If one's face is like the full moon,
Her household fortunes will prosper.
If one's lips are like red lotus blossoms,
Her supply of clothing and food will be ample.⁶⁰
If the features of one's face are evenly placed,
She is sure to gain distinction and bear a son.⁶¹
If the sound of one's voice is ethereal and clear,
She is sure to benefit her husband and gain wealth.⁶²

Be so good as to let me see your hand."

Yüeh-niang extended it from the mouth of her sleeve, exposing her ten slender fingers.

Immortal Wu said:

"If her hands are like dried ginger,
A woman will be good at housekeeping.⁶³
If the hair at her temples is glossy,
A female will have an aura of elegance.

These are all among your good points, but there are also a few deficiencies. Please don't take offense if I speak frankly."

"Immortal sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "pray express yourself without constraint."

Immortal Wu said:

"If one has black moles on the flesh under her eyelids,
She will suffer from lasting ills or do in her husband.
If one has wrinkled lines underneath her eyelids,
She will be incompatible with her six relations.⁶⁴

If a woman's deportment is sedate and proper, and she has an attractive appearance,
And if she walks as inconspicuously as a turtle emerging from the water,
If her movements do not disturb the dust,⁶⁵
and her words observe due measure,
And if her shoulders are barely perceptible, she will marry a man of distinction."⁶⁶

When he had finished physiognomizing her, Yüeh-niang retired.

"There are also my concubines," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you would be so kind as to take a look at them."

Thereupon Li Chiao-erh stepped up.

After Immortal Wu had scrutinized her for some time, he said, "As for this lady:

If her forehead is pointed and her nose small,⁶⁷

She will be a concubine or marry three husbands.

If her flesh is heavy and her body plump,⁶⁸

She will have ample food and clothing and live in luxury.

If her shoulders project and her voice is whiny,

She will either be menial or forsaken.

If the bridge of her nose should be too low,

She will either be poor or short-lived.⁶⁹

Be so good as to take a few steps for my benefit."

When Li Chiao-erh had taken a few steps, Immortal Wu said:

"If her forehead is pointed, her posterior sticks out,
and she moves like a snake,

In her early years she is sure to have fallen into the world of wind and dust.⁷⁰

If it turns out that she does not become the denizen of a brothel,

She is sure to be a concubine whose place it is to stand behind the screen.⁷¹

When he had finished physiognomizing her, Li Chiao-erh withdrew.

"Third Sister Meng," Wu Yüeh-niang called out, "come over here and let him take a look at you."

After having scrutinized her, Immortal Wu said, "As for this lady:

One whose 'three sections' are of equal dimensions,

Will not lack clothing or emolument in her lifetime.⁷²

One whose 'six treasures' are full and prominent,⁷³

Will certainly acquire glory and honor in old age.⁷⁴

She will suffer few ills in her lifetime,

All because her 'lunar comet' shines bright.

She will reach old age without mishap,

Since her 'palace of longevity' is sleek.⁷⁵

Be so good, young lady, as to take a couple of steps for my benefit."

When Meng Yü-lou had taken a few steps, Immortal Wu said:

"If her mouth is as square as the character 'four,'
and her spirit is clear,

She will be genial and generous, fit to be compared to a pearl on the palm.⁷⁶

She will both command respect and know how to please,
being destined to wealth,

And will gain the ascendancy over her husbands,⁷⁷
two or more of them,"

When he had finished physiognomizing Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien was called for, but she merely giggled and refused to come out. Only after Yüeh-niang had urged her repeatedly did Chin-lien consent to present herself for inspection.

Immortal Wu raised his head to scrutinize the woman and then pondered to himself for some time before saying, "As for this lady:

If the hair by one's temples is thick and luxuriant,

She will cast sidelong glances and revel in wantonness.⁷⁸

If one's face is pleasing and one's eyebrows are arched,

Her body will quiver spontaneously without any impetus.

If there are black birthmarks on one's countenance,

She is sure to gain the ascendancy over her husband.

If one's philtrum is short and abrupt,⁷⁹

She is sure to suffer a premature death.⁸⁰

If her movements are light and frivolous,⁸¹

she will be given to wantonness,

If her eyes are like dots of lacquer,⁸²

she will destroy human relationships.

Under the moon, beneath the stars,

if she is never satisfied,
Though she should dwell in spacious structures, she will find little peace.”⁸³

When Immortal Wu had finished physiognomizing Chin-lien, Hsi-men Ch'ing called for Li P'ing-erh to come out and let him examine her.

After having scrutinized her, Immortal Wu said, “As for this woman:

One whose skin is fragrant and smooth,
Will be the daughter of a well-to-do family.
One whose countenance is upright and correct,⁸⁴
Will be the virtuous matron of a prominent house.⁸⁵

The only problem is that:

If the glint in the eye suggests intoxication,
Assignations amid the mulberries are indicated.
If captivating dimples languidly appear,
Trysts beneath the moon are hard to rule out.⁸⁶
If the fold under one's eyelid is glossy and purple,
She is sure to give birth to a distinguished son.⁸⁷
If one's body is white and one's shoulders are rounded,
She is sure to enjoy the favor of her husband.
She will constantly suffer from illness and distress,
If the root of her nose is dingy and sunken.⁸⁸
She will frequently encounter auspicious omens,
If the flesh over her eyebrows is clear and glossy.⁸⁹

These are all among your good points, but there are also a few deficiencies, which you should be on your guard against.

If the root of one's nose is blue or black,
She will weep before or after her twenty-seventh year.
If the lines by one's nostrils are taut or contorted,
How can she survive the years of the cock or the dog?⁹⁰
Beware! Beware!⁹¹

With a flowerlike or moonlike countenance,⁹²
she is sparing of her pinions;
Throughout her lifetime her best friends are the male and the female phoenix.
The wealth and emoluments of a noble household are hers to depend on;
Do not make the mistake of regarding her as merely an ordinary bird,”⁹³

When he had finished physiognomizing her, Li P'ing-erh withdrew. Yüeh-niang then ordered Sun Hsüeh-o to come out and let herself be inspected.

After having scrutinized her, Immortal Wu said, “As for this lady:

If one's body is short and one's voice high,
If her forehead is pointed and her nose small,
though she may have:

Left the dark valley and mounted on high,⁹⁴
nevertheless, throughout her lifetime:
She will laugh sardonically without feeling, and
Her conduct will be devious and mean-spirited.⁹⁵

But she is also destined to suffer from the four deformities, which eventually:

Are sure to indicate a violent death.⁹⁶
The four deformities are as follows:
The lips are deformed in having no projection,
The ears are deformed in having no auricles,⁹⁷
The eyes are deformed in having no spirit, and
The nose is deformed in not being straight.⁹⁸

If one has a swallow's body and a wasp's waist,
she will be but a menial,
If one's eyes wander like flowing water, without integrity or truth,⁹⁹
If one stands leaning idly against the doorjamb¹⁰⁰

as a general practice,
If neither maid nor concubine, she will fall into the world of wind and dust.”¹⁰¹

When Sun Hsüeh-o had withdrawn, Yüeh-niang told Hsi-men Ta-chieh to come and be inspected.

Immortal Wu said, “As for this woman:

If the bridge of one’s nose is too sharp,
Her patrimony and her family will be destroyed.¹⁰²
If one’s voice is like a broken gong,¹⁰³
The substance of her house will be squandered.
If the skin on one’s face is too tight,
Though her philtrum be long, her life will be short.¹⁰⁴
If her gait is like the hopping of a sparrow,
She will dwell at home, but lack food and clothing.
Before completing her twenty-seventh year,
She should suffer a calamity.

If adverse bickering with her husband should be her most potent propensity,
The food and clothing inherited from her parents will barely sustain her.
If her appearance and her bearing evince inhibition, success will elude her,
She will either fall victim to an untoward death or the direst adversity.¹⁰⁵

When he had finished physiognomizing Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Ch’un-mei was also called out to undergo inspection. Immortal Wu opened his eyes wide and saw that Ch’un-mei was not more than seventeen years of age.

Wearing an informal cloud-shaped chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, a white drawnwork blouse, a peach red skirt, and a blue silk vest, replete with:

Compressed hands and bound feet,¹⁰⁶
she came out and bowed to him, saying, “Many felicitations.”

After Immortal Wu had scrutinized her for some time, he said, “As for this young lady:

Her ‘five governing features’ are sedate and proper;¹⁰⁷
Her skeletal structure is splendid and remarkable.¹⁰⁸
If one’s hair is fine and one’s eyebrows thick,
Her nature will be demanding and strong.
If one’s spirit is quick and one’s eyes round,
Her character will be hot and bothered.¹⁰⁹
If the root of one’s nose is not discontinuous,
She is sure to have a distinguished husband and give birth to a son.¹¹⁰
If one’s two brows pay court to each other,
It indicates that at an early age she will wear a pearl-decked cap.
If one’s gait resembles an immortal in flight,
And the sound of one’s voice is ethereal and clear,
She is sure to benefit her husband and gain wealth,
Obtaining a title of nobility at twenty-six.

But she is disadvantaged because:

If the left eye is large,
She will lose her father at an early age.
If the right eye is small,
She will lose her mother within the year.¹¹¹
If one has a mole beneath the left corner of the mouth,
She will suffer constant trouble from backbiting.¹¹²
If one has a mole on the right cheek,
She will win her husband’s lifelong love and respect.

If one’s forehead is sedate and proper, and one’s ‘five features’ are well-matched,
If one’s mouth appears to be daubed with rouge,
and one’s gait is easy-going,

If one's 'treasuries' and 'storehouses' are full,¹¹³ one's wealth and emolument ample,
She can rely on obtaining the lifelong affection of some distinguished person."¹¹⁴

Immortal Wu Physiognomizes the Exalted and the Humble

When Immortal Wu had finished physiognomizing them, the women all bit their fingers, acknowledging the supernatural efficacy of his art. Hsi-men Ch'ing had sealed up five taels of silver to give to Immortal Wu and also provided five mace of silver for the servant from Commandant Chou's headquarters, along with a note of thanks for his master.

Immortal Wu repeatedly refused to accept this remuneration, saying, "This humble Taoist:
Wanders like a cloud among the four quarters,"¹¹⁵

Dining in the wind and sleeping in the dew,¹¹⁶

Transforming and saving the myriad creatures.

It was no more than a momentary impulse that led Commandant Chou to send me over here. What would I want this money for?¹¹⁷

I absolutely refuse to accept it.¹¹⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing had no alternative but to bring out a bolt of muslin, saying, "Won't you accept this, Reverend Sir, to make a topcoat out of?"

Only then did Immortal Wu deign to accept it. Instructing his page boy to stow it in his scripture bag, he bowed in thanks to Hsi-men Ch'ing and saluted him in the Taoist manner by touching one hand to his forehead. Hsi-men Ch'ing escorted him as far as the main gate, where he proceeded nonchalantly to:

Float ethereally upon his way.¹¹⁹

Truly:

At the two ends of his staff he bears
the sun and the moon,
Within his solitary gourd he conceals mountains and rivers.¹²⁰

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished seeing off Immortal Wu, he returned to the rear reception hall and asked Yüeh-niang and the others what they thought of the fortunes that had been predicted for them.

"The fortunes were all fine enough," said Yüeh-niang, "but there are three people whose physiognomies he was unable to read aright."

"Which three people's physiognomies was he unable to read aright?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It was no great feat to suggest that Sister Li was expecting and would give birth to a distinguished son," said Yüeh-niang, "since it is obvious enough that she is pregnant right now. So much for that. In physiognomizing our own Ta-chieh, he said that in the future she would suffer a calamity, but he didn't specify what sort of a calamity it would be. In physiognomizing Ch'un-mei, he said that in the future she, too, would give birth to a distinguished son. No doubt he figured that you must have had your way with her. After all:

Who can anticipate what children and grandchildren an individual may have?

But the prediction that I find it hardest to believe is that in the future Ch'un-mei will wear a pearl-decked cap and receive a title of nobility. After all, nobody in our family is an official, so where would a pearl-decked cap come from? And even if there were a pearl-decked cap, it would hardly end up on her head."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, saying, "He predicted that I would have the joy of:

Ascending to the clouds from the level ground,
and the glory of:

Appointment to office and augmented emolument.

Now where would I get an official appointment from?

"When he saw Ch'un-mei standing together with the rest of you, but dressed differently than a servant, wearing an informal cloud-shaped chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, he must have assumed that she was either a natural or adopted daughter of ours, who might someday marry into a prominent household or bring a distinguished husband into the family. That's why he said that she might be fated to wear a pearl-decked cap.

"It has always been true that:

You may calculate a person's fate,
But you can't predict his conduct.¹²¹
Likeness will appear in accord with mind,
Likeness will disappear in accord with mind.

Since Commandant Chou sent him to us, we could hardly disregard him. I had him physiognomize us so as not to be discourteous, that's all."

When he had done speaking, Yüeh-niang served him lunch in the master suite. After he had finished eating, Hsi-men Ch'ing took a plantain-leaf fan in his hand and strolled idly into the garden, ending up in the great summer-house, the Hall of Assembled Vistas.

All the way round blinds are suspended over the latticework,
On all four sides flowers and trees cast intersecting shadows.¹²²

It was just high noon. All he could hear was:

From deep in the green shade,¹²³
The strains of the cicada's stridulation.

Suddenly:

A breeze wafted the scent of the flowers,¹²⁴
Invading the senses as it struck the nose.

There are two poems that testify to this:

Amid green trees the shade is luxuriant;
the summer days are long;
The reflections of towers and terraces are upside-down in the pond.
The curtain of crystal beads is stirred as the gentle breeze blows;
A single arbor of roses fills the entire courtyard with fragrance.¹²⁵

In the secluded grounds of the country villa
the summer grass is green;
The pomegranates are everywhere in bloom,
shining through the blinds.
Shadows of locust trees cover the ground;
it is just high noon;
From time to time one hears the stridulation of new-fledged cicadas.¹²⁶

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down on a chair and was cooling himself with the fan in his hand when he saw the two page boys, Lai-an and Hua-t'ung, come in to draw some water from the well.

"One of you come over here," he said, "and fetch some ice from the underground storehouse to put in a basin for me."

Lai-an promptly came forward, and Hsi-men Ch'ing told him, "Go to the rear compound and tell your sister, Ch'un-mei, that if she has any damson punch, she should bring a jug of it here and put it in the ice bowl to cool."

Lai-an assented and went off on his errand. After some time had elapsed, who should appear but Ch'un-mei. She was dressed in her everyday garb, with her head uncovered, wearing an informal cloud-shaped chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, a pale blue homespun tunic, and a peach red linen skirt. In her hand she carried a jug of candied damson punch.

Giggling as she came, she asked, "Have you had anything to eat yet?"

"I've already eaten in the master suite in the rear compound," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"No wonder you didn't come into our quarters," Ch'un-mei said. "I'll put this damson punch into the ice here, so you can drink it when it's chilled."

Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded his head. When Ch'un-mei had finished icing the damson punch, she came over and leaned on the back of his chair.

Taking the plantain-leaf fan out of Hsi-men Ch'ing's hand, she proceeded to fan him with it, asking, "What was the First Lady talking to you about just now?"

"About the way Immortal Wu physiognomized us," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"That Taoist stated, out of the blue, that I would wear a pearl-decked cap," said Ch'un-mei, "which caused the First Lady to remark, 'even if there were a pearl-decked cap, it would hardly end up on her head.' As the saying goes:

Ordinary individuals cannot be judged by their faces;
The ocean's waters cannot be measured by the peck.¹²⁷

It has always been true that:

What you can't round on the lathe,
You can round with an axe.¹²⁸

How can one foretell who may not:

Depend upon his wife's connections
for his daily bread?

Does she mean to suggest that I'm doomed to remain a slave in your household forever?"

"Little oily mouth," Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, "that's nonsense. If you should bear a child someday, you'll get to put your hair up like a regular lady."

Thereupon, taking her onto his lap, he took her hand in his and began to toy with her, asking, "Is your mother in the rear compound, or in her own quarters? How is it I haven't seen her?"

"Mother's in her room," said Ch'un-mei. "She told Ch'iu-ch'ü to heat some water for a bath but couldn't wait for her to finish and lay down on her bed for a nap."

"After I've drunk the damson punch," Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "I'll go have some fun with her."

Thereupon Ch'un-mei reached into the ice basin and poured out a cupful of damson punch for Hsi-men Ch'ing. When he had swallowed a mouthful, the bone-chilling cold:

Pierced his heart and numbed his teeth,
in the same way that:

Sweet dew suffuses the heart.¹²⁹

In a little while he finished the punch and then, leaning on Ch'un-mei's shoulder, made his way around by the postern gate until he arrived at Chin-lien's bedroom. When he lifted aside the portiere and went in, he saw that directly in front of him the woman was lying asleep on her newly purchased bedstead of inlaid mother-of-pearl.

It so happens that, because Li P'ing-erh had an alcove bedstead of inlaid mother-of-pearl in her quarters, the woman had subsequently induced Hsi-men Ch'ing to spend sixty taels of silver in order to buy a balustraded bedstead of inlaid mother-of-pearl for her. Facing the interior of the bed, the two side panels were decorated with inlaid mother-of-pearl designs depicting:

Towers and terraces, halls and chambers,¹³⁰

Flowers and foliage, birds and animals.¹³¹

The three comb-back shaped back rests inside were decorated with the motif of pines, bamboos, and plum blossoms, the "three cold-weather friends." From the tester there hung:

Bed curtains of purple gauze, held in place by:

Brocade sashes and silver hooks,
while from either side:

Aromatic pomanders were suspended.

The woman's:

Jade body was completely naked.

Wearing nothing but a bodice of red chiffon, under a coverlet of red silk, her head resting on a mandarin duck pillow, she lay on the cool bamboo bed mat:

In a state of slumbering oblivion.¹³²

Within the room:

An exotic fragrance assailed the nostrils.¹³³

No sooner did Hsi-men Ch'ing catch sight of her than, before he knew it, his:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Ordering Ch'un-mei to close the door and go outside, he quietly took off his clothes and got into bed. When he lifted aside the silk coverlet, her jade body lay half concealed and half revealed. Bent on mischief, he gently separated her two thighs, positioned his jade chowrie handle, and slowly inserted it into her vagina. By the time:

Her starry eyes flashed open with surprise, he had already succeeded in thrusting and retracting several tens of times.¹³⁴

Opening her eyes wide, the woman laughed, saying, "You crazy ruffian! When did you sneak in here without anyone's knowing it? I was sleeping and didn't realize it. I was just enjoying my sleep and you still want to plague me to death."

"It's only me, so it doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "But if it were a strange man who got in, you'd probably still pretend not to realize it."

"I'd just be wasting my breath on you!" the woman said. "Who else would have the:

Seven heads and eight galls, to come into this room of mine? You're the only one allowed in here. How can you be so:

Oblivious to distinctions of status?"¹³⁵

It so happens that the woman, because she had overheard Hsi-men Ch'ing praising the whiteness of Li P'ing-erh's body in the Kingfisher Pavilion the other day, had secretly mixed the stamens of jasmine blossoms with butter-fat and face powder and rubbed the mixture over her entire body, until it was:

White and glossy, shiny and smooth,

Exuding a palpable exotic fragrance,¹³⁶

in the hope of gaining Hsi-men Ch'ing's affection and replacing her rival in his favor.

Thereupon Hsi-men Ch'ing, observing that her body was snow-white, and that she was wearing the pair of scarlet sleeping shoes that she had just made, assumed a squatting position on top of her, lifted up her thighs with his two hands, and proceeded to thrust with all his strength:

Bending his head the better to observe,

The sight presented as he went in and out.¹³⁷

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" the woman said. "What are you looking at so attentively? My complexion is black; no match for the white of Li P'ing-erh's body, that's all there is to it. Now that she's pregnant, you're:

Casually enamored and anxiously concerned,¹³⁸ on her behalf. The rest of us are only pickups that you can pester like this whenever you please."

"I hear you've been waiting for me to take a bath," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"How did you know that?" the woman asked.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told her what Ch'un-mei had said.

"You go ahead and bathe," the woman said. "I'll have Ch'un-mei bring the water in."

It wasn't long before the bathing tub was carried into the room and filled with hot water. The two of them got out of bed in order to:

Bathe together in the orchid-scented bath, and Emulate the pleasures of fish in the water.

Thereupon:

Replenishing the bath and changing the water,¹³⁹ they proceeded to bathe for a while.

Acting on a whim, Hsi-men Ch'ing placed the woman so that she was reclining faceup on the bathing-board, took her pair of feet in his two hands, straddled her and thrust away, lifting her body into the air as he rammed away at her no less than two or three hundred times. The sound they made was just like:

Crabs scuttling in the mud;

The noise was incessant.

The woman, fearing lest her:

Fragrant locks should tumble awry, held her clouds of hair in place with one hand while holding onto the bathing-board with the other. Meanwhile:

The swallow's cries and oriole's notes,¹⁴⁰ that issued from her mouth:

Were too multifarious to describe in detail.

What did this battle look like? Behold:

P'an Chin-lien Enjoys a Midday Battle in the Bathtub

The waters of the flowery pond are agitated, the ripples turbulent;
The turquoise curtains are rolled high,
autumn clouds threaten.
The talented gentleman's feelings are aroused,
he wants to engage;
The woman of beauty's heart is impatient to show off her skill.
One of them is all aquiver as he sticks out his adamantite spear;
The other is all aswagger as she brandishes her implacable sword.

One of them "risks death and forgets life,"¹⁴¹
 as he bores his way in;
 The other proves "addicted to clouds and rain,"¹⁴²
 as she strives for victory.
 With a p'u-p'u tung-tung the backsides beat a tattoo;
 With a pi-pi po-po the spear collides with the sword.
 With a p'a-p'a t'a-t'a they create a resounding racket;
 With a p'eng-p'eng p'ai-p'ai they end up all of a heap.
 Low-low, high-high, the water seems to run upstream;
 Splashing, plashing, the overflow creates a freshet.
 Slippery, slithery, how can they call a halt?
 Grasping, shoving, it is hard to stay in place.
 One comes, the other goes, ranging south and north;¹⁴³
 One lunges, the other butts, seeking east and west.
 Hot steam, billowing, gives rise to ominous clouds;
 Redolent, perfumed; fragrant vapor is dispersed.
 One of them, propelling her craft against the current,
 Sets her jade legs into motion.
 The other, just as the helmsman grips the tiller,
 Keeps her golden lotuses in hand.
 One of them, like a stallion run amok,
 shows off his prowess;
 The other, like a pale-faced sorceress,
 meets his cavalry charge.
 Happy and joyous are the feelings of the beautiful woman;
 Rough and ready are the desires of the young gentleman.
 Topsy-turvy, their only pursuit is gratification;
 Higgedy-piggedy, their feelings are all in a daze.
 "A life-or-death struggle,"¹⁴⁴ neither one will call a halt;
 "To triumph in every battle,"¹⁴⁵ they vie with heart and gall.
 Continually protesting, again and again,
 she threatens murder;
 High-spirited and stiff-necked, his ardor remains undimmed.
 In ancient times and modern, such contests have been countless;
 But none of them was the equal of this battle in the bathtub.

At the time, the two of them tangled in the water for a while, until Hsi-men Ch'ing ejaculated, bringing the contest to a halt. When they had rubbed themselves clean, the bathing tub was removed. Wearing nothing but short undershirts of thin floss silk, they got onto the bed, where a bed table had been prepared for them, replete with wine and delicacies.

"Bring some distilled spirits for your father to drink," the woman instructed Ch'iu-chü.

She also took some stuffed pastries out of a square box on the shelf of her bed cabinet and gave them to Hsi-men Ch'ing to eat, fearing he might have an empty stomach.

It was some time before Ch'iu-chü reappeared with a silver flagon of wine. The woman was just about to pour it into a cup when she felt it and, finding it to be ice cold, threw the contents right into Ch'iu-chü's face, soaking her:

Head and face alike.

"Why you lousy dead duck of a slave!" she railed at her. "I told you to decant it for him, but how could you have brought cold wine for Father to drink? Who knows what you've got on your mind?"

"Drag this slave out to the courtyard for me," she told Ch'un-mei, "and make her kneel down there."

"I had just gone out back," said Ch'un-mei, "to roll up Mother's foot bindings for her. I was hardly out of the way for a moment, and you've already gotten into mischief."

Pouting with her lips, Ch'iu-chü mumbled to herself, "Father and Mother have been drinking iced wine every day. Who could have known that today they would change their tune?"

When the woman heard this, she cursed her, saying, "Why you lousy slave! What did you say? Drag her over here."

"Give her ten slaps on each side of her face," she ordered Ch'un-mei.

"I wouldn't want to dirty my hands on that thick-skinned face of hers," said Ch'un-mei. "Mother, just have her kneel down with a stone balanced on her head, that's all."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,
she was dragged out to the courtyard and made to kneel with a large stone balanced on her head. But no more of this.

The woman, once more, instructed Ch'un-mei to warm some wine and shared several cups with Hsi-men Ch'ing. The wine and the table were then removed, the silk bed curtains were let down, and Ch'un-mei was instructed to fasten the door to the room. The two of them then:

Arm around head and thigh over thigh,
Physically exhausted, went to sleep.

Truly:

If you do not find her on the peak of the Mountain of Teeming Jade,
You must seek her in King Huai's dream upon the Radiant Terrace.¹⁴⁶

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 30

LAI-PAO ESCORTS THE SHIPMENT OF BIRTHDAY GIFTS; HSI-MEN CH'ING BEGETS A SON AND GAINS AN OFFICE

Success and failure, flourishing and decay,¹ are all inconsequential;²
To deploy every device at your disposal³ is likewise of no avail.
Human desires are never satisfied,⁴ like a snake swallowing an elephant;⁵
The affairs of this world, in the end, are like a mantis seizing a cicada.⁶
There is no medicine that is able to cure⁷
the aging of high officials;
No amount of money will purchase the virtue of one's sons and grandsons.⁸
To rest content with one's ordinary lot and take things as they come;
Is the way to enjoy a carefree life of free and easy wandering.⁹

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing and P'an Chin-lien had finished bathing, they went to sleep together in her room. Ch'un-mei was sitting on a cool chair outside in the corridor, stitching the sole of a shoe, when what should she see but Ch'in-t'ung:

Sticking out his head and craning his neck, around the postern gate.

"What have you got to say," Ch'un-mei asked.

Ch'in-t'ung also noticed that Ch'iu-chü was kneeling in the courtyard with a stone balanced on her head and proceeded to prance around and point at her.

"You crazy jailbird!" Ch'un-mei railed at him. "If you have something to say, just say it, that's all. Why bother:

Gesticulating with both hands and feet?"

Ch'in-t'ung continued laughing for some time before saying, "Chang An, the caretaker of the family graveyard, is waiting outside to speak to Father."

"You lousy jailbird!" Ch'un-mei said. "So it's Chang An, is it? What's the need for:

Such a great show of consternation, as though you'd seen a ghost, or something? Keep it quiet. Father and Mother are asleep inside the room. If you wake them up, you'll be done for. Just tell Chang An to wait outside a while."

Ch'in-t'ung went outside and, after waiting there for what seemed like half a day, came back again and peered around the postern gate, asking, "Sister, is Father up yet or not?"

"You crazy jailbird!" exclaimed Ch'un-mei.

"Barging right in without more ado, that way! You gave me quite a start.

As though you didn't know any better,¹⁰ you've come back a second time like a homeless ghost."

"Chang An is still waiting for Father to come out and see him," said Ch'in-t'ung. "After speaking to him, he has to get out through the city gate before it's closed for the night."

"Father and Mother are fast asleep," said Ch'un-mei. "Who would dare disturb them? Tell Chang An to wait a little longer before going. If it becomes too late for him to get home today, tell him to go back tomorrow."

As they were talking, who would have thought that Hsi-men Ch'ing over-heard them from inside the room.

Calling Ch'un-mei inside, he asked, "Who's talking?"

"Ch'un-mei replied, 'The page boy, Ch'in-t'ung, has come in to say that the caretaker of the graveyard, Chang An, is outside and wants to have a word with you.'"

"Get me something to put on," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I'll get up and go out."

While Ch'un-mei was helping Hsi-men Ch'ing into his clothes, Chin-lien asked, "What has Chang An come to talk about?"

"Chang An came the other day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to tell me that Widow Chao's country estate, which is adjacent to our ancestral graveyard, is being offered for sale, landed property and all. The asking price is three hundred taels of silver, but I'm only willing to give her two hundred and fifty taels. I instructed Chang An to negotiate with her. If the sale is agreed to, I'll have Pen the Fourth and Ch'en Ching-chi go out to pay over the silver.

"There are four wells on the grounds, complete with well railings, from which water can be drawn. If I buy this property, I'll open it up and combine it with my own. I plan to build three summerhouses, three reception halls, an artificial hill, a garden, a juniper hedge, a locust tree arbor, well pavilions, an archery range, a kickball field, and other recreational facilities. It may cost a few taels of silver to do it, but what of that."

"What indeed!" said the woman. "Go ahead and buy it. In the future when your womenfolk have occasion to visit the graveyard, they'll have something pleasurable to do when they get there."

When they had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the front of the compound to talk to Chang An.

Chin-lien got up and, pausing in front of her dressing mirror to:

Retouch her powdered face, and Recomb her cloudy locks,

came out into the courtyard to see to the beating of Ch'iu-chü. Ch'un-mei went outside and called in Ch'in-t'ung to wield the cane.

Chin-lien interrogated the culprit, saying, "I told you to fetch the wine. But how could you have brought cold wine for your father to drink? It seems that if anyone in the household, great or small, has the temerity to offer you a word of criticism, you're prepared to brazen it out:

With nail-like mouth and iron tongue."¹¹

She then shouted an order to Ch'in-t'ung, "Give this slave twenty strokes with the cane, well laid on."

Ch'in-t'ung had only administered ten strokes when, luckily for the culprit, Li P'ing-erh came over with an ingratiating smile and persuaded her mistress to put an end to the punishment, so Ch'iu-chü was spared ten lashes. Chin-lien ordered her to kowtow to Li P'ing-erh, after which she let her get up and go off to the kitchen.

"Old Mother Feng," said Li P'ing-erh, "has shown up with a fourteen-year-old slave girl in tow. Our second sister in the rear compound is going to buy her to serve in her quarters. The asking price is seven taels and five candareens of silver. She'd like you to come have a look at her before she completes the transaction."

Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh thereupon went back to the rear compound together. As expected, Li Chiao-erh asked Hsi-men Ch'ing for the money and paid seven taels of silver for the slave girl. She changed her name to Hsia-hua and employed her in her quarters. But no more of this. Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment and speak of something else.

Let us now return to the story of how Lai-pao and Wu Tien-en escorted the shipment of birthday gifts to the capital. From the time they set out from Ch'ing-ho district, all along the way:

Every morning they took to the purple road;

Each evening they tramped the red dust.

When hungry they ate, when thirsty they drank;

Stopping by night and traveling by day.¹²

It was the time of the greatest heat, when:

The weather is steaming hot,

Melting rock and liquefying metal, and travelers find it extremely rough going.

To make a long story short, one day they arrived outside the Myriad Years Gate of the Eastern Capital and sought out an inn at which to take lodgings for the night. The next day, bearing the consignment of birthday gifts with which they had been entrusted, they proceeded straight to the gate of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's mansion by the Heavenly River Bridge, where they paused to reconnoiter. Lai-pao told the manager, Wu Tien-en, to take charge of the gifts, while he, himself, donned his black livery and proceeded to salute the gatekeeper with a bow.

"Where do you come from?" the gatekeeper asked.

"We are servants of the Honorable Hsi-men Ch'ing of Ch'ing-ho district in Shantung," Lai-pao replied, "and have come to present birthday gifts to His Honor."

"You lousy dead duck of a convict!" the gatekeeper railed at him. "You may make much of your Honorable 'Eastgate' or Honorable 'Westgate'¹³ where you come from. But at the present time, His Honor, our master, is:

Under but one man, and Above a myriad men."¹⁴

No matter whether it be one of the:

Three dukes or eight ministers;

or whether it be a:

Noble scion or royal princeling;¹⁵ who would dare to use such presumptuous language before His Honor's mansion? Stand back, and make it snappy!"

Among the gatekeepers there was one who recognized Lai-pao and placated him, saying, "This is a newly appointed gatekeeper who has only been on the job a few days. He didn't recognize you. Don't take offense. If you want an audience with His Honor, wait until I ask Uncle Chai Ch'ien to come out and see you."

Lai-pao then reached into his sleeve, pulled out a packet of silver weighing one tael, and gave it to the man.

"That's not necessary as far as I'm concerned," the man said. "But add an equal amount and give it to these two functionaries. You've got to make allowances for them."

Lai-pao hastily produced three packets of silver, one tael for each, and distributed them accordingly. Only then did the original gatekeeper show something like a smile.

"Since you have come from Ch'ing-ho district," he said, "just wait a little, and I'll take you in first to see the majordomo, Chai Ch'ien. His Honor has just returned from burning incense at the Precious Tablet Temple of Highest Clarity¹⁶ and is taking a nap in his studio."

It was some time before the majordomo, Chai Ch'ien, appeared. He was wearing sandals, white socks, and a long black silk Taoist robe.

As soon as Lai-pao saw him, he kowtowed, and Majordomo Chai returned his salutation, saying, "Your efforts on a former occasion are appreciated, and now you have come to present birthday gifts to His Honor."

Lai-pao handed him a sealed document and, after a servant had presented two bolts of Nanking silk and thirty taels of silver, said, "My master, Hsi-men Ch'ing, sends his respects to Master Chai.

Having nothing suitable to express his feelings, he offers these paltry gifts for Master Chai to dispense as he sees fit. On a former occasion, in connection with the Wang Ssu-feng affair, he is deeply appreciative of Master Chai's efforts."

"These gifts," said Chai Ch'ien, "I really ought not to accept. But, enough! Enough! I will provisionally accept them."

Lai-pao also handed him the list of birthday presents for the grand preceptor.

After perusing it, he returned it to Lai-pao, telling him, "Have the gifts carried in and wait inside the second inner gate."

It so happened that on the west side of the courtyard inside the second inner gate there was an eighteen-foot-wide structure, situated with its back to the south and its front facing north, where miscellaneous persons and those who came and went on errands were entertained with tea while they waited. In no time at all a young page boy brought out two cups of tea and gave them to Lai-pao and manager Wu Tien-en to drink.

In a short while, the grand preceptor, Ts'ai Ching himself, came into the reception hall. Chai Ch'ien first reported the situation to the grand preceptor, after which the latter ordered Lai-pao and Manager Wu to present themselves, and the two of them knelt down below the dais. Chai Ch'ien first handed up the list of birthday presents for the grand preceptor to peruse, while Lai-pao and Manager Wu made a formal presentation of the gifts. Behold:

Blazing yellow,
Gold pitchers and jade cups;
Glittering silver,
Enchased immortal figurines.
Created by skilled craftsmen, they cost much expenditure of effort;
Wrought by deft artificers, they are seldom seen among mankind.
Brocaded python robes,
Whose variegated colors dazzle the eye.
Heavy Nanking silks,
The golds and greens of which blend their hues.
The finest Yang-kao vintage from Fen-chou,

Lai Pao Presents the Shipment of Birthday Gifts

Encrusted with its authenticating seals.
Exotic fruits and seasonal rarities,
Piled high in platters and boxes.

How could he help but be pleased?¹⁷

“As for these gifts,” he said, “It really wouldn’t be right to accept them. You had better take them back with you.”

This threw Lai-pao and his companion into such a state of consternation that they kowtowed below the dais, saying, “Our master, Hsi-men Ch’ing:

Having no other way to pay his respects,¹⁸
proffers these:

Paltry and insignificant gifts,¹⁹
to His Honor for him to dispense as he sees fit.”

“If that is the case,” said the grand preceptor, “let my attendants take possession of them.”

The attendants and waiting men to either side then proceeded to remove all the presents and put them away.

The grand preceptor further went on to say, “The other day, in connection with that matter of the merchant Wang Ssu-feng in Ts’ang-chou, I have already sent someone to deliver a letter about the case to your grand coordinator, Hou Meng. Has he acted on the requested favor or not?”

“As a result of Your Honor’s celestial grace,” Lai-pao replied, “your letter no sooner arrived than the salt merchants involved were all taken before the Salt Distribution Commission, had their tallies returned to them, and were duly released.”

The grand preceptor then turned to Lai-pao and said, “The presents I have provisionally accepted. But I have repeatedly benefited from your master’s efforts on my behalf:

Without having anything to offer in return.

What am I to do? Does your master hold any post or commission?”

“My master,” said Lai-pao, “is but:

A humble villager.

What post or commission could he hold?”

“So he holds no post or commission,” said the grand preceptor. “Yesterday the emperor happened to consign several blank orders of appointment²⁰ to me. If I were to appoint your master to the post of assistant judicial commissioner of the local office of the Shantung Provincial Surveillance Commission, in order to fill the vacancy left by the promotion of Assistant Judicial Commissioner Ho Chin, how would that be?”

Lai-pao hastily kowtowed in thanks, saying:

“His obligations to you are so great, that even if my master and his entire household should have:

Their heads pulverized and their bodies dismembered,²¹

They could hardly hope to repay you.”

Thereupon, the grand preceptor directed an attendant clerk to bring in his writing desk and forthwith signed and sealed a blank order of appointment, filling in Hsi-men Ch’ing’s name, and designating him a battalion vice-commander in the Left Guard of the Embroidered-Uniform Guard unit of the Imperial Insignia Guard, and concurrently, assistant judicial commissioner in the Ch’ing-ho office of the Shantung Provincial Surveillance Commission.

Turning to Lai-pao, the grand preceptor said, “The two of you have gone to great pains in delivering these birthday gifts to me.”

He then went on to ask, “What is the relationship to you of the person kneeling behind you?”

Lai-pao was about to report that he was an employee, when Manager Wu stepped forward and said, “I am Hsi-men Ch’ing’s brother-in-law. My name is Wu Tien-en.”

“So you are Hsi-men Ch’ing’s brother-in-law,” the grand preceptor said. “You look to me to have a decent enough demeanor.”

Then he directed an attendant clerk to bring him an order of appointment, and said, “I’ll appoint you to the post of station master of the Ch’ing-ho Postal Relay Station. You ought to be able to handle that.”

Wu Tien-en was so flustered by this that he proceeded to:

Kowtow as though he were pounding garlic.²²

The grand preceptor then took up another order of appointment and filled in Lai-pao’s name, appointing him as a commandant on the staff of the Prince of Yün.²³

Both of them kowtowed in gratitude and took possession of their orders of appointment.

The grand preceptor instructed them, “Tomorrow morning you must report to the Ministry of Personnel and the Ministry of War in order to register your names, receive your credentials, and learn the deadlines by which you must report for duty in order to carry out your commissions.”²⁴

He also instructed Chai Ch’ien, “See that they are entertained with food and wine in the anteroom on the west side of the courtyard, and get ten taels of silver to give the two of them for their expenses on the road.”

But no more of this.

Gentle reader take note: At that time, during the reign of emperor Huitsung:

The empire was badly governed;

Wicked ministers held positions of power,²⁵

Slanderers and sycophants filled the court.²⁶

The four wicked ministers, Kao Ch’iu, Yang Chien, T’ung Kuan, and Ts’ai Ching, presided at court:

Selling offices and bartering justice,²⁷

Flagrantly trafficking in bribes;²⁸

Promoting officials with scales in hand,

Pointing to the post and demanding the price.

Those who resorted to:

Truckling and insinuation,
Rapidly rose to high position.

Those who were:

Worthy, able, honest, and straightforward,
Went for years without appointment.

As a result:

Public mores deteriorated.
Venal officials and corrupt functionaries,
Overspread the entire empire.
The burdens of corvee and taxation were heavy,
The people were impoverished and bandits arose.
The empire was ripe for revolt.²⁹
Solely because the wicked and sycophantic occupied positions of power,
It was only appropriate that the Central Plain should become soaked in blood.³⁰

Chai Ch'ien then proceeded to invite Lai-pao and Manager Wu into an antechamber to be entertained. From the kitchen there appeared a complete array of soups, dishes, and savories, in:

Large platters and large bowls;
The meat as rich as flower cakes,³¹
The wine as lustrous as amber.

After they had eaten their fill, Chai Ch'ien turned to Lai-pao and said, "There is something that I would like to request your master to take care of for me, but I don't know if he would be willing to undertake it or not."

"How can you talk that way, Master Chai?" said Lai-pao. "In view of the way you have looked after my master's interests in dealing with His Honor, no matter what you might ask, you have but to command, and he will:

Not fail to comply with your orders."

"There is no reason for me to deceive you," said Chai Ch'ien. "In my attendance on His Honor, day in and day out, I have but the single person of my wife to solace me. I am approaching forty years of age, constantly suffer from a variety of ailments, and have not been able to have any children. In forwarding my request to your master, just ask him if there should happen to be any healthy young girls in your neighborhood, around fourteen or fifteen years old, if he could seek one out and send her to me. For whatever cost this may incur, I will see that he is fully remunerated."

Thereupon, he sealed up a return present and a reply for Hsi-men Ch'ing and entrusted them to Lai-pao, also presenting the two of them with five taels of silver for their expenses on the road.

Lai-pao repeatedly refused to accept this gratuity, saying, "Just now His Honor has already rewarded us. You had better take this back, Master Chai."

"That was His Honor's business," said Chai Ch'ien, "while this is mine. There is no need for you to refuse."

When they had finished eating and drinking, Chai Ch'ien said, "I'll send a functionary from our staff to accompany you to your lodgings and facilitate your visit to the Ministry of Personnel and the Ministry of War tomorrow morning, to register your names, receive your credentials, and get started on your way. That will save you the need to go back and forth on the road in order to return here tomorrow. On receipt of my instructions, the ministries will not dare to delay in issuing your documents."

Thereupon, he summoned a functionary named Li Chung-yu and told him, "You accompany these two gentlemen tomorrow when they go to the ministries to register their names and receive their credentials, and then report back to me."

That functionary, along with Lai-pao and Wu Tien-en, then said goodbye, went out the gate of the mansion, and proceeded to the vicinity of Heavenly River Bridge, to a tavern that sold distilled spirits, in order to have a chat. After treating him to wine and food, Lai-pao gave Li Chung-yu three taels of silver and arranged with him that, early the next morning, he should take them first to the Ministry of Personnel and then to the Ministry of War, to register their names and receive their credentials.

On hearing that they came from His Honor the grand preceptor's mansion, who would have dared to be dilatory, or refuse to:

Act upon it even in defiance of the law?

Chu Mien, the defender-in-chief of the Imperial Insignia Guard, promptly applied his seal, signed the authorizing documents, and transmitted them to the heads of the appropriate offices, thereby appointing Lai-pao to serve on the staff of the Princely Establishment of the Prince of Yün in Shantung. He also sent a calling card in reply to Majordomo Chai Ch'ien.

In less than two days, everything necessary had been taken care of, so they hired mounts and set out that very day to return to Ch'ing-ho district and report the good news. Truly:

Wealth and distinction are only to be gained by guile and craft;
Success and fame are utterly dependent on Teng T'ung's money.³²

To resume our story, one day, during the dog days of summer, when the weather was extremely hot, the members of the Hsi-men family gathered in the great summerhouse, the Hall of Assembled Vistas, in order to enjoy the lotus blossoms, escape the heat, and drink wine together. Wu Yüeh-niang and Hsi-men Ch'ing occupied the places of honor, the various concubines and Hsi-men Ta-chieh arranged themselves on the two sides, and Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yu-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang, the four household musicians, stood in attendance to play their instruments and sing. What were the revels like that day? Behold:

Urns are planted with green shrubs,
Vases are studded with red blossoms.
Portieres of beaded crystal furl their "shrimps' whiskers," Screens of inlaid mica display their peacocks' tails.
Platters are piled with unicorn flesh;
Smiling beauties proffer goblets of iridescent hue.
Basins harbor submerged iced peaches;
Lovely women raise on high beakers made of chrysoprase.
Dainties are prepared of the rarest kind,
Fruits are provided just in season.
Pipes and strings accompany the songs,
Producing a surge of pure melody and lovely harmony.
Clad in silks and decked with jewelry,
There stand two rows of dancing girls and singing boys.
During the feast the red ivory inlays of the clappers resound,
The entire surface of the dancing skirts is comprised of brocade.
Thus does one dissipate the idle days within the Taoist's gourd;³³
Journeying beyond the corporeal realm in the universe of the drunk.³⁴

As Hsi-men Ch'ing's wife and concubines were enjoying their wine, it was noticed that Li P'ing-erh was absent.

Turning to Hsiu-ch'un, Yüeh-niang asked, "What has your mistress returned to her room for? Why doesn't she come and drink wine with the rest of us?"

"My mistress is suffering from pains in the abdomen," Hsiu-ch'un replied. "She's sprawled out in her room at the moment but will be here shortly."

"Why don't you quickly go and speak to her?" said Yüeh-niang. "Tell her not to sprawl about that way, but come and sit down with us properly, and listen to the singing for a while."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked Yüeh-niang, "What's up?" and she replied, "Sister Li has suddenly developed abdominal pains and is lying down in her room. I've just sent her junior maidservant to ask her to join us."

Turning then to Yü-lou, she said, "Sister Li must be in the last month of her term. I fear it may be a miscarriage."

"Elder Sister," said P'an Chin-lien, "how could she be due in this month? My guess is it will be an eighth-month child. It's early days yet."

"If it's still too early," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "send a maidservant to invite the Sixth Lady to come and listen to the singing."

Before long, Li P'ing-erh duly made her appearance among them.

"I fear you've caught a chill of some kind," Yüeh-niang said to her. "Have a cup of hot wine and I'm sure you'll feel better."

Before long, the cups in front of each of them were filled with wine, and Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Ch'un-mei, "Sing the song suite that begins with the words:

Everyone fears the days of summer,

for us."

Ch'un-mei and the other members of the quartet, after seeing to it that:

The bridges on the psaltery were ranged like wild geese,

and:

The silken strings of the mandola were properly tuned,
Opened their ruby lips,

Exposed their white teeth,³⁵ and proceeded to sing the song suite beginning with the tune "A Single Missive," the first line of which is:

Everyone fears the days of summer,³⁶

etc., etc.

Li P'ing-erh had put in an appearance at the party, but her brows were knit, and without even waiting till the song suite was finished, she returned to her room. Though Yüeh-niang was listening to the lyrics of the songs, she was worried about her and sent Hsiao-yü to her quarters to see how she was.

When she returned, she reported, "The Sixth Lady is suffering from abdominal pains and is writhing about on her k'ang."

Yüeh-niang exclaimed in consternation, "I said that her time must have come, but Sister Six here insisted that it was too early for that. Why don't you call in a page boy and send him to fetch a midwife as quickly as possible?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately ordered Lai-an, "Run like the wind and go fetch Midwife Ts'ai."

Thereupon, the wine-drinking came to a halt, and they all went to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to ask after her.

"Sister Li, how do you feel inside?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"First Lady," Li P'ing-erh replied, "in both my chest cavity and my lower abdomen I have a painful sensation of downward pressure."

"You ought to sit up," said Yüeh-niang. "Don't lie down any more. I'm afraid you might injure the fetus by writhing about that way. We've sent for the midwife, and she should be here any minute now."

In a little while, Li P'ing-erh's birth pangs gradually became more severe, and Yüeh-niang demanded to know, "Whoever was sent after the midwife, that she hasn't shown up by this time?"

"Father ordered Lai-an to go," said Tai-an.

"You jailbird!" Yüeh-niang cursed at him. "Why don't you get a move on yourself, and go meet them? It was absolutely senseless to send that child of a slave on such an errand. He doesn't know what's urgent and what isn't."

"Quickly, get on a mule and go after them," Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Tai-an.

"It's a matter of fiery urgency," said Yüeh-niang, "and you handle it like any ordinary affair:

Just as slow and easy as you please."

Now P'an Chin-lien, on seeing that Li P'ing-erh was about to give birth to a child, could not help being somewhat sore at heart. After observing the goings on in Li P'ing-erh's quarters for a while, she pulled Meng Yü-lou outside with her, and the two of them stood by a pillar under the eaves of the anteroom on the west side of the courtyard, to get a breath of fresh air and have a chat.

"Ai ya-ya!" she exclaimed. "On top of everything else, when it's as hot as it is, to crowd a whole roomful of people in there. It's not as though a child were being born, but as if they all want to see an elephant lay an egg."

After some time, who should they see coming through the gate but Midwife Ts'ai, who approached the group and asked, "Which of you is the mistress of the house?"

"This is the First Lady," said Li Chiao-erh, at which Midwife Ts'ai prostrated herself and performed the kowtow.

"We're imposing on you, Granny," said Yüeh-niang, "but why has it taken you so long to get here?"

"Listen to me, and I'll tell you all about it," said Midwife Ts'ai:

I'm a midwife whose surname is Ts'ai,
Whose two feet can move really fast.
Bedecked with strange green and queer red,
Whatever fret I've got on, it's awry.
My wire-inlaid earrings shine bright,
My yellow kerchief is fixed with a pin.
On arrival, I demand a tip wrapped in red,
Once seated, I expect good entertainment.
Be my client a spoiled girl from a noble house,
An imperial relative, or the mother of an emperor;
She'll have to let me examine her as I like,
Strip off her clothes and handle her at will.
A breech birth will require a cesarean,
Difficult deliveries call for rough handling.
Whether it be the umbilical cord or the placenta,
If need be, I may have to tear it with my hands.
If the child live, I attend the third day lustration;³⁷
If it should die, I clear out as fast as I can.
For these reasons, my patrons are numerous,
So, when called for, I'm not to be found."

"That's enough of your idle chatter," said Yüeh-niang. "Be so good as to take a look at this lady, who's about to bear a child.”

Midwife Ts'ai approached the bed, felt Li P'ing-erh's body with her hands, and announced, "Her time has come." She then went on to ask, "First Lady, do you have on hand the swaddling clothes and absorbent grass paper that will be needed?"

"I do," replied Yüeh-niang, who then instructed Hsiao-yü, "Quickly now, go to my room and fetch them."

To resume our story, when Meng Yü-lou saw that the midwife had arrived, she said to Chin-lien, "Midwife Ts'ai has come. Why don't we go into the room and see what's going on?"

Chin-lien, on the one hand, refused to budge, and on the other, said, "If you want to watch, go ahead; but, as for me, I don't want to see it. She's the sister with a child, so she's in favor. Why shouldn't people want to see her?"

"A while ago, when I made the mistake of remarking that it seemed to me her child wasn't due this month, and probably wouldn't be until the eighth month, I got publicly chastised for it by Elder Sister. It seems to me that I really didn't deserve anything like that, and it's been bothering me ever since."

"I, too, thought it would be a sixth-month child," said Yü-lou.

"Now you're talking nonsense, too," said Chin-lien. "Let me work it out for you. She came here in the eighth month of last year. And she wasn't any:

Chaste chrysanthemum of a virgin,³⁸ either. The child could have been:

Conceived at an earlier time,

Only to be born in our house.

As a remarried wife, there's no knowing how many men she may have been involved with. Moreover, it takes a month or two for the fetus to develop. Even if you assume it to be a child belonging to our family, and that I spoke incorrectly; if it had been an eighth-month child, there might have been a semblance of our family in it. But if it is a sixth-month child, it's a case of:

Stepping on a low stool to paste up an effigy of the Spirit of the Perilous Paths;

You'll end up falling a hat's-height too short.³⁹

Once it has strayed out of familiar territory,

Where can you go to look for the missing calf?"⁴⁰

As they were talking, whom should they see but Hsiao-yü, carrying the absorbent grass paper, swaddling clothes, and a little sleeping mat out from the rear compound.

Meng Yü-lou said, "These are things that Elder Sister has prepared for her own use when she is brought to bed with a child, sooner or later, herself. She is letting them be used today in response to the emergency."

"One of them is the legitimate wife," said Chin-lien, "and the other is merely a concubine. But it seems that, in the future, so long as it's a childbearing competition they're engaged in, though neither one should produce a satisfactory baby, any piecemeal excuse for one will do. Even if my case should be like that of:

The purchased hen who doesn't lay eggs;

do you mean to say he'll simply kill me?"

"In any case," she went on to say, "No matter whether:

Things land right side up or upside down,⁴¹ one oughtn't to make the mistake of:

The dog who bites the inflated bladder;

Only to find his excitement deflated."⁴²

"What kind of talk is that, Fifth Sister?" said Meng Yü-lou.

After that, whenever she saw that Chin-lien was blurting things out:

Without any consideration for the consequences, she simply lowered her head, fiddled with her skirt, and declined to say anything in reply.

P'an Chin-lien leaned against the courtyard pillar with one hand, and stood with her foot resting on the raised threshold, cracking melon seeds with her teeth.

What should they see at this point but Sun Hsüeh-o from the rear compound, who had heard that Li P'ing-erh was in the process of bearing a child and had come running up in a state of obvious agitation:

Stumbling at every step,⁴³ to see what was happening. Carelessly, in the dark shadow of the doorway, she tripped over the edge of the stylobate and nearly came a cropper.

Chin-lien, on seeing this, said to Yü-lou, "Just look at that ingratiating slavey of a concubine! You'd better take it easy! What are you in such a hurry to risk your life for? If you had really come a cropper by tripping up in the shadow there and had broken a tooth, it would cost a pretty penny. Sister, you're like:

The radish peddler who tags along after the salt vendor:

forever horning in where you don't belong."⁴⁴

If you ever bear a child yourself, I suppose they'll reward you, concubine that you are, with the silk hat of an official."

After some time, from inside the room they heard:

The sound of a gurgling cry,⁴⁵ and knew that the baby had been born.

"Tell the head of the household," announced Midwife Ts'ai, "to prepare an appropriate gratuity. She has given birth to a boy."

When Wu Yüeh-niang reported this to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he hastily washed his hands:

Lit a full burner of incense,⁴⁶

and made a vow, before Heaven and Earth and the tablets of his ancestors, to sponsor an elaborate performance, of one hundred and twenty degrees, of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal, in order to pray for:

The safety of mother and child,

A fortunate parturition,⁴⁷ and

An untroubled accouchement.⁴⁸

Now P'an Chin-lien, realizing that the birth of the child was resulting in the:

Jollification of the entire family, who were:

All of a heap with excitement, only became angrier than ever. Taking herself off to her own room, she closed the door, lay down on her bed, and wept.

At the time it was the twenty-third day of the sixth month in the sixth year of the Cheng-ho reign period.⁴⁹ Truly:

One may find things less than satisfactory

eight or nine times out of ten;

But it is seldom wise to tell anyone about even two or three of them.

Midwife Ts'ai took charge of the baby, biting off its umbilical cord, and burying the placenta. She then decocted a "heart stabilizing potion"⁵⁰ for Li P'ing-erh to take and saw to it that the baby was comfortable. Yüeh-niang invited the midwife into the rear compound and entertained her with food and wine. When she was about to leave, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave her a single ingot of silver weighing five taels and also promised her a bolt of satin if she would come and preside at the third-day lustration ceremony. Midwife Ts'ai went out the gate with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand

expressions of gratitude.

That day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came into the room and first saw the armful of baby flesh, with its very fair complexion, he was as pleased as could be. The whole household was delighted. That night he slept in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, in the room that had the bed in it, and constantly came over to the room with the k'ang, where the mother and child were, in order to see the baby.

The next day, before daylight, he got up early and sent off page boys to deliver ten square boxes of celebratory noodles to his relatives, neighbors, and friends. When Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta heard that a son had been born to Hsi-men Ch'ing, and that he had sent celebratory noodles to them, they hastened:

Covering two steps with every one,⁵¹

to come and offer their congratulations. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited them to have some noodles with him in the summerhouse.

He had no sooner seen them on their way and was busy in the reception hall, about to send a page boy for a go-between in order to locate a wet nurse to suckle the child, when Auntie Hsüeh suddenly showed up with a wet nurse in tow.

It so happened that she was a wife, of humble social origin, twenty-nine years old, who had just lost a child, less than a month before. Her husband was a soldier and couldn't make a go of it. Fearing that if he went on campaign there would be no one to support her, he had decided to sell her and was only asking six taels of silver.

When Yüeh-niang saw that she seemed well-favored enough, she talked it over with Hsi-men Ch'ing, weighed out six taels of silver, and retained her services. She gave her the name Ju-i, or As You Like It, and assigned her the task of caring for the baby and suckling him, early and late.

Old Mother Feng was also sent for, to look after the needs of the lying-in room, while Li P'ing-erh recuperated from childbirth. She was given five mace of silver per month to take care of the laundry.

The household had been in an uproar all day, when P'ing-an suddenly announced that Lai-pao and Manager Wu had returned from the Eastern Capital and were now dismounting at the front gate. Before long, the two of them came inside and, on seeing Hsi-men Ch'ing, congratulated him.

"What is there to be congratulated about?"⁵² asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The two men then gave a full account, from beginning to end, of how they had arrived in the Eastern Capital, obtained an interview with Grand Preceptor Ts'ai, and presented the gifts to him.

"When His Honor saw the gifts, he was very pleased," reported Lai-pao. "He said, 'I have repeatedly been the recipient of your master's munificence:

Without having any means of repaying him.'

He then asked if your ancestors had held any appointments, and I said, 'He is but:

A humble villager,

who doesn't hold a commission of any kind.'

"His Honor the grand preceptor then said that the emperor had consigned several blank orders of appointment to him, and that he would assign one of them to you. So he filled in your name, designating you as a battalion vice-commander in the Imperial Insignia Guard, and appointing you to the post of assistant judicial commissioner of the local office of the Shantung Provincial Surveillance Commission, in order to fill the vacancy left by the promotion of Assistant Judicial Commissioner Ho Chin. He then appointed your servant to the post of commandant of the Iron Bell Guard, to serve on the staff of the Prince of Yün, and appointed Manager Wu to the post of station master of the Ch'ing-ho Postal Relay Station."

Thereupon, he took out the three uniformly signed and sealed orders of appointment, together with the authorizing credentials from the Ministry of Personnel and the Ministry of War, and the patent of nobility for his wife, and placed them on the table for Hsi-men Ch'ing to see.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that these documents were stamped with numerous seals, indicating imperial authorization according to precedent,⁵³ and that he really had been appointed to the position of battalion vice-commander, before he knew it:

Joy manifested itself about his temples
and between his brows;
Delight spread itself across his cheeks
and smiling face.

Picking up the imperial decrees in his hand, and taking them back to the rear compound to show to Wu Yüeh-niang and the other members of the family, he said, "His Honor the grand preceptor has favored me with an appointment to the position of battalion vice-commander in the Imperial Insignia Guard, which carries with it the title of grand master of the fifth rank. This entitles you to receive a patent of nobility inscribed on patterned damask, to ride in a carriage embellished with seven aromatic spices, and to be addressed by the honorific title of lady. He also concurrently appointed Manager Wu to the post of station master of the Ch'ing-ho Postal Relay Station, and Lai-pao to the post of commandant on the staff of the Prince of Yün.

"When Immortal Wu physiognomized me he concluded that I would 'not fail to wear the silk hat of an official,' and would enjoy 'an ascent to the clouds from the level ground,' and today those predictions have come true. In hardly half a month both of these happy events have come to pass."

Then, turning to Yüeh-niang, he said, "This baby boy that Sister Li has just borne is certainly starting out on a firm footing. At the lustration ceremony on the third day, when we choose a name for him, let's call him Kuan-ko, or Official Son, in commemoration of the occasion."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished showing the documents to Yüeh-niang, Lai-pao came in, kowtowed to Yüeh-niang and the rest, and talked to them for a while.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Begets a Son and Gains an Office

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed him, "Tomorrow morning, take the documents to the yamen of the Provincial Surveillance Commission to show to Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, and have Manager Wu deliver his documents to the district yamen."

Lai-pao then took his leave of Hsi-men Ch'ing and went home.

The following day, by the time the third-day lustration ceremony was completed, Hsi-men Ch'ing's relatives, neighbors, and friends all knew that his Sixth Lady had given birth to a boy, and that, before three days were out, he had had the good fortune to see:

Officialdom and emolument descend upon his gate, in the form of an appointment, out of the blue, to the post of battalion vice-commander. Nor did anyone fail to try his best to curry favor with him by bearing gifts and offering congratulations.

People come and people go,⁵⁴
All day long, without ceasing.⁵⁵

As the saying goes:

When fortune comes, who does not come;
When fortune does not come, who comes?

Truly:

When fortune comes, even the crudest iron looks shiny;
When luck recedes, even the truest gold lacks luster.⁵⁶

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 31

CH'IN-T'UNG CONCEALS A FLAGON AFTER SPYING ON YÜ-HSIAO; HSI-MEN CH'ING HOLDS A FEAST AND DRINKS CELEBRATORY WINE

TO THE TUNE "Moon on the West River":

If his family be rich, the person will be distinguished;
When others meet him they are sure to yield him precedence.
Poor officials presume on the indulgence of their superiors;
Each of them acknowledging the deference due to money.

In marriage alliances he looks only for social prestige;
In business transactions he seeks merely to gain influence.
Not knowing that success and failure reside in the heart,
He relies only on what he can see before his eyes.

The story goes that the next day Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Lai-pao to the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission and to the district yamen to deliver his credentials.

At the same time he commissioned someone to make an official hat for him and summoned Tailor Chao to come to his home with four or five other tailors to take charge of measuring and cutting the fabric in order to provide him with a set of official garments. He also called in a contingent of artisans to manufacture seven or eight four-finger-wide official girdles for him, with decorative plaques made of carved openwork, mica, rhinoceros horn, "crane's crest red,"¹ tortoiseshell, fishbone, and aloeswood.² We will say no more, for the moment, about the goings on in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household.

To resume our story, that same day Wu Tien-en paid a visit to Ying Po-chüeh's house and repeatedly besought his aid in asking Hsi-men Ch'ing for a loan of silver to expend, both high and low, in connection with his appointment as station master.

"If I am successful in borrowing the silver," he promised Ying Po-chüeh, "I'll set aside ten taels in order to buy you a present as an expression of my gratitude, Elder Brother."

As he spoke, he got down on his knees, which threw Ying Po-chüeh into such consternation that he helped him up with one hand, saying, "This is a case of:

Helping someone to accomplish his legitimate desires.³

The fact that His Honor saw fit to send you on this mission to the Eastern Capital, which made it possible for you to benefit by the windfall of this position, is no ordinary event."

He then went on to ask, "How much will you need for present purposes?"

"There is no reason to deceive you, Elder Brother," Wu Tien-en replied.

"The situation of my household is such that I haven't a candareen to my name. In the days to come the costs of assuming office, calling upon my superiors, supplying:

The customary presentation gifts,⁴ hosting a banquet, and providing myself with appropriate clothing, horse and saddle, etc., at the very least, will come to seventy or eighty taels of silver. How am I to cope with it? Now I have drafted a promissory note but have not yet presumed to write in the amount. I hope that whatever happens, Elder Brother, you will consent to help me out by putting in a good word from the side. If I am successful:

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

Ying Po-chüeh looked over the promissory note and then said, "Brother Wu, this seventy or eighty taels of silver that you propose to borrow will not be sufficient for your needs. If you take my advice, you'll pick up a brush and write in the sum of a round hundred taels. More likely than not, out of consideration for me, he won't demand any interest from you, and you'll have enough to cover your expenses. It won't be too late to pay him back, a little at a time, in the future, after you've assumed office. As the common saying aptly puts it:

Borrowed rice will go into your pot;

Begged rice will not go into your pot.⁵

As long as you can stall him off:

Every day is another morning and afternoon.⁶

How much the more should this be true since you've done business on his behalf. These few taels of silver for you are hardly anything likely to weigh on his mind."

When Wu Tien-en heard these words, he thanked him again and again and proceeded, on the spot, to write in the sum of a hundred taels on the promissory note. Thereupon, having finished their tea, they got up together and made their way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's gate.

Ying Po-chüeh asked the gatekeeper, P'ing-an, "Is your father up yet, or not?"

"Father's already up," replied P'ing-an. "He's in the summerhouse watching the artisans who are making up official girdles for him. I'll go tell him you're here."

Thereupon, he went straight in and reported to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Ying the Second and Uncle Wu the Second are here."

"Ask them to come in," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long the two of them found themselves inside, where they saw that there were a considerable number of tailors and artisans working away, hugger-mugger, at their tasks. Hsi-men Ch'ing, wearing an informal skullcap and a brocade robe, was sitting in the veranda with Ch'en Ching-chi, looking on as the latter wrote out his curriculum vitae in an accordion-bound album for presentation to his official superiors. When he saw the two of them, he bowed and offered them a seat.

"Brother," Ying Po-chüeh asked, "have you presented your curriculum vitae and your order of appointment yet?"

"This morning," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "I sent a servant to the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission to deliver my order of appointment. I'm getting my curriculum vitae ready now, but I haven't sent it to Tung-p'ing prefecture or the district yamen yet."

When he had finished speaking, the page boy, Hua-t'ung, served them with tea. After they were done with the tea, Ying Po-chüeh said nothing about Manager Wu's business but stepped down from the veranda to take a look at the artisans as they worked on the manufacture of the official girdles.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw him pick up a girdle to examine it, he played directly to the gallery, saying, "Take a good look. What do you think of these girdles I've managed to procure for myself?"

Ying Po-chüeh:

Expressing the most fulsome admiration,⁷ praised them, saying, "Who else but you, Brother, would know where to find the like? Each of them is a finer girdle than the last. They are rarely to be seen as wide and capacious as this. Regarding the rest of them, enough said; but as for this girdle with its decorative plaque of rhinoceros horn, and this one of 'crane's crest red,' you couldn't find the like in the entire metropolis, though you had the money in hand.

I am not flattering you to your face.⁸

They say that Chu Mien, the defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard in the Eastern Capital, though he may possess girdles of jade and girdles of gold, does not have anything to compare to this rhinoceros horn girdle. This is the horn of the water rhinoceros, not the horn of the dry land rhinoceros. The latter is not worth anything. The horn of the water rhinoceros is called 'Heaven penetrating rhinoceros horn.'⁹ If you don't believe me, bring a bowl of water, put the rhinoceros horn in it, and it will divide the water in two. This is:

A priceless treasure.¹⁰

Moreover, if you ignite it at night it will illuminate an area of a thousand li, and the flame will not be extinguished all night."

"Brother," he went on to ask, "how much silver did it cost you to obtain this rarity?"

"You two try to guess the price," Hsi-men Ch'ing said.

"There's no market rate for things like this," said Ying Po-chüeh. "How could we ever guess correctly?"

"I'll tell you then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "This girdle comes from the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang on Main Street. Yesterday evening someone heard that I was in the market for girdles and came particularly to tell me about it. I sent Pen the Fourth back and forth several times with seventy taels of silver to try to buy this girdle from them, but they insisted on holding out for a hundred taels."

"It would be hard to find one as wide and handsome as this," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Brother, when you put it on and go forth in days to come you'll cut quite a figure. Even your colleagues will covet it when they see it."

Thereupon, after fulsomely praising it for a while, he sat down.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then turned to Manager Wu and asked him, "Have you delivered your credentials or not?"

"Brother Wu has not yet delivered his credentials," Ying Po-chüeh responded. "Today he has made a point of begging me to trouble you on his behalf. Although he has benefited from your patronage in sending him to the Eastern Capital to escort the consignment of birthday presents, as a result of which he has received this appointment from the grand preceptor, so that it is just as if you had uplifted him yourself, it is also his personal good fortune. As the saying goes:

From the first rank to the ninth rank,¹¹

All are the subjects of the emperor.

However, at the present time he doesn't have any money available at home. So he has besought my aid, saying, 'At present the costs of assuming office, calling upon my superiors, hosting a banquet, and providing myself with appropriate clothing, and the like, will amount to a sizable sum of silver.

One guest does not trouble two hosts.

Where am I to go to come up with it?’

“Brother, there’s no help for it. Out of consideration for me, if you have any silver to spare, lend a few taels to him in order to sustain him in this exigency. If you help him out in this matter, in the future, when he has assumed his official post, he will:

Carry rings and knot grass,¹² never daring to forget that you are his great benefactor. Aside from the fact that he is an old employee in your establishment, who is accustomed to come and go as your protegee, from first to last, who knows how many officials and functionaries in:

Other cities and other prefectures, you have helped out in similar circumstances. If you were not to do so, where would you have him go to take care of this matter?”

“Brother Wu,” he went on to say, “bring out that promissory note of yours and let His Honor see it.”

Wu Tien-en hastily pulled it out of his pocket and gave it to Hsi-men Ch’ing to examine. When he saw that it was made out for a loan of a hundred taels of silver, that Ying Po-chüeh was the guarantor, and that it promised to pay interest of five percent per month, Hsi-men Ch’ing took up a brush and crossed out the interest.

“Since Brother Ying the Second is acting as guarantor,” he said, “it will suffice if you repay me the principal of one hundred taels in the future. I imagine you will need a sum of silver like this to negotiate things, both high and low, satisfactorily.”

Thereupon, he put away the promissory note.

Just as he was about to send to the rear compound for the silver, all of a sudden, a card was delivered from Judicial Commissioner Hsia of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, who had also sent along a professional scribe for his benefit. The three categories of functionaries in the yamen had also sent copies of their curricula vitae and deputed twelve orderlies to be placed at his service. They wanted to know the date on which he intended to assume office and what his courtesy name and style were, so that his colleagues in the yamen could prepare the customary gifts when they came to offer their congratulations.

Hsi-men Ch’ing consulted Master Hsü, the yin-yang master, who determined that the stem-branch combination designating the second day of the seventh month ended with the branch tzü, which is governed by the god Green Dragon, making it an auspicious day, and that the hour ch’en (8:00 A.M.), which is governed by the god Metal-bound Casket, would be an appropriate time at which to assume office.¹³ He therefore sent a calling card with this information to Judicial Commissioner Hsia and rewarded the scribe with five mace of silver, but there is no need to describe this in further detail.

Ying Po-chüeh and Wu Tien-en were still sitting in the summerhouse when what should they see but Ch’en Ching-chi emerging from the rear compound with the sum of a hundred taels of silver in hand.

Hsi-men Ch’ing directed him to give it to Manager Wu, saying, “Brother Wu, in the future if you merely return me the capital that will suffice.”

Wu Tien-en accepted the silver, on the one hand, and then kowtowed in gratitude.

Hsi-men Ch’ing said, “I won’t keep you any longer. Go take care of your business at home. But Brother Ying, here, I’ll retain a while. There’s something I want to talk to you about.”

Wu Tien-en, holding the silver in hand, went out the gate as happy as could be.

Gentle reader take note: Later on, after the death of Hsi-men Ch’ing, the state of the family was such that:

Its fortunes collapsed and its influence declined.

Wu Yüeh-niang preserved a chaste widowhood and gave her maidservant Hsiao-yü to Tai-an as his wife. The household page boy P’ing-an absconded with jewelry stolen from the pawnshop and squandered it on a pair of prostitutes in the Southern Entertainment Quarter. When he was apprehended and brought before Station Master Wu, the latter subjected him to severe finger-squeezing and flogging, coercing him into false testimony that Yüeh-niang had been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an, in order to force her to appear in court, thereby:

Requiting kindness with enmity.

But this is a subsequent event; having mentioned it, we will say no more about it. Truly:

Flowers that do not bear seeds should not be planted;

People that lack righteousness should not be cultivated.¹⁴

At this juncture, Pen the Fourth, who had been sent to Tung-p’ing prefecture and the district yamen to deliver copies of Hsi-men Ch’ing’s curriculum vitae, came back to report on his mission, and Hsi-men Ch’ing invited him to join Ying Po-chüeh and himself in keeping company with Master Hsü, the yin-yang master, for a meal.

Just as they were eating their meal, whom should they see but Hsi-men Ch’ing’s brother-in-law, Wu K’ai, who had come to pay his respects. Master Hsü then got up to leave and, after a while, Ying Po-chüeh also bade his host farewell, went out the gate, and headed straight for the home of Manager Wu.

Wu Tien-en had already set aside and sealed up ten taels of silver as a guarantor’s fee, which he proffered to Ying Po-chüeh with both hands and then proceeded to kowtow.

Ying Po-chüeh said, “If it hadn’t been for the clever way I broached the subject with him, no matter what you had done, he could never have been induced to make this loan to you. As for this hundred taels of silver he's given you, no matter how you expend it, both high and low, you won't have any need to spend it all, so you can keep half of it to defray your household expenses."

Wu Tien-en, having duly rewarded Ying Po-chüeh, provided himself with an official girdle and appropriate clothing and selected a propitious day on which to report to his superiors and assume office. But no more of this.

At the same time, the presiding magistrate of the district, Li Ta-t'ien, together with his three principal colleagues, the vice-magistrate, assistant magistrate, and docket officer, sent someone to deliver the traditional congratulatory gifts of mutton and wine to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Magistrate Li also sent him, along with his card, a young man to wait upon him. He was just seventeen years old and was a native of Ch'ang-shu district in Su-chou prefecture. His nickname was Little Chang Sung,¹⁵ and he had begun his career as a "gate-boy" in the district yamen.¹⁶ He had a naturally clear-cut appearance:

His face looked as though it were powdered,¹⁷

His teeth were white and his lips were red.¹⁸

Moreover:

He knew how to read and write,
and was good at:

Singing southern-style songs.

He was wearing a long gown of black chiffon, sandals, and white socks.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw how accomplished the young man appeared to be, he was utterly delighted. He sent a card expressing his appreciation to Magistrate Li, agreed to retain the young man in his service, and changed his name to Shu-t'ung, or Book Boy. He had a complete outfit of clothes made for him, including new boots and a new hat, and did not have him accompany him when he went out on horseback, but put him in charge of his studio, where he was responsible for his social correspondence, and gave him custody of the key to the garden gate.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's crony, Chu Jih-nien, also recommended a fifteen-year-old page boy to wait on him. His name was changed to Ch'i-t'ung, or Chess Boy.¹⁹ Every day he and Ch'in-t'ung were deputed to carry his letter case and card case and accompany him when he went out on horseback.

On the day that he assumed office, Hsi-men Ch'ing hosted a lavish banquet in the yamen of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. Summonses were issued mandating the attendance of musicians from the licensed quarter, together with their file leaders and appearance monitors, to:

Play wind and percussion instruments and sing, for the entertainment of the guests. The party in the rear hall of the yamen continued until sunset before breaking up.

Every day Hsi-men Ch'ing paraded through the streets riding on a large white horse, wearing on his head the black silk hat of an official, dressed in a round-collared robe emblazoned with a mandarin square of variegated embroidery featuring a lion with a ruffled mane,²⁰ a four-finger-wide girdle with a decorative plaque of gilded aloeswood, and white-soled black boots, escorted by not less than ten orderlies who shouted to clear the way, holding aloft a large black flabellum to protect him from the sun:

Clamoring in front and crowding behind.²¹

When he came home after formally assuming office, he first went to pay his respects to his fellow officials in the prefectural and district yamens, the Regional Military Command, the office of the local military director-in-chief, and the left and right battalions of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, and only after that, to his relatives, friends, and neighbors. His public proceedings were on a gloriously lavish scale, while at home he:

Accepted presents and received cards,

All day long, without ceasing.

Truly:

On a white horse with bloodred trappings

he is newly caparisoned;²²

Even those with no claim to relationship insist on being related.²³

When fortune comes, even the crudest iron

looks shiny;

When luck recedes, even the truest gold lacks luster.

From the time that he assumed office, every day Hsi-men Ch'ing officiated in the local yamen of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, where he took his place on the bench, held roll call, and tried the cases that came before him.

Light and darkness alternate swiftly.

Before anyone knew it, the full-month celebration²⁴ of Li P'ing-erh's accouchement rolled around. Wu K'ai's wife, Wu the Second's wife, Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P'an, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, Ch'iao Hung's wife, and many other female relatives and neighbors all sent presents in honor of Kuan-ko's full-month celebration. Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh from the licensed quarter, on learning that Hsi-men Ch'ing had been appointed to the post of assistant judicial commissioner in the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission and had concurrently fathered a son, also sent lavish presents and engaged sedan chairs to come and offer their congratulations.

On that day Hsi-men Ch'ing provided a feast in the great reception hall in the front compound for the entertainment of the female guests. Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, and Lan-hsiang were all dressed up to befit the occasion and joined Yüeh-niang in the banquet area to pour the wine and hold the flagons for the female guests.

It so happens that every day when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home from the yamen, on arriving at the reception hall in the front compound he would take off his formal clothes and have Shu-t'ung fold them up for him and put them in his studio, wearing only his official hat as he proceeded into the rear compound. When he got up the next morning, he would send a maidservant to the studio to get them for him.

Recently he had fixed up an antechamber on the west side of the courtyard housing the great reception hall as his studio and furnished it with a bed, desk, table, chairs, a standing screen, brushes, inkstones, a zither, books, and the like. At night Shu-t'ung would place his bedding on the footboard of the bed and sleep there. The next morning, before Hsi-men Ch'ing had appeared, he would straighten things up, sweep the studio clean, and be prepared to wait on him. Whoever's quarters Hsi-men Ch'ing might choose to spend the night in, in the morning a maidservant from those quarters would be sent out to the front compound to fetch his formal clothes for him.

What with all this:

Coming to fetch and taking away, who would have thought that this young man who, in the first place, had begun his career as a "gate-boy" and was a likely looking lad with a naturally clear-cut appearance, and, in the second place, was given the opportunity of:

Engaging in badinage and repartee, with the maidservants from all the quarters, should have ended up becoming familiar with them. Thereupon, he secretly struck up a flirtation with Yü-hsiao from the master suite.

One day it was one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

The young man had just gotten up, ignited a stick of incense on the surface of the bed in the studio, set his dressing mirror on the windowsill to do his hair, and was engaged in binding it with a red silk ribbon, when, unexpectedly, Yü-hsiao from the master suite pushed open the door and came in.

When she saw what he was doing, she said, "You lousy jailbird! Late as it is, you're still:

Painting your brows and making up your eyes.

Father will be right out as soon as he's finished eating his congee."

Shu-t'ung paid no attention but continued binding up his topknot.

"Father's clothes have been folded up," said Yü-hsiao. "Where did you put them?"

"They're lying right there at the southern end of the bed," Shu-t'ung said.

"He's not wearing that outfit today," said Yü-hsiao. "He told me to tell you that he wants to wear that jet²⁵ brocade round-collared robe emblazoned with a gold lame mandarin square, and the jade-colored undergown."

"That outfit is in the clothes cabinet," said Shu-t'ung. "I put it away only yesterday, and today he wants to wear it again. Sister, open up the door of the cabinet and take it out yourself."

Yü-hsiao, however, did not proceed to get the clothes, but came right up to him and watched him binding his hair.

"You crazy louse of a jailbird!" she teased him. "You're binding your hair with red ribbon just like a woman, and affecting such a bouffant hairdo over your temples too."

Then, noticing that on his undershirt of bleached Hsiang-yang ramie there were suspended a pink silk scent bag and a green silk scent bag, she asked him for one of them, saying, "Give me this pink one."

"Even someone else's prized possession you want for yourself," said Shu-t'ung.

"It's inappropriate for a boy like you to wear a pink one," said Yü-hsiao. "But it would be just right for me."

"It's a good thing that's all you want," said Shu-t'ung. "If it were a man in question, you'd hanker after him too, I suppose."

Yü-hsiao deliberately gave him a pinch on the shoulder, saying, "You lousy jailbird, you're like someone:

Reduced to peddling his effigies of the Gate Gods²⁶

in a narrow passageway:

Who knows what sort of rubbish you'll come up with."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,
she took hold of the two scent bags and, without bothering to untie them, tore them loose from the cords by which they were fastened, and tucked them into her sleeve.

"You're certainly no respecter of persons," protested Shu-t'ung. "You've managed to rip my girdle apart."

Yü-hsiao gave him a playful blow with her fist, which provoked Shu-t'ung into responding, "Sister, stop pestering me. Wait until I've finished binding up my hair."

"Let me ask you," said Yü-hsiao, "since I haven't heard. Where's Father off to today?"

"Today," Shu-t'ung replied, "Father's going to see off the third officer in the district yamen, Assistant Magistrate Hua Ho-lu. There's to be a party hosted by Eunuch Director Hsüeh, the supervisor of the local imperial estates. He should get home early. This afternoon, I understand, he's arranged to meet with Uncle Ying the Second in order to pay out the silver for the purchase price of the Ch'iao family's property across the street. They'll be having a drink over there."

"You wait right here. Don't go anywhere else," said Yü-hsiao. When I come back, I'll have something to say to you."

"I understand," said Shu-t'ung.

Thereupon, having reached an understanding with him, Yü-hsiao took the clothes and went straight back to the rear compound.

In a little while, Hsi-men Ch'ing came out, called for Shu-t'ung, and instructed him, "You stay at home. Don't go anywhere else. First off, I want you to write out twelve invitations, on scarlet paper, with sealed envelopes. Tomorrow, on the twenty-eighth, I'm inviting some official guests to a party to celebrate the birth of Kuan-ko. Tell Lai-hsing to purchase the provisions, engage the necessary cooks and waiters, and see that all the place settings are properly prepared. Send Tai-an with two orderlies to deliver the invitations and engage the singing girls. Let Ch'in-t'ung stay here to look after the wine for the female guests."

When he had finished with his instructions, Hsi-men Ch'ing mounted his horse and set off for his farewell party.

By this time the female guests invited by Wu Yüeh-niang and her sorority of concubines had all arrived. At first they were served tea in the summerhouse, and only after that did they take their seats in the great reception hall, where:

Screens display their peacocks' tails, and Cushions conceal their hibiscus blossoms.²⁷

Four singing girls had been engaged to play and sing for the entertainment of the company.

Sure enough, Hsi-men Ch'ing did return home in the early afternoon, where a table setting of wine and delicacies had been set aside for him. After inviting Ying Po-chüeh and Ch'en Ching-chi to join him, he set out with seven hundred taels of silver in hand for the closing on his purchase of the Ch'iao family property across the street.

While the female guests were in the midst of drinking their wine, lo and behold, Yü-hsiao secreted a silver flagon of wine, along with four pears and a tangerine and headed straight for the antechamber to give them to Shu-t'ung to enjoy. When she pushed open the door, to her surprise, Shu-t'ung was not there. Fearing lest someone should see what she was doing, she set her burden down, flagon and all, and took herself off.

Strange as it may seem,

Ch'in-t'ung, who was tending to the wine up in the reception hall, happened to look out with a sardonic eye and catch sight of Yü-hsiao going into the studio, and then, after a while, coming out again. Assuming that Shu-t'ung was inside, without anyone's knowing it, he slipped into the room himself to see what was up.

Who could have anticipated that Shu-t'ung had gone out and not yet returned, but the flagon of warm wine and the fruit were still sitting there under the bed. Ch'in-t'ung hastily hid the fruit in his sleeve and then, concealing the flagon of wine behind his body, carried it straight to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. Ying-ch'un and her mistress were both in the reception hall and had not yet come back from the party. Only the wet nurse, Ju-i, and Hsiu-ch'un were in the room looking after Kuan-ko.

"Where is Elder Sister?" Ch'in-t'ung asked as soon as he came in the door.

"She's up in the reception hall," replied Hsiu-ch'un, "pouring wine for the mistress. Why do you ask?"

Ch'in-t'ung Conceals a Flagon after Spying on Yü-hsiao

"I've got hold of something good that I want her to keep for me," said Ch'in-t'ung.

"What is it?" asked Hsiu-ch'un, but he refused to produce it.

As they were talking, Ying-ch'un came in from the reception hall, carrying a plate of roast goose and a saucerful of steamed corn flour pastries with rose-flavored stuffings for the wet nurse to eat.

When she caught sight of Ch'in-t'ung, she said, "You lousy jailbird! What are you laughing at here instead of being up in the reception hall tending to the wine?"

Only then did Ch'in-t'ung pull the flagon out from underneath his clothes, and say, "Sister Ying-ch'un, keep this for me."

"This is one of the flagons used for pouring wine in the reception hall," said Ying-ch'un. "Why have you bothered to bring it here for no reason at all?"

"Sister," said Ch'in-t'ung, "don't you worry about that. This is a case of Yü-hsiao from the master suite:

Playing at sevens and eights, with that page boy Shu-t'ung. She purloined this flagon of wine, along with a tangerine and some pears, and brought them to the studio for him to enjoy. When I saw that no one was looking, I lifted them off him for myself. You just keep them good and safe for me. No matter who comes looking for them, if you don't trot them out, I'll have picked up something for nothing."

Thereupon he pulled out the pears and the tangerine for Ying-ch'un to see and said, "This is perfect for me, since, after I finish tending to the wine, it's my turn to spend the night at the house on Lion Street."

"In a little while," said Ying-ch'un, "if they turn the place upside down looking for the flagon, you'll take responsibility for it, I suppose?"

"After all, I'm not the one that stole their flagon," said Ch'in-t'ung. "It's true for everyone that while:

Those actually involved may be disturbed,
Those removed from the scene are relaxed.
What's it got to do with me?"

When he had finished speaking, he went nonchalantly off without more ado. Ying-ch'un put the flagon out of sight on a table in the inner room, but no more of this.

That evening, when the party broke up, the utensils were checked, and a flagon was found to be missing. Yü-hsiao went to the studio to look for it but came up empty-handed, for it was nowhere to be found.

When she asked Shu-t'ung about it, he said, "I was out on an errand and don't know anything about it."

Yü-hsiao then proceeded to panic and tried her best to blame it all on Hsiao-yü.

"You must have been screwed silly, you whore!" Hsiao-yü cursed at her. "I was in the rear compound seeing to the tea, while you were holding the flagon in order to pour wine for Mother at the party. And now that the flagon has disappeared, you try to blame it on me."

A thorough search was conducted, but it did not turn up.

After some time, Li P'ing-erh returned to her quarters, where Ying-ch'un reported, thus and so, to her, "Ch'in-t'ung brought one in here and asked me to keep it safe for him."

"That jailbird!" Li P'ing-erh exclaimed. "What did he bring that flagon of theirs in here for? In the rear compound, all on account of this flagon, the place is really being turned upside down. Yü-hsiao is blaming it on Hsiao-yü. Hsiao-yü is blaming it on Yü-hsiao. That senior maidservant is so upset she's:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths, while all she can do is cry. You'd better take it back there immediately. If there's any further delay, I promise you, it'll be you that ends up being blamed for it, you little whore!"

Only then did Ying-ch'un bring out the flagon and prepare to take it back to the rear compound.

Meanwhile, in the rear compound, Yü-hsiao and Hsiao-yü were still quarreling over the disappearance of the flagon, and the two of them carried their dispute to Yüeh-niang.

"You lousy little stinkers!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "What are you still presuming to make such a ruckus about? What were the two of you in charge of at the time the flagon disappeared?"

"I was in the reception hall helping Mother serve wine to the guests," declared Yü-hsiao, "while she was in charge of the silver utensils. Now that it's disappeared, she's trying to blame it on me."

"Mother's senior sister-in-law wanted some tea," protested Hsiao-yü, "so didn't I go back to the rear compound to fetch it? Since it was you who were holding the flagon, how did it come to disappear? I dare say:

The hole in your bottom's so big:
Your mind has dropped out,²⁸ or something of the sort."

"I fear there weren't any unfamiliar people at the party today," said Yüeh-niang, "so how could something just disappear like that? Let's wait a bit and see if this flagon won't turn up somewhere. If we wait until your master gets wind of it, and the flagon is still missing, I promise you there'll be a beating for each of you."

"If Father gives me a beating," expostulated Yü-hsiao, "and I ever let that whore off the hook, I might as well quit."

As they continued to wrangle, who should walk in from the outside but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who asked, "What's all the ruckus about?"

Yüeh-niang told him about the disappearance of the flagon.

"Just take your time and look for it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What's the point of making such a fuss about it, for no good reason?"

"If you lose a flagon like this every time you have a party," said P'an Chin-lien, "and don't make a fuss about it:

Even if you were as rich as Moneybags Wang;²⁹
When the first sample of vinegar is not sour,
The whole batch will turn out to be insipid."³⁰

Gentle reader take note: These words of Chin-lien's were intended to reflect satirically on the fact that though Li P'ing-erh was the first woman in the household to bear a child, something valuable had been lost on the occasion of its full-month celebration, which was an unlucky omen.

Hsi-men Ch'ing understood this clearly enough but did not utter a sound.

What should they see at this point but Ying-ch'un coming in to return the flagon.

"So the flagon is here after all!" exclaimed Yü-hsiao.

"Where did this flagon actually turn out to be?" Yüeh-niang asked Ying-ch'un.

Ying-ch'un explained all about it, saying, "Ch'in-t'ung brought it into my mistress's quarters from outside somewhere and asked me to keep it for him. I don't know where it came from."

Yüeh-niang then asked, "Where is that slave, Ch'in-t'ung, right now?"

"It's his turn today to spend the night in the house on Lion Street," said Tai-an.

Chin-lien, who was standing to one side, couldn't help snickering at this.

"Just what are you laughing at?" Hsi-men Ch'ing then demanded to know.

"Ch'in-t'ung is her servant, after all," said Chin-lien. "And he stashed the flagon in her quarters. He must have had some reason for wanting to conceal the whereabouts of the flagon. If it were up to me, I'd send a page boy after that slave right now and subject him to a real beating, in order to get to the bottom of this. Otherwise, those two maidservants will have been falsely accused. Truly, that would be to:

Let the guardian deity escape while indicting the Buddha."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he became enraged, opened his eyes wide, looked directly at Chin-lien, and said, "From the way you put it, no doubt Sister Li was so enamored of this flagon that she appropriated it herself! Just let well enough alone, why don't you? What reason do you have to make such a fuss about it?"

Chin-lien's face turned crimson with embarrassment, and she said, "I certainly never meant to imply that Sister Li doesn't have enough money of her own."

When she had finished speaking, she withdrew to one side in a huff.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was then invited away by Ch'en Ching-chi, who came in, saying, "Eunuch Director Liu, the manager of the Imperial Brickyard, has sent someone to deliver a gift. You'd better go up front to see him."

Chin-lien, who was standing to one side with Meng Yü-lou, started to curse, saying, "You'll come to a bad end, you lousy ruffian, sorting people so differentially into:

Three classes and nine categories.³¹

The last few days, the way you've been carrying on, you'd think you could defy death itself. Ever since she gave birth to this seedling, you've been treating her just as though she'd produced the crown prince. But when you run into the rest of us, you're like the incarnation of a baleful deity and haven't so much as a good word to say for us. Whatever we do, you open wide those two cunt-hole eyes of yours and start yelling at us. Who doesn't know that Sister Li's got money? In the future, I suppose, when her page boys and maidservants have been allowed to get away with their fornication and thievery till they've screwed everyone in sight, you'll still refuse to crack down on them."

As she was speaking, they noticed that Hsi-men Ch'ing, after sitting a while longer, got up and went out to the front compound.

"Aren't you going, too?" Meng Yü-lou asked. "He's sure to be headed for your place."

"As he said himself," Chin-lien retorted, "it's more lively when there's a child in the place. The quarters of people like us, who don't have any children, are forlorn."

As they were speaking, what should they see but Ch'un-mei coming in from the outside.

"I told you he was headed for your place," said Meng Yü-lou, "and you wouldn't believe it. Now Ch'un-mei has come to fetch you."

She then called Ch'un-mei over to ask her.

"I've come to ask Yü-hsiao for my handkerchief," said Ch'un-mei. "She borrowed my handkerchief to wear today."

"Where is your father?" asked Yü-lou.

"Father has gone to the Sixth Lady's place," Ch'un-mei replied.

When Chin-lien heard this, it was just as though a torch had been applied to her heart, and she started to curse, saying, "That lousy ruffian! In the future:

For a thousand years or all eternity,

I'd rather see him break his leg than try to come into my room. If he so much as sets foot on the threshold, that incorrigible jailbird, may he break his anklebone!"

"Sister Six," said Yü-lou, "why are you denouncing him so venomously today?"

"That's not it at all," said Chin-lien. "It's just that that lousy three-inch good-for-nothing of a ruffian has a:

Rat-stomach chicken-gut,³² heart with a capacity of no more than three inches. We're all your wives after all. Only because she's produced this piddling bladder's spawn of hers, do you mean to say you're going to carry on like this? What do you mean by:

Raising one person up, and Putting another down,³³

only to:

Trample them into the mud?"³⁴

Truly:

Whenever a great wind blows down

the phoenix tree,
There are sure to be bystanders to comment on it.³⁵

Chin-lien continued to make a show of her temper. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the front compound, he found that Eunuch Director Hsüeh had sent a servant to deliver a jar of wine from the imperial palace, a sheep, two bolts of satin brocade, a tray of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, a tray of birthday noodles, and four rare delicacies; in the first place, to wish him a happy birthday; and in the second place, to offer his congratulations. Hsi-men Ch'ing gave the messenger a generous tip and sent him on his way.

When he returned to the rear compound, Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh were preparing to take their leave and go home.

"The two of you ought to stay over another day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tomorrow, the twenty-eighth, I've invited His Honor Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command, His Honor Hsia Yen-ling of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, His Honor Ching Chung, the military director-in-chief, Eunuch Director Hsüeh, the supervisor of the imperial estates, and Eunuch Director Liu, the manager of the Imperial Brickyard, to a birthday party. There will be a troupe of tumblers and actors from the licensed quarter, so all the two of you will have to do is serve the wine."

"If you're going to keep us here," said Kuei-chieh, "I'd better send someone home to let Mother know, so she'll be less inclined to worry."

Thereupon, the sedan chairs of the two of them were sent on their way. But no more of this.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing had the great reception hall prepared by:

Arraying brocaded screens, and Spreading out silken tablecloths,

for the party for official guests, the invitations to which had already been issued in advance. Because, the previous day, he had met Eunuch Director Liu, the manager of the Imperial Brickyard, while he was being entertained at the imperial estates, and that dignitary had joined with Eunuch Director Hsüeh in sending him gifts for the occasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing had also sent an invitation to him. He had also invited Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta to help keep his guests company. By lunchtime, having dressed themselves to befit the occasion, the two of them had already arrived, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had ushered them into the summerhouse, where they were served tea.

"Brother," Ying Po-chüeh then asked, "what particular guests have you invited to the party today?"

"There are the two Eunuch Directors, Liu and Hsüeh," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "His Honor Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command, Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung, my colleague Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, Battalion Commander Fan Hsün of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, and my brothers-in-law, Wu K'ai and Wu the Second. My old neighbor, Ch'iao Hung, just sent someone over today to say that he couldn't make it. Together with the two of you, that's all the guests there are."

No sooner had he finished speaking than Wu K'ai and Wu the Second arrived, bowed in greeting, and sat down with them. The attendants set up a table and served something to eat.

When they had finished eating, Ying Po-chüeh then asked, "At the full-month celebration yesterday, was your son brought out and shown to the company?"

"The assembled female guests did want to see him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but my wife said not to bring him out lest he catch a cold. His wet nurse said it didn't matter. So she told the wet nurse to wrap him in a quilt and bring him out to the master suite so everyone could have a glimpse of him in honor of the day, after which she took him back to his mother's room."

"Sister-in-law also invited my wife that day," said Ying Po-chüeh, "and she wanted very much to come. But in the midst of all the goings on, that old ailment of hers broke out again, and she was unable to get up from her k'ang. She was as upset as could be about it. Right now, before the other guests have come, why don't you say the word and have your son brought out so we can have a look at him?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then gave the directions, "Have Kuan-ko carefully brought out from the rear compound, but don't do anything to frighten him. Tell your mistress that my elder brother-in-law and second brother-in-law are here, along with Ying the Second and Mr. Hsieh, who would like to take a look at him."

Yüeh-ning told the wet nurse, Ju-i, to wrap him tightly in a little red satin quilt and take him as far as the postern gate leading to the summerhouse, where she could turn him over to Tai-an to carry the rest of the way.

The company opened their eyes wide and took a good look at him. Kuan-ko was wearing an undershirt of scarlet silk:

His face was white and his lips were red, and he had quite an affluent appearance. Everyone sang his praises and paid him exaggerated compliments without end.

Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta each pulled out of his sleeve a satin brocade waistband with a small silver pendant attached, but Po-chüeh also presented a skein of variegated threads on which there were strung ten or more "longevity coins."

Turning these gifts over to Tai-an, Ying Po-chüeh said, "See that you carry him carefully back to his room. Don't do anything to frighten the baby."

He then continued by saying, "His features are regular. He's the natural-born embryo of someone fated to wear the silk hat of an official."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was greatly delighted, bowed, and thanked the two of them for their generous presents.

"Don't embarrass us, Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh. "These are no more than tokens of our esteem."

As they were speaking, it was suddenly announced that Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing hastened to don his formal clothes and went out to the ceremonial gate that led into the second courtyard to greet them. The two eunuchs arrived riding in sedan chairs borne by four bearers each, wearing python robes on which the body of the python extended around their shoulders,³⁶ and escorted by a contingent of soldiers with tasseled spears who shouted to clear the way.

Hsi-men Ch'ing first ushered them into the great reception hall, where he paid his respects, ran through the customary social amenities, and saw that they were served with tea.

After that, in no time at all, Commandant Chou Hsiu, Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, and the other military officials, dressed in clothing of figured brocade, escorted by soldiers holding rattan rods and large flabella who shouted to clear the way, and accompanied by their subordinates, all arrived at the front gate. The whole area was rendered black by the number of their servitors, while inside:

Drums and music resound to the heavens,³⁷

Pipes and flutes are alternately heard.

As they were about to take their seats preparatory to the serving of the wine, they were introduced to the two eunuchs, Liu and Hsüeh. There were twelve tables arranged along the upper end of the hall. On all of them:

Valances are fastened with brocade ribbons,

Blossoms are displayed in golden vases.

On each table were arrayed:

Cone-shaped piles of fruit and ingot-shaped cakes.

On the floor were spread:

Brocade carpets and embroidered rugs.

Hsi-men Ch'ing started off by urging his guests, with flagon in hand, to take their seats, but the two eunuchs, Liu and Hsüeh, repeatedly declined to take the seats of honor, saying, "What about these other distinguished gentlemen?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing Holds a Feast and Drinks Celebratory Wine

"The two senior eunuch directors," said Commandant Chou:

"Are exalted in both age and virtue.

As the saying goes:

Those who have served as palace eunuchs for three years,

Take precedence over princes and dukes.

Of course they are entitled to the seats of honor.

What need is there for further discussion?"

After they had dickered politely for a while, Eunuch Director Hsüeh said, "Brother Liu, since the distinguished gentlemen are unwilling to precede us, we are making things difficult for our host. Let's take our seats and be done with it."

Thereupon, after bowing all the way around to salute the company, first Eunuch Liu on the left and then Eunuch Hsüeh on the right, having first had handkerchiefs placed on their seats, and accompanied by two page boys to fan them, finally took their places. Only after that did Commandant Chou, Military Director-in-chief Ching, and the rest do likewise.

Before long, from beneath the steps, they heard:

The strains of a classic melody,³⁸

as the musicians began to play. What were the revels like that day? Behold:

Dainties were prepared of the rarest kind,

Fruits were provided just in season.

Before long:

Five rounds of wine had been consumed, and

Three courses of soup had been served.

The chef then came out and carved the minor entree of roast goose, after which Eunuch Liu, occupying as he did the seat of honor, rewarded him with five mace of silver.

The file leader from the Music Office then knelt down and proffered him a scarlet paper, accordion-bound album listing the program of pieces they were prepared to perform, after which, in the courtyard below the steps, the actors put on a comic farce of the genre known as hsiao-lo yüan-pen.³⁹

First the wai (supernumerary male role), playing the Adjutant, comes on and recites the opening verse:

wai:

When laws are just Heaven's attitude is favorable;

When officials are honest the populace is content.

When the wife is worthy the husband's mishaps are few;

When children are filial the father's mind is relieved.⁴⁰

It's not as though I were anyone else. I'm the Adjutant of this troupe, with many a star performer among the strolling players at my disposal. Yesterday in the marketplace I bought a standing screen on which there was inscribed a poem about the Prince of T'eng's Pavilion.⁴¹ I asked someone about it, and he said that it was composed by Wang Po⁴² of the Tang dynasty, who won success in the Palace Examination, though he was not quite three feet tall.⁴³ He also said that this person could:

Create a composition with a flourish of the brush;⁴⁴ and that he was:

Extensively possessed of knowledge and erudition;

in short, a man of talent. Now I might as well call for the fu-mo (supporting male role) to go looking for him and invite him over so I can make his acquaintance; why not? Where's the fu-mo?

fu-mo:

From in the hall a single call;

Below the steps a hundred yeps.⁴⁵

At your service, Adjutant. What is your command?"

wai:

Yesterday I observed that the poem about the Prince of T'eng's Pavilion inscribed on that standing screen is very well written. I've heard that it was composed by Wang Po of the T'ang dynasty, who won success in the Palace Examination, though he was not quite three feet tall. Now here's a yardstick to measure him by. I want you to go looking for him immediately, and invite him over. If you are successful, I'll reward you with a mace of silver. If you are unsuccessful, you'll get twenty lashes with a hempen rope. I'll beat you for certain and not let you off.

fu-mo:

I understand, (mimes exiting) This Adjutant is a fool! As for that Palace Graduate Wang Po, from the T'ang period to the present time is not less than a thousand years or more. Where would he have me go to look for him? All I can do is:

Come this way and go that way, until I arrive at the gate of the Confucian Temple. In the distance, there, I see an erudite-looking scholar coming this way. What else can I do but ask him. "Sir, are you, by any chance, the Palace Graduate Wang Po who composed the poem about the Prince of T'eng's Pavilion and are not quite three feet tall?"

ching (comic-villain role, playing a scholar; aside, laughing):

The Palace Graduate Wang Po was a man of the T'ang dynasty. Where would one find him today? I'll just play him along and see what happens, (addresses him) Yes, I am the Palace Graduate Wang Po, and it was I who composed the poem about the Prince of T'eng's Pavilion. I'll recite a few lines from the preface to convince you.

The city of Nan-ch'ang in the old Yü-chang commandery,
Is now the metropolis of the new Hung-chou prefecture.
It accords celestially with the mansions I and Chen ...⁴⁶
The effulgence of its dragon swords shoots up to the Herd Boy and the Dipper.⁴⁷
Its men are superlative and its territory is numinous;
The worthiness of Hsü Chih induced Ch'en Fan to lower his suspended cot.⁴⁸

fu-mo:

The Adjutant gave me this yardstick and said he only wanted someone who is three feet tall, and if he should be off by so much as a finger's-width, not to invite him. With that body of yours, how could you ever pass muster?

ching:

That doesn't matter.

The Way is what man makes of it.⁴⁹

Look over there. Another Palace Graduate Wang Po is coming this way. (mimes adopting the posture of a dwarf)

fu-mo:

I'll measure him with this yardstick.

ching:

I'll shrink myself a little further.

fu-mo: (laughing)

You'll pass muster, I guess.

ching:

There's just one thing. When I see this Adjutant of yours, be sure to remember; whatever happens, I've simply got to have a low stool to rest on. Now we:

Come this way and go that way,
until we arrive at the Adjutant's gate.

fu-mo: (orders the ching)

You wait outside.

ching:

I've simply got to have a low stool to rest on.

fu-mo: (goes inside to report to the Adjutant)

wai:

Have you been successful in inviting that Palace Graduate Wang Po?

fu-mo:

He's waiting outside the gate this very moment.

wai:

Tell him I'm waiting to meet him inside the ceremonial gate that leads into the second courtyard. I'll regale him with tea flavored with hazelnuts and pine seeds, sliced roast meat, and congee, (they mime greeting each other)

wai:

This really is none other than the Palace Graduate Wang Po.

Were one but to see your distinguished features,
Such good fortune would suffice for three lives.⁵⁰

Pray accept my kowtow.

ching: (miming consternation)

Where is that low stool?

wai: (continues)

From ancient times until the present day,
Such good fortune is not easily met with.⁵¹

Though I have:

Heard of your name without having seen your face,
today I find:

Seeing your face is better than hearing your name.⁵²

Allow me to kowtow again.

ching: (miming consternation)

Where is that low stool?

fu-mo: (mimes running off stage)

wai:

I have heard that you possess:

Broad erudition and an extensive memory,
and that:

Your brush engenders dragons and serpents.⁵³

Truly, you must be a man of talent. Your servant is:
Like a thirsty person longing for drink;
Like a parched person longing for coolness.⁵⁴
Allow me to kowtow to you twice more.

ching: (urgently breaking in)

Is your father well? Is your mother well? Are your elder and your younger sister, and the other members of your household all well?

wai:

They're all well.

ching:

Why you mother-fucking dog! If the members of your household, both high and low, are all in such good shape; (straightening himself up) I shouldn't have to stay bent out of shape any longer.
Truly: (recites the closing verse)

A hundred jewels adorn her girdle,
Pearls entwine her leather sleevelets.
A smile moves dimples near her eyes,
Dance done, brocade enwraps her head.⁵⁵

Another round of wine was served at the feast, and the audience of officials all laughed. Eunuch Director Hsüeh was delighted. He called up the head of the troupe and rewarded him with a tael of silver, after which the man kowtowed to express his thanks.

Before long, Li Ming and Wu Hui, the two boy actors, came before them to play and sing. One of them accompanied himself on the psaltery and the other on the p'i-p'a.

Commandant Chou first raised his hand and deferred to the two eunuchs, saying, "The senior eunuch directors should condescend to instruct these two as to what song suites they should perform."

"You distinguished gentlemen go first," said Eunuch Liu.

"Senior Eunuch Directors," said Commandant Chou:

"It is a self-evident principle;⁵⁶

There is no need for discussion."

Eunuch Director Liu then said, "Let the two boys perform the song suite that begins with the line:

Alas! This floating life of ours is like a dream."⁵⁷

"Senior Eunuch Director," said Commandant Chou, "That is a piece about the life of retirement and disillusion with the world. Today we are celebrating His Honor Hsi-men's happy event, and it is also his birthday. It wouldn't do to sing that."

Eunuch Director Liu tried again, asking, "Can you sing the song suite that begins with the lines:

Though I am not one of the eight ministers entitled to wear the purple sash;
I command the denizens of the six palaces with their golden hairpins.⁵⁸

"That is from the tsa-chü drama Ch'en Lin Pao chuang-ho (Ch'en Lin carrying the dressing-case)," said Commandant Chou. "Today is a celebratory occasion. It wouldn't do to sing that."

"Have those two come up here," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh. "Let me tell them what to do. You know that set of songs to the tune 'Plucking the Cassia'⁵⁹ that begins with the line:

It seems that in this life the hardest thing to bear is separation.⁶⁰

Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling laughed out loud at this, saying, "Senior Eunuch Director, that piece is on the subject of separation. It's even more inappropriate for this occasion."

"Our responsibilities as eunuchs are such," said Eunuch Director Hsüeh, "that all we know how to do is to wait upon the pleasure of the Lord of Ten Thousand Years. We have no taste for the subtleties of lyrics or songs. Let them sing whatever they want.”

Judicial Commissioner Hsia, after all, held a substantive appointment in the Imperial Insignia Guard and was able to rely on his status as an officer in the legal system, so, when one of the musicians came up, he instructed him, “You sing the song suite entitled ‘Thirty Melodies.’⁶¹ Today we are celebrating His Honor Hsi-men’s:

Appointment to office and augmented emolument.

And it is also his birthday. And, in addition he has had:

The joy of giving his son a jade scepter to play with.⁶²

That is the appropriate suite to sing.”

“What is all this about:

The joy of giving his son a jade scepter to play with?”

Eunuch Director Hsüeh asked.

“My two senior eunuch directors,” said Commandant Chou. “Today is also the full-month celebration for the birth of His Honor Hsi-men’s young scion. We colleagues of his have all brought meager gifts in honor of the occasion.”

Eunuch Director Hsüeh started to say, “We,” and then, turning to Eunuch Director Liu, said, “Brother Liu, I guess we’ll have to make restitution by bringing our congratulatory gifts tomorrow.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing expressed his gratitude, saying, “The fact that your pupil has been able to sire a shoat or a whelp:

Is not worthy of congratulation.

There is really no need for the senior eunuch directors to go to so much trouble.”

When he had finished speaking, he summoned Tai-an and told him to call Wu Yin-erh and Li Kuei-chieh out from the rear compound to serve a round of wine at the feast. The two singing girls made themselves up and came outside, then:

Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze,

facing the company:

Neither correctly nor precisely,

Just as though inserting tapers in their holders, they kowtowed four times. After which, they stood up, took flagons in hand, and respectfully offered a serving of wine to each person present. The two musicians then proceeded to sing a new set of song lyrics:

The sound of their singing is melodious;

truly possessing:

A timbre that lingers around the rafters.⁶³

That evening the company was entertained:

First with singing and then with dancing,

Amid clinging brocade and clustering blossoms.⁶⁴

The drinking continued until after the first watch of the night before Eunuch Director Hsüeh stood up and said, “Your pupils, in the first place, have already benefited excessively from your lavish hospitality; and in the second place, because it has been such an occasion for rejoicing, have been insensibly enticed into drinking too deeply, and disturbing you to the fullest possible extent. We beg to take our leave.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing replied, “In response to my:

Humble invitation for a cup of tea,

You have condescended to pay a visit,

thereby abruptly:

Enhancing the glory of my humble abode.⁶⁵

I hope you will relax and stay a little longer,

In order to exhaust your remaining pleasure.”

All the guests then got up from their places and said, “Your pupils have put you to a great deal of trouble.

The effects of the drink are more than we can handle.”

Each of them then:

Bent his body to perform an obeisance,⁶⁶ as an expression of gratitude. Hsi-men Ch’ing repeatedly urged them to stay, but to no avail. All he could do was to accompany them to the main gate, along with his eldest brother-in-law, Wu K’ai, and Wu the Second. There, as the strains of:

Drums and music resound to the heavens,

while on either side:

Lanterns and torches flare resplendently,⁶⁷

With crowds of escorts in front and behind,⁶⁸ setting up a shout to clear the way, they made their departure.

Truly, it is a case of:

When happy one dislikes the shortness of the day,⁶⁹

Deliberately burning high candles to illuminate the red makeup of the crab apples.⁷⁰

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 32

LI KUEI-CHIEH ADOPTS A MOTHER AND IS ACCEPTED AS A DAUGHTER; YING PO-CHÜEH CRACKS JOKES AND DANCES ATTENDANCE ON SUCCESS

As the saying goes, "Riches constitute the foundation of distinction";
When "wealth" is "flourishing" it begets "the official"
as everybody knows.
To get a leg up on the road to officialdom
one must rely on patronage;
Only by means of truckling to the powerful can one hope for promotion.
Marriage alliances with factional malefactors will make everyone fear you;
If one relies on the influence of the prominent who will dare to defy you?
It were better to forgo the blaze of success in favor of tranquility;
How can human effort hope to contend with the decree of fate?¹

THE STORY GOES that when the party for the group of officials broke up that day, Hsi-men Ch'ing urged his elder brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, Ying Po-chüeh, and Hsieh Hsi-ta to stay a little longer.

He arranged for the musicians and other performers to be provided with wine and food and, when they had finished, instructed them, "You must come back again and do another stint tomorrow. I have invited the four principal officers from the district yamen to a party, so be sure that you are properly attired for the occasion. When it's all over, I'll compensate you for both days' work at the same time."

"We will, of course, do our best," responded the musicians. "Tomorrow we'll report for work in brand new regulation costumes."

As soon as they had finished consuming their wine and food, they left.

After a while, Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh came out with their hair done up in kerchiefs and said, with an ingratiating smile, "Father, we fear it's getting late. Our sedan chairs have come for us. We'd better be off."

"My children," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you're certainly having an easy time of it. The two old gentlemen are still here, but rather than offering to sing a song for our senior brother-in-law, you just want to take off, do you?"

"If you hadn't spoken up," said Li Kuei-chieh, "you might have been written off as a dog who couldn't bark. We haven't been home for two days now. Who knows how anxious Mother may be to see me?"

"What's she so anxious to see?" said Ying Po-chüeh. "Have you pinched a jade yellow "imperial damson"² for her, or what?"

"That's enough," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. Let the two of them go. After all, they've been exerting themselves for two days in a row. I'll get Li Ming and Wu Hui to sing us a song."

"Have you had anything to eat?" he then went on to ask.

"Just now, the First Lady gave us something to eat in the master suite," said Li Kuei-chieh.

Thereupon, they both prostrated themselves and kowtowed as though inserting tapers in their holders.

"The two of you must come again day after tomorrow," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed them, "and also engage another two singing girls on my behalf. It doesn't matter who you get. Cheng Ai-hsiang would do, and Han Chin-ch'uan would do also. I'm throwing a party for my relatives and friends."

"What a piece of luck for the little whores," said Ying Po-chüeh. "If you have them engage the singing girls for you, they'll collect the commission to spend on themselves."

"You're not a 'cribber'³ yourself," exclaimed Li Kuei-chieh. "How do you come to know so much about it?"

After saying which, they departed, laughing as they went.

"Brother," Ying Po-chüeh then went on to ask, "who are you going to invite the day after tomorrow?"

"That day," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I plan to invite my old neighbor, Ch'iao Hung, my two senior brothers-in-law, Hua the Elder, Mr. Shen, the husband of my wife's elder sister, and all the sworn brothers from our club. We'll make a day of it."

"It goes without saying," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that we have imposed too much on you as it is. The day after tomorrow, the two of us ought to come early so we can help you out by serving as assistant hosts."

"That would be only too kind of you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When they had finished speaking, Li Ming and Wu Hui came up with their instruments and sang a song suite for them. Only after that did elder brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, and the rest of the guests get up to go. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing had invited the four principal officers from the district yamen to a party, and they sent gifts beforehand to congratulate him on having just sired a son. That day Eunuch Director Hsüeh arrived early, and Hsi-men Ch'ing invited him into the summerhouse and served him with tea.

Eunuch Director Hsüeh then asked, "Eunuch Liu hasn't sent his gift yet, has he?"

"Eunuch Director Liu has already sent a gift," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied.

After some time, Eunuch Hsüeh said, "Might I request that your son be brought out so that I can have a look at him and wish him a long life?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to refuse this request and could only instruct Tai-an, "Go back to the rear compound and tell them to have the baby brought out."

Before long, the wet nurse brought Kuan-ko out as far as the postern gate leading into the garden, where she turned him over to Tai-an to carry the rest of the way.

When Eunuch Hsüeh saw the baby, all he could do was to sing his praises, exclaiming, "What a wonderful little brother!"

He then called out, "Where are my page boys?"

In no time at all, two servants clad in black produced a pair of square lacquer gift boxes decorated with inlaid gilt designs, containing a bolt of red government-quality shot silk, four gold-plated silver coins bearing the characters for:

Good fortune, long life, health, and tranquility,⁴ a toy clapper-drum⁵ decorated with a varicolored, gold-flecked portrait of the God of Longevity, and two tael's worth of silver trinkets in the shape of the "eight treasures."

"I am but a poor eunuch," he said, "with nothing fit to offer. I only hope your son will find these insignificant gifts amusing."

Hsi-men Ch'ing bowed and thanked him, saying, "I am much indebted to Your Excellency for your consideration."

When they had finished looking at the presents, Kuan-ko was carried back to his room. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing kept him company as he drank his tea, after which an Eight Immortals table⁶ was set out and refreshments provided in the form of twelve bowls of assorted appetizers and fresh new rice.

No sooner had they finished eating than the gatekeeper came in to announce that the four principal officers of the district yamen had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing hastily adjusted his attire and went out to the gate that led into the second courtyard to greet them. They were District Magistrate Li Ta-t'ien, Vice-Magistrate Ch'ien Ch'eng, Assistant Magistrate Jen T'ing-kuei,⁷ and Docket Officer Hsia Kung-chi.

Each of them first presented his calling card and then performed the rituals of greeting in the reception hall. Only after this did Eunuch Hsüeh come out to meet them. The assembled officials all insisted that Eunuch Hsüeh take the seat of honor. Among those present was the provincial graduate Shang Hsiao-t'ang, who also came out to greet them. After they had taken the seats appropriate for guests and host, a round of tea was served.

In a little while, from beneath the steps:

Drums and music begin to sound,
Pipes and voices rise in concert.

Wine was served, and someone from the Music Office presented the program, from which Eunuch Hsüeh picked the four scenes of the tsa-chü drama entitled Han Hsiang-tzu sheng-hsien chi (Han Hsiang-tzu induces Ch'en Pan-chieh to ascend to the realm of the immortals).⁸ A number of ensemble dance pieces were also presented, performed with superb execution. Eunuch Hsüeh was delighted by this and called on his attendants for two strings of cash with which to reward the performers. We will say no more about how the group of officials continued their drinking until evening before the party broke up.

To resume our story, when Li Kuei-chieh arrived home, in recognition of the fact that Hsi-men Ch'ing had become a judicial commissioner, she and the old procuress:

Laid plans and hatched a scheme.

The next day, she bought a box of stuffed pastries, a set of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two bottles of wine, and a pair of women's shoes, consigned the load of gifts to a servant to carry, and set out in a sedan chair, first thing in the morning, in order to make obeisance to Wu Yüeh-niang as her godmother, and get herself accepted as an adopted daughter.

When she came in, before doing anything else, she faced Yüeh-niang with an ingratiating smile and proceeded:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,
to perform:

Four brace makes eight kowtows.⁹

Only after that did she kowtow to her aunt and to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

This had the effect of so cozening Yüeh-niang that she was utterly delighted and said, "The other day we received a lavish present from your mother, and today you have put yourself to the trouble of buying all these gifts."

Kuei-chieh laughed, saying, "Mother says that since Father has now become an official, it's not like it used to be when he could frequent the licensed quarter all the time. I'd be more than willing to settle for the status of your adopted daughter, so we could come and go as relatives, and I could visit in your home."

This flustered Yüeh-niang to such an extent that she hastily told her to take off her outside clothes and sit down.

Li Kuei-chieh Adopts a Mother and Is Accepted as a Daughter

After her things had been put away, Yüeh-niang went on to ask Kuei-chieh, "What of Wu Yin-erh and those other two; how come they haven't arrived yet?"

"I arranged everything with Wu Yin-erh yesterday," replied Kuei-chieh. "I don't know why she hasn't come yet. The day before yesterday, Father instructed us to engage Cheng Ai-hsiang and Han Chin-ch'uan for him, and when I set out, their sedan chairs were already waiting at the door for them. They should be here any minute now."

She had not yet finished speaking, when whom should they see but Wu Yin-erh and Cheng Ai-hsiang, along with another young painted face wearing a gown of scarlet silk, come in the door, carrying their garment bags. Before doing anything else, they faced Yüeh-niang and kowtowed to her:

Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze,

Sending the pendants of their embroidered sashes flying.

When Wu Yin-erh saw that Li Kuei-chieh had already taken off her outer clothing and was seated on the k'ang, she said, "A fine person you are, Kuei-chieh! Without waiting for the rest of us, you just came ahead by yourself."

"I was waiting for you," protested Kuei-chieh, "but when Mother saw that my sedan chair was at the door, she said, 'I fear Yin-erh must have gone ahead. You'd better be on your way.' Who could have anticipated that you'd get here even later?"

Yüeh-niang laughed, saying, "It's not late. Take your seats and we can all have tea together."

"And what is the name of this other girl?" she then went on to ask.

"She is Han Chin-ch'uan's younger sister, Yü-ch'uan," Wu Yin-erh replied.

Before long, Hsiao-yü brought in a table and set out eight saucers of assorted delicacies and two of sweetmeats for the refreshment of the four singing girls. Li Kuei-chieh, making a show of her status as Yüeh-niang's adopted daughter, sat on Yüeh-niang's k'ang and joined Yü-hsiao in cracking nuts and putting the kernels into serving boxes, while Wu Yin-erh, Cheng Ai-hsiang, and Han Yü-ch'uan sat below on a row of stools to one side.

Li Kuei-chieh forthwith plucked up her spirits, calling out, on one occasion, "Sister Yü-hsiao, might I trouble you, if there is any tea, to pour a cup for me?" and, on another occasion, "Sister Hsiao-yü, if there's any water handy, bring some here so I can rinse these hands of mine."

Hsiao-yü actually did dip up a pewter basinful of water for her to rinse her hands in. Wu Yin-erh and the others looked on with wide-open eyes but did not dare say anything.

Li Kuei-chieh then said, "Yin-erh, why don't the three of you get out your instruments and entertain Mother with a song. I've sung for her already."

Wu Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh were sitting right across from her, so when Wu Yin-erh heard these words of Kuei-chieh's she had no alternative but to do as she was told.

Thereupon, with Cheng Ai-hsiang playing the psaltery, Wu Yin-erh playing the p'i-p'a, and Han Yü-ch'uan singing along with them, they sang the song suite beginning with the tune "Eight Beats of a Kan-chou Song," the first line of which is:

Concealed amid clusters of turquoise hair ornaments.¹⁰

In no time at all, they finished singing and put down their musical instruments, after which Wu Yin-erh started off by asking Yüeh-niang, "Which official guests has Father invited to the party today?"

"The guests your father has invited today are all relatives and friends," Yüeh-niang replied.

"Are those two eunuchs not going to be here today?" asked Kuei-chieh.

"Eunuch Hsüeh was the only one who showed up yesterday," said Yüeh-niang. "The one named Liu didn't come."

"Eunuch Liu is all right," said Kuei-chieh, "but that Eunuch Hsüeh is given to mischief. He pinches you until you think you'll go out of your mind."

"After all, he's only a eunuch," said Yüeh-niang, "so what does it matter? You might as well let him have a little fun."

"That's a fine thing to say," complained Kuei-chieh. "He's enough to drive a person crazy."

As they were talking, who should they see but Tai-an, who came in to pick up the serving boxes of nuts they had been preparing.

When he saw the four singing girls sitting in the room, he said, "Half the guests have already arrived, and they're just about to take their seats. Hadn't you better get yourselves together and go up to the reception hall?"

Yüeh-niang then asked, "Who all have arrived up front?"

"Old Mr. Ch'iao, Hua the Elder, Wu the Elder, Wu the Second, and Mr. Hsieh have all been here for some time," reported Tai-an.

"Are that beggar, Ying the Second, and Pockmarked Chu going to be here today?" asked Kuei-chieh.

"Of the ten members of the club," said Tai-an, "not one of them will be absent today. Ying the Second showed up at 8:00 A.M. and Father sent him off on an errand, but he said he'd be right back."

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Kuei-chieh. "Every time it's those same chunks of knife-bait. Who knows how long they'll keep on pestering us? I won't go out there today. I'd rather stay here in her room and sing for Mother's benefit."

"You're certainly bent on having an easy time of it," said Tai-an as he picked up the boxes of nuts and went his way.

"Mother, you just don't know how it is," said Kuei-chieh. "That Pockmarked Chu, when he's at a party, keeps his two lips going so incessantly that all you can hear is the sound of his talking. No matter how people take him to task for it, he doesn't pay any attention. He and that Blabbermouth Sun are nothing but a pair of slobber-pusses."

"That Pockmarked Chu," said Cheng Ai-hsiang, "the one who constantly runs around with Ying the Second, showed up at our place the other day with Little Chang the Second, who produced ten taels of silver and wanted to engage my younger sister Ai-yüeh. Mother told him, 'She has just been deflowered by a Southerner, not more than a month ago, and the "Southerner has not yet left town, so how can I agree to retain you as her customer?' She explained all this to him, but he repeatedly refused to accept it and made such a nuisance of himself that in her botheration she locked herself in and refused to come out and see him.

"That Little Chang the Second has really got money to burn. He rides around on a large white horse with four or five page boys to accompany him. He just sat there in our reception hall that day and refused to budge, which got Pockmarked Chu so flustered that he knelt down in the courtyard, so his torso looked as though it were sticking out of the ground like a post, and begged us, saying 'Whatever happens, ask your mother to come out and accept this money of his. If Sister Ai-yüeh will do no more than come out to see him and serve him a cup of tea, we'll leave.' It really made us laugh. He was just like someone abasing himself to plead for flood relief, the slobber-pussed good-for-nothing!"

"I thought Little Chang the Second was keeping Tung the Cat," said Wu Yin-erh.

"Because, in the course of his devotions, he burnt incense in two places on her tiger's mouth,"¹¹ said Cheng Ai-hsiang, "their affair has been 'a-nail-eighted'¹² for some time. Right now they're running loose."

Then, turning to Kuei-chieh, she said, "The other day while attending a wake on a country estate outside the gate, I ran into Chou Hsiao-erh, who asked me to give you his best. He said that the day before yesterday he went to your place with Nieh Yüeh, but you weren't at home."

Kuei-chieh tipped her a wink, saying, "I was here at Father's place that day. It's my elder sister, Kuei-ch'ing, that he's interested in."

"If you haven't had anything to do with Chang¹³ in the past," said Cheng Ai-hsiang, "why are you carrying on with him now?"

"Why that fucking Liu the Ninth!"¹⁴ Kuei-chieh exclaimed. "As though I'd take him as a customer! What sort of a good-for-nothing is that? He'd only have given me the creeps. After he got out of that affair he was implicated in, people I ran into said that he was angry at me for refusing to see him. Mother told him, 'If you were to stick to our place, we might be willing to lay out a little something to entertain you; what would it matter? But if you insist on carrying on with someone else, we're not stupid enough to countenance you any further.' Truly:

If you put on fake crystals to contemplate that southern exposure;

It'll only look more repulsive."¹⁵

Everyone laughed at what was being said, but Yüeh-ning, sitting on her k'ang listening to the conversation, protested, "You've been talking all this while, and I haven't understood a word of it. I don't know what sort of lingo you're talking."

Let us put this aside for a moment and say no more about it. To resume our story, in the front compound all of the guests had arrived, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, in formal attire, supervised the serving of the wine. The company insisted that Ch'iao Hung should take precedence, and he was the first to offer a toast to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Just at this juncture, the three singing girls came out from the rear compound. Behold:

On their heads:

Pearl-decked caps are all aquiver;

From their bodies:

The scent of orchid and musk reeks.

No sooner did Ying Po-chüeh spot them than he started to joke, saying, "Where did these three sweethearts of yours come from? Stop them. Don't let them come in."

"Mr. Host," he then went on to ask, "why didn't Li Kuei-chieh come out with the rest of them?"

"I have no idea," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

To start off with, Cheng Ai-hsiang played the psaltery, Wu Yin-erh the p'i-p'a, and Han Yu-ch'uan the mandola as they:

Opened their ruby lips,

Exposed their white teeth, and sang the set of songs to the tune "The Water Nymphs," beginning with the one the first line of which is:

With his tiger-head tally minted out of horse-hoof gold.¹⁶

After some time had elapsed and everyone had been provided with wine, Ch'iao Hung took the seat of honor, followed in order of precedence by Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, Hua the Elder, Brother-in-law Shen, Sponger Ying, Tagalong Hsieh, Blabbermouth Sun, Sticky Chu, Welsher Yün, Cadger Ch'ang, Scrounger Pai, Manager Fu, and Scurry-about Pen, making a party of fourteen. There were eight tables in all, and Hsi-men Ch'ing presided as host at the lower end of the seating arrangement.

Words are inadequate to describe the scene:

The sound of their singing is melodious,

The style of their dancing is fastidious;

The wine flows as copiously as waves,

The viands are piled as high as hills.¹⁷

When they reached the point at which:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed, and Three suites of songs had been performed, Ying Po-chüeh began to hold forth, saying, "Mr. host, there's no need to have them sing anymore. Whether you look at it this way or that, one way or the other, it's always the same couple of suites, as monotonous as a dog scratching at the door. Who wants to listen to it? It would be better to get your servant to set another three places for them and let them serve the company with wine rather than continuing to sing."

"Just let them show their respects to the guest of honor and the rest of the company with a couple more suites of songs," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You dog! You're always ready to:

Disturb the feast and break up the party."¹⁸

"Beggar Ying," said Cheng Ai-hsiang, "you're the type who:

Lets off fireworks behind the gate:

Unable to wait for evening."¹⁹

Ying Po-chüeh got up from his place and cursed, saying, "You crazy little whore! I care about as much whether it's evening or not as your mother's cunt!"

Then, instructing Tai-an, "Come over here, and take their instruments away from them," he took one of them by each hand and forcibly dragged them up to where the company was seated and told them to serve the wine.

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" protested Cheng Ai-hsiang. "You're dragging me so fast:

My limbs can hardly touch the ground."²⁰

"You little whore!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "The truth of the matter is that:

Time is running out.

At any moment:

The 'blue-bladed horse' may 'come.'²¹

Serve the wine. I can't hold out any longer."

"What do you mean by the 'blue-bladed horse'?" asked Hsieh Hsi-ta.

"When you wind up with a 'shiver like a cold crow,' " said Ying Po-chüeh, "the 'blue-bladed horse' always 'comes.' "

Everyone laughed at this sally.

Thereupon, Wu Yin-erh served Ch'iao Hung, Cheng Ai-hsiang served Wu K'ai, Han Yü-ch'uan served Wu the Second, and they then proceeded to work their way, one at a time, down the two sides of the seating arrangement.

When Wu Yin-erh finally arrived in front of Ying Po-chüeh, he asked her, "Why didn't Li Kuei-chieh come out with the rest of you?"

"Master Two," said Wu Yin-erh, "you mean you still don't know about it? Li Kuei-chieh has now been acknowledged by the First Lady as her adopted daughter. Whatever I tell you about this, keep it to yourself. Talk about premeditated schemes! Day before yesterday, when the party broke up here at Father's place, we all went home together and agreed that we would meet early this morning in order to come over here together. I got myself all ready at my place and was just waiting for her, while who could have known that, all the time, she had intended to buy presents in advance and set out ahead of me, leaving me to wait for her all this time.

"I sent a maidservant to your place to see what was up, and she reported that you had already left, which earned me a real scolding from Mother. So I hastened, along with the other two, to catch up with you. If you were going to get yourself acknowledged as an adopted daughter by Father and Mother, what difference would it have made to tell me about it? It's not as though I wanted to take your place or anything like that, so you would feel justified in doing things behind my back.

"No wonder she was sitting there on the First Lady's k'ang just now, making a show of the fact that she was Mother's adopted daughter, cracking nuts and putting the kernels into serving boxes:

Picking up this and then picking up that, and spurning the rest of us under her feet.

"I hadn't known about it until the Sixth Lady surreptitiously told me, just now, in the rear compound. She made a pair of shoes for the First Lady, bought a box of stuffed pastries, two ducks, a set of pig's trotters, and two bottles of wine, and came here in a sedan chair before any of the rest of us."

She gave a full account of the affair, from beginning to end.

When Ying Po-chüeh had heard her out, he said, "If she's here today but won't come out to entertain us, it doesn't matter; but I'd really like to show that lousy little whore a thing or two. Let me tell you, she must have planned all this together with the madam of her place. On seeing that His Honor has become an official, and moreover that he holds a judicial appointment, in the first place, they were afraid of his power and influence; and, in the second place, they feared that he would visit the licensed quarter less often; so they took advantage of this scheme to get her acknowledged as an adopted daughter to ensure that their relationship would continue and not be broken off. Have I got it right, or not?

"I'll tell you what to do. She got the First Lady to accept her as an adopted daughter. Now you, too, should buy some presents and get the Sixth Lady to acknowledge you as an adopted daughter. After all, you and she have both been:

Traveling companions on the same road, along with the late Hua Tzu-hsü.

Everyone must do the best he can for himself."²²

Is what I say right, or not? There's no reason for you to get upset with her."

"What you say is right," responded Wu Yin-erh. "When I get home, I'll speak to Mother about it."

When she had finished speaking, she served him with wine and then moved on.

The next person to serve him with wine was Han Yü-ch'uan.

"Sister Han," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I'm putting you to a lot of trouble. Don't bother to perform a proper obeisance. What's your elder sister up to at home these days?"

"Someone is maintaining my elder sister at home," replied Han Yü-ch'uan. "She hasn't come out to sing for some time now."

"I remember visiting your place in the fifth month last," said Ying Po-chüeh, "and not seeing anything of your sister."

"On that occasion," said Han Yü-ch'uan, "why didn't you stick around a little longer, instead of running off so soon?"

"I would have stayed longer that day," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but there were two people there that I don't get along with, and your father here also wanted me to join him, so I left early."

When Han Yü-ch'uan saw that he had drunk his cup of wine, she poured out another cup.

"That's enough," said Ying Po-chüeh. "Take it easy. I can't drink any more."

"Master Two," said Han Yü-ch'uan, "take your time about it, and when you're finished I'll sing a song for you."

"Sister mine," said Ying Po-chüeh, "whoever told you? That's the surest way to my heart. As the saying goes:

You don't raise a child in the hope it will shit gold and piss silver;

All you can hope for is that it will respond empathetically to you.

You're a true denizen of the Verdant Spring Bordello.²³ In the future, you needn't worry about not having anything to eat. You're certainly superior to that lousy little splay-legged whore from the Cheng place. Slippery as she is, she never consents to sing."

"Beggar Ying the Second," exclaimed Cheng Ai-hsiang, "you're delirious again. What a thing to say!

"You dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Just a while ago, you were objecting to their singing, and now you're giving her a hard time about it."

"That was a while ago," responded Ying Po-chüeh. "Now that they've served the wine, should we not have a song? As long as I've got three mace of silver to my name, I can afford to:

Make a ghost at the millstone,²⁴ out of that little whore."

Han Yü-ch'uan had no alternative but to pick up her p'i-p'a and sing four songs for the amusement of the company.

Ying Po-chüeh then enquired of Hsi-men Ch'ing, "How come you didn't have Li Kuei-chieh come out to entertain us today?"

"She's not here today," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I heard her singing, a while ago, in the rear compound," said Ying po-chüeh, "and now you're telling lies on her behalf."

Then, turning to Tai-an, he said, "Whatever happens, go into the rear compound and tell her to come out, and be quick about it."

Tai-an refused to budge, saying, "Master Two, you haven't heard right. It's the blind professional singer Big Sister Yü that's singing for the ladies."

"You lousy little oily mouth!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh, "do you think you can fool me? Wait till I go back there myself to fetch her."

Sticky Chu then said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother, it doesn't really matter, but why not just ask Li Kuei-chieh to come out and serve a round of drinks to your distinguished relatives? If she doesn't sing, it doesn't matter. I know that she is here for personal reasons today."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to withstand the pestering of his cronies and felt compelled to send Tai-an back to the rear compound and ask Li Kuei-chieh to come and join them.

Li Kuei-chieh was in the master suite, playing her p'i-p'a and singing for the entertainment of Wu K'ai's wife, Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P'an, and company.

When she saw Tai-an come in to call for her, she asked, "Who sent you here?"

"Father told me to come," replied Tai-an, "and ask you to go out to the reception hall and serve a round of drinks."

"Mother," said Li Kuei-chieh, "Father's not making any sense. I said, just now, that I wasn't going to go out, and now he's calling for me anyway."

"It was only because Father was unable to withstand the pestering of the company," said Tai-an, "that he sent me back here for you."

"It doesn't matter," said Yüeh-niang. Just go out, serve a round of drinks, and come back as quickly as you can, that's all."

"Was it really Father who sent for me?" Kuei-chieh again asked Tai-an. "If it was, then I'll go. But if it was Beggar Ying the Second, I wouldn't care if he called me for an age, I'd never go."

Thereupon, she availed herself of Yüeh-niang's mirror stand to retouch her makeup and adjust her attire and then went out to the reception hall.

When the company looked up, they saw that on her head she wore:

A chignon enclosed in a fret of silver filigree, fastened in place all round with:
Gold filigree pins and combs,
on which:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles.
Above, she wore:

A blouse of pale lavender silk;
below, she wore:

A skirt of turquoise satin, revealing:

The upturned points of her tiny golden lotuses,
Decorated with a pair of red phoenixes.
On her painted face she wore:

Three turquoise beauty patches;
From her body:

A gust of exotic fragrance²⁵ assailed the nostrils.
Facing the seat of honor:

Neither correctly nor precisely,
she performed but a single kowtow, after which:
Hiding her face behind her gold-flecked fan,
While coyly adjusting her hair ornaments,
she took her stand in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Tai-an to set out a brocade-covered stool for her at the head of the seating arrangement so she could offer wine to the guest of honor, Ch'iao Hung.

Ch'iao Hung, however, hastily bowed to her, saying, "There's no need for you to trouble yourself on my behalf. What about these other distinguished relatives?"

"Start off with Master Ch'iao," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Li Kuei-chieh, thereupon:
Lightly flaunted her silken sleeves,
Raised high the golden flagon, and offered Ch'iao Hung some wine.

"Distinguished sir," exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh from one side, "Please resume your seat and let her serve you. For these painted faces from the Verdant Spring Bordello, providing entertainment and serving wine are their professional responsibilities. You mustn't be overindulgent with them."

"Master Two," responded Ch'iao Hung, "This young lady is the sweetheart of our distinguished host. How could I possibly presume to put her to any trouble? It would make me:

Ill at ease either sitting or standing."

"You can relax on that score," said Ying Po-chüeh. "She is no longer playing the role of a strumpet. On seeing that His Honor has become an official, she has volunteered herself for acceptance as an adopted daughter."

Li Kuei-chieh's face turned red, and she said, "You're delirious! Whoever said such a ridiculous thing?"

"Really," exclaimed Hsieh Hsi-ta.

"Can such things be?"

We didn't know anything about it. We ought to take advantage of this occasion, when all of you gentlemen are here, not one of us being absent, to contribute five candareens of silver apiece as a gift to our brother here, in celebration of his acquisition of this adopted daughter."

Ying Po-chüeh picked up where Hsieh Hsi-ta had left off, saying, "It's a good thing Brother has become an official. It has always been true that:

There is less need to fear officials,
Than there is to fear the officious."²⁶

Now that you've acquired an adopted daughter to boot, in the future, if you sprinkle a little water on her, barren as she is, she may end up producing a juicy little niece or nephew for me."²⁷

"You lousy dog!" Hsi-men Ch'ing railed at him. "All you ever do is resort to outlandish irony over nothing."

"Even foreign iron can be forged into a cutting instrument," retorted Ying Po-chüeh.

"Beggar Ying the Second," interjected Cheng Ai-hsiang, who was serving wine to Mr. Shen, "If Li Kuei-chieh can be his goddaughter, maybe you can become his godson, which, if you scramble the letters a bit, would make you a gone sod."²⁸

"You lousy little whore!" railed Ying Po-chüeh. "You're nothing but a dead duck. I'll stop giving you a hard time about as soon as you start reciting Buddha's name."

"Sister Ai-hsiang," said Li Kuei-chieh, "Why don't you tell off this beggar for me?"

"Don't pay any attention to him," said Cheng Ai-hsiang. "To cite a few familiar phrases, he's just a:

'Cock' a doodle doo,

'Hold' onto your hat;
who's:

A 'dollar,' a dollar, a ten o'clock scholar,
Yes,' my darling daughter."²⁹

"You little whore!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "You may abuse me all you want with that highfalutin lingo of yours. Needless to say, if I were really as infamous as you make out, I'd have ripped off your mother's pant strings a long time ago. Don't worry about it. In the future, if I don't give you something to remember me by, you'll refuse to acknowledge the General of the Five Ways as a god."

"We'd better not bother him any further," said Li Kuei-chieh. "He's showing all the symptoms of desperation."

"This Beggar Ying the Second," said Cheng Ai-hsiang, "is worse than ever today."

He puts his 'ugly' 'niece' on a pushcart:
the better to parade his 'ugliness.'³⁰

Like the flowers of the wax gourd:
he stinks in and out of season.

It so happens that, he's really a 'son of a nun.' "

"This little splay-legged whore!" protested Ying Po-chüeh. "Nobody else will have her. I'm the only one willing to make the best of it."

"You crazy chunk of knife-bait!" exclaimed Li Kuei-chieh. "What a clean mouth you've got! You're knocking the tartar right off her teeth. Father, why don't you give him a slap or two? Just look at the way he's carrying on."

"You crazy clod of a dog!" Hsi-men Ch'ing berated him. "You were the one who wanted them to serve the wine in the first place, so what are you teasing them for?"

Going up to his place at the table, he gave him a slap.

"You lousy little whore!" said Ying Po-chüeh. "You think that as long as you've got your lover's influence behind you, I'll be afraid of you. Just listen to how sweetly she pronounces the word 'Father.' "

"But don't have her serve any more wine," he went on to say. "That's letting her off too easily. Bring on the instruments, and let her sing a suite of songs for us, or she'll slip back to the rear compound. She's been giving us the slip enough as it is."

"Master Two," said Han Yü-ch'uan, "you're like:

The intendant of the Ts'ao-chou Military Defense Circuit:
The area of your jurisdiction is broad."³¹

There in the front reception hall:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade, they continued to drink wine and enjoy themselves. But no more of this.

Let us now return to the story of P'an Chin-lien. Ever since Li P'ing-erh had borne a child, she noticed that Hsi-men Ch'ing constantly chose to spend the night in her quarters. Thereupon, she:

Constantly harbored jealous thoughts,³² and Frequently nurtured dissatisfied ideas.

Knowing that Hsi-men Ch'ing was entertaining in the front reception hall, she approached her mirror stand:

Deftly painted her moth eyebrows,
Retouched her cicada-shaped coiffure,
Lightly rouged her ruby lips, adjusted her attire, and emerged from her room.

On hearing the baby crying in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, she walked right in and asked, "Since his mother isn't even here, why is he crying so?"

"His mother has gone to the rear compound," the wet nurse Ju-i replied. "He's crying this way because he wants his mother."

Affecting an ingratiating smile, P'an Chin-lien stepped up and started to play with the baby, saying, "You've hardly been here any time at all, you're just a newborn sprout, and yet you already know enough to look for your mother. Let me carry you back to the rear compound, and we'll see if I can't find your mother for you."

She was about to loosen her blouse and pick the child up, when the wet nurse Ju-i said to her, "Don't pick the baby up, Fifth Lady. I fear he might go wee-wee on you."

"You crazy little stinker!" said Chin-lien. "What is there to worry about? If I hold him on a diaper-cloth, there won't be any problem."

She then took Kuan-ko into her arms, embraced him, and set off straight for the rear compound. As she went through the ceremonial gate leading into the rear courtyard, she raised the child up as high as she could hold him.

Who could have anticipated that Wu Yüeh-niang would be standing in the loggia outside the master suite, overseeing some servants' wives, who were busy replenishing dishes of savories for the party, while Li P'ing-erh and Yü-hsiao were just inside the door, making butterfat "abalone shell" sweets.³³

P'an Chin-lien, with an ingratiating smile, looked at the child and said, as though in his voice, " 'What are you doing, First Mother?' Now say, Your little Kuan-ko has come looking for his mother.' "

Yüeh-niang, abruptly lifting up her head to see who it was, said, "Fifth Lady, what are you saying? It's a good thing his mother isn't here. Late as it is, what are you doing carrying him back here for no good reason? And lifting him so high up, to boot? I'm afraid you may frighten him. His mother has her hands full just inside the door there."

She then called out, "Sister Li, come outside. Your son has come looking for you."

When Li P'ing-erh hastily came outside and saw Chin-lien holding her baby, she said, "Little Kuan-ko, I left you, perfectly content, in my room, in the arms of the wet nurse. Why have you come looking for me, for no good reason? See that you don't go wee-wee on your fifth mother's clothes."

"He was in your room," said Chin-lien, "crying like anything for you. So I thought I'd bring him out with me for a walk."

Li P'ing-erh hastily loosened her blouse and took possession of her child.

Yüeh-niang playfully teased the baby for a while and then said, "Carry him carefully back to your quarters, and try not to frighten him."

When Li P'ing-erh got back to her quarters in the front compound, she said quietly, "Wet nurse, if he starts to cry, you should take your time and try to comfort him until I get back. Why did you let the Fifth Lady take him back to the rear compound looking for me?"

"That's just what I told her," said Ju-i, "but the Fifth Lady insisted on carrying him off."

Li P'ing-erh took the time to watch as Ju-i breastfed the baby and then put him to bed. Who could have anticipated that, not long after he had fallen asleep, the child started to cry as though something had frightened him in a dream. In the middle of the night, he started to suffer from alternating chills and fever. The wet nurse tried to breast-feed him, but he rejected the milk and continued to cry. Li P'ing-erh became alarmed.

P'an Chin-lien Raises Kuan-ko as High as She Can Hold Him

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing's party in the front compound broke up, he sent the four singing girls home. Yüeh-niang gave Li Kuei-chieh a set of heavy chiffon velvet brocade clothing and two taels of silver, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Late that evening, when Hsi-men Ch'ing went to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to see his child, he saw that it was crying and asked what had happened.

Li P'ing-erh did not bring up the fact that P'an Chin-lien had carried him off to the rear compound, merely saying, "I don't know why, but after falling asleep, he woke up and has been crying like this ever since. He also rejects his milk."

"Do your best to pet him back to sleep," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Then he upbraided Ju-i, saying, "Why didn't you look after Kuan-ko properly? What were you doing to frighten him like that?"

Returning to the rear compound, he told Yüeh-niang about it. Yüeh-niang, although she knew that it was Chin-lien's taking him out that had frightened him, did not mention a word about it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, merely saying, "Tomorrow I'll send for Dame Liu to have a look at him."

"Don't have that old whore come and subject him to her:

Bogus acupuncture and quack moxabustion,"³⁴ said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Get a licensed pediatrician to treat the child."

Yüeh-niang did not accede to his suggestion, saying, "For a baby who's barely a month old, what need is there for any such thing as a licensed pediatrician?"

Early the next day, after seeing Hsi-men Ch'ing off to work at the yamen, she sent a page boy to ask Dame Liu to come and take a look at him. She said that he was suffering from a fright, and she was given three mace of silver for her pains. Only after the baby had been made to swallow some of the medicine she prescribed did he start to sleep soundly and stop rejecting his milk, which enabled Li P'ing-erh to feel as though:

The stone on her head had finally fallen to the ground.

Truly:

A whole breastful of intimate concerns,
Resides in what is not expressed in words.³⁵

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 33

CH'EN CHING-CHI LOSES HIS KEYS AND IS DISTRAINED TO SING; HAN TAO-KUO LIBERATES HIS WIFE TO COMPETE FOR ADMIRATION

In this life, although we are not endowed with foreknowledge,¹ Wealth and distinction, success and fame,
 are not won by exertion.
It is vain to take riches and silk
 as one's foundation;
How can human effort hope to contend with the decree of fate?²
The customs of the age, heat and cold, vainly beguile the eye;
Worldly cares, separation and reunion,
 are better quite forgotten.
The superior man proceeds or halts as he is used or discarded;³
If you do not unknit your brow and laugh, what are you waiting for?⁴

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home from the yamen, he had no sooner come in the door than he asked Wu Yüeh-niang, "Is the child any better? Have you sent a page boy after the doctor?"

"I've already had Dame Liu here," replied Yüeh-niang, "and he's been taking the medication she prescribed. The child is no longer rejecting his milk and has been sleeping soundly for some time. He seems to be somewhat better."

"How can you trust that old whore, with her:

 Bogus acupuncture and quack moxabustion?"

said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The right thing to do would have been to engage the services of a licensed pediatrician. If he's better, so much for that. If he's not any better, I'll have her taken to the yamen and give the old whore's fingers a good squeezing for her pains."

"You and your:

 Bad-mouthed and evil-tongued, abuse!" complained Yüeh-niang. "Your child is currently taking the medication she prescribed and has gotten better. Yet you persist in sticking your mouth out and cursing people!"

When she had finished speaking, a maidservant brought in something to eat.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had scarcely done eating when who should he see but Tai-an, who came in to announce, "Master Ying the Second has come."

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed the page boy, "Take some tea out and ask Master Ying the Second to have a seat in the summerhouse."

Then, turning to Yüeh-niang, he said, "Leave the dishes that I've been eating from just as they are and have a page boy take them out, together with some rice, and ask our son-in-law to join him for a snack. I'll be there momentarily."

"Where did you send him off to yesterday morning," asked Yüeh-niang, "that he should be so late getting back?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing then explained to her, "Brother Ying the Second is acquainted with a merchant from Hu-chou, a certain Magnate Ho, who has five hundred taels worth of spun silk in storage at his inn outside the South Gate that he is anxious to dispose of so he can start on his way home. He has let me know that his friend is willing to unload it at a discount. I only agreed to pay four hundred fifty taels of silver. Yesterday I sent him, along with Lai-pao, to take two large silver ingots as samples of the quality of my silver. The deal has already been struck, and we have arranged to pay over the silver today."

"My thinking is that since the house on Lion Street is empty, I might as well open two rooms on the street front there, have them fixed up to serve as a silk goods shop, and engage a manager to take care of it. Moreover, since Lai-pao is now nominally on the staff of the Prince of Yün, which entitles him to a government salary, he can continue to stay there, along with the manager, to look after the house, on the one hand, and take charge of the business, on the other."

"There's no getting around the need to find another manager," said Yüeh-niang.

"Brother Ying the Second," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "has told me that he has an acquaintance named Han who was originally in the silk goods trade but is currently out of capital and sitting idle at home. He says that he is proficient at writing and arithmetic, and that:

His conduct is upright and correct, and has repeatedly offered to stand as a guarantor for him. One of these days he's going to bring him to meet me and we'll arrange the terms of a contract."

When he had finished speaking, Hsi-men Ch'ing weighed out four hundred fifty taels of silver and told Lai-pao to take charge of it. Ch'en Ching-chi had already finished eating with Ying Po-chüeh in the summerhouse. The latter had waited until he was:

Burning with impatience, but when he saw the silver brought out, he was:

Delighted in his heart.⁵

Bowing to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he said, "After imposing on your hospitality yesterday, I got home late, and it was all I could do to crawl out of bed this morning."

"I've weighed out four hundred and fifty taels of silver here," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I'll have Lai-pao fetch a bag and pack it while we both look on. Today is an auspicious day for such a proceeding, so we'll hire a pushcart to transport the goods, and lock them up for the time being in the house over there. That ought to take care of it."

"What you propose makes sense, Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh. Where these Southerners are concerned:

If you delay things you'll only give them ideas.⁶
Have the goods carted in and the business will be completed."

Thereupon, he and Lai-pao mounted their horses and, taking the silver with them, went straight out to the inn outside the South Gate and completed the transaction. Who could have known that Ying Po-chüeh had colluded with Magnate Ho on a price of only four hundred twenty taels of silver, so that he profited by a kickback of thirty taels? For public consumption, when the deal was closed a commission of only nine taels of silver was forthcoming, which Ying Po-chüeh and Lai-pao divided equally between them. They then proceeded to hire a pushcart and have the goods transported into the city that very day, stored them in an empty room in the house on Lion Street, locked the door, and came back to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ying Po-chüeh to pick an auspicious day and bring Manager Han to see him. He turned out to be short of stature and twenty-nine-years-old.

His speech was voluble,
His appearance was imposing,
His face was blithe as the spring breeze,⁷
His manner was congenial.

That very day Hsi-men Ch'ing signed a contract with him, by the terms of which he and Lai-pao were to receive the capital from him to hire workers to dye silk, open up a storefront⁸ in the house on Lion Street, and offer a complete line of silk goods for sale. Every day they sold several tens of taels worth of merchandise. But no more of this.

Light and darkness alternate swiftly;
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

Before anyone knew it, it was the fifteenth day of the eighth month, Wu Yüeh-niang's birthday. A group of female guests was invited to a party to celebrate the event, and her elder brother Wu K'ai's wife, Old Mrs. P'an, and Aunt Yang were asked to stay overnight so they could listen to the two Buddhist nuns recite sacred texts and sing Buddhist songs for them. On such occasions they often stayed up until the second or third watch before going to bed.

On this particular night, because his sister-in-law, Wu K'ai's wife, was staying in the master suite and it would be inconvenient for him to be there, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound to have a look at Kuan-ko and intended to sleep in Li P'ing-erh's room.

"The child is only now a little better," said Li P'ing-erh, "and I'm not in the mood for it. Why don't you go spend the night in the Fifth Lady's room?"

"I won't bother you then," Hsi-men Ch'ing said with a laugh.

Thereupon he went over to P'an Chin-lien's place. When Chin-lien heard her husband come into her quarters, she felt just as though she had:

Discovered a piece of gold or a precious stone, and lost no time in bundling Old Mrs. P'an off to spend the night in Li P'ing-erh's place.

In her bedroom she then proceeded to:

Ignite the highly placed silver lamp,
Deftly unroll the embroidered quilt,
Light incense and wash her private parts,

so that she could sleep together with Hsi-men Ch'ing that night.

The feelings expressed by the pillow side,
Were too multifarious to describe in detail.

Her every endeavor was designed to ensnare her lover's heart so that he would not stray into anyone else's room. Truly:

Drumming its antennae, the roving bee,
Finding the tender corolla half open,
beguiles away the spring;

Sipping fragrance, the powdered butterfly,
Resting deep in the womb of the flower, disports itself by night.⁹

When Li P'ing-erh saw Old Mrs. P'an come over to her place, she hastily offered her a seat on the k'ang and ordered Ying-ch'ün to serve wine and bake some wheat cakes so they could enjoy an evening chat. The night was half over before they went to sleep.

The next day she gave Old Mrs. P'an a pale green satin jacket, two pairs of satin shoe uppers, and two hundred candareens, which pleased the old lady so much she was ready to:

Fart ferociously and pee in her pants.

Returning to her daughter's quarters, she showed these things to Chin-lien, saying, "These were all given to me by your sister over there."

When Chin-lien saw them, however, she criticized her mother, saying, "How can you be so:

Mean-spirited and covetous?"¹⁰

What's so great about these things that you should be taking handouts from her?"

"A fine one to talk you are!" said Old Mrs. P'an. "When someone has been considerate enough to give me something, you start talking like that. What did you ever give me to wear?"

"I can't be compared to those sisters who have money of their own," said Chin-lien. "I don't have anything to wear myself. What would I give to you? And now, for no good reason, you've accepted favors at someone else's hands. In a little while, we'll simply have to get together a few dishes of something, pour out a flagon of wine, and go over to her place to return the favor. Otherwise, in the future, someone is sure to:

Engage in idle tittle-tattle.

I've had enough of that, thank you."

She then directed Ch'un-mei to prepare eight dishes of food, four boxes of delicacies, and a pewter flagon of wine. Having ascertained that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home, she told Ch'iu-chü to put the things in square boxes and carry them over to Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where she was to say, "Mother and Grandmother would like to come over, if you are free, and share a cup of wine with you."

"I've put your mother to trouble again," said Li P'ing-erh.

In a little while, Chin-lien and Old Mrs. P'an came over, and the three of them sat down together for a drink. Ch'un-mei stood in attendance upon them, and poured the wine.

As they were talking, who should they see but Ch'iu-chü, who had come to call Ch'un-mei, saying, "Son-in-law Ch'en is over at our place looking for some clothes that have been pawned. He wants you to go open the outer door to the second floor for him."

"Tell our son-in-law," instructed Chin-lien, "that after he has retrieved the clothes, he should come over here and have a goblet of wine before going on with his business."

Before long, Ch'en Ching-chi found the several sets of clothes he was looking for and headed out toward the front of the compound.

Ch'un-mei came in and reported, "He won't come in."

"Whatever it takes, drag him in if necessary," said Chin-lien, and she sent Hsiu-ch'ün out, who succeeded in inviting him in.

Old Mrs. P'an was sitting on the k'ang beside a small table, arrayed with various dishes and delicacies, while Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh kept her company in drinking wine. Ch'en Ching-chi hastily made them a bow.

"I told you to come have a drink with the best of intentions," said Chin-lien. Why have you made excuses and refused to come? At this rate you'll be out of luck before you know it."

Making a meaningful moue, she instructed Ch'un-mei, "Fetch a capacious cup and fill it for our son-in-law to drink."

Ch'en Ching-chi put the clothes he had come for down on the k'ang and sat down. Ch'un-mei, who was a practiced hand at the routine, fetched a tea bowl, filled it to the brim, and handed it to him.

"It's very gracious of you, Fifth Lady," Ching-chi exclaimed in consternation, "but I'd rather drink two small cups, if you don't mind. There are a lot of people out in the shop waiting for their clothes."

"Let them wait," said Chin-lien. "I insist upon your drinking this big cup. Who has the patience to bother with those piddling little cups?"

"Let the young man go after this one cup," said Old Mrs. P'an. "I fear his business is pressing."

"Don't you believe it," said Chin-lien. "What's he got to be busy about? He can manage no small quantity of wine. In fact:

On a gold-varnished wine bucket,
He can drink down as far as the second hoop."

Ching-chi laughed at this and addressed himself to the wine.

He had barely swallowed two mouthfuls, when Old Mrs. P'an said to Ch'un-mei, "Sister, give him a pair of chopsticks. Don't have him drink on an empty stomach."

Ch'un-mei did not provide him with a pair of chopsticks but, in the endeavor to bedevil him further, picked two walnuts out of a partitioned box and offered them to him.

Ching-chi took them from her, saying, "No doubt you expect to get a laugh at my expense if I'm unable to crack them."

Thereupon, putting them between his teeth, he broke them into pieces with a single bite and downed them along with his wine.

"He's still a youngster," said Old Mrs. P'an, "with a good set of teeth in his mouth. For an old body like myself, if things are at all hard, I just can't eat them."

"There are only two things in this world," boasted Ching-chi, "that I am unable to eat. Pebbles and water buffalo horns."

When Chin-lien saw that he had downed the cup of wine, she told Ch'un-mei to refill it, saying, "That first cup was for me. But are not my mother and the Sixth Lady as worthy of the honor as myself? I wouldn't want you to drink too much. Just down these three cups and I'll let you off."

"Fifth Lady," pled Ching-chi, "take pity on your son. I can't drink any more. With just this one cup, I fear my face must be red, and Father may take it amiss."

"So you're afraid of your father-in-law are you," said Chin-lien. "I thought you weren't afraid of him. Where is he going to go out drinking today?"

"This afternoon he's going to Station Master Wu Tien-en's place for a drink," reported Ching-chi. "Right now he's across the street at Ch'iao Hung's house, supervising the alterations."

"Mr. Ch'iao's family moved out yesterday," said Chin-lien. "Shouldn't we have sent them a present of tea today?"

"The present of tea was sent off this morning," said Ching-chi.

"Where have they moved to?" asked Li P'ing-erh.

"They've spent one thousand two hundred taels of silver," said Ching-chi, "to buy a great big place on East Main Street, not very different from our own. It's got a forty-two-foot-wide frontage opening onto the street and five interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis."

As they were talking, Ching-chi managed by holding his nose to swallow a second cup of wine, after which, as soon as he thought no one was looking, he grabbed up the clothes and disappeared in a puff of smoke.

"Mother," Ying-ch'un then remarked, "look at that. Your son-in-law has forgotten to take his keys with him."

Chin-lien proceeded to pick them up and then sit down on top of them, saying to Li P'ing-erh, "When he comes looking for them, don't any of you give the game away. Let me have a little fun with him before returning them."

"My child," said Old Mrs. P'an, "you really ought to return them. What do you want to fool around with him for?"

When Ch'en Ching-chi returned to the pawn shop and groped in his sleeve, he couldn't find the keys and headed straight back to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to look for them.

"Whoever saw any keys of yours?" Chin-lien said. "You must have had the keys in your hand while doing something else and left them there without realizing it."

"I fear you may have left them locked in the second floor storage area," said Ch'un-mei. "I didn't notice your having them with you just now."

"I remember bringing them out with me," said Ching-chi.

"What a child!" said Chin-lien. "I dare say:

The hole in your bottom's so big:

Your mind has dropped out.

Who knows who it could be, either at home or abroad, who's got such a hold on you that:

You possess a soul but lack perception;

Your heart is no longer over your liver."

"There are customers waiting to redeem their clothes," said Ching-chi. "What am I to do? Before Father comes back, I'll have to call in a tinker to get the second-floor door open and see if they're there or not."

Li P'ing-erh could no longer contain herself and started to giggle.

"Sixth Lady," exclaimed Ching-chi, "if you have picked them up, give them to me."

"I've never seen anything like it," said Chin-lien. "I don't know what Sister Li is laughing at him about, as though we'd taken his keys or something."

Ching-chi was so anxious all he could do was:

Turn round and round like a millstone,¹¹ until his roving eye caught sight of the ribbon attached to the keys, which was sticking out from underneath Chin-lien's body.

"Aren't those the keys there," he exclaimed.

Just as he was about to reach for them with his hand, Chin-lien slipped them into her sleeve and refused to give them to him, saying, "How could any keys of yours have fallen into my hands?"

This so flustered the youngster that all he could do was to kneel down on the ground before her:

Dragging his knees like a chicken on the chopping block.

"They say you can sing a pretty song," said Chin-lien, "but you perform only for the benefit of the page boys in the shop out front. Why don't you sing me a song? Take advantage of the fact that your grandmother and the Sixth Lady are here today. If you select good ones, that we haven't heard before, and sing four of them for us, I'll let you have those keys. Otherwise, though you should:

Jump as high as the top of the White Pagoda,¹²

the keys will not be forthcoming.”

“This Fifth Lady,” exclaimed Ching-chi, “is enough to give one a case of heartburn. Whoever told you I could sing?”

“Still up to your tricks, are you?” said Chin-lien.

“Just as Nanking has its Shen Wan-san,¹³

Peking has its withered willows;¹⁴

Just as a man has his reputation,

A tree has its shadow.”¹⁵

The young scamp, unable to withstand her teasing any longer, said:

“It’s not going to kill me.”¹⁶

I’ll sing for you then. I’ve got a bellyful of songs. If I were to really:

Exercise my mind and poke up my liver;

should you demand a hundred, I’d come up with them.”

“Still shooting off your mouth, are you, you short-life!” Chin-lien berated him.

She personally poured a full measure of wine for everyone present and then said to him, “Have another cup to cover your stage fright as you sing.”

“I’ll sing first and then drink at my leisure,” said Ching-chi. “I’ll sing a couple of songs for you on the names of fruits and flowers¹⁷ to the tune ‘Sheep on the Mountain Slope.’ ”

When we first met, we “plighted our faith in the Peach Orchard.”¹⁸

Once we were acquainted, I put you on a pedestal like an “imperial damson.”

Everyone said that you were carousing amid the turquoise blossoms in the green bowers;
Which upset me so much I scratched your apple cheeks to smithereens.

You louse, you took after the barberry in being “solid without but hollow within”;

Which upset me so much the pearly tears fell from my plum-shaped eyes.

I sent a pair of slave-catching peaches¹⁹ to track you down.

They caught you dating under the wild persimmon tree,
so I knew you had left me;

Which upset me so much I looked like a “crane’s crest red” litchi,

And was reduced to cutting off a hank of my black plum-thread hair.

You’re as smooth as any mandarin, yet you say I don’t make sense.

“Go, mango! You’re as stubborn as an ox!”
I curse the ruffian.

“If you press me too hard, I’ll just hang myself from a drooping branch,

And look to see, next autumn, whom you’ve got to depend on in my place.”

I heard the golden sparrow (caragana) warbling before my eyes;

But he abandoned me as lightly as a goose feather (chrysanthemum),

Leaving me to cry my heart out underneath
the speckled bamboo blind.

When a pair of auspicious magpies announced the good news,²⁰

I wondered who it might be;
Never expecting the cassia, for whom I had been “Gazing toward the Southland.”

I had not yet finished redoing my coiffure under the smartweed blossoms,

When the dog-teat (foxglove) ran to the door to bite my visitor.

I surreptitiously sent my maid, Jasmine Blossom, to look everywhere for you.

You leaned on the seven sisters trellis,
Stuck out your clove-shaped tongue,
And called me your plantain lily.
The Chinese lantern plant, acting as my Hung-niang,²¹ slowly led you into my quarters.
Under the blossoms of the verdant peach trees,²²
we compared botanical specimens a while.
Then you had your way with me; I dropped the marigold in my hand,
And we became entangled with each other amid the passionflowers.
I ended up calling you my handsome pomegranate blossom.
But if you suffer my maid, Chrysanthemum,
To tell the tale to my seven sisters,
What sort of picture would that convey?
It would only make a laughing stock of me.

When he had finished singing he asked Chin-lien for the keys, saying, "Fifth Lady, give them to me right away. The manager in the shop has been waiting for me for ever so long. I'm afraid Father might show up at any moment."

"You're certainly bent on having an easy time of it," said Chin-lien. "And you put it so cleverly. If your father should ask me, I'll just say you were out drinking somewhere, lost the keys, and came into my room looking for them."

"Ai-ya!" Ching-chi exclaimed. "Fifth Lady, you're really:

An executioner who likes to play with his victims."

Li P'ing-erh and Old Mrs. P'an repeatedly chimed in from the sidelines, saying, "Sister, let him have them so he can go about his business."

"If it weren't for the good offices of my mother and the Sixth Lady," said Chin-lien, "I'd certainly make you sing until the day is done. At the outset you boasted that you could come up with a hundred or two hundred. And now, after singing only two songs, you want to take flight. I'm not going to let you get away with it."

"I've still got a couple of specialty numbers up my sleeve," said Ching-chi. They're a pair of songs on the terminology of silver and coinage²³ to the tune 'Sheep on the Mountain Slope,' which I might as well offer for your delectation."

Thereupon:

Commencing to sing in full voice,
he sang:

Dear enemy! Your absence has made a mopus²⁴ of me for lo this whole month;
Leaving me to pound my breast in vain, quite unable to sycee²⁵ things up.
I sent that little nugget, Lion-head, with a yellow chit to summon you;
But you were in Ministry of War Hollow,²⁶ having a merry night of it at the Silver Ingot.
I'm willing to put up with your brass, verdigris and all, to avoid abandonment;
You're imprinted in my heart like stamped silver;
there's no way I can do without you.
If I call out for you, you turn away your obverse side and pay me no heed;
Even when I use blowpipes to heat up your crucible,
you make me wait half the night.
The bamboo pattern stamped on my face turns sallow, and I gnash my silver teeth;
Invoking the Goddess of Legal Tender,²⁷ I bolt fast
the door to my room.
That defaced brockage²⁸ of a man may hammer in vain,
I'll pay him no heed.
I curse him for a remelted, thrice-cast, specimen of a two-timing crooked louse.
I've poured the molten metal of my heart into your mint, only to be rejected as too hot-blooded.

Sister! When you were at K'ai-yüan's²⁹ place the two of us burned incense and swore oaths together.³⁰
 I spent jingling cash³¹ and shiny-edged coins in order to be one of those who danced attendance on you.
 But you claimed your furnace³² was out of order, and I couldn't take the goose-eyes³³ of your madam.
 It may be said of you that "elm-pod cash³⁴ are lightweight, and brush-handles are hollow."

Ch'en Ching-chi Loses His Keys and Is Distrained to Sing

Sister! Like an antique cash; your body's shrunk and your hole's too big, no longer of any use;

Unless you let some bare stick,³⁵ with a worn legend, play up to you with his oily mouth.
Baring your shiny tail, milled rim,³⁶ and baked lacquer³⁷ hue, he'd debase you into utter compliance,
And then leave you so topsy-turvy you wouldn't be worth so much as a single black sand-plate.³⁸
"Sister!" I call out. "You two-faced androgynous mule!"³⁹
Just you try and listen to what I say.
It would be a pity if this shiny gold-back⁴⁰ were paired with such a wrinkle-faced, mis-struck ingot."

Ching-chi having finished his song, Chin-lien was about to have Ch'un-mei pour out more wine for him, when Wu Yüeh-niang suddenly showed up from the rear compound.

Noticing that the wet nurse Ju-i was sitting on the stone stylobate outside the door, holding Kuan-ko on her lap, she said to her, "The child is just recovering, you bitch! And here you are, holding him out here and exposing him to the wind. Why don't you take him inside?"

"Who is that speaking?" asked Chin-lien.

"The First Lady is here," Hsiu-ch'un replied.

Ching-chi hastily grabbed his keys and fled outside, as fast as he could go, while the rest of them came down the steps to welcome Yüeh-niang.

"What is our son-in-law doing here?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"Sister Li has prepared a snack and asked my mother over for a visit," said Chin-lien. "When our son-in-law came looking for some clothes, she invited him in for a drink. Sister, please have a seat. It's good sweet wine. Won't you have a cup?"

"I won't have any," said Yüeh-niang. "My elder brother's wife and Aunt Yang are in the rear compound, about to go home. I was concerned about the child and came straight over to see how he is. Sister Li, you're not paying adequate attention. You've let the wet nurse take him outside and sit down where he's exposed to the wind. The other day Dame Liu said he had caught a chill. You really ought to look after him more carefully."

"We were just having a drink with Old Mrs. P'an," Li P'ing-erh said. "Who could have known that lousy little stinker would carry him outside without anyone's knowing it."

Yüeh-niang sat down for a bit and then returned to the rear compound.

A little while later, she sent Hsiao-yü to invite Old Mrs. P'an, the Fifth Lady, and the Sixth Lady to come back to the rear compound for a visit. P'an Chin-lien and Li P'ing-erh put their makeup to rights and accompanied Old Mrs. P'an to the rear compound to join the other ladies for a drink with Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law and Aunt Yang. At sundown they all went out with Yüeh-niang to see their visitors off outside the front gate, where they got into their sedan chairs and departed.

As they were standing in the gateway, Meng Yü-lou started things off, saying, "Elder Sister. Since Father's not at home today, having gone to station master Wu's place for a drink, why don't we take advantage of the opportunity to go take a look at the former Ch'iao family's house across the street?"

Yüeh-niang asked the page boy P'ing-an, who was in charge of the gate, "Who's got the keys to the place over there?"

"If you ladies want to go over and have a look," said P'ing-an, "the door's open. Lai-hsing is supervising two laborers who are at work on the place."

"Go tell them to get out of the way while we take a look," Yüeh-niang instructed him.

"You ladies go ahead and have your look," said P'ing-an, "it won't be any problem. They're all at work:

Mixing lime and sifting sand, in the big empty structure four courtyards back from the street. I'll just go and call them out."

Thereupon, Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh were carried, one at a time, in a sedan chair, for the short haul to the house across the street, by the two laborers, who acted as bearers. On entering the ceremonial gate, they found an eighteen-foot-wide reception hall, beyond which, in the second courtyard, there was a two-story structure.

Yüeh-niang started to go up to the second floor, but:

Strange as it may seem,
before she was halfway up the stairs, which were unexpectedly steep, she was heard to utter a gasp, and one of her feet slipped out from under her. Fortunately, she was able to grab hold of the banisters to either side of the stairway, while Yü-lou, exclaiming in consternation, "What is it, Sister?" hastily gripped her by the arm and was able to prevent her from falling.

Yüeh-niang had been taken by surprise and refused to proceed any further. By the time her companions had helped her down to the foot of the stairs, the shock of the unexpected occurrence had turned her face as sallow as wax.

"Sister," asked Yü-lou, "what happened? Your foot must have slipped on the way up. Have you hurt yourself anywhere?"

"I may have managed to escape a fall," said Yüeh-niang, "but I've twisted my waist, and the shock has made:

My heart jump into my mouth.

The stairs are steep, and I made the mistake of assuming they were just like the ones we have at home. My foot slipped on the way up. It's lucky I was able to grab hold of the banisters. Otherwise, who knows what might have happened."

"On top of everything else," said Yü-lou, "you're feeling poorly in your present condition. It would have been better not to climb the stairs in the first place."

Thereupon, the group of sisters escorted Yüeh-niang back home, but no sooner did they arrive there than, as if in response to a call, she began to suffer from abdominal cramps. Unable to withstand the pain, Yüeh-niang took advantage of Hsi-men Ch'ing's absence to send a page boy after Dame Liu to come and treat her.

"You've already ceased menstruating," said Dame Liu, "and now you've hurt yourself. I'm afraid it's all over."

"I've been pregnant for more than five months," said Yüeh-niang, "and now I've wrenched myself going up the stairs."

"You'd better take a dose of my medicine," said Dame Liu. "If you can't carry it to term, you might as well abort it."

"All right, I'll abort it then," Yüeh-niang replied.

Dame Liu thereupon left behind two doses of medicine, in the form of large black pills, and told Yüeh-niang to take them along with a decoction of artemisia-flavored wine. Before the night was half over, she evacuated the fetus, and when they lit a candle to examine the contents of the commode, it turned out to be that of a male child that had already assumed recognizable shape. Truly:

Before the embryo was able to emerge into the fullness of life,
Its true soul first made the journey to the Realm of the Shades.

Fortunately, when Hsi-men Ch'ing came home that day, he did not sleep in the master suite but spent the night in Meng Yu-lou's quarters instead. The next day, Yü-lou paid a visit to the master suite in the morning, to ask Yüeh-niang how she was feeling.

"Sure enough," Yüeh-niang reported, "in the middle of the night, I was unable to retain it and suffered a miscarriage. And it turned out to have been a boy."

"What a pity!" exclaimed Yü-lou. "Does Father not know about it?"

"Father had been drinking when he got home," explained Yüeh-niang. "He came into my room and started to take off his clothes, but I said to him, 'You go to someone else's quarters tonight. I'm feeling out of sorts.' It was only then that he went over to your place. I didn't tell him anything about it. Even now I'm still suffering from vague pains in the abdomen."

"I fear there may be some remaining blood that you still haven't voided," said Yü-lou. "If you drink some wine suffused with pot soot,⁴¹ that should take care of it."

"Sister," she went on to say, "you really ought to look after yourself for a few days. Stay in your room and don't go out. The consequences of a miscarriage can be even harder to treat than those of a regular childbirth. If you were to catch cold under these circumstances, it would be hard on your system."

"That goes without saying," Yüeh-niang responded. "But I don't want it bruited about till everybody hears of it. They'll make a big fuss for no good reason, and say I'm brooding over an empty nest, or something like that. It will only cause tongues to wag."

For this reason, Hsi-men Ch'ing was never told what had happened. Now that this matter has been explained, we will say no more about it.

To resume our story, the manager that Hsi-men Ch'ing had just engaged to take charge of his new silk goods shop was not the sort to abide by his lot. His surname was Han, his given name was Tao-kuo, and his courtesy name was Hsi-yao. He was the son of a decadent man-about-town named Baldy Han but had now fallen on hard times. He had succeeded to his grandfather's hereditary position as a commandant on the staff of the Prince of Yün. At present he resided on Oxhide Lane, off East Street.

Frivolous and flighty by nature,
His words overstate the facts.⁴²
Possessed of a clever tongue,
He is a glib conversationalist.
Those to whom he promises money, end up
Catching at shadows and clutching the wind;⁴³
But bilking others of their due, he finds
As easy as groping for something in a bag.⁴⁴

For these reasons, the people in his neighborhood, observing how meretricious he was, casually referred to him as Posturer Han.

Now that he had begun to do business for Hsi-men Ch'ing and felt flush with the money and silk at his disposal, he invested in a brand new outfit of "dung beetle skins,"⁴⁵ in which he swaggered about the neighborhood, hunching up his shoulders and putting on the dog. When people saw him, they did not refer to him by his courtesy name as Han Hsi-yao, but as Han I-yao, or Swaggery Han.

His wife was a younger sister of Butcher Wang, who slaughtered cattle for a living. She was called Wang Liu-erh, or Wang the Sixth, because she was the sixth sibling in her generation. She was tall of stature, had a face shaped like a melon seed, and a rosewood complexion, and was twenty-seven or twenty-eight years old. She had given birth to a daughter, so there were three of them living together in the family.

Han Tao-kuo's younger brother, Han the Second, was nicknamed Trickster Han. He was a gambler and "knockabout" and lived apart from his brother's family. He and his sister-in-law were engaged in a long-standing illicit affair. Whenever he felt like it, he would take advantage of Han Tao-kuo's absence, on the days he had to spend the night at the shop, to drop in and have a drink with the woman; and, when it became late, if he was on the make, he would refuse to leave.

Who could have anticipated that there were a number of dissolute young scamps in the neighborhood who took note of the way in which the woman was given to:

Putting on rouge and applying powder,⁴⁶ and making a spectacle of herself by standing in the doorway at all hours in order to ogle the passersby. Yet if anyone rose to the bait by making a suggestive remark to her, she would respond by being:

Both hard and smelly, and showering him with vituperation.

For this reason, these young scamps in the neighborhood were something less than well disposed toward her.

Gathering together in twos and threes, they surreptitiously discussed her conduct and determined to find out if she were engaged in hanky-panky with anyone behind her husband's back. It took them less than half a month to ascertain the fact that she was, indeed, carrying on with her brother-in-law, Han the Second.

It so happens that the house in which Han Tao-kuo resided on Oxhide Lane had an eighteen-foot-wide frontage, was bounded by the houses of neighbors to either side, and had a rear gate that opened onto the embankment of a reservoir. Whenever this group of young scamps saw Han the Second go inside, they would engage the services of an old woman to intrude by offering to sprinkle the courtyard; or, at night, they would climb onto the hind wall to keep an eye on things; or, by day, send a little monkey onto the rear embankment, pretending to chase after moths; their one endeavor being to catch them in the act.

Who could have anticipated that, one day, Han the Second, having ascertained that his elder brother was not at home, brought some wine with him, got drunk with the woman in broad daylight, locked the door on the inside, and fell to it with her in the bedroom. Unbeknownst to them, the group of young scamps, having got wind of this, sent a little monkey to climb over the wall and open the rear gate, on which the whole bunch of them rushed in together and contrived to jerk open the door to the room. Han the Second tried to bolt out the gate, but one of the youths managed to:

Knock him over with one blow, and he was taken captive. The woman was still on the k'ang, trying desperately to get into her clothes, when one of them came in and prevented this by grabbing her pants in his hand.

The two of them were trussed together with a single length of rope and taken outside, where, in no time at all, a crowd had gathered around the gateway and followed them to the township subprecinct station on Oxhide Lane. As a result of this, the entire street was in an uproar.

Han Tao-kuo Liberates His Wife to Compete for Admiration

This one came to ask,
That one came to see.

Everyone said that Han Tao-kuo's wife had been caught in an illicit affair with her brother-in-law.

A certain oldster among them, on seeing the man and the woman trussed up together, asked the people standing around, "What's this affair all about?"

A busybody next to him replied, "You mean you haven't heard about it, sir? This is a case of a brother-in-law engaging in illicit intercourse with his elder brother's wife."

The oldster nodded his head, saying, "How reprehensible! It so happens that when a brother messes around with his sister-in-law, if they should be convicted of violating the statute governing illicit relations between brother and sister-in-law, both of them would be condemned to strangulation.”⁴⁷

The busybody by his side recognized the oldster to be the notorious Crud-crawler T’ao, who was known to have “crawled in the crud” successively with all three of his daughters-in-law.⁴⁸

For this reason he intruded himself further by saying, “You appear to be well versed in the law, sir. Since this case of a brother-in-law having sexual relations with his elder brother’s wife is a crime entailing the punishment of strangulation, if a father-in-law were to do the same with his daughter-in-law, of what crime do you think he would be guilty?”⁴⁹

The oldster, noting the untoward turn the conversation was taking, lowered his head, without saying another word, and beat a hasty retreat. Truly:

Every person should sweep the snow
in front of his own eaves;
Without bothering about the frost upon his neighbor’s roof.⁵⁰

We will say no more for the moment about how Han the Second and his paramour were caught in the act but return to the story of Han Tao-kuo.

That day was not one of those on which he had to spend the night at the shop, so he was able to leave for home early. It was the middle decade of the eighth month. Sporting an outfit of light silk and soft damask, a newly blocked hat, a pair of fancy hairnet rings, jet satin shoes, and pure velveteen socks, and fanning himself as he went, he swaggered along the street:

Cutting a wide swath with his exaggerated strides.

Whenever he chanced to meet anyone, he made an occasion of it, either sitting or standing, while:

His words flowed like a cataract,⁵¹
Billowing out without interruption.⁵²

Among those he encountered were two acquaintances, Chang the Second, the proprietor of a paper shop, and Pai the Fourth, who was a silversmith, to whom he hastened to make an obeisance and raise his hand in greeting.

“Brother Han,” responded Chang, whose nickname was Chang the Importunate, “Long time no see. I hear that you are to be congratulated for going into business in the shop that His Honor Hsi-men Ch’ing has just opened on his premises. We are lacking in courtesy not to have offered our felicitations before this. I hope you won’t take it amiss.”

As he spoke, he offered him a seat.

Adopting a lofty expression and flaunting the fan in his hand, Han Tao-kuo sat down on a bench, and said, “Though your pupil is devoid of talent, thanks to the diffracted radiance shed by you gentlemen, I have been enabled to become a manager in the employ of my gracious master, His Honor Hsi-men Ch’ing. We split the profits on a 30 to 70 percent ratio, I have enormous sums at my disposal and am in charge of shops at several locations. Indeed, I am treated with such respect as to set me apart from others.”

A certain Hsieh Ju-huang, whose nickname was What a Whopper, responded, “From what I hear, Brother Han, all he has seen fit to charge you with is the management of his silk goods shop.”

“There are things of which you two gentlemen are ignorant,” pronounced Han Tao-kuo with a laugh. “The matter of the silk goods business is no more than an empty title. Nowadays, which one of the accounts of the various enterprises of his establishment, both great and small, are not in my hands?

He listens to my words and follows my advice,⁵³
Fortune and misfortune are shared between us.

Without me, he couldn’t get along for so much as an hour.

“Every day, when he comes home from the yamen, he invites me to share his meal with him. Without me, he wouldn’t even have the appetite to eat anything. The two of us while away the time in his little studio, eating delicacies and chatting with each other; often sitting there until the night is half over before he goes back to the rear compound.

“The other day, on his First Lady’s birthday, my wife went in a sedan chair to pay her respects, and his lady kept her so long at the party that she didn’t get home until the second watch.

Our two families are so intimate,
There are no restraints between us.⁵⁴

I probably oughtn’t to tell you this, but even the most private events in his bedchamber are among the topics on which he often consults with me.

“To begin with:

My conduct is upright and correct,
My heart opposed to all compromise.

On behalf of my wealthy patron, I am able to:

Promote profit and prevent loss,⁵⁵
Rescuing him from water or fire.⁵⁶

In all cases, I am:

Scrupulous where money is concerned,⁵⁷
Acquiring it only by legitimate means.

Even Manager Fu the Second stands somewhat in awe of me. It’s not that I’m boasting about myself, the fact is that His Honor values me precisely for this quality.”

Just as his tongue was in full spate, all of a sudden, someone came running up in a state of obvious agitation, saying, “Brother Han, what are you still jabbering here for? I wasn’t able to find you at the shop.”

Drawing him aside to a secluded spot, he told him, “At your house:

Thus and thus, and

So and so,

your wife and your younger brother have been caught in the act by the neighbors, who have trussed them up and taken them to the subprecinct station. Tomorrow morning they’ll be escorted to the district yamen to appear before the magistrate. You’d better bestir yourself to pull whatever strings you can, if you want to take care of this matter.”

When Han Tao-kuo heard this, he:

Turned pale with consternation,⁵⁸

Licking his lips, above, and Stamping his feet, below, in his haste to take flight.

At this point, Chang the Importunate called out to him, “Brother Han, you haven’t finished your story. Why are you so anxious to get away?”

Han Tao-kuo raised his hand in acknowledgment, saying, “Your pupil has an insignificant matter to attend to at home, which prevents me from keeping you company any longer.” After which, he made a hasty departure. Truly:

Even if one could draw off all the water

of the West River,

It would hardly suffice to wash away

this day’s shame.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 34

SHU-T'UNG RELIES UPON HIS FAVOR TO BROKER AFFAIRS; P'ING-AN HARBORS RESENTMENT AND WAGS HIS TONGUE

In relying upon one's official prestige in order to do as one pleases;
One ought not to let joy or anger confuse the spheres of public and private.
Coveting wealth, he pays no heed whatever to the violation of ethical norms;
Given to lust, he shows total disregard for breaches of propriety and reason.
His hangers-on avail themselves of his name to seek personal advantage;
His wanton slaves employ ingratiating gestures to effect surreptitious ends.
If you wish to know the principles that govern subsequent success or failure;
The doings of the day provide all one needs to extrapolate them by analogy.

THE STORY GOES that when Han Tao-kuo arrived home and found that his wife and his brother, Han the Second, had been trussed up and taken to the subprecinct station, he hastened back to the shop on Lion Street to consult with Lai-pao.

"You'd better go directly to Uncle Ying the Second," said Lai-pao, "and ask him to intercede with your master. If he sends a note about it to Magistrate Li in the district yamen, no matter how important a matter it might be, that ought to take care of it."

Han Tao-kuo went straight to Ying Po-chüeh's house, but his wife sent out a maidservant who reported, "He's not at home. Who knows where he may have gotten to. More likely than not, he's at His Honor Hsi-men's place."

"If he's not at home," said Han Tao-kuo, "let me speak to Ying Pao." But it turned out that he had gone out with his father.

This threw Han Tao-kuo into a panic, and he went looking for him in the licensed quarter.

It so happens that Ying Po-chüeh had been invited for a drink by Ho Liang-feng, the younger brother of Magnate Ho from Hu-chou, in the establishment of the singing girl, Ho Chin-ch'an, on Fourth Street. When Han Tao-kuo succeeded in tracking him down, he invited him to come outside and have a word with him.

Ying Po-chüeh had been drinking until his face became bright red and was sporting a toothpick in the brim of his hat. Han Tao-kuo bowed to him and then, drawing him aside to a secluded spot, told him, thus and so, what had happened.

"Since such an event has occurred," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I cannot do otherwise than go with you."

Thereupon, he said goodbye to Ho Liang-feng and accompanied Han Tao-kuo to his home, where he interrogated him about the details of the affair.

Han Tao-kuo beseeched him, saying, "My only hope is that you will go to His Honor's residence and ask him to write a note on my behalf. I anticipate that tomorrow morning when they are taken to the district yamen the case will be adjudicated by Magistrate Li Ta-t'ien. If he could only request him to:

Look upon the matter with favorable eyes,¹ so that my wife is not required to come before the bench, when the affair is over, I will see that you are richly rewarded, and even kowtow to you."

As he spoke, he knelt down on the ground, but Ying Po-chüeh pulled him up by the hand, saying, "Worthy friend, in such a trifling affair as this, I could scarcely fail to intervene on your behalf. Get a sheet of paper and write out an explanatory note. I'll accompany you to His Honor's residence right now and speak to him about it. You should dispense with any idle chatter. Just say, 'I am frequently away from home, and in my absence this bunch of "bare sticks" from the neighborhood are constantly:

Pitching bricks and tossing tiles, in order to insult my wife.' Because your younger brother, Han the Second, couldn't get over his resentment at this, he got into a brawl with them, only to find himself surrounded by this bunch who dragged him to the ground and started kicking and beating him. As a result, he and your wife now find themselves trussed up together in the subprecinct station. Ask His Honor to write a note to Magistrate Li explaining the situation and urging that your wife not be required to come before the bench. You can be sure that he will prove responsive to such a request and that will be the end of it."

Han Tao-kuo fetched brush and inkstone, promptly wrote out an explanatory note, and tucked it into his sleeve. Ying Po-chüeh then led him straight to the door of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence and asked the gatekeeper, "Is your master at home?"

"The master is in his studio in the flower garden," P'ing-an replied. "Master Second and Uncle Han, please go right in."

Ying Po-chüeh was such a regular visitor that even the dog did not attempt to bite him. With Han Tao-kuo in tow, he proceeded through the ceremonial gate, around the main reception hall, and through the vaulted right angle turn in the gallery connecting the gable of the reception hall to the anterooms on the side of the courtyard, straight to the postern gate leading into the garden. Skirting the juniper hedge that ran along either side of the banksia rose arbor, they came to the small three-roomed summerhouse on the other side of the hedge called the Kingfisher Pavilion. This was the place where Hsi-men Ch'ing sought to cool off during the summer months.

In front and behind,
Screens and lattices set each other off;
On all four sides,
Flowers and bamboos are thick and shady.
All the way round are displayed,
Rare birds and exotic animals,²
Ultramundane plants and amaranthine blossoms,³
Each a perfect specimen of its kind.

The studio consisted of three compartments, one well-lighted parlor, and two less well-lighted inner rooms.

The page boy, Hua-t'ung, who was sweeping the ground outside, announced, "Master Ying the Second and Uncle Han are here."

The two of them lifted aside the blind and stepped into the parlor, where they found Shu-t'ung on duty in the study within.

When he saw that it was Master Ying the Second and Uncle Han, he said, "Please have a seat. Father has just gone back to the rear compound." He then told Hua-t'ung to go and ask him to come out again.

Ying Po-chüeh observed that facing each other on the upper and lower ends of the room were ranged two rows of six low-slung, bow-back, folding armchairs of the type called Tung-p'o chairs,⁴ embellished with Yunnan agateware lacquer, gilt nails, and wickerwork rattan seats. On the two side walls were hung four landscape paintings by well-known artists, mounted on ultramarine patterned damask with white satin borders. On one hand there stood a side table, the cabriole legs of which were carved in the shape of a protruding "mantis belly"⁵ that tapered down into "dragonfly feet,"⁶ and the top of which was inlaid with an oblong, letter-shaped, slab of marble, chosen for its pictorial quality.⁷ On this table there was displayed an antique bronze incense burner in the shape of a gilded crane. In the center of the back wall there hung a plaque emblazoned with the three characters for Kingfisher Pavilion, with a pair of framed hanging scrolls suspended to its left and right, on the coated paper of which was inscribed the couplet:

The breeze is tranquil, shadows of locust trees purify the courtyard;
The day is long, fragrance from an incense burner suffuses the latticework.

Thereupon, Ying Po-chüeh took a seat in one of the chairs facing the entrance, Han Tao-kuo pulled over a chair and sat down at right angles to him, while Hua-t'ung went back to the rear compound to find Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After some time had passed, Ying Po-chüeh wandered into the inner study, where he found standing on the floor a black lacquer summer bedstead with incised gold ornamentation and a decorative marble panel, and fitted with bed curtains of blue silk. To either side of this there were painted lacquer bookcases adorned with gold tracery, which were filled with the conventional presentation gifts of privately printed books with brocade wrappers and bolts of fabric. There was also a desk, piled high with writing implements and books. Under the green gauze window there stood a black lacquer zither stand and a solitary folding chair inlaid with mother-of-pearl. A letter case was also visible containing Hsi-men Ch'ing's social correspondence, calling cards, and lists of people with whom Mid-autumn Festival gifts had been exchanged.

Picking up the first list, Ying Po-chüeh opened and perused it. He found inscribed there the names of His Honor Ts'ai Ching, His Excellency Ts'ai Yu, Defender-in-chief Chu Mien, Defender-in-chief T'ung Kuan, His Honor Privy Councilor Ts'ai the Fourth,⁸ His Honor Commandant Ts'ai the Fifth,⁹ as well as the names of the four principal officers from both the local district and prefectural yamens. The second list contained the names of Commandant Chou Hsiu, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and the two Eunuch Directors Liu and Hsüeh. The items indicated were bolts of satin brocade, preserved pork, wine, gold-colored pastries, preserved shad, salted seafood, chicken, goose, and other gifts appropriate for major occasions, each graded differentially according to the status of the recipient.

The two of them continued to wait for their host. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Hua-t'ung went back as far as Chin-lien's quarters and asked, "Sister Ch'un-mei, is Father here?"

"You lousy little slave! You've been seeing things," Ch'un-mei railed at him. "Father's next door at the Sixth Lady's place, isn't he? Why insist on running over here to ask after him?"

Hua-t'ung then went over to the other side, where he found Hsiu-ch'un sitting on the stone stylobate, and asked her in a low voice, "Is Father here? Master Ying the Second and Uncle Han have come and are waiting in the studio to have a word with him."

"Father is here," replied Hsiu-ch'un. "He's watching Mother make some clothes for the baby."

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had come up with two bolts of material, one of scarlet silk, and one of parrot-green Lu-chou pongee, out of which he had told Li P'ing-erh to make undershirts, cloaks, vests, skullcaps, and the like for Kuan-ko. On the gold-flecked k'ang frame a scarlet strip of felt had been laid down to create a working space for this purpose. The wet nurse was holding the baby on one side, and Ying-ch'un was standing by with an iron in her hand. Whom should they see at this juncture but Hsiu-ch'un, who came in and surreptitiously gave a tug at Ying-ch'un.

"What are you tugging at me for?" demanded Ying-ch'un. "If you're not careful, you'll knock some of the coals from the iron onto the strip of felt."

Li P'ing-erh then asked, "Why are you tugging at her for no good reason?"

"Hua-t'ung says that Master Ying the Second has come," said Hsiu-ch'un, "and would like to have a word with Father."

"You little slave!" said Li P'ing-erh. "If Master Ying the Second has come, you should come in and explain the situation, that's all. Why insist on tugging at her?"

"Just ask Master Ying the Second to have a seat," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Hua-t'ung. "I'll be there in a minute."

Thereupon, he continued to watch the cutting out of the baby things until the task was completed and then went out to the studio in his informal clothes to see Ying Po-chüeh and his companion.

When they had bowed to each other and sat down, with Han Tao-kuo occupying a seat to one side, Hsi-men Ch'ing called Hua-t'ung and told him to bring them some tea. Before long he brought out three cups of tea flavored with candied kumquats in carved lacquer cups with silver teaspoons, and after they had drunk it, he took the cups and their raised saucers away again.

Ying Po-chüeh then started things off by saying, "Brother Han, if you've got anything to say, tell His Honor what it is."

"If you've got something to say, speak up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Han Tao-kuo was about to say, "There is a bunch of ruffians in my neighborhood, whose names are unknown to me," when he was interrupted by Ying Po-chüeh, who said, "Worthy friend, that's not the way to go about it. It won't do to.

Conceal the bones in your mouth and merely expose the flesh.

In front of His Honor your employer here, you would do better to:

Open up the back door and speak right out.

Brother Han often has to spend the night at the shop, which means that there is no one left at home but his wife and their child. In his neighborhood there are a number of persons who are:

Neither fish nor fowl,

who, seeing that there is no man in the house, are constantly:

Pitching bricks and tossing tiles, driving her crazy with their tricks and insults. His younger brother, Han the Second, being fed up with this behavior, gave them a piece of his mind when he came to visit, only to find himself set upon by this bunch of 'bare sticks' who:

Without permitting any further explanation, surrounded him and beat him to a stinking pulp. Right now, his brother and his wife have both been trussed up and taken to the subprecinct station. Tomorrow morning they'll be escorted from there to the township station and the district yamen and brought before the presiding magistrate, His Honor Li Ta-t'ien.

"Weeping and wailing, he has come and respectfully begged me to ask you to write a note on his behalf, and send someone to speak to Magistrate Li about it, requesting that he:

Look upon the matter with favorable eyes.

If his brother has to be arraigned, that will not matter too much, so long as his wife is not required to appear before the bench."

He then went on to say, "Get out that explanatory note of yours, and show it to His Honor, so that he can send someone to take care of it for you."

Han Tao-kuo then reached into his sleeve, pulled out the note, and hastily getting down on his knees, said, "Unworthy as I am, your humble servant has been the recipient of your patronage. My only hope is that Your Honor, out of consideration for Uncle Ying the Second, will deign to show me some consideration in this matter. Should you do so, my entire family will be:

Unable to forget your kindness as long as we live."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was so affected by this speech that he pulled him up by one hand, saying, "Please get up."

Thereupon, glancing at the note, which read, "Please look with favor on the female defendant, nee Wang, and exempt her from the obligation to appear before the bench," Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "This note ought not to be worded this way. You should refer only to your younger brother, Han the Second, and leave it at that."

Then, turning to Ying Po-chüeh, he said, "Rather than my addressing a note to the district yamen, it would be better to instruct the local constable to alter his report so that tomorrow the case will be dealt with in my yamen instead."

"Brother Han," exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh, "You should make an obeisance to His Honor. This way of handling it is better yet."

Han Tao-kuo once again knelt down and kowtowed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Tai-an, "You go outside immediately and call in one of the foremen on duty there."

Before long an adjutant in black livery was called in and stood to one side awaiting orders.

Hsi-men Ch'ing told him to step forward and instructed him, "You go to the residence of Manager Han on Oxhide Street, find the local constable of the relevant neighborhood subprecinct station, and have him speak to the neighborhood head of the relevant mutual security unit. You can say that it is my personal directive that he should release the defendant, nee Wang, immediately; ascertain the names of the 'bare sticks' involved; and alter the report so that tomorrow morning the case will be brought before my yamen, the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, for adjudication."

The adjutant assented to the orders he had received and went out the gate.

"Brother Han," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you might as well go along with him and take care of your business. I still have a few words to say to His Honor."

Han Tao-kuo took his leave, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude, and accompanied the adjutant to Oxhide Street to convey his orders.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then sat down to keep Ying Po-chüeh company in the Kingfisher Pavilion. Ordering Tai-an to set up a table, he said to him, "Go back to the rear compound and tell the First Lady to open and decant some of that osmanthus-flavored lotus blossom wine that Eunuch Director Liu of the Imperial Brickyard sent us the other day. I'd like to share it with Uncle Ying the Second. And have some of that preserved shad in fermented mash steamed for us as well."

Po-chüeh raised his hand at this point and said, "I still haven't thanked you, Brother, for the two fine shad that you were kind enough to send me the other day. I gave one of them to my elder brother and said to my wife, with regard to the other, 'Cut it in two with a cleaver, and send a piece to our daughter. As for what's left over, chop it into thin slices, marinate it in the red mash it came in, mix in a little sesame seed oil, and store it in a porcelain jar, so that, early or late, when we're having a meal, or if a guest should show up, we can steam a saucerful for our delectation, thereby not failing in our appreciation of Brother's lavish generosity.'"

Hsi-men Ch'ing told him, "Eunuch Director Liu's younger brother, Company Commander Liu, because he has made a good thing for himself out of the management of the Imperial Reed Beds below the river, has recently bought himself an estate at Wu-li Tien and appropriated timber from the Imperial Lumber Depot to build a house on it. Recently this matter was brought before our yamen, and my colleague Hsia Yen-ling, despite having accepted a bribe of one hundred taels of silver, threatened to memorialize about the case and forward the records to the Ministry of Justice in the capital. This threw Eunuch Director Liu into such a panic that he came to me in person, with a hundred taels of silver in hand, and begged me repeatedly to do what I could to quash the case. There's no reason for me to deceive you. I make enough at my business concerns not to have to worry about getting by, so that sort of money means nothing to me. Moreover, Eunuch Director Liu is a long-standing friend of mine, from whom I have often received gifts, so I could scarcely afford to lose face over such a trifling affair. Thus I refused to accept anything from him, simply telling him to see that the house in question was torn down overnight. When the case came before the bench, I merely had Company Commander Liu's servant, Liu the Third, given twenty strokes of the bamboo, and thereby disposed of the matter.

"When the affair was concluded, Eunuch Director Liu could not get over his feelings of gratitude at my consideration, so he slaughtered a pig and came in person to present it to me, along with a jug of homemade lotus blossom wine, two packages of preserved shad weighing forty catties, and two bolts of figured satin brocade.

It redounds to the credit of both of us, that we were able to exchange favors this way. What need was there for money?"

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "Money may not mean anything to you, but His Honor Hsia Yen-ling started life in the ranks, so that from the time he:

Put down roots and stood up straight, he's had to do without it. If he doesn't grab some for himself when the opportunity offers, what is he to live on? Brother, since taking office you must have heard quite a few cases with him."

"Great and small, I have heard quite a few cases with him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As for the rest, everything is fine enough; the only trouble is:

His greed and avarice know no bounds.

When cases come before him, without so much as enquiring into the:

Blue or red, black or white, of the situation, if money comes into his hands, he frees the parties concerned. What sort of justice is that? I have consequently balked at his proposals more than once and refused to go along with him. After all, although we are both only military officials, we are charged with the administration of justice and ought to have some regard for appearances."

Before he had finished speaking, wine and delicacies were laid before them. First there were four saucers of hors d'oeuvres, after which another four dishes of cold appetizers were served to go with the wine, consisting of fresh red T'ai-chou duck eggs, crescent-shaped golden prawns from Liao-tung on a bed of julienned cucumber, fragrant deep-fried pork ribs, and plump dry-steamed pieces of split sun-dried chicken. The second course consisted of four more dishes of hot appetizers: a bowl of roast duck steamed in its own juice, a bowl of jellied pig's trotters, a bowl of braised pork, and a bowl of quick-fried pork kidneys. Only after that, on a porcelain platter decorated with a blue and white pattern both inside and out, was there served up a whole red and savory steamed preserved shad, with a bewitching aroma.

It melted on entering the mouth,

Even its bones were fragrant.

Hsi-men Ch'ing poured the lotus blossom wine into gold cups in the shape of chrysanthemum blossoms and kept Ying Po-chüeh company as they enjoyed their repast. But we will say no more about how the two of them sat together and chatted for more than two hours before breaking up.

To resume our story, the bunch of young scamps concerned in the affair, on observing that an adjutant in black livery had shown up at the subprecinct station and effected the release of the woman, nee Wang, who was allowed to go home; had interrogated the neighborhood head of the relevant mutual security unit in order to ascertain the names of the parties involved; and had directed that the next morning they were all to be escorted to the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission for a hearing; could only:

Gaze at each other in consternation.¹⁰

It dawned on them that Han Tao-kuo was a manager in the employ of Hsi-men Ch'ing and must have asked his master to put in the fix on his behalf, with the result that Han the Second was now the only person in custody at the subprecinct station.

With one voice they exclaimed, "This matter has taken a turn for the worse."

Han Tao-kuo had slipped five mace of silver to the adjutant, who promptly saw to it that the head of the relevant mutual security unit wrote down the names of the parties involved and sent them to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, preparatory to their being haled into court the following morning.

The next day the two officials, Hsi-men Ch'ing and Judicial Commissioner Hsia, went to the yamen and took their places on the bench, while the local constable and the neighborhood head of the relevant mutual security unit delivered their charges to the court. The first party brought forward was Han the Second, who knelt down before the bench. Judicial Commissioner Hsia first perused the report, which read:

The resident of Oxhide Street and neighborhood head of the fourth neighborhood of the first subprecinct of Ch'ing-ho, Hsiao Ch'eng, reports a case of disturbance of the peace in the said neighborhood. The first party involved is called Han the Second; the second is Ch'e Tan, or Hogwash Ch'e; the third is Kuan Shih-k'uan, or Busybody Kuan; the fourth is Yu Shou, or Loafer Yu; and the fifth is Hao Hsien, or Idler Hao.

All of these persons were then called on to come forward and sign their names, after which the magistrate asked Han the Second, "What is this all about?"

"My elder brother is engaged in commerce," said Han the Second, "which often requires him to be away from home. He and his wife are a young couple and have consequently been taken advantage of during his absence by this bunch of 'bare sticks' from the neighborhood, who are constantly strumming guitars and ukuleles, gathering on her doorstep to sing:

Suggestive songs and lewd tunes, pitching bricks over the wall at night, and insulting her in every way. I live apart from my brother's family, but when I came by his house and saw what was going on, I was unwilling to put up with it and gave them a piece of my mind, as a result of which this bunch of 'bare sticks,' like a pack of tigers:

Without permitting any further explanation, dragged me down to the ground and started kicking and beating me. Now that I have been brought before Your Honor's bench, I hope Your Honor will look into the matter."

Addressing himself to the other parties in the case, Judicial Commissioner Hsia then asked, "And what is your story?"

As though with one voice, that group of individuals responded, "Your Honor, don't allow yourself to be taken in by his specious testimony. He's nothing but a gambler and trickster who has been taking advantage of his brother's absence from home to carry on an affair with his sister-in-law, nee Wang; while she, for her part, has displayed the brazen audacity to vilely abuse her neighbors. Yesterday we caught them in the act, and we have her underpants to present as evidence."

Judicial Commissioner Hsia then asked the neighborhood head, Hsiao Ch'eng, "Why is the woman, nee Wang, not here in court?"

Hsiao Ch'eng did not feel that it would be appropriate to say that the adjutant had released her, so he simply said, "Her feet are small, so she has trouble walking on the street. She'll be here soon enough."

Han the Second, from his position beneath the bench, merely fixed his two eyes on Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing inclined his body in Judicial Commissioner Hsia's direction and said, "My senior colleague, it seems unnecessary to arraign the woman, nee Wang. It is probable that she is rather good-looking, and that when she refused to respond to the propositions of these 'bare sticks,' they have retaliated by concocting this trap for her."

He then called for their leader, Ch'e Tan, to come forward and asked him, "Where was it that you apprehended this Han the Second?"

"It was yesterday, in her house, that we apprehended them," the group replied.

He then went on to ask Han the Second, "What is the woman nee Wang's relationship to you?"

The neighborhood head replied, "She is his sister-in-law."

He then continued to question the neighborhood head, saying, "And how did this bunch of people get into her house?" "They got in by climbing over the wall," the neighborhood head responded.

Hsi-men Ch'ing became very angry and upbraided them, saying, "What is to be done with a bunch of 'bare sticks' like you! Since he is her brother-in-law, the woman, nee Wang, falls within the scope of his five mourning relationships¹¹ as defined by law, so what objection can there be to his frequenting her home? As for the likes of this bunch of 'bare sticks,' what is your relationship to her? How dare you enter her house by climbing over the wall? Moreover, you did so while her husband was away from home, and she had only a young daughter in the house. Whatever you had in mind:

If it was not seduction, it must have been robbery."¹²

Then he shouted to the attendants, "Bring out the ankle-squeezers. Give each of them a squeezing and then administer twenty strokes of the heavy bamboo."

They were beaten until:

The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and

Fresh blood spurted out.¹³

Moreover, the four or five of them were all young scamps who:

From the time they left their mothers' wombs,

Had never undergone judicial punishment,

so that in every case, as a result of the beating:

Their cries shook the heavens, and

Their groans filled the courtroom.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, without waiting for Judicial Commissioner Hsia to open his mouth, ordered, "Han the Second is to leave the court and await the further disposition of the case. The other four are to be incarcerated until such time as their depositions can be taken and they can be escorted to a higher court to stand trial."

When the four of them found themselves in jail, they engaged in mutual recriminations, each of them feeling as though he were:

Carrying a spectral fetus.

The other prisoners in the jail further intimidated them by saying, "If the four of you are escorted to a higher court to stand trial, you will be sentenced to penal servitude, and if you are exiled to some faraway prefecture, subprefecture, or district it will be the death of you."

The whole bunch of them were in a state of panic, and as soon as the servants from their families showed up to deliver food to them, they each sent letters home instructing their fathers and elder brothers to spend money both high and low in order to pull whatever strings they could.

Among these there was one who approached Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, who responded, "The husband of this woman, nee Wang, is a manager employed by His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing. As long as he remains adamant about this matter, insisting that they be escorted to a higher court to stand trial, since he is a colleague of mine, there is not much I can do about it. You had better find some way of pulling strings with him if you want a favorable outcome."

There were also those who induced Hsi-men Ch'ing's brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, to intervene in the matter, but without result. Everyone was aware that Hsi-men Ch'ing's household had money to spare, so they felt it would be futile to offer him anything directly.

At this point, the fathers and elder brothers of the four families involved were in a state of panic and held a conference together, at which one of them said, "There's no point in another approach to Battalion Commander Wu since he has already turned us down. But I've heard it said that Ying the Second, the Younger brother of that Ying the Elder who has a silk goods store on East Street, is thick with him. The best thing to do is for each of us to ante up some silver, enough to come to several tens of taels altogether, and then seal it up and offer it to Ying the Second. If he can be persuaded to intervene on our behalf, the outcome is bound to be auspicious."

Thereupon, the fathers and elder brothers of the families involved, with Ch'e Tan's father, Old Man Ch'e, the proprietor of a local wineshop, at their head, each came up with ten taels of silver, making the sum of forty taels in all. They then proceeded as a group to Ying Po-chüeh's house to beg him to intervene with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Ying Po-chüeh agreed to accept the money and sent them on their way.

His wife then said to him, "Since you've already come to the aid of Manager Han by helping to land this bunch of scamps in their present predicament, how can you now turn around and accept this money to speak up on their behalf without antagonizing Manager Han?"

"Of course, it's going to be an awkward business," said Ying Po-chüeh. "To start with, thus and so, I'll take fifteen taels of silver and surreptitiously present it to Shu-t'ung, the page boy in charge of his studio, asking him to exercise his ingenuity in broaching this matter with his master. You don't know the extent to which His Honor depends on him in matters great and small, taking everything he says seriously. I guarantee he'll:

Hit the bull's-eye with the first arrow."

Thereupon, having weighed out fifteen taels worth of silver, wrapped it up, and tucked it into his sleeve, he headed straight for Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence. Hsi-men Ch'ing had not yet returned home. Ying Po-chüeh proceeded as far as the reception hall when he saw Shu-t'ung coming out of the studio on the west side of the courtyard. On his head he wore a "tile-ridge" hat, and the two tufts of his hair were bound into knots with jet satin ribbons and sported gold-headed pins in the shape of lotus blossoms. On his body he wore a long gown of Su-chou chiffon, a jade-colored silk tunic, sandals, and white socks.

"Master Second," he said, "please have a seat in the parlor."

He then ordered Hua-t'ung to go to the rear compound and fetch some tea, saying, "Page boy, I'm sending you to fetch some tea for Master Ying the Second, but instead of getting a move on, you're continuing to fool around. Just wait until Father comes home and see if I tell him about it or not."

Only then did the page boy set off to fetch the tea.

"It looks as though he's not back from the yamen yet, is he?" Ying Po-chüeh then asked.

"Just now one of his attendants came by," replied Shu-t'ung, "to say that the court session is already over, but that he and His Honor Hsia have gone outside the South Gate to pay a social call together. Master Second, what is it that you have to say to him?"

"It's nothing in particular," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"With regard to that matter concerning Manager Han that you spoke to him about the other day," said Shu-t'ung, "Father went to the yamen yesterday and had that bunch of scamps beaten and incarcerated. Tomorrow he is going to draft the necessary documents and have the defendants escorted to a higher court to stand trial."

Drawing him aside to a secluded spot, Ying Po-chüeh said to him, "Right now a further complication has arisen. The relatives of that bunch of scamps, thus and so, on hearing the proposal that they be escorted to a higher court to stand trial, have all become fearful about the situation. Last night they came to my home, weeping and wailing, and begged me repeatedly, on bended knee, to speak to your master on their behalf. I thought to myself, 'since I have already spoken to him previously on Manager Han's behalf, how can I very well intervene on their side without antagonizing Manager Han?' I had no alternative but to tell the four families to come up with fifteen taels of silver and ask you to exercise your ingenuity in broaching the subject with your master, to see if there is any way he might see his way clear to letting them off the hook."

As he finished speaking, he reached into his sleeve, pulled out the silver, and handed it to Shu-t'ung.

Shu-t'ung unwrapped it, saw that it consisted of four ingots of varying sizes along with four smaller pieces, and said, "As long as it's for your sake, Master Second, you can tell them that if they come up with another five taels I will undertake to speak on their behalf, but I don't know whether Father will agree to their request or not. Last night his brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, came in person to speak to him about this matter, and he refused to agree. As for me:

With the visage of a flea,

How much face have I got?¹⁴

To tell you the truth, Master Second, this silver must take care of more than myself. I'll have to spend a little something to enlist the services of the Sixth Lady, the one who has borne him a son. Only if I approach him in this roundabout way will there be any hope of success."

"If that's the way it is," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I'll explain the situation to them. Whatever you do, put your heart into it. They'll be coming for an answer later this afternoon."

"I don't know when Father will get home," said Shu-t'ung. "You'd better tell them to come back tomorrow morning."

When they had finished speaking, Ying Po-chüeh made his departure.

Shu-t'ung took the silver into the shop, chiseled off a piece worth one tael and five mace, and sent someone out to buy a jug of Chin-hua wine, two roast ducks, two chickens, one mace worth of fresh fish, a leg of pork, two mace worth of stuffed cream puff pastries, and one mace worth of fruit-flavored sweet rolls. Then he carried these ingredients to Lai-hsing's quarters and asked his wife, Hui-hsiu, to prepare them for him, so they would be ready to be served.

That particular day it so happened that P'an Chin-lien was not at home. Early in the morning she had taken a sedan chair to Old Mrs. P'an's place outside the South Gate in order to celebrate her mother's birthday. Shu-t'ung directed Hua-t'ung to put the delicacies he had provided into square boxes and deliver them to Li P'ing-erh's quarters. Only after he had done so did he plan to pick up the jug of Chin-hua wine and go inside himself.

"Where did all this come from?" Li P'ing-erh asked.

"It's Brother Shu-t'ung's way of showing his respect for you," Hua-t'ung replied.

"The lousy jailbird!" laughed Li P'ing-erh. "Why should he be showing any respect to me?"

After a while, Shu-t'ung came in and saw Li P'ing-erh seated on the gilt lacquer frame of the k'ang, extending her jade wrists, the color of snowy lotus root and encircled by gilded bracelets, in the effort to induce a tortoiseshell cat to play with Kuan-ko.

"You lousy jailbird!" she said. "For whom have you provided all these goodies here?"

Shu-t'ung merely smiled.

"What do you mean," asked Li P'ing-erh, "by not saying a word and merely smiling that way?"

"To whom should I show respect," Shu-t'ung replied, "if not to you?"

"You lousy jailbird!" said Li P'ing-erh. "Why should you appear to go to such pains for no good reason only to show respect for me? Unless you explain yourself, I'll refuse to eat any of it. As the saying goes:

The superior man does not eat food of unknown origin."

Shu-t'ung opened the jug of wine, arrayed the delicacies on a small table, told Ying-ch'ün to decant the wine into a silver flagon, poured some of it into a cup, and offered it up to her with both hands.

Shu-t'ung Relies upon His Favor to Broker Affairs

Getting down on his knees, he said, "Only after you have drunk this cup will I explain things to you."

"What is this all about?" demanded Li P'ing-erh. "Only after you have explained it to me will I eat anything of yours. If you refuse to explain it, you can kneel to me for a hundred years and I still won't eat anything."

"You can stand up to explain it," she added.

Shu-t'ung then gave her a complete account from the beginning of Ying Po-chüeh's request on behalf of the four defendants.

"Since he had initially intervened on behalf of Manager Han," he explained, "he felt awkward about speaking up for the other side, so he asked me to present his petition to you first. If Father questions you about it, don't tell him I had anything to do with it. Just pretend that your brother-in-law, Hua Tzu-yu, sent someone to speak to you about it. I've written out a note in the front studio, which I will say that you gave me, with instructions to show it to him. If you will just put in a good word while he's in your room, that ought to do it. Moreover, the other day, Father has already given them a taste of the bamboo for their sins. If he can be induced to settle the case by letting them go free, it would be a truly momentous good deed."

"So that's what it's all about," laughed Li P'ing-erh. It's no big deal. As soon as your father comes home I'll speak to him. That's all there is to it. What made you think you had to prepare all these goodies for no good reason?"

"You lousy jailbird!" she went on to say. "No doubt you made him pay dearly for your services."

"There's no reason for me to deceive you," said Shu-t'ung. "He gave me five taels of silver for my pains."

"You lousy jailbird!" said Li P'ing-erh. "You're becoming quite an expert at:

Setting people up and shaking them down."

Thereupon, instead of using small cups, she told Ying-ch'ün to fetch a pair of large goblets of chased silver. After drinking off two goblets herself, she poured another gobletful and presented it to Shu-t'ung.

"I don't dare drink anything," Shu-t'ung said, "or my face will get red, and Father will notice it."

"I'm bestowing it on you," said Li P'ing-erh. "What is there to be afraid of?"

Thereupon, he kowtowed to her, stood up, and drank it off with one gulp. Li P'ing-erh picked out a sampling of each of the delicacies and put them on a saucer for him to eat. The page boy kept her company by draining two large goblets in succession, after which, fearing that his face would turn red, he dared not drink any more but took his leave and went out to the shop at the front of the compound.

Half of the sweetmeats and delicacies he had bought were left over and he laid them out on the counter, along with two flagons of wine, and invited Manager Fu, Pen the Fourth, Ch'en Ching-chi, Lai-hsing, and Tai-an to share them with him. The bunch of them fell to and polished everything off in no time, like:

A gust of wind sweeping away vestiges of clouds.¹⁵

But he forgot to invite P'ing-an to join them.

P'ing-an just sat at his post at the main gate, pouting with his lips. Who could have anticipated that Hsi-men Ch'ing would arrive home from the social call he had been paying outside the South Gate early that afternoon. P'ing-an saw him coming but did not say anything to warn of his arrival. When Shu-t'ung heard the sound of his escorts shouting to clear the way, he was so flustered he did not have time to clear up the mess but raced to the reception hall in two or three strides in order to take charge of Hsi-men Ch'ing's formal clothes.

"Has anyone been here today?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked him.

"No one has been here," Shu-t'ung replied.

Hsi-men Ch'ing took off his formal clothes, doffed his official headgear, exchanging it for a cap and headband, and then went into the studio and sat down. Shu-t'ung fetched a cup of tea and served it to him. Hsi-men Ch'ing drank a mouthful and then set the teacup down again.

Noticing that his face was red, he asked him, "Where've you been drinking wine?"

Shu-t'ung then pulled out a note from under the inkstone on the table and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "This is a note that the Sixth Lady called me into her room to give me. It has something to do with Ch'e Tan and that bunch and was sent over here by her brother-in-law, Hua Tzu-yu. The Sixth Lady told me to take it with me in order to show to you. Because she bestowed a cup of wine on me, I guess my face must be red."

Hsi-men Ch'ing glanced at the note, which said, "Please look with favor on the four offenders Ch'e Tan and company"; and then, having read it, he handed it to Shu-t'ung and instructed him, "Put it in my letter case and have the officer on duty remind me about it in the yamen tomorrow."

Shu-t'ung put the note in the letter case and then came over and stood in attendance at his side. When Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that after a few drinks the colors red and white formed a pleasing contrast on his face and the fragrant redness of his lips revealed a mouthful of teeth as white as glutinous rice, how could he have been anything but captivated. Thereupon his:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Taking him onto his lap, the two of them fell to kissing and sucking each other's tongues. The young man had a cinnamon-flavored breath-sweetening lozenge in his mouth, and his whole person exuded a pungent fragrance. Hsi-men Ch'ing hiked up his clothes with one hand, took down his flowered drawers, and began to fondle his buttocks.

As he did so, he enjoined him, "You shouldn't drink too much wine, or you'll spoil that face of yours."

"Your instructions are duly noted," said Shu-t'ung.

The two of them then continued to carry on with each other in the study.

To resume our story, a figure, clad in black and riding a horse, arrived at the main gate of the compound, leapt off his horse, and, bowing to P'ing-an, who was tending the gate, asked him, "Is this the residence of His Honor Hsi-men, the judicial commissioner?"

Now P'ing-an was still pouting over the fact that Shu-t'ung had failed to invite him to partake of his treat and was not in the best of moods, so he did not reply for some time.

The man continued to stand there and said, "I have been sent by Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command to deliver a circular announcement to His Honor Hsi-men. Tomorrow he is throwing a party at the Temple of Eternal Felicity in order to see off His Honor Hsü Nan-ch'i, who has been promoted to the post of commander of the Hsin-p'ing Stockade. Their Honors Military Director-in-chief Ching Chung, Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, and Militia Commander Chang Kuan will also be there. Contributions of one tael apiece have already been received from them. I have come straight here to deliver this communication. Might I trouble you, as his gate tender, to pass it on to him? I will wait for an answer."

Only then did P'ing-an take the circular notice and go back to the rear compound, where he learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing was in his studio in the flower garden. Proceeding in that direction, he had just skirted the juniper hedge when he caught sight of Hua-t'ung, who was sitting on the stone stylobate outside the window. When the latter saw him, he gave a negative wave of his hand, and P'ing-an realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing must be engaged in some less than pressing business with Shu-t'ung. Silently approaching the window, he had been eavesdropping for some time when he heard the sound of heavy breathing coming from inside, accompanied by a creaking of the floorboards that was quite audible.

"My child," he overheard Hsi-men Ch'ing say, "hold your body straight, and don't move."

After that, some time elapsed without his hearing anything, when what should he see but Shu-t'ung coming out to fetch some water so Hsi-men Ch'ing could wash his hands. When he caught sight of P'ing-an and Hua-t'ung standing under the window, his face turned crimson with embarrassment, and he hurried off to the rear compound to complete his errand.

P'ing-an took the circular announcement and went inside, where Hsi-men Ch'ing read it, took up a brush, and wrote "noted" in the appropriate place; after which he instructed him, "Go to the rear compound and ask the Second Lady for a tael of silver. Then get my son-in-law to seal it up and give it to the messenger."

P'ing-an assented and went on his way.

Induced by a Bribe Shu-t'ung Uses His Charms to Make a Point

When Shu-t'ung came back with the water, Hsi-men Ch'ing washed his hands and then went back to Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

"Would you like some wine?" Li P'ing-erh asked. "I'll have a maidservant decant some for you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, noticing that there was a jug of Chin-hua wine under the table, asked, "Where did that come from?"

Li P'ing-erh did not feel comfortable explaining that Shu-t'ung had bought it in order to present to her, so she merely said, "I felt like having some wine a while ago and consequently sent a servant out onto the street to buy this jug of wine for me. After opening it, I only drank two cups before I had had enough."

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've laid in plenty of wine in the front compound, and you go spending silver on it. Just the other day, I purchased a consignment of forty jugs of Ho-ch'ing wine on credit from Ting the Southerner, which is sitting in an anteroom on the western side of the front courtyard. If you want anything to drink, just send a servant after the key and have him go get some for you."

When he had finished speaking, Li P'ing-erh remembered that she still had a saucer of roast duck, a saucer of chicken meat, and a saucer of fresh fish that had not been touched left over from the earlier repast, so she instructed Ying-ch'un to make them into four saucers of appetizers, with the addition of a saucerful of sliced smoked pork, and set up a table in her room so she could have a drink with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hsi-men Ch'ing did not ask where these delicacies had come from. It is apparent that he was so accustomed to eating this kind of fare, whether enjoying it at home or entertaining guests, that he did not go a single day without it.

While he was drinking, Hsi-men Ch'ing bethought himself to ask Li P'ing-erh, "Was that note that Shu-t'ung handed me just now given to him by you?"

"It's from my brother-in-law, Hua Tzu-yu, from outside the gate," replied Li P'ing-erh. "He sent someone over with it to try to persuade you to be lenient with that bunch of scamps."

"Just the other day my brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, spoke to me about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I refused his suggestion. If it weren't for this, I would certainly have insisted on that bunch of 'bare sticks' being escorted to a higher court to stand trial. Out of consideration for your brother-in-law, however, when I go to the yamen tomorrow, I'll just have each of them given a beating and then let them go."

"What need is there to beat them again?" said Li P'ing-erh. "When people are beaten into:

Showing their teeth and making faces, it's not a pleasant sight."

"Our yamen is that kind of yamen," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It makes no difference to me whether people show their teeth or not, as persons more delicate and pampered than they have found out before now."

"The other day we heard a case in the yamen concerning the family of the deceased Vice Commissioner Ch'en from our district. Since Vice Commissioner Ch'en died, his wife has maintained her widowhood. She has a daughter, Miss Ch'en, who was standing at the front door to see the lanterns on the sixteenth of the first month when a young scamp named Juan the Third, who lived across the street from her, was setting off firecrackers and happened to notice how pretty she looked. This inspired him to flirt with her by strumming his guitar or p'i-p'a, and serenading her in song. When Miss Ch'en heard this, her forbidden desires were stirred and she sent her maidservant to surreptitiously summon him to her door, where the two of them exchanged a kiss. But after that there was no way for them to meet."

"Who could have anticipated that Juan the Third would become so lovesick that he was bedridden for five months. His father and mother lavished money widely on physicians to treat him, but he gradually approached the brink of death until he was expected to die at any moment."

"At this point, a friend of his named Chou the Second came up with a plan and said to him, 'Every year at the time of the Middle Primordial Festival¹⁶ on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, the mother and daughter of the Ch'en household go to Nun Hsüeh's place at the Ksitigarbha Nunnery to burn incense during the Ullambana services. If you promise ten taels of silver to Nun Hsüeh, and she consents to conceal you in her monastic quarters so that you can have a tryst with the young lady, I am sure that it will cure you of what ails you.'

"Juan the Third was delighted by this and actually adopted his proposal. Nun Hsüeh accepted his ten taels of silver with the result that, as the young lady could scarcely have anticipated, while taking a noonday nap in the abbess's quarters, she ended up having illicit relations with Juan the Third. The latter had just arisen from his sickbed, however, where he had long been given to licentious thoughts, and when his desires were suddenly fulfilled in this way, he died on top of the young woman's body."

"This threw her mother into a panic, and she hurriedly took her daughter back home, but Juan the Third's parents were scarcely willing to leave it at that¹⁷ and lodged a complaint before the yamen, with the result that both Mrs. Ch'en and her daughter were taken into custody."

"Hsia Yen-ling, knowing that the Ch'en family was well-to-do, wanted to charge the daughter with the crime, but I refused to go along with him, saying, 'Although it is true that Miss Ch'en had illicit relations with Juan the Third, the latter had long been hankering after her without result and, moreover, had not fully recovered from his illness. Under the circumstances, it is scarcely surprising that such a sudden indulgence in illicit relations should have proven to be fatal. Nun Hsüeh falsely employed, as she should not have done, a Buddhist ceremony as a means of covering up an illicit assignation that resulted in the loss of life; and, moreover, she received a bribe for so doing.'

"She was, therefore, condemned as an accessory before the fact, stripped of her clothing, given twenty strokes of the bamboo, and ordered to return to lay life. The girl's mother, nee Chang, took her daughter, as she should not have done, to a Buddhist temple to burn incense, which is detrimental to public morals. She and her daughter, therefore, were both subjected to the finger squeezers, which were struck twenty times, after which their depositions were taken and they were released. If it had not been handled in this way, and the case had been forwarded to Tung-p'ing prefecture, the girl would certainly have forfeited her life."¹⁸

"That was a truly momentous good deed on your part," said Li P'ing-erh. "As long as you are an officer in the legal system, you ought, whenever you can, to utilize your position in the court to treat people favorably. If for no other reason, it would serve to accumulate merit for this little bit of a child of yours."

"What would you suggest?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Quite aside from anything else," said Li P'ing-erh, "it must have been very hard on that young lady. How could her delicate little fingers ever have withstood such treatment without being hurt?"

"She was hurt so badly that the fingers of her two hands were streaming with blood," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"In the future," said Li P'ing-erh, "you ought to subject people to the squeezers and the bamboo more sparingly.

Where you can afford to be lenient, you should be lenient.

There are opportunities to accumulate good fortune everywhere."¹⁹

"One can't afford to take feelings into account in the conduct of public affairs," pronounced Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Just as the two of them were drinking together there, whom should they see but Ch'un-mei, who lifted aside the portiere and came into the room.

On seeing that Hsi-men Ch'ing and Li P'ing-erh were drinking together, thigh over thigh, she said, "The two of you are doing just as you please, having a good time and drinking wine. Late as it is, you haven't thought to send a servant out to meet my mistress. Lai-an is the only one accompanying her sedan chair.

What with all the intervening gates and doors,
I'm afraid she may be late, but you don't seem to care about it."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that:

Her flowery headdress was in disarray,²⁰ and Her clouds of hair were in disorder, his whole face became wreathed in smiles, and he said, "Little oily mouth! My guess would be that you've been sleeping."

"The drawnwork kerchief on your head has jumped out of place," remarked Li P'ing-erh. "Why don't you pull it back down where it belongs?"

Then, offering it to her as she spoke, she said, "Here's some good, sweet Chin-hua wine. Won't you have a cup?"

"Have some," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I'll send a servant to meet your mistress."

Leaning on the end of the table with one hand while she fiddled with her shoe, Ch'un-mei said, "I've only just gotten up, and I'm not feeling very well. I don't want anything to drink."

"Just look at you, little oily mouth!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You've had more than a little already."

"In any case, your mistress is not here today," said Li P'ing-erh. "You might as well have a cup. What is there to be afraid of?"

"Sixth Lady," said Ch'un-mei, "you go ahead and drink. I really don't have a mind for it. Whether my mistress is here or not doesn't make any difference to me. Even when she is present, if I don't feel like it, and she offers me some, I refuse it."

"If you don't want any wine," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "have a mouthful of tea. I'll send Ying-ch'un out front for a servant to go and meet your mistress."

As he spoke, he offered her the cup of tea, steeped with osmanthus, sesame seeds, and cured bamboo shoots, that he had been holding in his hand.

Ch'un-mei accepted it as indifferently as though she were:

Uncertain whether it was there or not,²¹ and, after merely swallowing a mouthful, put it down, saying, "You needn't send Ying-ch'un after anyone. I've already called in P'ing-an, who's right here. He's older than the others; you might as well send him."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then called for P'ing-an through the window, and the servant responded, "I'm here, awaiting further orders."

"If you go," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who will tend the front gate?"

"I've deputized Ch'i-t'ung to look after the gate," said P'ing-an.

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "take a lantern with you and hurry off to meet your mistress."

Thereupon, he took a lantern and set straight off to meet P'an Chin-lien. Before he had gone halfway, whom should he see but Lai-an accompanying her sedan chair as it approached from the south.

It so happens that the two chair-bearers were persons with whom he was already familiar. One of them was called Chang Ch'uan-erh, and the other was called Wei Ts'ung-erh.

P'ing-an went up to them, took hold of one of the shafts with his hand, and said, "I've come to meet the mistress."

Chin-lien then proceeded to interrogate him, saying, "P'ing-an, is your father at home yet? Was it he who sent you to meet me, or somebody else?"

"For Father to send me," said P'ing-an, "is not likely at all. Not likely at all. It was Sister who sent me to meet you."

"I imagine that your father is not yet home from the yamen," said Chin-lien.

"Not yet home?" said P'ing-an. "He went to pay a visit to someone outside the gate, but he's been home since this afternoon. He's in the Sixth Lady's room having a good time and drinking wine. If Sister hadn't called me inside and pressured him to send me with a lantern to meet you, I wouldn't be here now. It seemed obvious to me that since Lai-an, who's still so young, was the only one accompanying your sedan chair, and there was reason to fear you might be late, or suffer some inconvenience on the road, you really needed an older servant to come meet you. But since that would have left no one to tend the front gate, I deputized Ch'i-t'ung to look after it, before being free to come myself."

"When you left," Chin-lien went on to ask, "where was your father?"

"When I left," said P'ing-an, "Father was still in the Sixth Lady's room drinking wine. It was only after Sister importuned him on your behalf that Father sent me to meet you."

When Chin-lien heard this, she remained silent for some time in her sedan chair before expostulating sardonically, "That lousy ruffian! I might just as well be dead for all he cares. More than ever, he's taken to sleeping all the time in that whore's room, that's all there is to it. And this may cause her to think that in the future she can depend forever on that piddling bladder's spawn of hers. She had better beware of the fact that:

After high noon the sun has passed its zenith.

"Chang Ch'uan-erh, just let me ask you, since there are no outsiders present, and you frequent:

The doors of a thousand households,

The gates of ten thousand families, which of them would clothe a baby who has only just been ejected from the womb in garments made from whole bolts of silk or satin?

Even if you were as rich as Moneybags Wang,

Would that do, or would it not do?"

"If you hadn't mentioned it," said Chang Ch'uan-erh, picking up where Chin-lien had left off, "I would not have presumed to say anything about it, but that would never do. To say nothing of the extravagance, I fear it would only serve to diminish his share of good luck. He hasn't yet come down with smallpox, measles, chicken pox, or rubella. It's no easy thing to raise a child to adulthood.

"Just last year there was a case, outside the East Gate, of a certain prominent family with its own large landed estates, the patriarch of which was in his sixties. He occupied a hereditary post and had incalculable wealth at his disposal, being one of those of whom it can be said that:

His oxen and horses form teeming herds,

His stores of grain are inexhaustible.

And as for his maidservants and concubines, to mention only those with the ability to take charge of a household and wear formal robes, he had seventeen or eighteen at his disposal. But however much he wanted a son to show for it, he did not have any. So he:

Performed ceremonies in the Eastern Temple,

Presented offerings in the Western Monastery,

Donated sutras and contributed effigies, leaving no stone unturned in his quest, when, contrary to all expectation, his seventh concubine bore him a son, which made him as happy as could be. Just as in the case of the master of your household, all day long he pampered the child as though it were a pearl on the palm, wrapping it in a nest of brocade and embroidery, satin and silk. Moreover, he replastered five rooms for it, until they looked like snow grottoes, and purchased four or five waiting women to look after it, carrying on all day as though he were touched in the head. But before it was three years old it came down with smallpox and died. If you don't mind my saying so, it's really better to:

Let them go and let them come like spilt water."

"Let them go and let them come like spilt water, indeed!" responded Chin-lien. "His only regret is that he can't keep him wrapped in gold all day long."

"There's something else I'd better tell you about," said P'ing-an. "If I don't tell you, and you find out about it later, you'll hold it against me. It's about that bunch of scamps that Manager Han spoke to Father about. He has had them put in the squeezers and beaten in the yamen, has incarcerated them in the lockup, and intends to have them escorted to a higher court to stand trial. This morning Ying the Second came and spoke to Shu-t'ung about it. I imagine he must have received a number of taels of silver from him, because he took a sizable packet to the shop and insisted on having two or three taels worth chiseled off for his use. He then bought quite a lot in the way of delicacies and so forth, had Lai-hsing's wife prepare them for him, and proceeded to carry them off to the Sixth Lady's quarters. He also purchased a jug of Chin-hua wine. After first sharing these things with the Sixth Lady, he then took the remainder to the shop up front, where he invited Uncle Fu the Second, Pen the Fourth, your son-in-law, Tai-an, and Lai-hsing to join him in making a communal feast of it. They enjoyed this treat right up until the time Father came home, before breaking up."

"Didn't he offer you anything to eat?" asked Chin-lien.

"Offer me anything!" exclaimed P'ing-an. "That impudent southern slave! Why even you ladies of the household don't carry any weight in his mind. I ought not to mention it, but Father is spoiling him rotten. Just to start out with, he has been up to dirty business with him in his studio. It's really not surprising since he was formerly a 'gate-boy' in the district yamen. There isn't much he doesn't know about anything. If Father doesn't get rid of that southern slave soon, before long the entire household will be corrupted by him."

"When he was drinking wine in Li P'ing-erh's quarters," asked Chin-lien, "how long did it go on?"

"They were drinking the better part of the day," replied P'ing-an. "I saw with my own eyes that he didn't come out until his face was bright red."

"When your father came home," said Chin-lien, "didn't he say anything to him about it?"

"Father's lips were sealed," said P'ing-an. "What could he have to say about it?"

"That lousy shameless ruffian of a benighted ruler!" exclaimed Chin-lien.

He'd sell his own son to obtain a son-in-law:

Both of them are going about it ass-backwards.

At the same time you're plotting to plug his shitty asshole, that slave, for his part, is busy fucking your favorite concubine."

She then enjoined P'ing-an, "If you ever catch him up to this kind of dirty business anywhere with that southern slave again, come and tell me about it."

"Your instructions are duly noted," replied P'ing-an. "I can count on old Chang Ch'uan-erh here not to leak inside information. Having served the needs of our household for lo these many years, he's an oldtimer. As far as I'm concerned:

If you don the black livery of a servant,

You must cling to even the blackest post.

Since you're my mistress, if I have anything to say, how could I fail to report it to you? But you must keep it to yourself and not mention so much as a word about me."

Thereupon, he accompanied the sedan chair, talking as they went, all the way to the front gate of the compound.

As P'an Chin-lien stepped out of the sedan chair, above the waist she wore a blouse of lilac-colored, cloud-patterned Nanking silk that opened down the middle, emblazoned with a variegated embroidered mandarin square enclosing a roundel that featured a pair of magpies face to face, a rebus for the words "happy reunion." Below the waist she had on a long trailing drawnwork skirt of white glazed damask with a foot-wide border that featured a motif of playing children tugging on a branch of vine.²² On her bosom she had fastened a gold openwork brooch that held the two sides of her collar together, and beneath this she held a purse made of gold-spangled sheepskin.

Thus attired, she went first to the master suite in the rear compound to pay her respects to Wu Yüeh-niang.

"You could have stayed overnight," said Yüeh-niang. "What led you to come back so soon?"

"My mother wanted me to stay," replied Chin-lien, "but she's taken the eleven-year-old daughter of my maternal aunt into her household to raise, and we would all have been squeezed together on the same k'ang. Who wants to stay over under such conditions? I was afraid that:

What with all the intervening gates and doors,

I'd better just come home. My mother asked me to tell you how much she appreciated your generous gifts."

Thereupon, having paid her respects to Yüeh-niang, she went to the quarters of Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and the others to say hello and then headed back to the front compound. On learning that Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking wine in Li P'ing-erh's quarters, she went straight there to pay her respects to Li P'ing-erh. When Li P'ing-erh saw her come in, she promptly stood up and welcomed her with a smile.

After they had exchanged mutual salutations, Li P'ing-erh said, "Sister, you've come home early. Please sit down and have a cup of wine."

Turning to Ying-ch'un, she said, "Quickly, fetch a chair for the Fifth Lady to sit on."

"I've already had something to drink today," said Chin-lien. "Rather than indulging in two feasts on the same day, I'd better excuse myself."

After saying which, she prepared to take herself nonchalantly off without more ado.

"A fine slave you are!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How impudent can you get! You come home and don't even bother to salute me with a kowtow."

Chin-lien picked up where he left off, saying, "I kowtow to you! You haven't earned the right to it.

If a slave is not to be impudent,

Who is to be impudent?"

Gentle reader take note: These few words of Chin-lien's were clearly intended to reflect satirically on Li P'ing-erh. Since she had first shared a few drinks with Shu-t'ung, and later done the same with Hsi-men Ch'ing, was this not a case of indulging in two feasts on the same day? But Hsi-men Ch'ing had no way of grasping the point of her remarks. Truly:

It is clear that words serve as both the needle and thread;

That bring out discordant patterns from the fabric's ground.²³

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 35

HARBORING RESENTMENT HSI-MEN CH'ING PUNISHES P'ING-AN; PLAYING A FEMALE ROLE SHU-T'UNG ENTERTAINS HANGERS-ON

Do not enter the subprefectural yamen or the district yamen;
Practice diligence in the performance of your daily tasks.
The pond accumulates water in order to guard against drought;
Business, if conducted industriously,
will support a family.
In teaching your sons and grandsons,
teach them a craft;
Plant mulberry trees or date trees,
do not plant flowers.
Try not to pay any attention to idle gossipmongering;¹
When thirsty, drink spring water, if dejected, drink tea.²

THE BURDEN of the above eight lines of regulated verse is simply that fathers and mothers must train their sons and grandsons from infancy to:

Study their lessons and learn propriety,³ so they will know how to be:

Filial and obedient to their parents,⁴
Respectful to their elders and superiors, Harmonious with their neighbors, and Content with their various occupations.⁵

On no account should they permit their young offspring to:

Become arrogant, indolent, or unruly,
Congregate in groups of three or five,
Turn into dedicated idlers, devoted to their leisure,
Sport bows and flaunt arrows,⁶
Make a hobby of raising caged birds,
Play at kickball and suchlike sports,⁷
Drink wine or engage in gambling,
Toy with the breeze and patronize prostitutes, or Do whatever they please without restraint.

If they do, in the future they are sure to:

Devote themselves to stirring up trouble, and Bring their families to rack and ruin.⁸

Families such as this only succeed in involving their sons in the meshes of the law, with the result that, at the worst:

Their lives are lost and their families ruined;⁹

or, at the least:

They suffer chastisement and endure incarceration,
Their property is prey to government confiscation,
Their conduct is governed by petty functionaries,
Their fathers and elder brothers are implicated,
They are troubled by remorse and subject to sorrow.
What benefit is there to be derived from this?

The story goes that when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived at the yamen the next morning, he first withdrew from the courtroom to consult with Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling, to whom he said, "These four men have repeatedly sent people to me seeking to pull strings on their behalf, in order to secure lenient treatment for them."

"People have come to my place about it, too," said Hsia Yen-ling, "but I hesitated to raise the issue with you. Since that's the way things stand, we might as well simply have them brought into court here and now, give them a warning, and let them go."

"What you say makes sense," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

They then ascended the tribunal and ordered the attendants to bring them before the court. The culprits, Ch'e Tan and company, knelt down before them. Afraid they would get another beating, they kowtowed for all they were worth.

Without waiting for Hsia Yen-ling to initiate the proceedings, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "What am I to do with a bunch of 'bare sticks' like you! How did you ever get so many people to speak up on your behalf? You all ought to be escorted to a higher court to stand trial, but I'll let you off this once. If any of you ever falls into my hands again, I'll see to it that you die a living death in prison. Now get out of here."

Whereupon, along with Han the Second, they were all shouted out of the courtroom and fled, as though:

Whether their fates were governed by metal or by water,

There was no place for them to hide.

This is the way the case was settled. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Ying Po-chüeh, with five taels of silver in hand, sought out Shu-t'ung to get word of what had happened, and surreptitiously slipped him the silver. Shu-t'ung accepted it and put it in his sleeve, but P'ing-an, from his vantage point at the gate, caught sight of this transaction.

Shu-t'ung thereupon said to Ying Po-chüeh, thus and so, "I spoke to Father about it yesterday, and today he has gone to the yamen to settle the case."

"The fathers and elder brothers of those four have approached me repeatedly about it," said Ying Po-chüeh. "They are afraid that they will be subjected to further punishment."

"You can rest easy on that score," said Shu-t'ung. "I can assure you they won't suffer so much as a single stroke."

On receiving this information, Ying Po-chüeh hurried off to communicate this news to them.

By lunchtime the four scamps had returned to their homes, where each and every one of them laid hold of their fathers and elder brothers and began to weep out loud. Each of them had lost no inconsiderable amount of silver, only to end up with the scars of a beating on their haunches. They would not dare to recklessly foment any trouble in the future. Truly:

Catastrophe ever follows in the wake of officious actions;

Vexation is always the consequence of lack of forbearance.

To resume our story, before Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home that day, Shu-t'ung called Lai-an into the studio to sweep the floor and, while he was there, opened a food box, in which someone had sent a place setting of decorative confectionery, and gave him some molded sugar candy¹⁰ to eat.

As a result, that page boy, though he:

Never, ever, should have done it, said to him, "Brother Shu-t'ung, I've got something to tell you. Yesterday, when brother P'ing-an went to meet the Fifth Lady's sedan chair, he told all kinds of tales about you along the way."

"What did he say about me?" Shu-t'ung demanded to know.

"He said that you had managed to squeeze a few taels of silver out of someone, with which you made bold to buy wine and meat and have it delivered to the Sixth Lady's quarters, where you remained eating and drinking for half the day before coming out. And that you had then employed the leftovers to treat the staff in the shop in the front compound but had not offered him anything to eat. He also said that you and Father had been up to some kind of business in the studio."

Nothing might have happened if Shu-t'ung had not heard this, but having heard it, he made a point of remembering it, though he allowed the rest of the day to go by without saying anything about it.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing had made prior arrangements not to go to the yamen that morning, but to go to the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate, where the farewell party to see off Stockade Commander Hsü Nan-ch'i to his new post was being held.

It was not until that afternoon that he returned home, when he dismounted and instructed P'ing-an, saying, "If anyone should come looking for me, just tell them that I haven't come home yet."

When he had finished speaking, he went to the front reception hall, where Shu-t'ung helped him off with his outer garments.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked him, "Did anyone show up today?"

"No one," Shu-t'ung replied. "But His Honor Hsü Feng-hsiang, the supervisor of the State Farm Battalion, sent you two packages of crabs and ten catties of fresh fish. I sent off a thank-you note in reply and gave the messenger two mace of silver. Also, your elder brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, sent six invitations inviting the ladies of the household to attend the third-day celebrations tomorrow."

It so happens that Wu K'ai's son, Wu Shun-ch'en, had just married Third Sister Cheng, the niece of their former neighbor Ch'iao Hung's wife. Hsi-men Ch'ing had already sent them the customary present of tea, and this is why they had received these invitations.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went to Wu Yüeh-niang's quarters in the rear compound and showed her the invitations, saying, "You had all better prepare yourselves to attend the party tomorrow."

When he had finished speaking, he came out to his studio and sat down. Shu-t'ung hastened to add some charcoal to the brazier, put some pellets of sweet-smelling incense in the burner, and then offered him a cup of tea with both hands. As Hsi-men Ch'ing held the teacup in his hand, the page boy slowly moved closer until he was standing right beside him at the end of the table. After some time, Hsi-men Ch'ing made a meaningful moue, signaling to him to close the door, and then pulled him onto his lap with one hand, while he pinched his cheeks with the other. Hsi-men Ch'ing stuck out his tongue, and the young man, who was holding a phoenix-embossed breath-sweetening lozenge in his mouth, transferred it to him, while at the same time stroking his jade stalk below.

"My child," Hsi-men Ch'ing asked, "Has anyone out there been giving you a hard time?"

"There is something," the servant took the opportunity to say, "but if Father had not asked, I would not have presumed to bring it up."

"Say what you like. It doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Shu-t'ung then proceeded to tell him about P'ing-an, saying, "The other day, when you had called me into the studio, he and Hua-t'ung were eavesdropping outside the window. When I went outside afterwards to fetch some water so you could wash your hands, I saw them with my own eyes. Moreover, in talking to people outside, he called me a southern slave and abused me in every conceivable way."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he became enraged and fulminated, "If I don't beat that slave's bottom right off for him, I might as well forget it."

We will say no more for the moment about this conversation in the studio.

For some time now, P'ing-an had been on the watch for any such goings on, so before anyone knew it, he barged into her room and told Chin-lien all about it. Chin-lien responded by sending Ch'un-mei to the front compound to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing if he would come speak to her.

No sooner had she rounded the corner of the juniper hedge than she encountered Hua-t'ung, who was playing with a pine moth caterpillar and said, "What have you come for, Sister? Father's in the studio."

Ch'un-mei merely gave him a rap on the head with her knuckles. When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard the rustling of skirts outside, he knew that someone was coming. Hastily pushing the page boy away, he went over to the bed and lay down, while Shu-t'ung pretended to busy himself with brush and inkstone at the desk.

Ch'un-mei pushed open the door and came in. When she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing, she licked her lips, and said, "The two of you are certainly keeping to yourselves in the room here, with the door closed, no less. No doubt you're enjoying your honeymoon, but Mother has something she wants to say to you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was lying face-up with his head on the pillow, said, "Little oily mouth! What does she want to say to me? You go ahead. I'll come along after I've laid down for a while."

Ch'un-mei was adamant and said, "If you refuse to go, I'll drag you out of bed myself."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was unable to withstand her insistence on:

Dragging him away, dead or alive, and allowed himself to be dragged off to Chin-lien's quarters.

"What was he up to in the front compound?" Chin-lien asked.

"He and the page boy, just the two of them, were in the studio, with the door latched," replied Ch'un-mei. "They were so quiet you'd think they were trying to catch a fly. Who knows what sort of funny business they were up to? It was just as though they were enjoying their honeymoon. When I went in, the page boy was at the desk, pretending to be engaged in his secretarial duties. I opened my eyes wide, but that one merely lay back on the bed, and was reluctant to come, even when I tried to drag him."

"When he comes into this room of mine," said Chin-lien, "it's just as though he were afraid someone was going to:

Stew him in a pot and eat him.

The worthless, shameless good-for-nothing! As though he still possessed a sense of shame! What do you suppose he was up to, in broad daylight, closing himself inside the room with that slave, for no good reason? No doubt he was busy boring his way into the stinking asshole of that slave; and at night he'll come into my room and want to sleep with me. How fastidious can you get!"

"You believe all the nonsense that little oily-mouth tells you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Since when did I do any such thing? I was looking on as he wrote out some gift cards and had just lain down on the bed."

"Why should you go out of your way to write out gift cards behind closed doors?" said Chin-lien. "What sort of:

Classified information or ominous rumor, were you dealing with? Had you discovered:

A three-legged guardian deity, or

A double-horned elephant, that you were afraid to let anyone see?

"Tomorrow sister-in-law Wu's family is holding a 'third-day party' to celebrate her son's marriage, and she has dropped us an invitation.

Neither too long, nor too short,¹¹ you've got to come up with some piece of goods that I can take with me as a complimentary gift for the occasion. If you don't provide me with something, I'll have to find some other lover to demand it from. Elder Sister is presenting a complete outfit of clothes and five mace of silver, and some of the others have hairpins, or ornamental flowers. If I am the only one without anything, I won't go."

"Take a bolt of red silk from the clothes cabinet in the front compound as your complimentary gift," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I won't be able to go then," said Chin-lien. "Who wants that diaphanous silk stuff, anyway? If I trot out something like that, everyone will only laugh at me."

"Don't get all worked up about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Wait till I go look on the upper floor over there. I'll find something suitable for you to give her. Right now I still need several more bolts of material for the congratulatory gifts I'm sending to the Eastern Capital, so I can pick up something for you as part of the same lot."

Thereupon, he went to the upper floor of Li P'ing-erh's belvedere and picked out two bolts of jet silk emblazoned with brocaded mandarin squares that featured a ch'i-lin, two bolts of Nanking variegated satin, one bolt of scarlet silk that featured a *tou-niu*¹² design, and a bolt of kingfisher blue cloud-patterned satin.

He then said to Li P'ing-erh, "How about coming up with a blouse of cloud-patterned damask for Chin-lien to give as a complimentary gift tomorrow? If you don't have anything like that available, I can send a servant with a note to get one from the silk goods store."

"There's no need for you to get anything from the store," said Li P'ing-erh. "I've got an outfit lying around of brocaded cloud-patterned damask, with a scarlet blouse and blue skirt, that I never use. The two of us can join together in presenting it as our complimentary gift."

Li P'ing-erh proceeded to open a trunk and take it out, after which she personally took it over to show to Chin-lien, saying, "Pick whichever you like, Sister, either the blouse or the skirt. The two of us might as well wrap them both up in a single package and present it as our complimentary gift, which will save us the trouble of sending out for something else."

"As long as it's yours," said Chin-lien, "it's hardly right that I should make use of it."

"My good sister," said Li P'ing-erh, "how can you talk that way?"

She had to urge her for some time before Chin-lien consented to the arrangement. They then took the package out and had Ch'en Ching-chi replace the label and write their two names on it. Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the task of selecting bolts of material in the rear compound. But no more of this.

To resume our story, P'ing-an was at his post at the front gate when whom should he see but Hsi-men Ch'ing's friend Pai Lai-ch'iang, or Scrounger Pai, who sauntered up and asked, "Is the honorable gentleman at home?"

"The master is not at home," replied P'ing-an.

Scrounger Pai did not believe it but walked straight in as far as the reception hall, where he noticed that the latticework doors were closed and said, "So he really isn't at home. Where has he gone?"

"Today he's gone outside the South Gate to see someone off," said P'ing-an. "He hasn't come home yet."

"If he was seeing someone off," said Scrounger Pai, "he ought to be home by now."

"Uncle Pai," said P'ing-an, "if you have something to say, say it to me, and I'll tell him about it when he comes back."

"It's not anything in particular," said Scrounger Pai, "it's just that we haven't seen each other for some time, and so, finding myself at leisure, I've dropped by to pay him a visit. Since he's not here, I'll wait for him."

"I fear he may not come back for some time," said P'ing-an. "You'll merely wait for him in vain."

Scrounger Pai chose to ignore this suggestion and, pushing open the latticework doors, walked into the reception hall and sat himself down in a chair. The page boys paid no attention to him but let him do as he pleased.

Who could have anticipated that:

As providence would have it, at that very time Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ying-ch'un to carry the bolts of material he had chosen and proceeded to accompany her toward the front compound. Just as they came around the hanging screen, the first thing he saw was Scrounger Pai sitting there in the reception hall. Ying-ch'un put down the bolts of material she was carrying and headed back to the rear compound as fast as she could go.

"So my brother is at home after all!" exclaimed Scrounger Pai as he came down from the hall and greeted him with a bow.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, upon seeing him, had no alternative but to offer him a seat. When he surveyed Scrounger Pai, he saw that:

On his head he sported a washed-out, reblocked, old silk cap, that looked as though it had made the pilgrimage as far as the summit of Mount T'ai;¹³

On his body he wore a stiffly-starched white cotton gown, with a frayed collar and worn lapels, that looked as though it had been rescued from a fire;

On his feet he had antique bronze-textured, edible tree fungus-shaped, black boots, that curled up at toe and heel, had hopelessly split seams, and squeaked like the beats of a clapper keeping time to a song;
Into which were stuffed a pair of stirrup-like stockings, barely held together by tangled string, the yellow threads of which were beginning to turn fragrant. Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down with him but did not call for tea.

Noticing that Ch'in-t'ung was standing in attendance nearby, Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed him, "Take the bolts of material to the guest room and get our son-in-law to have them properly wrapped up and sealed."

Ch'in-t'ung assented and proceeded to carry the bolts of material off toward the antechamber.

Scrounger Pai lifted his hand in salutation and said, "I'm afraid I've been remiss in not coming to see you for some time."

"Many thanks for your concern," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've been constantly away from home myself. Every day I'm tied up with business at the yamen."

"Brother," asked Scrounger Pai, "do you have to go to the yamen every day?"

"Every single day I have to be in attendance at both sessions of the court," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "On ordinary days we have to sit on the bench and hear cases, and on the first and fifteenth days of every month we also have to perform the ceremonies of bowing before the imperial tablet, taking the formal roll call, presiding over the general disposition of pending cases, and mustering the local constables, the neighborhood heads of the relevant mutual security units, and the police officers on rotational duty. Then there is a lot more busywork when I get home. I really don't have a moment's worth of free time."

"Today I had to go outside the South Gate because Hsü Nan-ch'i has just been promoted to the post of commander of the Hsin-p'ing Stockade, and his colleagues held a party to see him off. I've only just arrived home. Tomorrow Eunuch Director Hsüeh, the supervisor of the imperial estates, has invited me to a party, but it's too far away, so I can't go. Day after tomorrow I've got to find out what is entailed in going to welcome the new regional investigating censor for Shantung. On top of all this, Ts'ai T'iao, the fourth son of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital, has been appointed commandant-escort upon his marriage to Princess Mao-te,¹⁴ and T'ung T'ien-yin, the nephew of T'ung Kuan, the defender-in-chief of the Palace Command, has just been appointed to headquarters and promoted to the post of commander of the guard, with a substantive appointment as notary of the Bureau of Military Affairs. Congratulatory gifts to the several relevant levels will be required. What with all this, I've been completely worn out for the last few days."

They had been talking for what seemed like half a day before Lai-an showed up with some tea. Scrounger Pai had just picked up his teacup and swallowed a mouthful, when whom should he see but Tai-an, who came flying toward the interior of the compound with a large red missive in his hand.

"Judicial Commissioner Hsia is here," he reported. "He's just dismounting outside."

While Hsi-men Ch'ing went into the rear compound to change his clothes, Scrounger Pai concealed himself in an antechamber on the west side of the courtyard, from which vantage point he could observe what happened by looking out through the hanging blind.

After some time, Judicial Commissioner Hsia came in. He was wearing a round-collared robe of jet moiré emblazoned with a mandarin square of variegated embroidery featuring a golden lion with a ruffled mane, over a kingfisher blue silk undergown. Around his waist he wore an official girdle with a decorative plaque of aromatic liquidambar wood mounted in a gold setting. On his feet he wore black court boots. A bunch of keys dangled from his waist. The whole area was rendered black by the number of his servitors as he made his way in to the reception hall.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, having donned his official cap and girdle, came out from the rear compound to greet him. When they had finished with the social amenities, the two of them sat down in the positions appropriate for guest and host. Before long, Ch'i-t'ung came out with two cups of tea on a square platter of carved Yunnan agateware lacquer. The bodies of the teacups were made of fine plaited bamboo splints, covered with a thin layer of lacquer and mounted in silver. The teaspoons were of gold, in the shape of apricot leaves. The tea was steeped with osmanthus and cured green soybeans.

After they had finished their tea, Judicial Commissioner Hsia said, "With regard to that matter I mentioned the other day of going to welcome the new regional investigating censor, I sent someone to inquire about it today. It turns out that his surname is Tseng, and that he became a metropolitan graduate last year, in the year i-wei.¹⁵ His certificate of appointment has already been received in Tung-ch'ang prefecture, the seat of his jurisdiction. Our colleagues are all planning to set out tomorrow to welcome him at a distance. Although you and I are military officials, we serve as judicial commissioners in a yamen authorized by express imperial command, so we are not the same as the authorities in regular army and guard units. Consequently, we can delay our departure until the day after tomorrow and look for a place ten li outside the city at which to prepare a meal in order to welcome the new regional investigating censor."

"What my senior colleague proposes is just the thing," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "But there is no need for you to trouble yourself about it. Your pupil will send someone to find a suitable Buddhist or Taoist temple or monastery, or a private estate would also do, and send a cook ahead to make all the necessary preparations."

"In that case," said Judicial Commissioner Hsia, "I'll impose upon my colleague once again."

After they had finished their conversation and drunk another serving of tea, Judicial Commissioner Hsia got up and took his leave. When Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen him off, he came back inside and changed out of his formal clothes, but Scrounger Pai had still not departed.

Striding back into the reception hall, he sat down and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Ever since you stopped attending the monthly meetings of our club two months ago, it has been in danger of breaking up. Old Sun, although he has the necessary seniority, is unable to take charge of anything, and Brother Ying the Second is dodging his responsibilities. The other day, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, we held a meeting at the Temple of the Jade Emperor in conjunction with the celebration of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal during the Middle Primordial Festival, at which, including myself, only three or four of us showed up. There was no one to foot the bill, since all of us had turned up empty handed. It was an embarrassment to Abbot Wu who, after the ceremony of dismissing the marshals that evening, had engaged the services of a professional storyteller to entertain us, at considerable expense to himself. Although he didn't say anything about it, all of us:

Felt uneasy at heart.¹⁶

It's not like it was in the old days when you presided over the club and were able to take charge of things. It won't be long before we'll have to ask you to start attending again."

"Needless to say," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if the club must break up, let it break up. I scarcely have the time to worry about such things. If I have the leisure, I'll continue to arrange for Abbot Wu to perform the chiao rites of cosmic renewal once a year in order to requite Heaven and Earth, but that's it. You all can continue to meet, or not, as you please, but you needn't bother to tell me about it."

With these few words of reproof he succeeded in reducing Scrounger Pai to silence, but he continued to sit there as before. When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that he was not going to leave, he had no alternative but to call for Ch'in-t'ung and have him set up a table in one of the antechambers. He then went and fetched four saucers of appetizers:

Both meaty and vegetarian, including one of pan-fried wheat gluten, and one of roast pork. Hsi-men Ch'ing kept him company as he ate, and poured the wine. He sent to the rear compound for a pair of large chased silver goblets and poured out several cupfuls for him before he got up to take his leave.

Hsi-men Ch'ing accompanied him as far as the gate that led into the second courtyard, where he said, "You'll have to excuse me if I don't see you off any further. I'm wearing an informal skullcap in which it wouldn't do for me to be seen in public."

At this point Scrounger Pai finally said farewell and made his departure.

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the reception hall, pulled out a chair for himself, and called in a loud voice for P'ing-an.

When P'ing-an appeared before him, Hsi-men Ch'ing cursed at him, saying, "You lousy slave! Still standing are you?"

He then called for three or four of the orderlies on duty to stand in attendance on either side. P'ing-an did not know what it was all about. So frightened that his face turned as sallow as wax, he got down on his knees.

"When I came in the gate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I instructed you that, no matter who came to see me, you were to reply that I was not at home. Why did you not obey me?"

"When Uncle Pai came to call," replied P'ing-an, "I told him that you had gone outside the South Gate to see someone off, and had not yet returned home; but he didn't believe me and insisted on coming inside anyway. I followed him in and said to him, 'Uncle Pai, if you have something to say, all you have to do is tell me what it is, and when Father comes home, I'll report it to him.' He didn't say anything in response but pushed open the latticework doors to the reception hall himself and took a seat. Afterwards, who could have anticipated that you would come out and run into him?"

"Why you slave," cursed Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can stop shooting off your mouth! You've got some nerve! No doubt you'd let anyone come in while you're off gambling and drinking somewhere, instead of sticking to your post at the front gate."

Then, turning to the attendants, he ordered, "Smell his breath"

The orderlies smelled his breath and reported, "There's no odor of wine there."

"I want two of you who are experienced at administering punishment to stand by," ordered Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Give this slave a real finger-squeezing for me."

Thereupon, what with:

Two men having to deal with but one, they put on the finger-squeezers and proceeded to tighten them.

They squeezed P'ing-an until:

The pain was difficult to bear, and he called out, "I really did say that Father was not at home, but he forced his way in."

The orderly who had put the finger-squeezers on pulled the string taut, knelt down, and reported, "the squeezers are in place."

"Give the squeezers fifty strokes," ordered Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and have someone count them off from the side."

When the squeezers had been struck fifty times, they stopped.

"Give him an additional twenty strokes with the light bamboo," ordered Hsi-men Ch'ing.

In no time at all, he was given twenty strokes of the bamboo, with the result that:

The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and

His haunches were completely covered with weals.

"Let him go," shouted Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The two orderlies stepped forward to remove the finger-squeezers, and when they did so, P'ing-an screamed with pain.

"What am I to do with you, you lousy slave!" cursed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You say you were on duty at the gate, but I imagine you have been demanding bribes from my visitors and thereby damaging my reputation abroad. If any hint of such things should ever come to my ears, I'll have that slave's bottom of yours beaten right off for you."

P'ing-an kowtowed, got to his feet, hitched up his trousers, and made his way outside.

Noticing that Hua-t'ung was standing nearby, Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Take this little slave down and give his fingers a squeezing too.”

The page boy, in his turn, was thereupon subjected to the squeezers until he:

Howled outlandishly like a stuck pig.

But we will say no more at present about how Hsi-men Ch'ing went about subjecting people to the squeezers in the reception hall.

To resume our story, P'an Chin-lien came out of her quarters and headed toward the rear compound, but she had not gotten any further than the ceremonial gate behind the main reception hall when she observed Meng Yü-lou, all by herself, eavesdropping behind the hanging screen.

“What are you listening to here?” Chin-lien asked.

“I'm here listening to Father having P'ing-an beaten,” Yü-lou replied. “Even that little slave, Hua-t'ung, has been put in the finger-squeezers and given a squeezing. I don't know what it's all about.”

In a little while, Ch'i-t'ung came by, and Yü-lou called him to a halt and asked him, “Why is P'ing-an being beaten?”

Harboring Resentment Hsi-men Ch'ing Punishes P'ing-an

"Father's angry with him for letting Scrounger Pai into the house," Ch'i-t'ung replied.

"It wasn't really because he let in Scrounger Pai," said Chin-lien, picking up where Ch'i-t'ung had left off, it must be because he's been:

Busting his ivories.

If he hadn't been:

Busting his ivories,

why should he have beaten the page boy this way for no good reason? That lousy shameless good-for-nothing! It's a wonder he still has the face to play the master of the house, utterly devoid of shame as he is."

At this point, Ch'i-t'ung went about his business.

“What did you mean, just now, by saying that he had been:
Busting his ivories?”
asked Yü-lou.

“I’ve been wanting to tell you but haven’t gotten around to it,” said Chin-lien. “Day before yesterday, I went to my mother’s place to celebrate her birthday. It has come to my ears that, while I was not at home, that southern ‘sweetie’¹⁷ of a page boy, having managed to squeeze a few taels of silver out of someone in return for his good offices, proceeded to lay them out on delicacies, which he had prepared for him in the front compound, put in square boxes, along with a jug of Chin-hua wine, and delivered to the Sixth Lady’s quarters, where he remained eating and drinking with her for half the day before coming out.

“When that shameless good-for-nothing came home, he was told about it, but he had nothing to say. On top of which, he locked himself inside the studio in the garden together with that page boy. Who knows what sort of business the two of them were up to. The page boy, P’ing-an, happened to come inside to deliver a notice from somebody and, seeing that the door was closed, was standing there outside the window, when that southern page boy opened the door and saw him there. I imagine he must have reported this to that lousy shameless good-for-nothing, and today he’s getting his revenge by beating P’ing-an in order to get his rocks off. Who knows but what, one of these days, that southern slave is going to be the ruination of the whole household. But what’s it to him!”

“That’s a fine way to talk!” said Yü-lou. “If you include the whole household:
There are both the wise and the foolish.”¹⁸
You don’t mean to say that all of us are corruptible, do you.”

“That’s not it,” said Chin-lien. “Let me explain it to you. Right now in this household there are only two people who hold a preferential place in his heart. One of them is a member of the household and the other is not. All day long he carries on just as though his soul has become fixated upon their bodies. Whenever he sees them:

He talks, and he laughs;
while the rest of us are so out of favor that, no matter what we do, he treats us like an angry fighting cock. The lousy fickle ruffian, he’ll come to a bad end! It’s just as though his heart has been bewitched by a vixen so that he has eyes only for them. Third Sister, just you listen to me. In the future they’re bound to bring about:

Eight strange and seven untoward events, around here.

“Just today, on the matter of a complimentary gift, I had a quarrel with him. When he came home, he didn’t go to her quarters but went to his studio instead, where who knows what he was up to. I sent Ch’un-mei with instructions to find out where he was and ask him to come and see me. Who could have anticipated that, in broad daylight, he had shut himself up in the studio with that southern slave, behind closed doors. Ch’un-mei pushed open the door and went in, which startled him to such an extent that he was rendered:

Wide-eyed and speechless.
When he came to my quarters, I gave him a piece of my mind, but he did his best to evade the issue:
Concealing the left and covering up the right.”¹⁹

At first he offered me a bolt of red silk material to serve as my complimentary gift, but I rejected it. Afterwards, he went over to the upper floor of Li P’ing-erh’s belvedere to look for something more suitable.

The thief suffers from a sense of guilt.”²⁰ Troubled as she was by a bad conscience, she took an outfit of brocade clothing out of her trunk and personally came to offer it to me, saying, ‘Sister, see if you don’t think this outfit would do. It would save me the trouble of breaking it up if the two of us shared in making it our complimentary gift.’ I said, ‘As long as it’s yours, it’s hardly right that I should make use of it. I’ll just get Father to send for something from the silk goods store instead.’ She became flustered at this and said, ‘Sister, why make such a fuss about it. Pick whichever you like, either the blouse or the skirt, and when you’re satisfied, we can have it taken up front so Son-in-law Ch’en can attach a label and write our names on it.’ She pressured me into accepting it for half the day before I finally assented. She let me pick the blouse.”

“So that’s that,” said Yü-lou. “It was kind of her to insist on offering it to you.”
“You don’t understand,” said Chin-lien. “It’s not right to concede anything to her. In this day and age:
One merely fears the wide-eyed guardian deity;
There’s no need to fear the closed-eyed Buddha.

No matter whether it be wives or husbands, if you cut them the slightest bit of slack, you’ll end up being treated like:

Warden Wang’s lictors;
Not even worth a fuck.”
“Slavey Six,” teased Yü-lou:
“You’re just like wheat gluten;
As hard to masticate as leather.”

At this sally the two of them laughed together.

Whom should they see just then but Hsiao-yü, who came in and said, “Third Lady and Fifth Lady, you’re invited to the rear compound to eat some crabs. I’ll go on to invite the Sixth Lady and Mistress Ch’en.”

The two of them walked toward the interior, hand in hand, where they found Wu Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh sitting in the veranda outside the door of the master suite.

"What are the two of you laughing about?" they were asked.

"I'm laughing at Father for beating P'ing-an," said Chin-lien.

"I was upset by all the wild screaming and yelling," said Yüeh-niang, "and figured that he must be having somebody beaten. So it turns out to have been him. What was it all about?"

"It was because he had been:

Busting his ivories,"

said Chin-lien.

Yüeh-niang, who was ingenuous by nature, then asked, "What ivories are you talking about? Where were they, and how did he come to break them?"

At this, P'an Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou started to guffaw:

Falling into a heap with laughter.

"I don't know what you're laughing at," said Yüeh-niang, "if you don't explain it to me."

"Sister," said Yü-lou, "you don't know about it, but Father had P'ing-an beaten because he let Scrounger Pai into the house."

"So what if he did let Scrounger Pai into the house," said Yüeh-niang. "But what's all this about his:

Busting his ivories?

I've never seen the like of that loafer, without a stake of his own to venture, sitting at home with his idle prick between his legs, and only venturing out for no good reason:

As though he didn't know any better, in the hopes of picking up something at somebody else's place."

"He just came to call on Father," said Lai-an.

"A likely story!" said Yüeh-niang. "I suppose he just fell off his k'ang and decided to come pay a call. Don't talk such stinking rot! It's enough not to accuse him of coming only to scrounge something to eat."

After some time, Li P'ing-erh and Hsi-men Ta-chieh showed up, and the group of them sat down in a circle to enjoy the crabs.

"There's still some of that grape wine in my room," Yüeh-niang said to Hsiao-yü. "Go and decant some of it for the ladies to drink."

At this, Chin-lien, sharp-tongued as ever, said, "To go with the crabs, it would be even better if we had some Chin-hua wine to drink."

"It's too bad we've got only the crabs to go with the wine," she went on to say. "If we had a roast duck, we could tear it into pieces to complement the wine."

"At this hour, where would you go to buy a roast duck?" said Yüeh-niang.

Among those present, when Li P'ing-erh heard this, her face turned crimson with embarrassment. Truly:

The burden of the tale contains a deep meaning;

The topic of the story conceals

a hidden intent.

Yüeh-niang, however, was a straightforward person. How could she be expected to understand:

The story within the story?

We will say no more, at present, about how the ladies ate their crabs.

To resume our story, P'ing-an had been punished so severely that he was barely able to waddle as he made his way to his room at the front of the compound. His fingers had been squeezed so badly that he had to keep them splayed apart.

Pen the fourth, Lai-hsing, and company all hurried over to ask him, "P'ing-an, what did Father have you beaten for?"

"How should I know?" wailed P'ing-an.

"Father was angry with him for letting Scrounger Pai into the house," said Lai-hsing.

"Luckily you were there at the time," said P'ing-an, "and saw how I attempted to stop him twice, and reported that Father was not at home. But he insisted on going in and made his way inside the latticework doors to the reception hall. I said to him, 'If you have something to say, say it to me. Father has gone outside the South Gate to see someone off. I don't know when he'll be back. You'll merely wait for him in vain.' He said, 'I'll wait for him anyway,' and without another word, he proceeded to take a seat. Who could have anticipated that Father would come out from the rear compound and run into him? He really didn't have anything to say to him, except, 'I've happened by to pay you a call.' After tea had been served to him, he still wouldn't get up to leave, when who should appear but His Honor Judicial Commissioner Hsia. I assumed he would leave then, but he concealed himself in an antechamber and still refused to depart. Father had no alternative but to invite him to remain. Anyone with the slightest sense of shame would have stayed a little while and then made his departure, but he refused to leave until wine had been served to him. Father was so irritated that when he came back inside he had me beaten, saying that I had been shirking my duties at the gate and letting people into the house. If you say it's just my rotten luck that I failed to stop him, I can only reply, 'Didn't I try to stop him? It was he that insisted on coming in and sitting down, and he got away with it, while I got beaten.

What's it got to do with me?"

"That god-damned louse of a dog-bone!

His sons will be thieves and his daughters whores!"²¹

May the food he scrounged in our house be evacuated through his backbone!"

"If it rots his backbone, it will only be doing him a favor," said Lai-hsing. "It will leave room for him to scrounge even more in the future."

"I hope he develops a case of dysphagia!" exclaimed P'ing-an. "May cancer devour his esophagus! The world is full of people who exhibit shameless effrontery, but none of them is a match for this shameless dog-bone. He comes barging into our household so often the dog doesn't even bite him. The lousy scrounging beggar! He's been fucked so often, the lousy cuckold, it's a wonder his asshole hasn't putrefied!"

"If his asshole had putrefied," laughed Lai-hsing, "who would be the wiser? People would merely attribute the stench to the rankness of his body odor."

Everyone laughed at this sally.

"I dare say he doesn't have enough rice to make his evening meal," said P'ing-an. "Who knows what hunger his wife must endure? He's at such loose ends he's reduced to scrounging something to eat at someone else's place to save the cost of a meal at home."

That's not a long-term solution.²²

He'd do better to let his wife take on a lover, and play the role of cuckold. At least that would be to show some sign of vitality, rather than abjectly exposing himself to abuse at the hands of other people's servants."

Truly:

On the outside he may play the role of wastrel,
But at home his wife can only nibble her toes.

Tai-an was in the shop having his hair cut. When he had paid the barber and sent him on his way, he came out and said, "P'ing-an, if I don't say anything, I'll be so frustrated I could burst. You serve your master as a servant, but you still don't understand the nature of the head of the household. How can you blame anyone else for your troubles? As the saying goes:

You don't raise a child in the hope it will shit gold and piss silver;
All you can hope for is that it will respond empathetically to you.

What you were faced with is not to be compared to the situation when Uncle Ying the Second or Uncle Hsieh come to pay a call. If you respond to them that he is at home, or not at home, they are on such intimate and familiar terms with each other that it really doesn't make any difference. But where anyone of lesser standing is concerned, and when he has specifically instructed you to tell them that he is not at home, how could you just let them in?

If he doesn't beat you,
Who should he beat instead?"

"P'ing-an," said Pen the Fourth in jest, "has reverted to his childhood. His fingers are splayed like those of a baby learning to play pat-a-cake. Or, perhaps, he's just been playing with himself²³ too strenuously all day."

Everyone laughed again at this sally.

"If he got it for letting someone in," said Pen the Fourth, "what did Hua-t'ung do to entitle him to a share of the squeezers? A tasty treat, indeed, to have to share with anyone, the way you'd keep someone company in:

Drinking wine or eating meat!

When your ten fingers are fastened in the squeezers, what need is there for someone to share the treat?"

Hua-t'ung was still rubbing his hands and crying.

"My child, stop crying," Tai-an said to him in jest. "Your mother has really spoiled you. She's taken the trouble to tie these crullers between your fingers, and you don't even seem to enjoy them."

We will say no more, at present, about how the servants carried on at the front of the compound.

In the meantime, Hsi-men Ch'ing was busy in the anteroom supervising Ch'en Ching-chi and Shu-t'ung as they wrapped up the gifts and bolts of material, and wrote out the accompanying documents, so that they could be dispatched to the Eastern Capital the following day, to be delivered to Commandant-Escort Ts'ai T'iao and Commander T'ung T'ien-yin. But no more of this.

The next day, after Hsi-men Ch'ing went off to his yamen, Wu Yüeh-niang and his other womenfolk, riding in five sedan chairs, wearing pearl and jewel-bedecked caps on their heads, clad in brocaded gowns, and with Lai-hsing's wife accompanying them in a smaller sedan chair, set out for the house of her sister-in-law, the wife of Wu K'ai, to participate in the third-day celebrations after the marriage of their son, Wu Shun-ch'en, to Third Sister Cheng. Only Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh were left at home to look after the house.

That morning, Han Tao-kuo sent gifts to thank Hsi-men Ch'ing for his efforts on his behalf, including a jug of Chin-hua wine, a jellied goose, a set of pig's trotters, four roast ducks, and four shad. On the accompanying card he had written, "Presented by your pupil, Han Tao-kuo, with his compliments." Because there was no one at home, Shu-t'ung declined to formally accept them but detained the entire consignment, boxes, carrying pole, and all, until Hsi-men Ch'ing came home from the yamen, when he brought them out to show to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Ch'in-t'ung to the shop to fetch Manager Han and proceeded to berate him for his lack of savoir faire, saying, "What did you have to go buying these gifts for? I cannot possibly accept them."

"Your Honor," said Han Tao-kuo, with a bow:

"My obligations to you are so great,

for having taken pity on me in my plight, and providing me with a way to vent my spleen, that my entire family:

Will never be able to thank you enough.²⁴

These insignificant things are merely intended to be:

A token of my gratitude.

I hope Your Honor will see fit to accept them with a smile."

"This will never do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "After all, as an employee of mine:

You're like a member of the family.

How can I accept presents from you?"

He then turned to the original bearer of the gifts and said, "Carry them back where they came from."

Han Tao-kuo was thrown into such consternation by this that he pled with him for half the day before Hsi-men Ch'ing was induced to instruct his attendants, saying, "I will only accept the goose and the wine. Have the other gifts carried back where they came from."

He then ordered page boys to take cards and go to invite Ying the Second and Hsieh Hsi-ta to pay him a visit.

Turning to Han Tao-kuo, he said, "This afternoon, ask Lai-pao to look after the store for you, and come sit with us for a while."

Saying, "You won't even accept my gifts, and now I'm putting Your Honor to additional trouble," Han Tao-kuo assented and left.

Hsi-men Ch'ing arranged to have his household lay in a lavish quantity of additional provisions and, that afternoon, had an Eight Immortals table set up in the summerhouse in the garden, the Kingfisher Pavilion. Ying Po-ch'ieh and Hsieh Hsi-ta were the first to arrive.

"Manager Han has gone to the trouble to buy gifts in order to thank me for my intervention on his behalf," Hsi-men Ch'ing told them. "Despite the fact that I repeatedly refused to accept them, he has pulled out all the stops in begging me to do so. I have consented to keep only the goose and the wine, but it would hardly be right to enjoy them all by myself. So I have invited the two of you to come keep him company during his visit."

"He consulted with me about buying gifts in order to thank you," said Ying Po-ch'ieh. "But I said to him, Whatever you give him is not going to mean anything to someone who lives on such a lavish scale. Don't put yourself to the trouble. Even if you send the gifts, he is certain not to accept them.' So how has it turned out? It's just as though I'd:

Made the trip through your belly.

Sure enough, you refused to accept what he sent you."

When he had finished speaking, he had a drink of tea, and the two of them started to play a game of backgammon.

Before long, Han Tao-kuo showed up, and after the two of them had exchanged salutations, they all sat down together. Ying Po-ch'ieh and Hsieh Hsi-ta occupied the seats of honor, Hsi-men Ch'ing presided over the feast as host, and Han Tao-kuo sat down to one side.

Four plates and four bowls were immediately provided, and the table was spread with an assortment of delicacies in such profusion that they could not have been finished. In addition there were two large platters piled high with steamed corn flour pastries basted with rendered goose fat. Hsi-men Ch'ing took the jug of Chin-hua wine and ordered that Lai-an should open it in their presence and heat it in a brass warming pan, that Shu-t'ung should serve it to them, and that Hua-t'ung should be in charge of fetching additional condiments and dishes from the rear compound, as needed.

When the wine had been poured, Ying Po-ch'ieh instructed Shu-t'ung, saying, "Go back to your First Lady's quarters in the rear compound and ask, 'Why haven't any of the crabs been trotted out for Master Ying the Second to eat?' Go and say that I want a taste of the crabs."

"You silly dog!" expostulated Hsi-men Ch'ing, "There's not a crab to be had. To tell you the truth, His Honor Hsi Feng-hsiang, the supervisor of the State Farm Battalion, did send me two packages of crabs the other day, but by now the ladies of the household have eaten them all up. The few that are left over have already been pickled."

Turning to a page boy, he instructed him, saying, "Split up a few of the pickled crabs and bring them out for us."

"The ladies of the household are not at home today," he went on to explain. "They've gone to my Sister-in-law Wu's place for the third-day celebration of her son's marriage."

Before long, Hua-t'ung came out bearing two platters of pickled crabs, which Ying Po-ch'ieh and Hsieh Hsi-ta proceeded to polish off completely between them.

Noticing that Shu-t'ung was pouring the wine, Ying Po-ch'ieh said to him, "In his whole life, your Uncle Ying has never been able to abide drinking wine without a song to accompany it.²⁵ You boast of being able to sing southern-style songs, but I haven't heard any of them. Today, whatever happens, I won't drink this wine unless you sing one for me."

Shu-t'ung was about to clap his hands and start to sing, when Ying Po-ch'ieh said to him, "You could sing ten thousand that way, but it wouldn't amount to anything.

If you portray a dragon it must resemble a dragon;

If you portray a tiger it must resemble a tiger.²⁶

It won't do unless you step aside and put on your makeup and costume, like the actor who plays the female lead in a play."

Shu-t'ung remained where he was, merely looking to see what Hsi-men Ch'ing's reaction would be.

"You dog!" Hsi-men Ch'ing berated Ying Po-chüeh with a laugh. "All you ever do is give people a hard time."

Then, turning to Shu-t'ung, he said, "Since he's so insistent about it, I'll have Tai-an go out front and ask one of your sister servants for the loan of some clothes. You can come back after stepping aside somewhere to make yourself up for the part."

Tai-an first went to Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound and asked Ch'un-mei for the loan of some things for this purpose, but she refused. He then went to the master suite in the rear compound and approached Yü-hsiao, from whom he succeeded in borrowing four silver hairpins, an ornamental comb, a pin for the front of the coiffure in the shape of a Taoist goddess, a pair of imitation lapis lazuli pendant earrings in gold settings, a blouse of scarlet chiffon that opened down the middle, a green skirt of heavy silk brocade, a purple gold lame headband, and some rouge and powder, with which Shu-t'ung dressed up in the studio until he looked exactly like a woman, made up in the most alluring fashion.

So attired, he returned to the feast and proffered Ying Po-chüeh a cup of wine with both hands. Whereupon:

Commencing to sing in full voice,
he stood to one side and sang a song to the tune "Jade Lotus Blossoms":

Scattered red flowers bob on the water;²⁷
The plums on the branch tips are small.
For all this time my eyebrows have grown pale;
who is there to paint them?
It was the spring that brought this load of sorrow in its wake;
Now that spring has gone, why has my sorrow not dissipated?
Since our separation,
We are parted by distant mountains, distant waters.
Only on your account,
I have calculated the day of your return so often,
I have worn away the tip of my comb.²⁸

When Ying Po-chüeh heard this, he indulged in exaggerated compliments without end, saying, "For such a servitor as this, it's no wonder you see fit to provide him with a bowl of rice. Just listen to that throat of his; it's a veritable flute. People may praise the singing girls from the licensed quarter, but they stick to the same repertory. We've heard it all before. How can any of them sing as mellifluously as this? Brother:

Playing a Female Role Shu-t'ung Entertains Hangers-on

We are not flattering you to your face, but to have a person like this as your body servant cannot but be a source of gratification to you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this, and Ying Po-ch'ieh said, "Why do you laugh? What I'm saying is perfectly serious. You mustn't let this youngster down. With regard to everything, including his clothing, you should look on him with a favorable eye. It must have been difficult for Magistrate Li to relinquish him to you. It is an indication of his generous feelings toward you."

"It's just as you say," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Nowadays, when I'm not at home, every single requirement in connection with my studio, whether great or small, such as the acceptance of gift cards, the sealing of correspondence, the entertainment of guests, and so forth, is taken care of by him, along with my son-in-law. But my son-in-law also has to look after things in the shop."

When Ying Po-chüeh had drunk the proffered wine, he poured out another two cups and said to Shu-t'ung, "Have a little wine at my behest."

"I wouldn't presume," said Shu-t'ung. "I don't know how to drink."

"If you refuse to drink it," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you'll make me angry. I'm awarding it to you. What is there to be afraid of?"

Shu-t'ung's only response was to fix his eyes on Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Master Ying the Second is awarding it to you. Go ahead and drink it."

The page boy knelt down on one knee, languidly:

Bending low his powdered neck, and took a sip of wine from the cup, leaving half a cupful inside, and proffering it in turn to Ying Po-chüeh, who drank it off. Only then did he turn around and offer a cup of wine to Hsieh Hsi-ta, for whom he sang a second song to the same tune.

New lotus blossoms bend in the pond;
Sprinkled with pearly drops of rain.
The fragrant southern breeze disturbs even the billing swallows and cooing orioles.²⁹
Traces of tears transgress the boundaries of what remains of my makeup;³⁰
My waist has so wasted away it is reminiscent of Hsiao-man's.³¹
Since our separation,
I have suffered a thousand ills, ten thousand ills.³²
Only on your account,
I have longed so for the day of your return,
I have worn away the jade balustrade.³³

Hsieh Hsi-ta asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother, how old is this Book Boy of yours?"

"He has just turned fifteen this year," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsieh Hsi-ta then asked him, "How many southern-style songs do you know?"

"I don't know all that many songs," replied Shu-t'ung. "I can only do my best to entertain you gentlemen at your feast."

"What a prepossessing lad," exclaimed Hsieh Hsi-ta, offering him some wine in his turn.

Shu-t'ung then stepped down to wait on Han Tao-kuo, who protested, "His Honor deserves precedence. "How could I presume to take such a liberty with him?"

"Today you're a guest," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Whoever heard of such a thing?" said Han Tao-kuo. "Only after His Honor has been served will I consent to have any wine."

Shu-t'ung stepped over to offer wine to Hsi-men Ch'ing and then proceeded to sing a third song to the same tune.

Beside the eastern hedge chrysanthemums bloom;
By the gilded wellhead the phoenix trees fade.³⁴
In the southern bower, sad cries of frontier geese disturb the breast.
My spring feelings urge me to entrust news of the plum blossoms to a courier;³⁵
But when the migrating geese return, my lover does not return.
Since our separation,
News has miscarried, tidings have miscarried.
Only on your account,
I have so resented your failure to return,
I have stamped my embroidered shoe out of shape.³⁶

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished drinking, Shu-t'ung moved over in front of Han Tao-kuo, who was so flustered he hastily jumped up to receive the proffered wine.

"You'd better sit down," said Ying Po-chüeh, "so he can feel more comfortable singing."

Only then did Han Tao-kuo sit down, and Shu-t'ung proceeded to sing a fourth song to the same tune.

Filling the heavens the willow catkins fly;
Wings of bees and butterflies wildly cavort.
Atop the ridge the southern branch of the flowering plums has blossomed.

I should pluck a spray of plum blossoms and entrust it to the royal courier;
How many times have I paused in my needlework, only to utter long sighs?
Since our separation,
I have pined for you by day, pined for you by night.
Only on your account,
I have calculated the day of your return so often,
I have worn out the tips of my fingers.³⁷

Han Tao-kuo did not even wait for the song to be finished before he hastily took the cup of wine and:

Drained it in one gulp.

While they were drinking, what should they see but Tai-an, who came in and said, "Uncle Pen the Fourth has come and wants to speak to Father."

"Tell him to come in here and speak to me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long Pen the Fourth, wearing a black silk jacket, a sash with a single dangling tassel, and white-soled black boots, came forward and bowed to the company, after which he was given a seat to one side. Tai-an promptly provided him with a cup and a pair of chopsticks, and Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered him to go to the rear compound and fetch him a complement of food.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked him, "How's the work going on the improvements to our country estate?"

"The front tier of buildings has just been tiled," Pen the Fourth reported. "The foundations for the summerhouses behind them were laid just yesterday. But we still lack the building materials for the anterooms on either side and the living quarters in the rear. We will also need five hundred one-foot two-inch square bricks for the paving of the reception hall and the summerhouses. The old materials won't do. We also lack the large ornamental tiles for the coping on the corners of the wall. We have already used more than a hundred cartloads of dirt in order to lay the foundations and build up the artificial hill, and we will also need twenty taels worth of lime."

"The lime won't be any problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "At the yamen tomorrow I'll order the registered lime-burners to deliver it to you. The other day Eunuch Director Liu, the manager of the Imperial Brickyard, promised to let me have some bricks. If you make out a list of what you need and send it to him, along with a few taels of silver, he'll be pretty sure to comply as a partial return favor to me. All that we need now is the lumber."

"The other day," said Pen the Fourth, "you wanted me to go look the situation over at that country estate outside the gate. This morning I dropped by the graveyard to pick up Chang An, and we went to take a look at it. It turned out to be the estate of the distaff relatives of the imperial family named Hsiang. Hsiang the Elder has died, and his younger brother, Hsiang the Fifth, is prepared to sell off even the paved avenue leading to the tombs of his ancestors and the mausoleum. We would hardly want to demand anything like that. In discussing it with him, we agreed that it would suffice for our purposes to pull down the three reception halls, six antechambers, and a tier of auxiliary rooms. His asking price was five hundred taels, but if we come back to him with three hundred fifty taels in hand, we ought to be able to dismantle what we need. To say nothing of the timber and lumber, the bricks, the tiles, and the dirt alone are worth several hundred taels."

"I wondered who it was you were talking about," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "So it's the estate of Hsiang the Fifth. A suit has been brought against him for illegal appropriation of land, and it is being tried by the military intendant of the State Farms Circuit. He has already expended a lot of silver on the suit, and he is also maintaining Lo Ts'un-erh in the licensed quarter, so that, right now, he has managed to end up with no money on hand. If you want what he has to offer, give him three hundred taels of silver for it, and he'll have to settle. After all:

A cold hand can hardly hold onto a hot dumpling;

At whose altar is he to recite the Buddha's name?"

"Tomorrow," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Pen the Fourth, "take two large ingots of silver with you and, along with Chang An, go to negotiate with him. If he agrees to a selling price of three hundred taels of silver, you can proceed to demolish whatever you need."

"I understand," Pen the Fourth responded.

After some time, a bowl of soup and a platter of steamed pastries was brought out from the rear compound for Pen the Fourth to eat. Wine was poured, and he kept company with the others as they continued to drink. Shu-t'ung sang another song and then stepped into the background.

"There's not much fun in drinking wine this way," said Ying Po-ch'üeh. "It would be better if we had a dicebox so we could game at forfeits as we drink."

"Go to the Sixth Lady's quarters up front," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Tai-an, "and fetch a dicebox for us."

Before long, Tai-an brought a dicebox and put it down in front of Ying Po-ch'üeh, after which he slipped over to Hsi-men Ch'ing's side and, covering his mouth with his hand, whispered to him, "The baby in the Sixth Lady's room is crying. Ying-ch'un would like you to send someone to fetch the Sixth Lady."

"Put the wine flagon down," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and quickly go send a page boy to take a lantern and go after her."

"Where are those two page boys, anyway?" he went on to ask.

"Ch'in-t'ung and Ch'i-t'ung," said Tai-an, "have already gone off with two lanterns to meet her."

Ying Po-chüeh saw that there were six dice in the dicebox and, taking up one of them in his hand, said, "I'm going to cast a die, but first, each of you in turn must come up with a line associated with the name of a domino combination, and numbers appropriate to it. When the die is cast, if any of the numbers you have mentioned should match the number on the die, you will have to drink a large cup of wine yourself, as a forfeit, and the next player in line will have to sing a song, or, if he is unable to sing a song, tell a joke. If he is unable to do either of these things, he will definitely have to drink a large cup of wine as a forfeit."

"You crazy dog!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Why make it so complicated?"

"When the master of the revels chooses to fart," said Ying Po-chüeh, "it must be:

Respectfully received and respectfully acted upon.

You have no jurisdiction over me."

Then, turning to Lai-an, he said, "You pour a cup, first off, as a forfeit for your master. Only after that can we proceed with our game of forfeits."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and drank it off.

"Listen up, you all," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I'm going to start the game, and if I do anything wrong, I, too, will have to pay a forfeit."

Then he said:

"Young Chang has fallen down drunk in the western chamber.³⁸

How much wine has he consumed;

One large flagon, or

Two small flagons?"

Sure enough, the number that came up when he threw the die was a one spot. Hsi-men Ch'ing called for Shu-t'ung to rejoin them and pour the wine for Ying Po-chüeh's forfeit. Hsieh Hsi-ta, the next player in line, was slated to sing a song.

"I'll sing you a song to the tune 'Plucking the Cassia,' " said Hsieh Hsi-ta, and, clapping his hands to keep time, he sang:

How captivating is this alluring damsel, just sweet sixteen.

Her every feature is romantic;

In each particular she is hip.³⁹

Her brows suggest spring peaks;

Her eyes transmit autumn waters;⁴⁰

Her temples flaunt raven tresses.

In vain do I long for her;

Unable to rid my thoughts of her for a single hour or half a minute.⁴¹

Though next to each other;

We are as isolated as if relegated to the sea's rim or the sky's edge.⁴²

I'm getting thin on her account;

I'm getting sick on her account.

Whoever might help us to consummate our marriage affinity,

Would be a compassionate bodhisattva, relieving our distress.⁴³

Ying Po-chüeh drank his wine and then passed the dicebox to Hsieh Hsi-ta, whose turn it was to cast the die, after which it was Hsi-men Ch'ing's turn to sing.

Hsieh Hsi-ta picked up the die and said:

"Thanks be to Hung-niang⁴⁴ for helping him to bed.

What time is it?

The third night watch,

The fourth period thereof."

It so happened that:

Strange as it may seem,

the number that came up when he threw the die was a four spot.

"Hsieh Hsi-ta will have to drink four cups of wine," said Ying Po-chüeh.

"Spare me two cups," said Hsieh Hsi-ta. "I can't drink that much."

Shu-t'ung poured out two full cups of wine for him, and he drank off the first cup while waiting for Hsi-men Ch'ing to sing. While this was going on, he and Ying Po-chüeh between them had managed to finish off a whole saucerful of fresh water chestnuts.

"I can't sing," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "so I'll tell you a joke instead. A man went into a fruiterer's shop and asked if he had any torrey nuts for sale. The shopkeeper replied that he did and brought them out for his inspection, whereupon the customer began to put one after another into his mouth without stopping. At this, the shopkeeper demanded to know, 'If you're not going to buy them, why are you eating them so assiduously?' 'I'm eating them,' the man said, 'for their soothing effect on the lungs.' 'You may be eating them to soothe your lungs,' the shopkeeper replied, 'but it only gives me a case of heartburn.' "

Everyone laughed at this.

"Though it give you a case of heartburn," said Ying Po-chüeh, "bring on another saucer or two. I'm like:

The old matchmaker picking up horse droppings;

As fast as they drop I take them home to dry."

Hsieh Hsi-ta finished off his remaining cup of wine, after which it was the turn of the third player, Hsi-men Ch'ing, to cast the die.

He said:

"She left behind her gold hairpin to be a keepsake.

How much did it weigh?

Five or six,

Or seven mace."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then picked up the die, and the number that came up when he cast it was a five spot. Shu-t'ung poured out two and a half cups of wine for him.

"Brother has a great capacity," exclaimed Hsieh Hsi-ta. "It doesn't make sense that he, too, should get off with only two cups of wine. Brother, you really ought to drink four cups. Just take it that each of us is showing you his respects."

It was now the turn of Han Tao-kuo to sing, but he declined, saying, "I yield to Brother Pen the Fourth's seniority."

"I can't sing," said Pen the Fourth, "so I'll tell you a joke instead."

Hsi-men Ch'ing drank off two cups of wine, after which Pen the Fourth said, "A magistrate was interrogating a suspect in a case of illicit sexual intercourse and asked him, 'Initially, how did you go about violating her?' To which the man replied, 'Her head was facing east, and her feet were also facing east, when I did it.' 'Nonsense,' the magistrate responded. 'How could you do justice to the office with anybody in such a crooked position?' At which point a bystander came forward, knelt down, and said, 'Your Honor, as for that crooked position in the Office of Justice, if there are any openings in that body, I would be happy to fill them.' "⁴⁵

"A fine one you are, Brother Pen the Fourth!" exclaimed Ying Po-chüeh. "You know how to look out for yourself, don't you! After all, His Honor is not yet old. There might be something to be said for anything else, but you can hardly offer yourself as a replacement where his performance in the bedroom is concerned."

When Pen the Fourth heard these words, he was so startled that his face turned crimson with embarrassment.

"Uncle Two," he stammered, "what kind of talk is that! No such thought ever entered my head."

Ying Po-chüeh said, "You've given me the upper hand.

What kind of talk is that?

It's got a sandalwood haft."⁴⁶

Having relinquished the blade,

You've nothing but the sheath."

Pen the Fourth was too uncomfortable to remain where he was but also found it awkward to leave. He felt as though he were:

Sitting on a pincushion."⁴⁷

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon proceeded to finish off what remained of his four cups of wine, after which it was Pen the Fourth's turn to cast the die.

Just as he was about to pick up the die, whom should he see but Lai-an, who came in and said, "Uncle Pen the Fourth, there's someone outside looking for you. When I asked him what it was about, he said he was from the kiln."

Pen the Fourth could hardly wait for an excuse to absent himself, so as soon as he heard these words, he disappeared like:

A golden cicada molting its skin."⁴⁸

"Manager Han," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Now that he has gone, it is your turn to cast the die."

Picking up the die, Han Tao-kuo said, "I will comply with the rules.

The old lady took up a rod with which to chastise Hung-niang.

How many strokes did she give her?

Eight or nine,

Or ten strokes."

"It's my turn to sing," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but instead of singing, I, too, will tell you a joke."

Turning to Shu-t'ung, he said, "Fill up the cups all around the table, including your master's. Then prepare to listen to my joke. A Taoist priest, together with his disciple, were on their way to deliver a written invocation to the house of a donor. When they arrived at the donor's door, the disciple loosened his sash so that his gown hung straight down. When you wear it that way,' his master said, 'it looks as though you don't have any bottom at all.' 'If I didn't have a bottom, Master,' the disciple retorted, turning to face him, 'you wouldn't be able to stand it for a single day.' "

"You perverted dog!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"One can hardly expect ivory to emerge from the mouth of a dog."⁴⁹

We will say no more, for the moment, about how they continued to carouse.

To resume our story, before this Tai-an had gone to the front of the compound and set out with Hua-t'ung, taking a lantern with them, to fetch Li P'ing-erh home from the party at Wu Yüeh-niang's sister-in-law's place. When Li P'ing-erh heard that her child was crying back at home, she determined not to wait for the formal presentation of the gifts to the bride and groom, but left her complimentary gift behind, intending to take her leave and set out for home.

Her host, Wu K'ai's wife, and Wu the Second's wife were reluctant to let her go, saying, "Whatever you do, at least wait until the formal presentation of the gifts to the bride and groom."

"Sister-in-law," said Yüeh-niang, "you don't understand the situation. It would be better to let her go home. There isn't anyone there to take care of things, and the baby is really crying for her. The rest of us can stay a little longer without its making any difference."

Only then did Wu K'ai's wife consent to let Li P'ing-erh make her departure. Leaving Hua-t'ung behind, Tai-an took Ch'in-t'ung with him, and the two of them accompanied Li P'ing-erh's sedan chair back home before the rest of the party. Some time later, when the female guests were ready to depart after the formal presentation of the gifts, Yüeh-niang and the others set out for home in their four sedan chairs. They had only one lantern to light their way, and it was the twenty-fourth day of the eighth month, when the moon is dark.

"Where's the other lantern?" asked Yüeh-niang. "How come there's only one available?"

"We originally brought two with us," said Ch'i-t'ung, "but Tai-an demanded one of them and took Ch'in-t'ung with him to accompany the Sixth Lady home before the rest of the party."

To Yüeh-niang the issue was like a dormant account, not worth pursuing any further, but Chin-lien took it to heart and asked Ch'i-t'ung, "How many lanterns did you bring with you originally?"

"Ch'in-t'ung and I brought two lanterns with us when we came to get you," said Ch'i-t'ung, "but later, when Tai-an showed up with Hua-t'ung, he demanded the use of one of them, took Ch'in-t'ung with him in place of Hua-t'ung, and escorted the Sixth Lady home before the rest of you."

"Did that jailbird, Tai-an, not bring a lantern with him?" Chin-lien demanded to know.

"He and I brought another lantern with us when we came," reported Hua-t'ung.

"Since he already had one, that should have sufficed," said Chin-lien. "Why did he demand this other one of you?"

"That's just what I said to him," reported Ch'i-t'ung, "but he insisted on taking it anyway."

Chin-lien then addressed herself to Wu Yüeh-niang, saying, "Sister, just look at the way that sycophantic slave carries on. When we get home, I'll have something to say to him."

"Why bother?" said Yüeh-niang. "The baby was anxiously awaiting her at home, so he took an extra lantern to escort her back. What of it?"

"Sister," said Chin-lien, "that's not it at all. It doesn't make any difference to me. It's you, as the mistress, who ought not to be so lax in enforcing household discipline. On a bright night it might not matter, but when the moon is as dark as this, how can it be right for four sedan chairs to be lighted by a single lantern?"

As they were speaking, the sedan chairs arrived at the gate, and Yüeh-niang and Li Chiao-erh went back to the rear compound. Chin-lien and Meng Yü-lou got out of their sedan chairs together.

No sooner were they inside than Chin-lien demanded to know, "Where is Tai-an?"

"He's on duty in the rear compound," reported P'ing-an.

He had hardly finished speaking when Tai-an appeared.

Chin-lien gave him a piece of her mind, saying, "I hardly know what to do with you, you sycophantic jailbird! You'd better look out from now on. You may choose to dance attendance only on those who bask in temporary favor, but you'd better watch your step or you'll slip up. If you already had one lantern, that should have sufficed. Why should you have so far succumbed to delirium as to have insisted on usurping another one, as well as exchanging page boys? You appropriated two lanterns to escort her single sedan chair, while our four sedan chairs only rated a single lantern. Are the rest of us not also Father's wives?"

"Mother, you're doing me an injustice," protested Tai-an. "When Father learned that the baby was crying, he sent me to take a lantern, and go, as quickly as possible, to fetch the Sixth Lady home before the others. He was afraid the baby might cry himself into a serious state. Surely you don't think that if Father hadn't sent me, I'd have taken it upon myself to go and fetch her."

"That's enough out of you, you jailbird!" said Chin-lien. "He may have sent you to fetch her, but he didn't tell you to take all the lanterns for yourself. Brother, you're like:

The sparrow who only flies where the pickings are best.

Make no mistake about it. It's always wise to:

Add a stick of fuel to the cold stove,

As well as a stick of fuel to the hot."⁵⁰

It's not as though we are preordained to be out of favor forever."

"Mother, what are you saying!" protested Tai-an. "If any such thought ever entered my head, may I be thrown from my horse and fracture my breastbone."

"You deceitful jailbird!" ranted Chin-lien. "Don't you worry! From now on I'm going to rinse my eyes, the better to keep track of you."

While still continuing to speak, she and Meng Yü-lou headed back toward the rear compound together.

Tai-an, for his part, turned to his fellow servants and complained, "What a purely provoking business! Father sent me to go fetch her, and now, for no reason at all, I have to put up with such a tirade from the Fifth Lady."

When Yü-lou and Chin-lien got as far as the ceremonial gate, they ran into Lai-an and asked him, "Where is your father to be found?"

"Father, along with Master Ying the Second, Master Hsieh, and Uncle Han, is in the summerhouse drinking," replied Lai-an. "Shu-t'ung has dressed himself up as a singing girl and is singing for them. You ladies ought to go take a look."

Chin-lien took Yü-lou by the hand and said, "Let's go have a look."

When the two of them went up outside the summerhouse and looked through the latticework, what did they see? Ying Po-chüeh was sitting in the seat of honor, with his cap askew, so drunk that he appeared just like a puppet on its strings.⁵¹ Hsieh Hsi-ta was too drunk to keep his eyes open. Shu-t'ung in his disguise as a singing girl, was standing at their side, pouring the wine, and singing southern-style songs. Hsi-men Ch'ing had surreptitiously instructed Ch'in-t'ung to paint Ying Po-chüeh's face with powder, and surreptitiously slip a garland of straw over his head.

Chin-lien and Yü-lou, as they looked on from outside, couldn't help laughing uncontrollably, exclaiming, "The lousy jailbirds! When they die at some future date, they'll have nothing left to atone for, having already fully exposed their ugliness to view."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard the laughter outside, he sent a page boy out to ask who it was. Only then did the two of them continue on their way to the rear compound. By the time the party broke up, it was already the first watch. That night Hsi-men Ch'ing went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters to sleep.

When Chin-lien returned to her quarters, she asked Ch'un-mei, "When Li P'ing-erh got home today, did she have anything to say?"

"No, she didn't say anything," replied Ch'un-mei.

"Did that shameless good-for-nothing go into her room or not?" Chin-lien went on to ask.

"When the Sixth Lady came home," said Ch'un-mei, "Father paid a visit to her quarters; in fact, he went there twice."

"Was it actually on account of the baby's crying that he sent someone to fetch her home?" Chin-lien asked.

"In the afternoon the baby did start to cry unusually hard," said Ch'un-mei. "He cried when he was picked up and cried when he was put down. No one knew what to do."

"And where did that slave, Shu-t'ung, get the clothes he was dressed up in?" Chin-lien went on to ask.

"At first Tai-an came and tried to get some from me, but I sent him packing," said Ch'un-mei. "In the end he managed to borrow them from Yü-hsiao in the master suite. It was only after the situation with the baby had been reported to Father in the front compound that he sent the page boys after her."

"Well, if that's the way it was, I guess that's all there is to it," said Chin-lien. "I figured his sending someone to bring her home was just another case of that shameless good-for-nothing sorting people differentially into:

Three classes and nine categories."

"And if anyone should come after clothes again," Chin-lien continued, "see that you don't give any to that 'sweetie' of a slave to wear."

When she had finished speaking, realizing that Hsi-men Ch'ing was not going to come to her quarters that night, she closed the door in a huff and went to bed.

To resume our story, Ying Po-chüeh was already aware that Pen the Fourth was making money from being in charge of the work on Hsi-men Ch'ing's country estate, and now, on top of that, he heard that the next day he would be going with silver in hand to purchase the demolition rights to the buildings on the estate of that distaff relative of the imperial family, Hsiang the Fifth, from whom, at the very least, he was certain to get a kickback of some taels of silver. So when it happened in the course of the game of forfeits that Pen the Fourth was indiscreet enough to tell such a joke, Ying Po-chüeh took advantage of the occasion to take him to task and thereby give him something to think about.

Sure enough, Pen the Fourth had been frightened. So, the next day, he sealed up three taels of silver and went in person to Ying Po-chüeh's home to kowtow to him.

Affecting an air of innocence, Ying Po-chüeh said, "I haven't done all that much for you. What's all this about?"

"I have been lacking in courtesy with regard to you for some time," said Pen the Fourth. "I only hope that, early and late, you will continue to do what you can to uphold my interests where His Honor is concerned. My gratitude will know no bounds."

Ying Po-chüeh thereupon accepted the silver, entertained him with a cup of tea, and saw him out the door.

Taking the silver with him, he went into the interior of the house and said to his wife:

"If the old man is reluctant to be ruthless,

His old lady will lack even a cotton skirt.

I acted as both advocate and guarantor for that dog-bitten rascal Pen the Fourth, and now that he's gotten his hands on a good piece of business, he:

Hogs the contents of his own ricebowl, and has no further use for me. His Honor has put him in charge of the work at his country estate, and tomorrow he has commissioned him to take silver in hand and close a deal on the estate of Hsiang the Fifth. He's making money enough and to spare. Yesterday at our drinking party I took him to task for something he said, and he panicked. There was no reason to fear that he wouldn't come seek me out today and present me with these three taels of silver. I'll use them to buy a few bolts of cloth, which should suffice to make winter clothing for our children."

Truly:

He whose hatred is petty is no gentleman;

He who lacks ruthlessness is not a hero.⁵²

One merely resents that his idle sorrows are such an annoyance;

Before discovering that the foolish fare better than the clever.⁵³

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 36

CHAI CH'IENT SENDS A LETTER ASKING FOR A YOUNG GIRL; HSI-MEN CH'ING PATRONIZES PRINCIPAL GRADUATE TS'AI

From Fu-ch'uan gazing into the distance west of Chien-chiang;¹
I see only a solitary cloud formation blocking the sunset.
The tears that I am wont to shed, are lost amid the misty trees;
There is no way to transmit a letter,
geese and fish are scarce.
My wish to enquire after you is impeded
by three thousand li;
Separated as we are, I only long in vain
all twenty-four hours.
Broad as the sea and high as Heaven² are my thoughts of you;
On whom can I rely to let you know the date of my return?

THE STORY GOES that the next day Hsi-men Ch'ing and Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling went out to the suburbs to welcome the new regional investigating censor. He also took the occasion to visit his country estate and reward the construction workers for their services.

That evening, when he arrived home, he had no sooner come in the gate than P'ing-an reported, "Today a courier on his way from Tung-ch'ang prefecture to deliver documents to the capital stopped by to drop off a letter. He said that it was a letter addressed to you from His Honor Chai Ch'ien of the grand preceptor's household. I accepted it and had it taken back to the First Lady's quarters. The messenger will return for an answer tomorrow afternoon."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he went back to the master suite, opened the letter, and proceeded to peruse it. What did it have to say?

Respectfully indited by his devoted servant in the capital, Chai Ch'ien, for the perusal of the newly promoted officer of the Embroidered Uniform Guard His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing:

I have long admired your lofty eminence without having had the opportunity to meet you in person. As the repeated recipient of your lavish kindness, my sense of indebtedness knows no bounds. The instructions which you formerly transmitted to me are imprinted in my heart. In all things I will do everything in my power to uphold your interests where His Honor is concerned.

As for that trifling matter that I made bold to trouble you with by means of your esteemed servant, I imagine that you have already taken care of it for me. At present, taking advantage of a convenient messenger, I present you with my card and ten taels of silver as an inadequate expression of my esteem, as well as my concern for your well-being. I respectfully hope that you will see fit to vouchsafe me a reply, for which:

My gratitude will be impossible to contain.³

In addition, the new principal graduate Ts'ai, who is His Honor's adopted son, has received an imperial dispensation to return to his native place in order to visit his parents. His route will take him by your honorable place of abode, and I hope that you may be able to entertain him for a meal, a favor that he likewise will never dare to forget. Such is my earnest supplication.

Indited one day after the solar term Autumn Begins.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished reading the letter, he sighed incessantly, saying, "Quickly, send a page boy to summon a matchmaker. What have I been doing to completely forget such a thing as this and allow it to slip out of my mind?"

"What is it?" asked Wu Yüeh-niang. "Tell me about it."

"Chai Ch'ien," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "the majordomo of His Honor the grand preceptor's household in the Eastern Capital, sent me a letter some time ago saying that he was without a son, and asking me if I could seek out a young girl hereabouts, no matter whether she be rich or poor, cost being no object, since all he cares about is that she be healthy. He wants her for the purpose of procreation. He said that no matter what the dowry and bride price might be, I should simply send him an itemized account, and he would promptly remit the silver. He promised that in the future he would do everything in his power to uphold my interests where His Honor is concerned with regard to my official career. I've been so busy for some time, what with assuming office and:

Seven of this and eight of that,⁴ that I completely forgot about it and allowed it to slip out of my mind. Lai-pao, also, has been going to the shop every day and has failed to remind me.

Chai Ch'ien Sends a Letter Asking for a Young Girl

"Today, far away as he is, he has sent someone to deliver a letter asking how the nuptial arrangements are going, and also enclosing ten taels of silver in lieu of a congratulatory present. Tomorrow, when the courier comes for his answer, how am I to reply? He'll be as annoyed as can be.

"When the matchmaker comes, tell her, for better or for worse, to seek out such a person for him as fast as possible. He doesn't care whether the status of the family is high or low, as long as the girl is healthy. A fourteen-or fifteen-year-old, or even a sixteen-or seventeen-year-old, would do. Whatever the bride price may be, I will take care of it. Or, better yet, we could take Hsiu-ch'un from Li P'ing-erh's quarters-she's not bad looking-and give her to him."

"I must say," exclaimed Yüeh-niang, "Are your legs on fire, you good-for-nothing? What have you been doing with yourself the last two or three months? When someone makes such a request of you, you ought to look for a genuine virgin on his behalf if you expect him to be grateful. As for that maidservant, you've already had your way with her, so how could it be appropriate to send her? If you take his request seriously, he'll exert his efforts on your behalf in the future. Right now you're trying to:

Sculpt a Buddhist effigy on the one hand,
While burning incense to it on the other.
Into such turbulent water you can hardly hope to insert an oar.

It's not like setting out to purchase something, when you can simply take your silver to the marketplace and buy it. Even young girls brought up in the women's quarters are not all the same. You've got to give the matchmaker time to deliberately make her rounds and size up the possibilities. You talk about it as nonchalantly as though it were an easy matter."

"Tomorrow, when he comes for an answer," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what am I to tell him?"

"It's a wonder that someone like you, who is accustomed to adjudicating matters, should be at a loss to handle someone in a matter of this kind," said Yüeh-niang. "When that man comes tomorrow, give him a generous tip, and send him off with a written reply. All you need to say is that you've found a girl for him, but that her trousseau and dowry have not been entirely taken care of yet, and that you'll send someone from here to escort her on her way as soon as the preparations are complete. In the meantime, it won't be too late for you to delegate someone here to look for a suitable prospect. Thereby, you will:

Accomplish two objectives with a single act,⁵ bring about a favorable outcome, and feel that you have complied appropriately with his request."

"You've got a point there," Hsi-men Ch'ing said with a smile.

He then proceeded to send for Ch'en Ching-chi and instructed him to write the reply overnight.

The next day, when the courier arrived, Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to interview him in person and asked, "When will the principal graduate Ts'ai's boat get here, so that I can prepare to receive him?"

"When I left," the man said, "His Honor Ts'ai had just taken leave of the court and was preparing to start out from the capital. Majordomo Chai said that he feared His Honor Ts'ai might be temporarily short of funds for the trip home, and that he hoped you might be good enough to lend him something, for which he would undertake to reimburse you if you wrote him the amount required."

"Tell His Honor Chai," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that no matter what he might need, I will:

Not fail to comply with his orders."

Having finished speaking, he directed Ch'en Ching-chi to usher him into an antechamber and entertain him with food and wine. When he was ready to leave, he turned the reply over to him and gave him five taels for his traveling expenses. The courier bowed in thanks, went happily out the gate, and set out on his long journey. Truly:

When thoughts are pressing one wants to wave
the flying squirrel flag;
When the mind is eager one beats to tatters
the purple flowered whip.⁶

Gentle reader take note: Originally An Ch'en⁷ had been placed at the head of the list in the chin-shih examinations, but the censors had argued that because he was the younger brother of An Tun,⁸ the grand councilor of a previous reign whose name had been proscribed, he could not be designated the first scholar of the realm. Emperor Hui-tsung thus had no alternative but to elevate Ts'ai Yün⁹ to the number one position in his stead. Having been designated the principal graduate, he had offered himself as a protégé to Ts'ai Ching and been accepted as his adopted son. He had thereupon been appointed to a position as proofreader in the Palace Library and granted permission to return home in order to visit his parents.

To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang despatched page boys from the household to summon Old Mother Feng, Auntie Hsüeh, and other matchmakers, whom she directed to enquire everywhere for any family that had a healthy young daughter, so they could obtain a card with her vital statistics and discuss the match. But no more of this.

One day Hsi-men Ch'ing despatched Lai-pao to the port on the New Canal to wait for the arrival of Principal Graduate Ts'ai's boat. It so happens that he was traveling on the same boat with his fellow chin-shih graduate An Ch'en. This metropolitan graduate An Ch'en, because his family was too poor, had been unable to find a second wife. He had:

Lost out on the east, and Fallen short on the west, as a consequence of which, he, too, had taken leave of the court and was on his way home to seek a second wife. For this reason the two of them were traveling on the same boat.

When they arrived at the port on the New Canal, Lai-pao went aboard with Hsi-men Ch'ing's calling card and presented them with a gift for the road consisting of wine, noodles, chicken and goose delicacies, salt, soy sauce, and the like.

On top of all this, while Ts'ai Yün was still in the Eastern Capital, Chai Ch'ien had already said to him, "In Ch'ing-ho district there is a certain Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing who is also one of His Honor's protégés. He presides over a prominent family and is one of those who is:

Wealthy yet observant of the rites.¹⁰

As a result of His Honor's patronage, he currently holds a post as a judicial commissioner. When you arrive there, he is certain to entertain you lavishly."

Since this information was already:

Firmly fixed in his mind,

When Ts'ai Yün saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had sent his servant some distance to welcome him, and that he had also provided such a generous present, he was completely delighted.

The next day, when they arrived at Ch'ing-ho, he and his fellow metropolitan graduate, An Ch'en, went into the town to call upon Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, had already engaged a cook to prepare a feast on his premises. Because he had attended a party in the yamen of District Magistrate Li Ta-t'ien, where he had been impressed by the singing of a troupe of Su-chou actors, he had asked Shu-t'ung about them and been told that they were staying at Mo-tzu Ying-erh outside the South Gate. He had consequently engaged the services of four of them for the occasion.

Principal Graduate Ts'ai Yün that day had wrapped up and sealed a chiffon kerchief, a book, and a pair of shoes with cloud patterned toes, while Metropolitan Graduate An Ch'en had also prepared the customary book and kerchief, four bags of tender leaf tea, and four Hang-chou fans as presentation gifts. Both of them wore their official robes and black silk hats as they sent in their calling cards. Hsi-men Ch'ing, in formal attire, came out and ushered them into the reception hall, where they went through the social amenities and exchanged bows of salutation. Only after a servant had presented their gifts did they consent to sit down in the positions appropriate for guests and host.

Principal Graduate Ts'ai Yün initiated the proceedings by raising his hand, inclining his body in his host's direction, and saying, "Worthy Sir, Chai Ch'ien in the capital was loud in your praise as the:

Distinguished scion of a prominent house,¹¹

one of the great lineages of Ch'ing-ho. We have long admired your virtue and reputation without having the opportunity to make your acquaintance. Now that we have been enabled to pay our respects beneath your hall, we are fortunate indeed."

"You do me too much honor," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The other day I received a letter from Chai Ch'ien stating that the equipages of you two venerable gentlemen might condescend to come my way. I should certainly have gone forth to welcome you had I not been prevented from doing so by my official responsibilities. I hope that you will be magnanimous enough to forgive me."

"Might I enquire as to the native places and courtesy names of you two gentlemen?" he went on to ask.

"Your pupil is named Ts'ai Yün," replied Principal Graduate Ts'ai. "Though I currently reside in K'uang-lu, my native place is Ch'u-chou. My courtesy name is I-ch'üan, or One Spring. I have been lucky enough to be designated principal graduate and have received an appointment as proofreader in the Palace Library. I have been given an imperial dispensation granting me permission to return home and visit my parents. Not having anticipated Chai Ch'ien's praise of your surpassing virtue, I fear I have been tardy in paying my respects."

"Your pupil is a native of Ch'ien-t'ang district in Chekiang," said Metropolitan Graduate An, "and my courtesy name is Feng-shan. I currently hold a position as observer in the Ministry of Works and have also been granted permission to return home in order to seek a second wife. May I make bold to enquire, Worthy Sir, as to your distinguished courtesy name?"

"I am but a low-ranking official occupying a military office," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "How could I presume to affect a courtesy name?"

Only after being pressed repeatedly did he say, "My courtesy name is Ssu-ch'üan, or Four Springs. Thanks to repeated acts of patronage on the part of His Honor Ts'ai Ching, and the support of Chai Ch'ien, I have been granted the rank of battalion commander in the Embroidered Uniform Guard and occupy a post as a judicial commissioner, for which, if the truth must be known, I am hardly qualified."

"Worthy Sir," responded Principal Graduate Ts'ai, "you are:

A man of no ordinary ambition.¹²

Your reputation for elegance is well-known. There is no need to be so self-effacing."

When they had finished with the social amenities, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited his guests to visit the summerhouse in his garden so they could loosen their formal clothing and relax, but Principal Graduate Ts'ai declined, saying, "My desire to return home is pressing, my boat is moored by the shore, and I feel compelled to be on my way. But having had the pleasure of contemplating your distinguished countenance, I do not wish to depart precipitously. What is to be done? What is to be done?"

"If you two gentlemen will condescend not to reject my snail-like abode," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I humbly beseech you to plant your literary banners here for the nonce, that I may detain you for the space of a meal, and thereby gratify my desire to offer you a meager entertainment."

"Since that is your gracious desire," responded Principal Graduate Ts'ai, "your pupils will comply with your command."

Thereupon, divesting themselves of their formal robes, the two of them sat down, while the attendants served another round of tea. Ts'ai Yün took advantage of the occasion to visually survey Hsi-men Ch'ing's premises.

Noting that the garden pools and decorated pavilions, the secluded luxuriance of the flowers and trees:

Stretched before them as far as the eye could see,

he was delighted by the prospect and:

Expressing the most fulsome admiration, remarked hyperbolically, "Truly, a vista to rival the Isles of the Blest."

Thereupon, a table with an inlaid chessboard on its surface was set before them, and they commenced a game.

"I happen to have a couple of actors in attendance today," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to enhance the pleasures of the feast."

"Where are they?" asked Metropolitan Graduate An. "Why not tell them to come in so we can have a look at them?"

In no time at all, the four actors knelt down and kowtowed to them.

"Which two play the leading male and female roles?" asked Principal Graduate Ts'ai. "And what are their names?"

Thereupon, a member of the troupe came forward, and said, "I play the leading male roles, and my name is Kou Tzu-hsiao. That one over there plays the leading female roles, and he is called Chou Shun. This one, who plays subsidiary female roles, is called Yüan Yen. And that one, who plays young male lead roles, is called Hu Ts'ao."

"Where are you actors from?" asked Metropolitan Graduate An.

"We are all natives of Su-chou," replied Kou Tzu-hsiao.

"Make yourselves up and come perform something for us," said Metropolitan Graduate An.

When the four actors retired to put on their makeup, Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that female clothing, hairpins, and combs should be fetched from the rear compound and told Shu-t'ung to get dressed up with the rest. As a result, there were three actors playing female roles, and two playing males. The first piece they played was from the southern-style ch'uan-ch'i drama entitled Hsiang-nang chi (The scent bag).

Two place settings were provided for Principal Graduate Ts'ai and Metropolitan Graduate An at the upper end of the reception hall, while Hsi-men Ch'ing occupied the position of host below in order to keep them company. As they continued their drinking, the actors performed a scene from the play and then came over to join them.

Shu-t'ung's performance in a junior female role caught the eye of Metropolitan Graduate An, who asked, "And where does this actor come from?"

"This is my paltry servant, Shu-t'ung," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Calling him over, Metropolitan Graduate An rewarded him with a drink of wine, saying, "This youngster is absolutely marvelous. He could not be improved upon."

Principal Graduate Ts'ai also called the other performers over and rewarded them with wine, saying, "How about singing that song to the tune 'New Year's Audience' that begins with the words:

Beside the flowers, beside the willows."

Kou Tzu-hsiao responded by standing to one side, clapping his hands to keep time, and singing:

Beside the flowers, beside the willows,
Beyond the eaves threads of gossamer curl.
Before the mountains, before the waters,
On horseback the eastern breeze is soft.
I sigh that the course of my journey,
Is like that of tumbling tumbleweed.
Though I gaze longingly toward my native place,
The geese are distant, the fish are submerged.¹³
The sorrow of separation fills my breast, but who is there to transmit it?
Like the day lily, my mother's days are short.
My dreaming soul is drawn to her in vain.
Chorus:
Lo-yang is far away,
When will I ever ascend to the golden halls of the nine-gated palace?¹⁴

When he had finished singing the first song, he went on to sing the next song in the suite, to the same tune as before:

Ten years have I toiled at blue lamp and yellow scrolls,¹⁵
Applying myself by firefly light at study window.¹⁶
At snow-lit desk I have expended studious effort,¹⁷
Hoping to shed honor on my family,
And bring added luster to my name.
I will enter the lists in the literary tournament.
Having mastered the three thousand rules of deportment,¹⁸
The five hundred successful heroes will contend for their standings in the rank.
Quickly apply Tsu T'i's whip,¹⁹
The sooner to earn an audience with the emperor.
Chorus:
Lo-yang is far away,
When will I ever ascend to the golden halls of the nine-gated palace?²⁰

Metropolitan Graduate An addressed himself to Kou Tzu-hsiao, saying, "Do you know the song from the play Yü-huan chi (The story of the jade ring), which begins with the words:

Your kindness and virtue are without bounds?"

"That's a song to the tune 'Prelude to Painted Eyebrows,' " replied Kou Tzu-hsiao. "I do know it."

Your kindness and virtue are without bounds.
My feelings at meeting my new parents are not shallow.
I am fortunate to be able to entrust my life to you,
Who have also granted me your daughter in marriage.
This meeting of wind and cloud²¹ will enable me to take flight on some future day;
This mating of male and female phoenix will lead to inseparable harmony here and now.
Chorus:
Clearly they are not husband and wife
for this life alone,
In a former life jade was planted in Indigo Field.²²

Shu-t'ung poured a round of drinks and then, clapping his hands to keep time, proceeded to sing the next song in the suite, to the same tune as before:

My tender body has just come of age.
The profoundness of my parents' kindness²³ is as vast as the heavens.
Blushing at my inability to repay them,
This heart of mine is entangled.
For this mating of the mandarin ducks
I am bathed in their kindness.
Serving my husband with dustpan and broom,
I look forward to his success.
Chorus:
Clearly they are not husband and wife
for this life alone,
In a former life jade was planted in Indigo Field.²⁴

It so happens that Metropolitan Graduate An Ch'en, as a native of Hang-chou, was enamored of the "southern breeze."²⁵ When he saw how well Shu-t'ung could sing, he pulled him over by the hand and the two of them passed the same cup of wine back and forth between them as they drank.

After some time, the wine ran out, and Hsi-men Ch'ing escorted them on a tour of the garden, after which they returned to the summerhouse and played a game of chess. He ordered a page boy to fetch two partitioned tabletop boxes containing thirty varieties of delicacies, fresh things in season, and so forth, for them to enjoy with their wine.

"Your pupils have just met you for the first time," said Principal Graduate Ts'ai Yün. "We really ought not to be the cause of any further inconvenience in your secluded mansion. It is growing late, and we had better bid you farewell."

"Whoever heard of such a thing?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Are you two gentlemen, when you depart, planning to return to your boat?" he went on to ask.

"We have arranged to avail ourselves of temporary quarters in the Buddhist Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate," replied Principal Graduate Ts'ai.

"Right now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "even if you are only going outside the gate, it's rather late. The best thing to do would be to keep a couple of your retainers here to wait on you, and send the rest back there, with instructions to return and fetch you in the morning. That way we could both have the opportunity to fully express our feelings."

"Although it is an indication of your love of hospitality, Worthy Sir," said Principal Graduate Ts'ai, "how can we avoid putting you to inordinate inconvenience?"

Thereupon the two of them directed all of their retainers, on the one hand, to return to the Buddhist temple outside the gate to spend the night, and, on the other, to bring horses to fetch them early the next morning. The crowd of retainers assented and took their leave. But no more of this.

The two of them played two games of chess in the summerhouse. The actors performed another two scenes from the play for their entertainment, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing, fearing that it was getting late, paid them for their services and sent them on their way. He only retained Shu-t'ung to pour the wine and wait on them at the feast. Gradually, as they continued drinking, it became time to light the lamps, and the two of them went outside to adjust their toilets.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Patronizes Principal Graduate Ts'ai

Drawing Hsi-men Ch'ing aside with his hand, Principal Graduate Ts'ai said to him, "Your pupil, on this return home to visit his parents, is somewhat short of traveling expenses."

"Venerable Sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "there is no need for you to remind me. You can be sure that I will faithfully comply with Chai Ch'ien's esteemed behest."

After some time, he ushered his two guests back into the flower garden, saying, "There is another cozy little structure I would like you to see."

Showing the way to the two of them, he skirted the juniper hedge until he came to the "snow cave" in that secluded nook, the Hidden Spring Grotto. The interior was brightly illuminated with lamps and candles, and on a low zither stand there had already been laid out a lavish spread of delicacies and wine.

The couches and beds were precisely right;
Zither and books were elegantly displayed.

The drinking party was resumed, and Shu-t'ung was there to entertain them with his singing.

"Do you happen to know the song that begins with the words:

Red has entered into the palace peaches?"

asked Principal Graduate Ts'ai.

"That's a song to the tune "Moon over the Brocaded Hall," said Shu-t'ung. "I know it."

"Since you do know it," said Principal Graduate Ts'ai, "sing it for us."

Thereupon, after pouring another round of wine, Shu-t'ung, adopting a southern style of delivery, clapped his hands to keep time and sang:

Red has entered into the palace peaches,
Green has returned to the royal willows.
Orioles sing in the imperial park during early spring.
Blinds are rolled up to admit the eastern breeze,²⁶
In silken garments the morning chill is still sharp.
Blessed that an immortal maiden has seen fit to give a letter to the blue bird;²⁷
I recall the kindness of my solicitous mother, in emulation of the black crow.²⁸

Chorus:

The prospect is beautiful.

I only wish our human situation were an eternal spring;

So we could prolong our revels on the Isles of the Blest.²⁹

When Metropolitan Graduate An heard this performance, he was:

Unable to contain his delight,³⁰ and, remarking to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "This youngster is deserving of respect," he raised his cup of wine and drank it off at one gulp.

Shu-t'ung, attired in:

Turquoise sleeves and red skirt, and adorned with a gold lamé headband:

Lifting high a jade goblet,

offered up the wine and sang, to the same tune as before:

Hard to repay, our mother's exertions,
Her maternal kindness is without limit.
May she live as long as Red Pine and Wang-tzu Ch'iao.³¹
To wait upon her morning and evening,
Among my kin, there is my elder brother's wife.
In the spring breeze, the flowers of the cherry trees³² share their fragrance;
In the evening of the year, the pine and the cypress maintain their integrity.

Chorus:

The prospect is beautiful.

I only wish our human situation were an eternal spring.

So we could prolong our revels on the Isles of the Blest.³³

That evening they continued drinking until the middle of the night before retiring to rest. In both the Hidden Spring Grotto and the Kingfisher Pavilion, Hsi-men Ch'ing had provided beds and curtains and supplied quilts and mattresses of satin and brocade. After having deputed the two page boys, Shu-t'ung and Tai-an, to wait upon his guests, Hsi-men Ch'ing bade them good night and returned to the rear compound.

The next day, the attendants of Principal Graduate Ts'ai and Metropolitan Graduate An came to fetch them with bearers, sedan chairs, and horses. Hsi-men Ch'ing had a repast prepared for his guests in the reception hall and provided platters of assorted snacks, wine, and rice for their servitors. He had the two page boys bring forth his parting gifts in square boxes. For Principal Graduate Ts'ai there were a piece of satin brocade, two pieces of spun silk fabric for collar facings, five hundred pellets of storax, and a hundred taels of silver. For Metropolitan Graduate An there were a piece of variegated satin, one piece of spun silk fabric for collar facings, three hundred pellets of storax, and thirty taels of silver.

Principal Graduate Ts'ai repeatedly refused to accept the proffered gift, saying, "A loan of merely thirty taels would be sufficient. What need is there for such prodigality, and with your generous gifts to boot?"

"It is fitting that my fellow graduate should accept," said Metropolitan Graduate An, "but it would hardly be appropriate for me to do so."

"It is but a paltry gift," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "no more than an expression of my feelings on this occasion, Venerable Sir, of your triumphant return home in order to remarry. It is my humble hope that it may serve to alleviate the cost of a cup of tea."

Thereupon, the two of them both got up from their places to express their thanks, saying:

"These sentiments, this kindness,

When will they ever be forgotten?"³⁴

After which, instructing their retainers to accept the gifts and put them away in their felt bags, they took their leave of Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Once your pupils have departed, we will be:

At opposite ends of the world."³⁵

Temporarily absenting ourselves from your instruction, on our return to the capital at some future date:

Should we advance but an inch in our careers,³⁶

we will naturally feel obliged to repay your generosity."

"Though we must part today," said Metropolitan Graduate An, "I trust that on some future occasion we will have the opportunity to reciprocate by receiving your distinguished countenance."

"Though you have condescended to visit your pupil's snail-like abode," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I fear you have experienced but too shabby a reception. I hope that you will be considerate enough to overlook it. I really ought to see you off for some distance were it not for the responsibilities of my office. I must therefore bid you a premature farewell."

Accompanying his two visitors as far as the gate, he watched as they mounted their horses and departed. Truly:

Having won the right of "returning to one's home in brocade robes";³⁷

Such success alone "enables one to believe that he is a real man."³⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 37

OLD MOTHER FENG URGES THE MARRIAGE OF HAN AI-CHIEH; HSI-MEN CH'ING ESPOUSES WANG LIU-ERH AS A MISTRESS

Time passes languidly aboard the light vessels on the waterways of Wu;
Parting cups were refilled and you indulgently supported my unsteady gait.
On the blue sea you may be assailed by sorrow as light flickers lambently;
Among scattered peaks I can hardly object to the colors of divergent shades.
As you are propelled forward by your orchid oars
how full are your feelings;
While I am reduced to leaning on the balustrade as the sun sets in the west.
Amid misty waves, so near and yet so far, how vast is the distance between us;
There is no need for you to harbor in your breast a sense of redoubled sadness.

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing saw off Principal Graduate Ts'ai and Metropolitan Graduate An as they made their departure.

One day, as he was riding on horseback, wearing his eye shades and preceded by an escort who shouted to clear the way, he ran into Old Mother Feng.

He sent a page boy to call her to a halt and question her, saying, "Father says to ask you how things are going with that girl you were commissioned to look for. Why haven't you come to the house to report on it?"

The old woman promptly stepped up to him and said, "These last few days, although I've looked over a number of prospects, all of them were the daughters of butchers or carriers, about whom it would not have been appropriate to report back to you. Who could have anticipated that:

As providence would have it, there has been a girl from a suitable family right before my eyes all along, that I simply failed to remember. She's as talented as she can be and was born in the year of the horse, so next year she'll be just fourteen years old. If I hadn't passed by her place yesterday and been invited in for a cup of tea by her mother, who was standing at the door, I wouldn't have had the chance to see her. It hasn't been more than a few days since she's started to put up her hair in a cloud-shaped chignon. Her posture is as straight as the handle of a writing brush. She has two tiny bound feet. Her face is heavily made up, and she's got a little bit of a mouth. In fact, she's as captivating as an elf.

"Her mother says that she was born on the Dragon Boat Festival on the fifth day of the fifth month, and her informal name is Ai-chieh, or Love. Quite aside from the fact that she appears to be lovable to us womenfolk, if you were to set eyes on her yourself, sir, you'd fall in love with her to I know not what extent."

"What a crazy old crone you are!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What would I want with her for no good reason? I've got more than enough of that sort of thing at home as it is. The truth of the matter is that Master Chai Ch'ien, the majordomo of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital, is looking for a concubine, with a view to procreation, and asked me to see if I could find one for him. If you can come up with a prospect that satisfies him, it will certainly redound to your benefit."

"Who's daughter is it?" he went on to ask. "See if you can get a card from them with the year, month, day, and hour of her birth, and bring it to me to look at."

"Who's family does she belong to?" said Old Mother Feng. "I'll tell you all about it, sir.

Distant, it is not a thousand li;

Close, it is but a stone's throw.¹

It's not as though she were anyone else. She's the daughter of Han Tao-kuo, the manager of your silk goods shop. If you want to take a look at her, just wait until I've had a word with her old man, obtained the card with her vital statistics, and settled on a day, and you can go see for yourself."

"If you can manage it thus and so," Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed her, "go ahead and speak to him about it, and, if he agrees, get the card with her vital statistics, and come back to my place to report on the situation."

The old woman assented to this and went her way.

Two days later, when Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting in the front reception room, he suddenly caught sight of Old Mother Feng, who had come back to report to him. She handed him the card with the girl's vital statistics, which read, "The young woman, née Han, is fourteen years old and was born on the fifth day of the fifth month, at midnight."

"I told her old man what you had said to me," she reported, "and he replied that if Your Honor should see fit to show her such favor, it would also be his daughter's good fortune. The only problem is that his household is poor, so they don't have the wherewithal to handle the necessary expenses."

"Tell him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that it won't cost him so much as a thread in the way of expenditure. Everything required in the way of clothing, jewelry, trousseau, furniture, etc., will be taken care of by me, and I'll even provide him with twenty taels of silver in the way of a bride price on behalf of the groom. Tell him that if his household takes care of no more than her shoes and footbindings, that will suffice. When the time comes, I'll also arrange to have her old man escort her to the Eastern Capital."

"Her status will not be comparable to that of an ordinary concubine. Majordomo Chai is seeking a mate with a view to procreation and may well treat her like a wife. If his daughter should be fortunate enough to bear him so much as:

A single boy or half a girl,² there is no reason to doubt that she would end up enjoying great wealth and distinction."

"They would like to know," asked Old Mother Feng, "when you will pay them a visit in order to have a look at her, so they can prepare themselves accordingly."

"As long as they are agreeable," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll just go over there tomorrow and take a look at her. He's been sending me one letter after another, he's so anxious about it. Tell them not to make any special preparations for me. I'll just drink a cup of clear tea and be on my way."

"Your Honor," said Old Mother Feng, "you're:

Waxing supercilious before you enter the door.

Though what they provide may not amount to anything special, you ought to stay and sit for a while. Since it's your own employee's home, you can hardly expect them to skimp if you pay them a visit."

"You've got it all wrong," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What you don't understand is that I've got other things to do."

"If that's the way it's to be," said Old Mother Feng, "I'll go tell them about it."

She then betook herself to Han Tao-kuo's house and told his wife, Wang Liu-erh, word for word, everything that had been arranged, saying, "His Honor, back at his residence, took a look at the card with your daughter's vital statistics and was as pleased as could be. He says that it won't cost you so much as a thread in the way of expenditure. Everything required in the way of dowry and trousseau will be taken care of at his place, and he'll even provide you with twenty taels of silver in the way of a bride price on behalf of the groom. All you'll need to do is to make sure that your daughter is supplied with the customary handmade shoes and footbindings for the occasion. When the day arrives, he'll even arrange for your husband to escort her to her new home. And if, by any chance, your daughter should become pregnant in:

Old Mother Feng Urges the Marriage of Han Ai-chieh

A year or half a year,³ it will be a piece of good luck for your entire family, and there is no reason to doubt that you will end up enjoying great wealth and distinction.

"Tomorrow, when his stint at the yamen is over, he'll pay you a visit in order to take a look at her. He says that you shouldn't make any special preparations for him, or expect him to stay for long; that he'll just drink a cup of tea, have a look at her, and be on his way."

"Really, Mother," said Wang Liu-erh. "You wouldn't tell me a story, would you?"

"Surely you don't mean to suggest that, if your employer had not spoken thus, I would come and try to put one over on you. It's not as though he's got nothing else to do. At his place:

People come and people go,
Altogether without ceasing."

When the woman heard these words, she got together some wine and food for the old lady and then sent her on her way with the injunction, "Come and help me out first thing tomorrow."

That evening, when Han Tao-kuo got home, the woman settled the arrangements for the morrow with him. In the morning, he got up early and went to Kao-ching, or High Well,⁴ to order a carrier-load of sweet water, and he also bought some premium-grade nuts, which he left off at home before setting out for the shop to conduct his business.

He left his wife at home:

Alluringly dressed and heavily made up, decked out in such a way as to make a spectacle of herself. She took the trouble to:

Wash her hands and trim her nails, before wiping clean the cups and goblets, shelling the nuts, and brewing some good tea, as she awaited the advent of Hsi-men Ch'ing. Old Mother Feng had already showed up to make sure everything was ready for her visitor.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing was through with his duties at the yamen, he went home to change into informal clothes, donned a "loyal and tranquil hat,"⁵ mounted his horse, put on his eye shades, and, accompanied by the two page boys, Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, proceeded straight to Han Tao-kuo's house, where he dismounted and went in.

Old Mother Feng hastened to invite him inside and gave him a seat. After some time, Wang Liu-erh, leading her daughter Ai-chieh, came out to greet him. Hsi-men Ch'ing hardly bothered to look at the daughter but couldn't take his eyes off the woman. He saw that, above, she was wearing a jacket of purple satin, a jet silk vest, and a jade-colored skirt, beneath which appeared the up-turned tips of her two feet, enclosed in black satin shoes with gold spangled toes. She was tall of stature and had a rosewood complexion and a face shaped like a melon seed, the temples of which were adorned with two long spit curls. Truly:

Before knowing what she's like on the inside,
One observes how slickly she is tricked out.

Behold:

Glossy and smooth,
Without benefit of makeup,⁶
By nature, her demeanor is alluring.⁷
Slender and graceful,⁸
Too indolent to use powder,
Innately, her persona is enchanting.⁹
Her two eyebrows resemble distant hills;
Her pair of eyes are like autumn waters.¹⁰
Her sandalwood mouth is barely open;
Attractive enough to drive bees to distraction
and butterflies to madness.
Her slender waist is constricted;
Covertly suggesting thoughts
of breezes and moonlight.
If she is not Ts'ui Ying-ying bent on an assignation,¹¹
She must surely be Cho Wen-chün appreciating the zither.¹²

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw her:

His heart was agitated and his eyes disturbed, to such an extent that:

He was unable to control himself.
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,

"So this is the sort of woman Han Tao-kuo keeps in his house. No wonder that bunch of scamps the other day were out to molest her."

He also noticed that her daughter cut quite a striking figure and thought to himself, "With a mother who looks like that, how could her daughter be anything but good-looking?"

The woman made him an obeisance, after which she instructed her daughter, Ai-chieh, to come over. Facing Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;
Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying,

she kowtowed to him four times, after which she got up and stood in attendance to one side. Old Mother Feng made haste to bring in some tea, and the woman brushed away a few drops of water from the rim of the cup before telling her daughter to offer it to him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked the young woman over from tip to toe.

Raven locks pile up beside her temples;
Powder and cosmetics adorn her cheeks.
Her carriage exhibits the rare beauty of a secluded flower;

Her full flesh is a delicate jade that exudes its own bouquet.¹³

He then ordered Tai-an to get the betrothal gifts, consisting of two embroidered handkerchiefs, four gold rings, and twenty taels of silver, out of his felt bag and directed Old Mother Feng to place them on the tea tray. Her mother lost no time in putting the rings on her daughter's hands, after which she bowed to him in thanks and returned to her room.

"In another couple of days," Hsi-men Ch'ing said to the woman, "I'll send someone to bring your daughter over to my place to be fitted for her trousseau. You can use this silver to make shoes and footbindings for her at home."

The woman hastily kowtowed to him once more and thanked him, saying, "We all belong to Your Honor:

From the crowns of our heads to the soles of our feet, and we have put you to this additional trouble on behalf of our daughter. The two of us:

Though we should forfeit our lives could not repay you.¹⁴

We are obliged to Your Honor for everything and are especially grateful for your generous provision of betrothal gifts."

"Is Manager Han not at home?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"This morning, after discussing matters with me, he went off to the shop," the woman said. "Tomorrow I'll have him go over to your place and kowtow to you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, observing that the woman was glib with her tongue, and that the words "Your Honor this, and Your Honor that" were seldom out of her mouth, felt himself irresistibly attracted to her.

As he was about to take his leave, he announced to her, "I'm on my way."

"Stay a little longer," the woman said.

"I can't stay any longer," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, he proceeded out the door, went straight home, and told Wu Yüeh-niang everything that had happened.

Yüeh-niang said, "It is a case of:

A marriage affinity between people a thousand li apart connects them by a single thread.¹⁵

As long as this daughter of Manager Han's is suitable, we will not have expended our efforts in vain."

"Sometime soon," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll send someone to bring her over here to stay for a couple of days in order to be fitted for her trousseau, and, right now, I'll begin by spending ten taels of silver to have half a set of jewelry, hairpins, bracelets, and the like, made up for her."

"You'd better have them made up as quickly as possible," said Yüeh-niang. "If we can get her old man to escort her on this trip, we won't have to send anyone ourselves."

"We might as well resign ourselves to closing the shop for a few days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and get Lai-pao to accompany him, so he can enquire at the residence whether or not the gifts for Commandant-Escort Ts'ai T'iao that we despatched by the adjutant the other day have actually arrived."

To make a long story short, two days later Hsi-men Ch'ing actually sent a page boy to fetch the daughter of the Han family. Her mother, Wang Liu-erh, had purchased an appropriate gift and personally accompanied her.

When they arrived, she kowtowed and was introduced to Yüeh-niang and the rest of the womenfolk of greater and lesser status, saying, "I'm imposing upon you."

"His Honor and the First Lady," she went on to say, "as well as all the rest of you ladies, have condescended to show such favor to our daughter that, speaking for the two of us:

Our gratitude knows no bounds."

At first they were served tea in Yüeh-niang's room, after which they were entertained in the main room of the master suite. Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Li P'ing-erh all kept them company.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had purchased two bolts of red and green Lu-chou pongee and two bolts of poplin, with which to make lingerie for her, and had also called in Tailor Chao to make her two sets of brocaded satin clothing and a gown of figured scarlet satin.

Her mother, Wang Liu-erh, did her best to set her daughter at ease before going home that evening.

Hsi-men Ch'ing also bought a lacquer chest adorned with gold tracery for her trousseau, a dressing case, a mirror stand, boxes and jars, a brass and a pewter basin, a slop pail, a brazier grate, and so forth.

This was not the work of a day, but everything was finally taken care of. A letter was written and the tenth day of the ninth month was selected for her departure. Hsi-men Ch'ing obtained the services of four couriers from the district yamen and also deputed two orderlies, carrying dispatch cases and armed with bows and arrows, to accompany her. Lai Pao and Han Tao-kuo hired four horses for themselves and, following closely behind the wagons and the closed sedan chair, escorted her on her way to the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.

Wang Liu-erh, who was left at home without either her husband or her daughter for company, cried over it for two or three days.

One day Hsi-men Ch'ing, having nothing else to do, rode his horse over to look in on the house on Lion Street, where Old Mother Feng offered him some tea.

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave her a tael of silver, saying, "I'm much indebted to you in that matter of Manager Han's daughter the other day. You can buy something to wear with this tael of silver."

The old woman made haste to kowtow to him in gratitude.

"Have you been over to their place anytime in the last couple of days?" Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to ask.

"Not a day has gone by that I haven't gone over there to keep her company," said Old Mother Feng. "Ever since her daughter left she's really had no one to rely on at home. As a mother she had grown dependent on her. She cried over it for two or three days. It's only in the last couple of days that she's reconciled herself somewhat to the situation.

"She also said that she was much beholden to you in the matter of her daughter and asked me, 'Has His Honor given you anything in the way of a gratuity for your pains?' I replied, 'The gentleman is busy, and I haven't been over to his place the last several days. It is not my place to concern myself with how much or how little he may give me.' She also promised that when her husband returned I would be handsomely rewarded."

"When her old man returns," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "he's bound to have picked up a little something and could hardly fail to express his gratitude to you."

After they had talked for a while, seeing that:

There was nobody about,

he stealthily whispered into the old woman's ear, thus and so, "Whenever you're free, go over to her place and exercise your ingenuity in broaching the subject, but just say politely that I'd like to drop by and visit her for a while sometime when I'm free, and see how she reacts, whether she agrees or not. I'll come back tomorrow to find out how she responds."

The old woman covered her mouth with her hand and laughed sardonically, saying, "Sir, you're just like:

An itinerant shoemaker tempted by an unmarried girl;

Wherever two hides meet you'll cobble them together.¹⁶

Having dug up a silver doll with a thrust of the spade;

You are bent on acquiring its mother into the bargain.

Later this evening I'll gradually make bold to broach the subject with her. You're not acquainted with this woman, sir. She's the younger sister of Butcher Wang, who slaughters cattle on our back street here. As the sixth sibling in her generation of the family, she's called Wang Liu-erh, or Wang the Sixth. She was born in the year of the snake, so she's twenty-eight years old. Although she dolls herself up in such a way as to make a spectacle of herself, it doesn't follow that she is promiscuous. Be sure to come back tomorrow, sir, after I've had a chance to sound her out, and I'll have something to report to you."

"That's it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, and, having finished speaking, he mounted his horse and went home.

The old woman, after seeing Hsi-men Ch'ing on his way, prepared a meal for herself, ate it, locked the door of the house, and made her way slowly to Oxhide Lane where the woman lived.

The woman opened the door, ushered her into an inner room, and offered her a seat, saying, "Yesterday I prepared a batch of noodles for you, but you didn't show up."

"I certainly intended to come," the old woman said, "but I went to someone else's place and got so tangled up with one thing and another that I was unable to get away."

"I've just prepared some steaming hot rice," said the woman, "and some stir-fried wheat gluten. Have something to eat."

"I've just finished eating," the old woman said, "but I'll sip some tea."

The woman then served her a cup of strong tea, and she looked on as her host ate her meal.

"You can see how forlorn I am," the woman said. "I've allowed myself to become so dependent on that heartless darling of mine that, ever since she left, the house seems completely deserted. I've got to do everything myself now, with the result that:

My nose is dingy,

My mouth is sooty,¹⁷ and I hardly look like a human being. It might even have been better if she had died and left me with a broken heart. This way, when she's so:

Far away from home,

how would you have me put her out of my mind? However urgently I long to see her, there's no way it can be done."

As she spoke her eyes felt sour and she began to cry.

"It hardly bears repeating," the old woman said, "but it was ever thus.

When a boy is born, everyone feels hot with excitement;

When a girl is born, everyone feels coldly indifferent.

Though she should live to be a hundred years old;

Sooner or later, she will belong to someone else.

However much you may complain about it today, in the future, when your daughter is installed in the mansion, she will start out on a firm footing. If she should bear so much as:

A single boy or half a girl, the two of you will be in a position to enjoy yourselves and no longer have any reason to complain about me."

"When it comes to the doings in a prominent household," the woman said, "there are bound to be:

Layers within layers.

Who knows how things will turn out? By the time any child of hers amounts to anything, our jawbones may have long since been exposed to the elements somewhere."

"How can you say such a thing?" the old woman said. "Your daughter is as smart as they come. There's no need to worry about her as far as needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments are concerned. Who is there that scruples to:

Depend upon his marriage connections
for his daily bread, that you should be worried on her behalf?"

The two of them talked for some time, passing the same cup of wine back and forth between them, until the conversation gradually started to warm up, whereupon the old woman said, "I've got a silly proposition to make to you. Your husband is away from home, so that both the front and rear quarters of your house are completely deserted. In the evenings, when you're left all by yourself, aren't you afraid?"

"You're a fine one to talk when it's you who got me into this fix in the first place," the woman said. "You really ought to come over in the evenings to keep me company."

"Just in case I might not be able to make it sometime," the old woman said, "if I offered to stand as guarantor for someone else to come keep you company, would you be willing to agree to it?"

"And who might that be?" the woman asked.

The old woman covered her mouth with her hand and laughed, saying:

"One guest does not trouble two hosts.

His Honor from the mansion came over to the other house yesterday and said to me, thus and so, that since your daughter had left home, leaving you all by yourself, he'd like to drop by and visit you for a while sometime. What do you say? There isn't anyone else here. If you were to go along with him, you wouldn't have to worry about having enough to eat, to wear, to spend, or to use. Once such a liaison was established, in the future, he'd even be willing to look for another house for you, which would be better than this out-of-the-way corner where you are now."

On hearing this the woman smiled and said, "With a houseful of goddess-like women at his disposal, what would he want with an ugly piece of goods like myself?"

"How can you say such a thing?" the old woman said. "It has always been true that:

In one's lover's eyes one appears like a veritable Hsi-shih.¹⁸

It is clear that:

This meeting was fated to occur.

It's not as though His Honor has nothing else to do. If he weren't particularly interested in you, he would not have made a point of coming to my place yesterday, giving me a tael of silver, and saying that he was much indebted to me in that matter of your daughter the other day. Later on, when there was no one else present, he brought up the subject with me and told me to come here and broach it to you, saying that, if you were willing to consider it, he would be waiting for an answer from me.

In mortgaging land to make the deed,
The parties involved must be agreed.

Surely you don't mean to suggest that I would lie about it."

"If he deigns to visit me," said the woman, "invite him to come over tomorrow. I'll be waiting for him."

The old woman, seeing that she had indicated her assent, sat with her a while longer, after which, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,

she made her departure.

The next day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived, she gave him a complete account, word for word, of what the woman had said. Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Unable to contain his satisfaction,¹⁹ and promptly weighed out a tael of silver for Old Mother Feng so she could purchase wine and delicacies for the occasion.

The woman, on hearing that Hsi-men Ch'ing was coming, straightened up the interior of her house:

Lit incense and hung curtains, and laid in a supply of:

Fine tea and fine water.

Before long, the old woman showed up with a basketful of chicken, fish, appetizers, groceries, and fruits, which she had purchased, and took them into the kitchen to be properly prepared. The woman took the trouble to:

Wash her hands and trim her nails, before baking a small quantity of wheat cakes and wiping the tables and chairs until they shone.

Sometime after noon, Hsi-men Ch'ing donned a skullcap and informal clothes, put on his eyeshades, and headed straight for her door, accompanied by the two page boys, Tai-an and Ch'i-t'ung. Upon dismounting to go inside, he directed that the horse be taken back to the house on Lion Street and brought back for him that evening, while he kept only Tai-an to wait on him in the meantime. Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded into the parlor and sat down.

After some time, the woman, having dressed herself to befit the occasion, came out to greet him, saying, "I'm afraid we imposed on you the other day. You've gone to so much trouble on behalf of our daughter that:

Words do not suffice,

to express our gratitude.”

“If there’s anything I may have overlooked,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “I hope the two of you will not hold it against me.”

“With regard to our whole family,” the woman said:

“Our obligations to you are so great, we could never hold anything against you.” After saying which, she kowtowed to him four times.

Old Mother Feng then brought in some tea, and the woman served it to him. Observing that the horse had been sent away and that Tai-an had closed the front door, the woman sat with Hsi-men Ch’ing for a while and then ushered him into an interior sitting room, at the other end of which a k’ang frame was set in an alcove behind a sliding paper door. The room was decorated with a set of four hanging scrolls, in frames carved with a motif of bees enjoying the fragrance of the flowers, depicting the story of Chang Chün-jui’s meeting with Ts’ui Ying-ying²⁰ in the form of a collage of pieces of variegated silk and satin. The table was crowded with a dressing case, a mirror stand, boxes and jars, pewter utensils, and other objects, and a stick of incense was burning on the floor beneath it. In the place of honor there was a folding Tung-p’o armchair, in which Hsi-men Ch’ing took his seat. The woman then poured a cup of strong tea, flavored with walnuts and marinated bamboo shoots, and served it to him. When Hsi-men Ch’ing had finished it, the woman took away the cup, sat down on the edge of the k’ang at the lower end of the room to keep him company, and asked him for a while about how things were going at home.

Hsi-men Ch’ing noticed that the woman handled the tray herself and said, “You really ought to have a girl to help out around here.”

“The truth of the matter is,” the woman said, “that ever since our daughter left home, things have been less convenient. In those days she was always here to help out, but now I’ve got to do everything myself.”

“That’s no problem,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Tomorrow, just get Old Mother Feng to find a twelve-or thirteen-year-old maidservant for you who can relieve you, at least to some extent, of the burden of housework.”

“It will have to wait till my husband gets back,” the woman said, “when we’ll simply have to:

Scrape together something from the east or the west, with which to get Old Mother Feng to find such a girl for us.”

“There’s no need for that,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Whatever it may cost, I’ll pay her myself.”

“How could it be appropriate to put you to such additional trouble and expense?” the woman said. “It’s not as though we haven’t imposed on Your Honor enough as it is.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw that she had a way with words, his heart was filled with delight, and when Old Mother Feng came in to set up a table for them, he spoke to her about the matter of finding a maidservant.

“Since His Honor has already agreed to it,” Old Mother Feng said, “you ought to kowtow to him in thanks. Auntie Chao’s place in the southern quarter has a twelve-year-old girl available. I can bring her here for you to look over tomorrow. She’s a girl of humble social origin who was raised by her own family. Her father is a military patrolman whose horse was killed in a fall. Being unable to pay the cost of reparation, and fearful of the beating he would be subjected to by the commandant of the Regional Military Command, he has had to sell his daughter. The asking price for her is only four taels of silver. You might as well get His Honor to buy her for you.”

The woman hastened forward and bowed to him in gratitude. Before long the table was spread with saucers of food and the wine was ready to be poured. The woman filled a cup to the brim and proffered it to Hsi-men Ch’ing with both hands.

She was about to kowtow to him as well, but Hsi-men Ch’ing hastened to pull her up with one hand, saying, “You’ve already saluted me just a while ago. There’s no need for any further obeisance. A simple bow will do.”

The woman, with a broad smile on her face, made him a bow and then sat down to one side on a low stool. In the kitchen, Old Mother Feng prepared the appetizers, fruits, and other dishes and served them up one at a time. There were also a couple of chopsticks worth of thin pancakes, which the woman filled with shredded pork and vegetables selected with her own hand, rolled up into spring rolls, and offered to Hsi-men Ch’ing on a saucer. The two of them proceeded to:

Pass their winecups back and forth, as they drank together in her room. Tai-an was also provided with a place to sit in the kitchen, where Old Mother Feng kept him company and gave him something to eat. But no more of this.

When they had shared a few rounds of drinks, the woman moved her seat closer to Hsi-men Ch’ing, so that she could talk to him and serve him more conveniently. After this, Hsi-men Ch’ing continued to drink with the woman, passing the same cup of wine back and forth between them. Seeing that no one came in, he embraced her by the neck, and they fell to kissing and sucking each other’s tongues. The woman then stuck her hand out below and grasped Hsi-men Ch’ing’s jade stalk. Mutually:

Carried away by lecherous desires, they called a halt to their drinking, closed the door to the room, and stripped off their clothes. The woman then proceeded to spread out her bedding on the k’ang frame in the alcove.

By this time the sun was already setting in the west. Hsi-men Ch’ing, exhilarated by the wine, took the silver clasp out of his wallet and fastened it in place, while the woman pumped his organ with her hand. She observed that:

Its protuberances swelled and its head sprang up,
It became empurpled and shiny,
Tumid, and extremely thick.

Hsi-men Ch'ing Espouses Wang Liu-erh as a Mistress

On the one hand, she sat down in Hsi-men Ch'ing's lap, while on the other hand, up above, the two of them fell to embracing each other by the neck and kissing. The woman then raised one of her legs, guided his organ into her vagina with her hand, and the two of them poked away for a while. Hsi-men Ch'ing, fondling the soft smoothness of the woman's body and the fineness of her pubic hair, wanted to fully engage with her, so he ordered her to lie faceup on the end of the bed, and then, supporting himself on his two hands and wrapping her feet around the small of his back, devoted himself to retracting and thrusting. What did this bout of clouds and rain look like?

Behold:

An awe-inspiring aura obscures the halcyon couch,
A baleful breath immures the mandarin duck quilt.
On the coral pillow they display their prowess,
Behind kingfisher curtains they vie in audacity.

The male warrior is enraged;
 Thrusting himself forward, he stabs away with his black-tasseled spear.
 The female commander is angry;
 Spreading her hips, she makes a show of her life-threatening sword.
 One comes, the other goes;
 As An Lu-shan consorts with Yang Kuei-fei.²¹
 One butts, the other lunges;
 As Chang Chün-jui makes up to Ts'ui Ying-ying.²²
 To left and right they join together;
 In the Milky Way the Weaving Maid
 meets the Herd Boy.²³
 Above and below they coil about;
 In the fairy cave the immortal maiden confronts Juan Chao.²⁴
 The spear comes, the bucklers bear the brunt;
 Ts'ui Huai-pao unites himself with Hsüeh Ch'üung-ch'üung.²⁵
 The ballista attacks, the blade fends it off;
 Shuang Chien conjoins himself with Su Hsiao-ch'ing.²⁶
 This one gives vent to the warbling of an oriole;
 It much resembles Wu Tse-t'ien's rendezvous with Hsüeh Ao-ts'ao.²⁷
 That one gives voice to the twittering of a swallow;
 It is just like Shen I-chi's consorting with Empress Lü.²⁸
 When they first engage;
 The short spear stabs indiscriminately,
 While the sharp blade responds in kind.
 Subsequently to that;
 Both ballistae fire simultaneously,
 And the bucklers ward the missiles off.
 The male warrior is excited;
 Wielding his spear, he wants to penetrate as far as the heart cavity;
 The female commander is agitated;
 Opening her orifice, she tries to swallow her assailant, head and all.
 The one who deploys the pair of ballistae, Comes and goes, in his assault upon the forces of the Inner Crotch;
 The one who brandishes the pair of bucklers, Above and below, defends herself against the General Beneath the Navel.
 One, adopting the position "The Golden Cock Standing on a Single Foot,"²⁹ Raises high her jade leg in order to display her spirit.
 The other, assuming the pose "The Bare Tree Extending Its Roots,"³⁰
 "Inserts the arrow upside down"³¹ in order to penetrate the vagina.
 The engagement is protracted,
 His starry eyes grow dim,
 The slightest move produces a melting sensation.
 The battle is prolonged,
 Her slender waist writhes gently,
 As the duel continues she worries

how long she can last.
 The Matron of the Cave of Scanty Hair backs across the bridge,
 Releasing her waters to drown the invader.
 The General of the Raven Black Armor³²
 waves his spear in vain,
 Turning about in the endeavor to escape.
 He of the navel aphrodisiac is unhorsed;
 In an instant, he is trampled underfoot,
 his flesh reduced to dust.
 She that is warm and tight feigns confusion;
 In a moment, she collapses into herself, sinking down into the abyss.
 He of the heavy armor, finds it to be scattered hither and yon,
 Just like falling flowers, driven about by a drenching rain.³³
 She of the brocade noose, finds her vigor gone, her muscles lax,³⁴
 Just like withered leaves, swirled around by a violent wind.³⁵
 The Marshall of the Sulfur Ring,
 His helmet awry and armor shattered, has nowhere he can flee.
 The General of the Silver Armor, Sticks close to her own encampment, loath to let him escape.

Truly:

The threatening clouds rise up as high as the nine-layered heavens,
 While down below the defeated combatants lie tumbled on the field.³⁶

It so happens that the woman suffered from a malady. Whenever she engaged in sexual intercourse she required her partner to pluck the flower in her rear courtyard, while she stimulated her clitoris below, before she was able to experience orgasm. If not, no matter what happened, she could not come. Even when Han Tao-kuo engaged in intercourse with her, he approached her by the rear entry more often than not, coming in by the front door no more than two or three times a month. A second malady of hers was that she was inveterately fond of sucking cock. She would keep it in her mouth for the longest time, even all night long, without being satisfied. No matter how much spunk her partner may have ejaculated, once subjected to her sucking and titillation, his member would re-erect itself forthwith. It was precisely these two maladies of hers that struck a responsive note in Hsi-men Ch'ing's heart.

That day he continued to engage with her until the first watch before going home.

"Come a little earlier tomorrow, sir," the woman said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "while it is still daylight, so we can have time to take off all our clothes and really play together."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was greatly delighted. The next day he went to the silk goods shop on Lion Street, where he weighed out four taels of silver and gave them to Old Mother Feng so she could purchase the maidservant for Wang Liu-erh's use, whose name was changed to Chin-erh.

Obsessed with the sweet prospect before him, on the second day, Hsi-men Ch'ing again rode his horse to the woman's home to pay her a visit. Originally both Ch'i-t'ung and Tai-an accompanied him, but when they got to her door, he told Ch'i-t'ung to take the horse back to the house on Lion Street.

Old Mother Feng devoted herself to going out with the jug to buy wine, picking up things on the street to prepare for them, running errands on their behalf, and so forth, and was dependent for her living on what she could make out of these transactions. Every time Hsi-men Ch'ing paid her a visit, he gave the woman one or two taels of silver for her expenses. He would come while it was still daylight and remain right up until the first watch before going home.

The members of his household were kept as completely in the dark as if they had been:

Locked tight in an iron bucket.

Since Old Mother Feng was working so hard at the woman's place every day, she seldom showed up at Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence. Li P'ing-erh sent page boys to summon her two or three times, but she claimed she was unable to get away. Whenever she felt like it, she would lock the door and stay away for a whole day at a time.

One day the page boy, Hua-t'ung, ran into the old woman and brought her home with him.

"Old Mother," Li P'ing-erh complained to her, "I haven't seen so much as your shadow for days on end. What kind of:

Pussyfooting errands, have you been up to? Every time I send after you, you're not there. You seem to have completely given up stopping by here. Are you really as busy as all that? I'm left with this accumulation of clothes, waistbands, and the baby's bedding that I've been waiting for you to come and help the maidservants launder for me, but you never show up."

"My dear mistress," the old woman exclaimed, "that's a fine thing to say!

If you insist on sending a scribe to arrest a deserter,

He can do no more than cite a body of precedents.

If you endeavor to turn a salt peddler into a sculptor,

He'll only end up making an 'idol' use of his time."³⁷

"Old Mother," said Li P'ing-erh, "you're as bad as:

The abbot of the Stone Buddha Monastery:

Every time you're asked to officiate, you're too busy.

I'm sure you're out making money for yourself all day long, it's just that I don't know where you are."

"As for me," the old woman expostulated:

"The tempest having blown away the rest of my face,

My mouth can hardly be expected to keep up.

What money have I been making that you should have reason to be angry with me? You can be sure that I've had it anxiously in mind to drop by, but I just haven't been able to make it. I hardly know myself what it is that's been keeping me so busy all day. Some time ago the First Lady in the rear compound gave me the silver and asked me to pick up a rush prayer mat for her Buddhist devotions outside the South Gate, but I forgot all about it. Yesterday, when I finally remembered her request, the lousy southern slave of a mat seller was nowhere to be found. What will I say to her?"

"Do you mean to say that you still don't have that prayer mat for her?" exclaimed Li P'ing-erh. You might as well have been:

Free as you please, and run off somewhere with a bonze. She's already given you the silver for it, and after all this time you still haven't bought it for her. How can you go on:

Playing the fool and putting on airs, that way?"

"It has had to wait," the old woman said, "until I've had a chance to explain the situation to the First Lady, but when I do, I'll return this silver to her. Yesterday, when I was riding a mule, I almost lost it."

"If you had lost that money of hers," said Li P'ing-erh, "you'd be a dead duck."

The old woman then headed straight for the rear compound, but before going into Yüeh-niang's room she went into the kitchen to reconnoiter, where she found Yü-hsiao sitting together with Lai-hsing's wife, Hui-hsiu.

Upon seeing her, Yü-hsiao said, "So you've finally showed up, Old Feng. Where have you come from, exalted person that you are? Your Sixth Lady is ready to eat your flesh alive. She claims that you haven't been showing her so much as a glimpse of your shadow."

The old woman went up to them, bowed twice, and said, "I've just been in her place up front where she nagged away at me for some time."

"What about the rush prayer mat that Mother asked you to pick up for her?" asked Yü-hsiao.

"I went outside the South Gate yesterday with silver in hand," said the old woman, "but the vendor who sells rush prayer mats has sold out his stock and gone back where he came from. He won't return until the third month of next year. I've still got the silver right here. Sister, let me turn it over to you."

"You crazy crone!" laughed Yü-hsiao. "Father is still in the room weighing out silver. After he comes out, you can return it to her personally."

"Sit down for a while," she then went on to say. "I've got something to ask you. How long has it been since Manager Han set out to escort his daughter to the capital? He ought to be back any time now, and when he returns it ought to be a piece of good luck for you. He's bound to express his gratitude to you in some way."

"Whether he thanks me or not is up to him," the old woman said. "As of today, he's only been gone eight days. He won't be back before the end of the month."

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing finished weighing out the silver, turned it over to Pen the Fourth to take out to the country estate, and then went out himself.

The old woman went into the master suite to see Yüeh-niang but still hesitated to produce the silver, simply saying, "That southerner had only a few coarse prayer mats available and went home after selling them off. He'll come back next year with good rush prayer mats of higher quality."

Yüeh-niang, who was a straightforward person, said, "Well that's that. You might as well hold onto the silver, and next year I'll ask you to pick up two of them for me, that's all."

She gave the old woman some tea cakes to eat, after which she returned to Li P'ing-erh's quarters.

"Did the First Lady give you a hard time?" Li P'ing-erh asked.

"I was able to paper things over in such a way as to satisfy her," the old woman said. "She actually gave me some tea to drink and rewarded me with a couple of large cakes when I took my leave."

"Those must have been the cakes left over from her visit to the Ch'iaos' house yesterday to celebrate the full-month ceremony for the birth of their daughter," said Li P'ing-erh. "Old Mother, that mouth of yours, true to form, is as lethal as:

The mosquitoes in the sixth month:

They bite you to death."

"As long as you're here today," she went on to say, "you might as well take care of the laundry before going home."

"Get your things together and procure some starch," the old woman replied. "I'll come by first thing tomorrow morning. This afternoon I still have to go to the home of an old client of mine to conduct some business."

"You old baggage!" exclaimed Li P'ing-erh. "You're never content unless you can:

Fool with the branches and tug at the leaves.

If you don't show up tomorrow, I'll have something to say to you."

The old woman talked and laughed for a while before taking her leave.

Li P'ing-erh urged her to stay, saying, "Don't leave until you've had something to eat."

"I'm still full," the old woman replied. "I don't need to eat anything."

Whereupon, fearing that Hsi-men Ch'ing might have preceded her in paying a visit to Wang Liu-erh's place, she hastened on her way:

Covering two steps with every one.

Truly:

The matchmaker is like a secondary ghost that haunts the locality;

Going back and forth, one party to the other,
wiping the oil from her lips.

In a single day she manages to go a thousand times a thousand steps;

But merely succeeds in engendering hardship for her pair of legs.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 38

HSI-MEN CH'ING SUBJECTS TRICKSTER HAN TO THE THIRD DEGREE; P'AN CHIN-LIEN ON A SNOWY EVENING TOYS WITH HER P'I-P'A

Though her lovely person is warm and soft,
 she is a practiced old hand;
Like a jade flagon illuminated by moonlight,
 she is made to inspire passion.
Lightly turning her jadelike countenance,
 the flowers look seductive;
At the slightest perturbation of her delicate brows,
 her cloudy chignon falls loose.
Attractive enough to drive bees to distraction,
 the peach blossom's pistil is open;
Sufficiently alluring to drive butterflies to madness,
 her willowy waist is pristine.
The heart of the beholder is held in thrall, subject to lasting infatuation;
May she not take after the "willows" in the quarter, who respond with pallid affection.¹

THE STORY GOES that when Old Mother Feng had proceeded as far as the postern gate leading to the front reception hall, she saw Tai-an standing in attendance outside the latticework doors to the hall with tea tray in hand.

Tai-an made a meaningful moue in her direction, saying, "You go on over there. Father and Master Ying the Second are talking together. As soon as they're done, and he's seen him off, he'll start out himself. He's already sent Ch'i-t'ung ahead to deliver the wine."

As soon as the old woman heard these words, she hastened on her way:

 Covering two steps with every one.

It so happens that Ying Po-chüeh had come to speak to Hsi-men Ch'ing about the merchant contractors Li Chih and Huang the Fourth, who had undertaken the assignment to procure one-third of the annual quota of thirty thousand tael worth of incense, wax, and other materials for use by the imperial household. Their share, therefore, in addition to whatever interest they could make on the transaction, would amount to ten thousand taels of silver, which would be paid over to them in bullion upon delivery of the consignment to Tung-p'ing prefecture.

"I've come to consult with you," he said, "about whether or not you would care to take a hand in the transaction."

"Why should I want to become a purveyor?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. They:

 Substitute the counterfeit for the genuine,

 Bribe officials and promise them kickbacks.

When such cases come before my yamen, we are required to proceed against them. Why should I involve myself in such a business?"

"If you don't participate," said Ying Po-chüeh, "they'll just go to someone else. All you have to do is lend them two thousand taels of silver, on which they will pay you five percent interest per month, and when they receive payment for their consignment they will return your original investment. What do you think? If you agree to the undertaking, I'll speak to them and have them bring the contract to you tomorrow."

"Only out of consideration for you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll put up a thousand taels of silver for them. Right now, because of the construction work on my country estate, I'm short of cash."

When Ying Po-chüeh saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing had indicated his assent, he said, "Brother, if you're so strapped for cash, couldn't you, somehow or other, come up with another five hundred taels worth of merchandise in order to make up an even one thousand five hundred for them? They wouldn't dare let you down."

"If they let me down," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll know how to handle them. But there's another thing, Brother Ying the Second. If I put up any money for them, they mustn't run around on the outside flaunting my name in order to:

 Fleece people to the east and cheat them on the west.

If I get wind of anything like that, I fear there'll be more than enough room to accommodate them in the lockup at my yamen."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "how can you say such a thing?

 The supervisor cannot relinquish his responsibility.

If they run around on the outside flaunting your name and no harm is done, so much for that. But if they should do any damage, what am I good for? You can simply relax on that score. If anything goes amiss, I'll be the first to tell you about it. If you agree, I'll let them know so they can be prepared to draft the contract tomorrow."

"Don't have them come tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've got something to do. Have them come the day after tomorrow."

When they had finished speaking, Ying Po-chüeh took his leave.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Tai-an to prepare his horse, put on his eye shades, and asked, "Has Ch'i-t'ung already left?"

"He's still here," said Tai-an. "He's gone to fetch your riding crop."

Before long, the riding crop was fetched, and Hsi-men Ch'ing mounted his horse and set off for Oxhide Lane.

Who could have anticipated that Han Tao-kuo's younger brother, Han the Second, or Trickster Han, who had lost at gambling and managed to get stark staring drunk, should turn up at his elder brother's house looking for something more to drink.

Pulling a string of small sausages out of his sleeve, he said, "Sister-in-law, since my elder brother hasn't returned yet, why don't the two of us share a jug of distilled spirits."

The woman, who was afraid that Hsi-men Ch'ing might show up and was aware that Old Mother Feng was in the kitchen, did not take him up on it, saying, "I don't want anything, but if you insist on a drink, take it out of the way somewhere and indulge yourself. I'm sick and tired of the way you:

Devote yourself to stirring up trouble, when your elder brother is away from home. What are you coming around again for, anyway?"

Trickster Han, opening wide his bleary eyes, refused to leave. Catching sight of a jug of wine underneath the table, with a white clay stopper and a red paper label attached to it, he asked, "Sister-in-law, who's wine is that? Open it up and decant a flagon's worth for us to drink. Ai-ya, you're keeping it all for yourself."

"Don't you dare touch it," the woman exclaimed. "It's a gift from His Honor in the mansion. Your elder brother hasn't even seen it yet. There'll be time enough to pour out a cup for you after he gets home."

"Why should I wait for any elder brother?" said Han the Second. "Even if it belonged to the emperor himself, I'd help myself to a cup."

He was just about to pull out the clay stopper when the woman gave him a precipitate shove with her hand, snatched up the wine jug, and lugged it into her bedroom.

It took a while for Trickster Han, who had been knocked flat on his back, to regain his feet.

His discomfiture turning into anger,² he muttered abusively, "You lousy whore! I brought these sausages over with the best of intentions, thinking that you must be lonely all by yourself and would be happy to share a cup of wine with me. You've not only ignored my suggestion, but knocked me down into the bargain. Don't you worry. You may have found yourself another lover with plenty of money and decided to ignore me. You may want to break up with me, so you're deliberately giving me a hard time, disregarding me, mocking me, and driving me away. You'd just better not let me catch the two of you together, you worthless whore, or it'll be a case of:

A white blade going in, and

A red blade coming out."

No sooner did the woman hear these indiscreet words than:

A spot of red appeared beside each ear, and

In an instant her two cheeks were purple.

Picking up a laundry bat in her hand, she drove him out of the house, cursing as she went, "You lousy starveling of a gallows bird! You've had it! You think you can guzzle yourself drunk somewhere and then turn up at my place and freeloader, do you? Well I'm not going to let you get away with it."

Muttering imprecations as he went, Trickster Han cursed her for a whore all the way out the door.

Who could have anticipated that Hsi-men Ch'ing would come riding along just at this juncture and, catching sight of him, demand to know who it was.

"You know perfectly well who it is," the woman replied. "It's that bastard Han the Second. Seeing that his elder brother is away from home, he's in the habit of losing at gambling and then coming around here in his cups to make trouble for me. When his elder brother is at home, he gives him a beating when he runs into him."

Trickster Han, observing the lay of the land, disappeared in a puff of smoke.

"That dead duck of a beggar!" Hsi-men Ch'ing exclaimed. "Tomorrow, when I get to the yamen, I'll give him something to remember me by."

"I've just provided you with another source of irritation," the woman said.

"You don't understand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We can't let him get away with that sort of thing."

"What you say is right," the woman responded. "It has always been true that:

Goodness is taken advantage of by others,

Benevolence merely gives rise to disaster."³

As she spoke, she ushered Hsi-men Ch'ing into the parlor and offered him a seat.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered Ch'i-t'ung to return home with the horse and said to Tai-an, "You keep watch at the front door. If that 'bare stick' so much as flaunts his shadow around here, lock him up, and bring him to the yamen tomorrow."

"When he heard that you had arrived," said Tai-an:

"Who knows where his soul ended up going to."

Hsi-men Ch'ing took a seat. The woman, after making him an obeisance, promptly directed her maidservant Chin-erh to bring out a cup of tea, flavored with fruit kernels, from the inner room and serve it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, after which she told her to kowtow to him.

Wang Liu-erh Menaces Trickster Han with a Laundry Bat

"That will do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She looks like a nice enough girl. You might as well make what use of her you can."

"Old Mother Feng is here, isn't she," he went on to say. "Why don't you have her take care of the tea?"

"As for that old body, Mother Feng," the woman said, "I've asked her to busy herself in the kitchen."

"That wine that I had the page boy deliver a while ago," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is 'Bamboo Leaf Green'⁴ that was given to me by a eunuch. It contains a lot of medicinal ingredients and has a very bracing taste. I noticed the other day that the wine you obtained around here was not fit to drink. That's why I had this jug of wine brought over for you."

The woman made him another bow, saying, "Thank you very much for the wine. It's just as you say. We're so out of the way, living in this obscure alley, that we don't even have access to a decent wine shop. Where would we get high-quality wine without going all the way to Main Street?"

"When Manager Han gets home," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you ought to talk it over with him. I'd be willing to spend a few taels of silver to buy a house on Lion Street so the two of you could simply move over there to live. It would be nearer the silk goods store, on the one hand, as well as being more convenient for shopping and everything else.”

“What you say is right,” the woman said. “If you could see fit, somehow or other, to show us such favor, so that we could manage to get away from this place, it would be wonderful. Even with regard to your coming and going, it would have the advantage of obviating a good deal of gossip on the part of petty-minded people. As long as what we do is right, there’s no reason to be afraid of anybody. If this is something you’ve made up your mind to do, go ahead and do it. It’s all the same whether he’s at home or not. After all, there’s no other road for him to take.”

After they had talked for a while, a table was set up in the inner room, and she invited Hsi-men Ch’ing inside to loosen his clothes, sit down, and relax. Before long, wine and food were prepared, and the table was spread with chicken, duck, fish, pork, as well as appetizers and snacks of all kinds. The woman kept him company and poured the wine.

It was not long before the two of them sat down together:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,

and proceeded to drink in earnest. When they began to feel the effects of the wine, they took off their clothes:

Got into bed and engaged each other in amorous sport,

Enjoying each other to their heart’s content.

The woman had long since laid out a thick layer of bedding on the k’ang frame and fumigated it until it exuded a pungent fragrance.

Hsi-men Ch’ing was aware that the woman was fond of the game of breeze and moonlight and was anxious to see what he could do to arouse her. Before leaving home, he had secreted a brocaded bag in his sleeve, which he now opened to reveal a silver clasp, a “ladies’ delight,” a sulfur-imbrued ring, a medicated band of white satin, a “pendent jade ring,” a navel aphrodisiac plaster, and a “titillating bell,” a full complement of sexual implements. The woman:

Lay down faceup on the pillow,

Raised her jade legs on high, while

Her “chicken-tongue” protruded from within.

Hsi-men Ch’ing first had the woman insert the “titillating bell” in her vagina, after which he fastened the silver clasp to the root of his organ, fitted the sulfur-imbrued ring around the neck of his glans, and stuck the navel aphrodisiac plaster on his navel. The woman guided his organ into her vagina with her hand until:

The two of them were joined together, and

It gradually penetrated more than halfway.

“Daddy!” the woman exclaimed, “I’m afraid your legs will start to hurt if you squat that way. Pull the pillow over so you can sit on it, and let this whore of yours do the moving.”

“I’m afraid you’re not really comfortable,” she went on to say. “Why don’t you try fucking me with one of my legs suspended? How would that be?”

Hsi-men Ch’ing actually unwrapped one of her foot bindings and tied it around her foot in such a way that one leg was suspended from the latticework partition of the bed. Thereupon he lowered his head and proceeded to thrust and retract until her vaginal fluids began to flow uninterruptedly, like a snail secreting its slime.⁵ In the process of retracting, a good deal of white discharge emerged.

“Why are you producing this white discharge?” Hsi-men Ch’ing asked.

He was about to wipe himself off when the woman said, “Don’t wipe it off. Let me suck it for you.”

Thereupon, she squatted down in front of him and lapped it up so thoroughly that:

The sound of her sucking was audible.

This so affected Hsi-men Ch’ing that his:

Lecherous desires were suddenly aroused.

Turning her over, he set out, with her cooperation, to pluck the flower in her rear courtyard. His turtle head was encumbered with the sulfur-imbrued ring so that, even with moistening and reaming, it was difficult to proceed. The woman knit her brows and silently endured the pain for some time before he succeeded in immersing the knob of his glans. Hsi-men Ch’ing thereupon began to thrust and retract in earnest, while the woman rubbed his organ with her hand until:

It gradually penetrated more than halfway.

Parking her posterior in Hsi-men Ch’ing’s lap, and:

Turning her head around with an amorous glance, she said, in a quavering voice, “Daddy! Slow down a bit. The rest of it is even thicker and larger. How will this whore of yours ever endure it?”

Hsi-men Ch’ing lifted her haunches in order to:

Observe the sight as he went in and out.⁶

Then, addressing her by her informal name, he said, “Wang Liu-erh, my child, your daddy doesn’t know why it is, but this is the one thing that delights him the most. Who would have thought that today I should meet up with you. You’re truly a woman after my own heart. In the days to come you and I will be:

Inseparable in life or death.”

“Daddy!” the woman replied. “I only fear that in the future you will grow tired of playing with me and pay me no heed. What then?”

“Once we become acquainted,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “you’ll see that I’m not that sort of person.”

As they talked together, the two of them had been going at it for about the time it would take to eat a meal. Hsi-men Ch'ing told the woman that she would have to utter promiscuously whatever:

Obscene sounds and wanton words, occurred to her before he would come. The woman, from underneath, raised her hips with her hands, the better to receive his semen.

When pleasure reaches its height passions are intense,
and Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Ejaculated like a geyser.⁷
When they were finished, he retracted his organ which still carried the sulfur-imbrued ring, and the woman sucked it clean for him before the two of them lay down to sleep:

Head to head and thigh over thigh.⁸
Truly:
The predilection appealing equally to his taste,
He chooses to pluck the flower in the rear courtyard.
There is a song that testifies to this:

My handsome lover,
Particularly loves to pluck the flower in the rear courtyard.
Ordinarily he comes in by the front door,
But it is already occupied by the Brazenfaced Vanguard.⁹
When he presses his way into the portal, it is hard to bear,
But he pulls up on the reins,
Wheels his steed about, and Returns triumphant to the fray;
Infusing my body with a melting sensation.
My powdered face is utterly abased;
My powdered face, suffused with the glow of sunset clouds.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and the woman embraced each other until the second watch. It was only when the page boy arrived to fetch him with the horse that he got up and returned home.

The next morning, as soon as he got to the yamen, he sent two bailiffs to arrest Trickster Han and hale him before the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, where he was arraigned for petty larceny in the neighborhood. Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,
he was subjected to the ankle-squeezers and given twenty strokes of the bamboo, so severely that:

Fresh blood flowed down his legs.
As a result, he was confined to his bed for a month and very nearly forfeited his life. After that, he was so intimidated that he dared not molest the woman with so much as his shadow. Truly:

He whose hatred is petty is no gentleman;
He who lacks ruthlessness is not a hero.

A few days later, Lai-pao, Han Tao-kuo, and their retinue arrived back from the Eastern Capital.

Lai-pao gave a complete report on their mission to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Majordomo Chai Ch'ien, on seeing the girl, was very much delighted and said to thank you for your trouble. He put us up in the grand preceptor's mansion for two days, while we awaited his answer. He has sent you a black horse as a gift. He sealed up a present of fifty taels of silver for Manager Han, by way of the bride-price for his daughter, and also gave me a gift of twenty taels for my traveling expenses."

"That was only appropriate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When he read the letter he had received in reply, it was no more than an expression of the idea that:

His gratitude knew no bounds.
From this time on, the two households exchanged visiting cards employing the terminology appropriate for married relations and addressed each other as kinsmen. But no more of this.

When Han Tao-kuo had kowtowed in gratitude and was about to go home, Hsi-men Ch'ing said to him, "Manager Han, you must keep this bride-price for your daughter as a fitting reward for the kindness the two of you displayed in raising her."

Han Tao-kuo repeatedly refused to accept it, saying, "Thanks to your gracious magnanimity, we have already received compensation some time ago. How could it be right for me to accept this silver in addition? We've already imposed upon you more than enough as it is."

"If you don't agree," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll be annoyed. Take it home with you, but don't spend it. I've got something in mind for it."

Han Tao-kuo then kowtowed in gratitude, took his leave, and went home. When his wife saw that her husband had come back, she was utterly delighted. On the one hand, she took his luggage and brushed the dust off his clothes, while, on the other, she asked how things had gone, and whether their daughter had been well received when they arrived at their destination.

Han Tao-kuo told her about the events of the trip, both going and coming, saying, "It's a very decent establishment. When our daughter arrived there, she was provided with a suite of three rooms for herself, with two maidservants to wait on her, as well as clothing and hair ornaments, it goes without saying. The next day, she was taken to meet the lady of the house. Majordomo Chai was extremely pleased with her. He put us up for two days and regaled us with more wine and food than we or the servants could eat. He also provided a gift of fifty taels of silver, by way of a bride-price, which I repeatedly refused to keep for myself, but His Honor wouldn't take it and insisted that I bring it home with me."

Thereupon he proceeded to turn the silver over to the woman, who put it away. Only then did the woman feel as though:

The stone on her head had finally fallen to the ground.

"Tomorrow," she said, turning to Han Tao-kuo, "we ought to provide a tael of silver as an expression of thanks to Old Mother Feng. While you were away, I have been much indebted to her for constantly coming to keep me company. His Honor has also seen fit to reward her with a tael."

While they were speaking, whom should he see but a maidservant who came in to serve them with tea.

"Where did this young lady come from?" asked Han Tao-kuo.

"This is a maidservant that we have just purchased," the woman replied. "Her name is Chin-erh. Come over here and kowtow to your father."

After she had performed her kowtow, the maidservant went off to the kitchen.

His wife then proceeded, thus and so, to relate the whole story of her affair with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"After you went away, he dropped by here three or four times before coming up with the four taels of silver with which I was able to purchase this maidservant. Every time he comes by, he's good for a tael or two of silver. Han the Second, who really:

Doesn't know his place,¹⁰ got angry about it and came over here looking for trouble, but he happened to run into him and ended up being dragged off to the yamen, where he was beaten to a stinking pulp. Up until now, he hasn't dared show his face around here any more. His Honor, seeing how inconvenient our present location is, has promised to buy a house for us on a main street, and have us move in there to live."

"No wonder he refused to accept this silver just now," said Han Tao-kuo. "He told me to take it home with me, but not to spend it. So this is what it turns out to be about."

"Now that we've already got this fifty taels of silver in hand," the woman said, "in the future he's sure to add a few taels in addition and find a decent house for us. It's all owing to my willingness to surrender my body to him. We might as well take advantage of the opportunity to get what we can out of him and improve our life-style."

"After I've gone to the shop tomorrow," Han Tao-kuo said, "if he should show up, pretend that I don't know anything about it. Don't be remiss in your treatment of him, but cater to his every whim. It's not all that easy to make money these days. How did you ever happen on this way of doing it?"

"You lousy ruffian!" his wife laughed. "You'll drop dead in your tracks someday. You're certainly proficient enough at:

Eating the bread of idleness.¹¹

You don't have any idea what your old lady has had to put up with."

The two of them laughed about it a while longer, after which she fed him his supper, and husband and wife prepared themselves to rest.

The next morning, Han Tao-kuo stopped by the mansion to fetch the keys and then proceeded on his way to open the shop, where he gave Old Mother Feng a tael of silver to reward her for her pains, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

One day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing and Judicial Commissioner Hsia Yen-ling were returning from the yamen, the judicial commissioner noticed that Hsi-men Ch'ing was riding a tall dappled black horse and asked him, "My colleague, how does it happen that you're no longer riding that white horse of yours but have exchanged it for this one? It certainly seems to be a fine steed, but what does it look like in the mouth?"

"I'm letting that horse rest at home for a couple of days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "This horse was sent to me as a gift the other day by my kinsman Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital. It had been presented to him by Assistant Regional Commander Liu of the Hsi-hsia¹² army. It only has four teeth as yet in its mouth. It has a good gait, either fast or slow, its only faults being that it insists on hogging the manger and is prone to kick. When it first arrived, it had lost a good deal of weight from the rigors of the road, but in the last couple of days it is looking better on a regular diet."

"This horse of yours steps along pretty well," said Hsia Yen-ling. "You might as well ride it regularly as you traverse the streets every day, but don't try to take it too far. I would guess that hereabouts it must be worth at least seventy or eighty taels of silver. That horse that I customarily ride was lamed yesterday, so in order to come to the yamen this morning I had to send a note to borrow this horse from a relative of mine. It's been most inconvenient."

"That's no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you don't have a horse at the moment, I've got a sorrel at home that I could let you have."

Judicial Commissioner Hsia raised his hand in acknowledgment and said, "If my colleague will deign to help me out, I will pay you whatever it is worth."

"There's no need to haggle over it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As soon as I get home, I'll send someone over with it."

When the two of them reached the western end of Lion Street, Hsi-men Ch'ing raised his hand in farewell and made his way home. As soon as he arrived there, he sent Tai-an to deliver the horse as he had promised.

When Judicial Commissioner Hsia saw it, he was delighted, rewarded Tai-an with a tael of silver, and gave him a note in reply, saying, "Thank you very much. I'll express my gratitude in person when I arrive at the yamen tomorrow."

After two days had gone by, it being the middle decade of the tenth month, Judicial Commissioner Hsia, having prepared some homemade chrysanthemum wine¹³ and engaged the services of two boy actors, invited Hsi-men Ch'ing over for a chat, as a means of expressing his gratitude for the gift of the horse. Hsi-men Ch'ing, after eating his noonday meal at home and taking care of some business, set out for Hsia Yen-ling's house to attend the party.

It so happens that the judicial commissioner had provided an elaborate feast for the delectation of Hsi-men Ch'ing alone. When he saw that he had arrived, he was:

Unable to contain his delight,¹⁴ hastened down the steps to welcome him, and ushered him into the reception hall, where they exchanged salutations.

"My colleague," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "what need was there for you to go to so much trouble?"

"This year I've had some chrysanthemum wine made in my humble abode," said Hsia Yen-ling. "Being at leisure, I thought I'd see if you would condescend to come by for a chat. I haven't presumed to invite any other guests."

Thereupon, having exchanged the customary amenities, they discarded their formal clothes and sat down in the positions appropriate for guest and host. After tea had been served, they played a board game together and then took their places at the table, where they proceeded to drink wine and chat, while the two boy actors entertained them, playing their instruments and singing by their side. Truly, it is a case of:

Wine is presented in golden goblets, brimming with fragrant foam;
Ivory clappers accompany the psaltery,
as they sing "Partridge Sky."

We will say no more about Hsi-men Ch'ing's participation in the drinking party at Hsia Yen-ling's home.

Let us return to the story of P'an Chin-lien. When she observed what a long time it had been since Hsi-men Ch'ing had paid a visit to her quarters, every day:

Her halcyon hued coverlet felt cold;¹⁵
Her hibiscus bed curtains were chill.¹⁶

That night she left the postern gate ajar, while inside her bedroom:

She brightly lit the silver lamp,
Leaned against the standing screen,
And idly strummed her p'i-p'a.

She kept up her vigil until the second or third watch and sent Ch'un-mei out to look several times, but there was nothing to be seen. Truly:

She who is wont to diligently strum her p'i-p'a
late into the night;
When all alone in her deserted chamber can scarcely bear to play it.¹⁷

Picking up her p'i-p'a and laying it across her lap she gently played a song to the tune "River Water, with Two Variations" in order to dispel her languor. Unable to fall asleep on the bed with her clothes on, what was she to do?

Languidly I lean against the standing screen,
Or force myself to lie down in my clothes.

Suddenly she heard the wind chimes on the eaves of her room:

Make a peal of sound.

Thinking it was Hsi-men Ch'ing who had come and was making the racket with the door knocker, she hastily sent Ch'un-mei out to take a look. But she reported, "Mother, you're mistaken. The wind has come up outside and it's started to snow." The woman then continued to accompany herself as she sang:

I hear the roaring of the wind,
I see the snow blowing against the casement.
Let the frozen flakes flutter!

Before long:

The lamp grew dim and the incense burnt out.¹⁸

She thought to herself that she ought to trim the wick and relight the incense, but, seeing that Hsi-men Ch'ing hadn't come, she felt no inclination to move. She sang:

Too lazy to trim the precious lamp,
Too listless to relight the incense burner;

Truly:

Each day was like three months of autumn;
Each night seemed like half a summer.

P'an Chin-lien on a Snowy Evening Toys with Her P'i-p'a

Even if I last through this night,
I'll only be afraid of the morrow.
The more I think about it, the more I wonder,
when will this botheration ever end?

"You fickle scoundrel!" she thought to herself. "When I think of all the things you said to me at the start, how can I help feeling hurt?"

Coda:
Whenever I think of it, and especially tonight,
it really burns me up!
You've ruined the springtime
of my youth.

"Who would have thought you'd land me in such a fix, with no place to go?" she cursed¹⁹ at him.

From the way you've walked out on me, it's clear:
You may have what it takes to get started,
but you won't carry through!²⁰

To resume our story, around the time of the first watch, Hsi-men Ch'ing left the drinking party at Hsia Yen-ling's and set out for home. The sky was overcast the whole way and the precipitation, which was half rain and half snow, melted as soon as it landed on his clothes. All he could do was whip his horse toward home, lighted along the way by a servant carrying a lantern.

When he arrived, he didn't go into the rear compound but headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where she met him at the door and brushed the snow and sleet off his clothes. Hsi-men Ch'ing was wearing a white satin riding outfit emblazoned with a blue silk mandarin square that featured an embroidered lion,²¹ a "loyal and tranquil hat,"²² black boots, a palmetto cloak, and a sable scarf. After Li P'ing-erh had taken his outer garments, he sat down on the bed, wearing only a loosely cut satin robe, and asked, "Is the young fellow asleep yet?"

"The little fellow's been playing for some time," Li P'ing-erh replied, "but he's just fallen asleep."

"Let the child sleep," Hsi-men Ch'ing directed her. "We'll have to avoid any heavy movements or we may startle him awake."

Ying-ch'un then brought them some tea. When they had finished drinking it, Li P'ing-erh asked, "How did you happen to come home from your drinking party so early today?"

"It's all because of that horse I gave him the other day," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that Hsia Yen-ling went to the trouble of laying on a feast today, entirely on my account. He also engaged the services of two young actors. After I'd enjoyed his hospitality for quite a while, I noticed that it had started to snow, so I came home early."

"Would you like some wine?" Li P'ing-erh asked. "I can get the maidservant to decant some for you. You must be chilled from making your way home through the heavy snow."

"If there's still some of that grape wine around," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can decant some of that for me. The wine he served at his place today was a chrysanthemum wine he had made for himself. It tasted pretty insipid to me, so I didn't really have a lot to drink."

Ying-ch'un then brought out a table with several saucers of marinated chicken appetizers, fancy fruit and vegetable delicacies, and the like. Li P'ing-erh sat down on a stool to one side and ordered a small brazier to be placed underneath the table.

While the two of them were having a drink together in Li P'ing-erh's bedroom, P'an Chin-lien, all by herself in her deserted quarters, was sitting on the bed fondling her p'i-p'a. On her table:

The lamp grew dim and the candle guttered out.

At one and the same time, she wanted to go to sleep but was afraid that Hsi-men Ch'ing might turn up after all, and she wanted to stay awake but kept nodding with fatigue. And on top of everything else, it was cold. There was nothing for it but to remove her headdress:

Carelessly coil her raven tresses, let down one side of her bed curtains, and:

Sit there all wrapped up in her coverlet.

Truly:

Leaning languidly against the embroidered bed,²³

she's too depressed to sleep;

Inside the hanging brocade bed curtains

the embroidered coverlet is empty.

"It's all too obvious that my fickle lover has lightly abandoned me.

How could he bring himself to thus betray my ever loving heart?"

Once again she started to sing, to the same tune as before:

I hate my fickle lover for lightly abandoning me.

Depressed and apart, I give way to idle annoyance.

She called Ch'un-mei over to her once more, saying, "Go outside and take another look to see if your father's showed up or not; and report back to me right away."

Ch'un-mei went out and returned after some time, saying, "Mother, you still delude yourself into thinking Father hasn't come home, do you? When Father came home he couldn't be bothered coming in here. Who's that drinking wine in the Sixth Lady's rooms if it isn't him?"

Nothing might have happened if the woman had not heard these words, but having heard them:

It was just as if she were being stabbed in the heart with one knife after another.

She cursed him a number of times for a fickle scoundrel, and, before she knew it, with a gush, the tears began to flow from her eyes. Putting her p'i-p'a high out of reach, she continued her song:

They say, "Murder may be excused;
But reason cannot be evaded."²⁴
"No fickle deed escapes the eye of Heaven."

"Just thinking about it reminds me how much I love him, on the one hand, and how much I hate him, on the other."

"The pain of heartache is hard to dispel."
"In a sorrowful breast depression feeds on itself."

"You lousy, heartless lover!" she cried out. "What's she got that I haven't got?

This salt is just as salty;
This vinegar just as sour.²⁵
This brick is just as thick;
This tile just as thin.²⁶

Then, one fine day, you:
Abandoned the old in favor of the new."²⁷

You've, "Cast off a sweet peach,
To seek out a sour date."²⁸

"I never should have fallen for you in the first place."

While I've completely, "Misread the stars on your steelyard."²⁹

Coda:

Whenever I think of it,
it really burns me up!

You've ruined the springtime
of my youth.

From the way you've walked out on me, it's clear:

You may have what it takes to get started,
but you won't carry through.³⁰

Truly:

If you're going to be a human being,
don't be a woman;

Or your every joy and sorrow will be dependent on another.³¹

It's the old story of the, "Fond female and the fickle fellow";³²

If only she hadn't taken him so seriously
to begin with.

Once again she started to sing, to the same tune as before:

I'll always remember the first time we met;
When I fondly imagined we'd grow old together.

"Who would have thought that today he'd have a change of heart; that one fine day he'd lightly cast me aside and pay me no further heed? It's just like those times when:"

The Ch'u peak was shrouded in clouds;³³
The Blue Bridge was inundated by water;³⁴
The male and female phoenixes were driven asunder.

"So that now:

Though we talk, face to face,
Our hearts are separated by a thousand mountains.³⁵
Though divided by a single wall,
Those few feet prevent our seeing each other."

Our hearts are distant, though the road's not far.

"Our love has dissolved:
Like salt falling into water;
Like water falling upon sand."

Our feelings are estranged, so letters are few.

"In vain do I find myself:
Possessed of a plaint without a place to lodge it."

The Earth is thick and Heaven is high.³⁶

"In vain do I find myself:
Lacking a dream to take me to the Radiant Terrace."³⁷

My dreams are interrupted, my soul is troubled.³⁸
My handsome lover, at the critical juncture, has had a change of heart.

Coda:
Whenever I think of it,
it really burns me up!
You've ruined the springtime
of my youth.
From the way you've walked out on me, it's clear:
You may have what it takes to get started,
but you won't carry through.³⁹

Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking wine with Li P'ing-erh in her bedroom when he suddenly heard the sound of someone playing the p'i-p'a in a nearby dwelling. "Who's playing the p'i-p'a?" he asked.

"It's the sound of the Fifth Lady, over there, playing her p'i-p'a," replied Ying-ch'un.

"So the Fifth Lady hasn't gone to bed yet," said Li P'ing-erh. "Hsiu-ch'un, run over there and ask the Fifth Lady to come have a drink of wine. Say, 'It's Mother who invites you.'"

When Hsiu-ch'un had gone, Li P'ing-erh hastily directed Ying-ch'un, "Put another place at the table and set out a wine cup and chopsticks."

Some time later, Hsiu-ch'un came back and reported, "The Fifth Lady has already taken down her hair. She won't come."

"Ying-ch'un," said Li P'ing-erh, "You go and ask the Fifth Lady again. Say, 'Mother and Father both invite the Fifth Lady.'"

Not long afterwards, Ying-ch'un came back and reported, "The Fifth Lady has locked the postern gate. She says she's already blown out the lamp and gone to bed."

"Don't you believe a word that little whore says," exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Let's go over there, the two of us, and drag her here, by main force if necessary. It would be fun to play a board game with her."

Thereupon, he and Li P'ing-erh went over together and knocked at her postern gate. They had to knock for some time before Ch'un-mei came out and opened the door for them. Hsi-men Ch'ing, pulling Li P'ing-erh behind him, went right into her bedroom, where they found the woman sitting inside the bed curtains with the p'i-p'a lying beside her.

"You crazy little whore!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how come you have to be asked two or three times, and still refuse to come?"

Chin-lien just sat there on her bed:

Without turning a hair,⁴⁰ and pulling a long face. It was some time before she spoke. "It's only appropriate that someone so out of favor should be relegated to this desolate chamber. As long as you're determined to let me:

Fend for myself,

what's the point of coming around to pay me any further attention? Don't waste your affections here; save them for someplace they'll be better appreciated."

"You crazy slave!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"An eighty-year-old crone may lack teeth,

But she's still got plenty of lip.

Sister Li is inviting you over to her place to play a board game with her. She's been waiting all this time and you still haven't come."

"What's wrong, Sister?" said Li P'ing-erh. "We've already set out the pieces over in my room. We've both got time on our hands. Come play a game and we'll wager a cup of wine on it."

"Sister Li," said Chin-lien, "the two of you go right ahead. I've already taken down my hair. You wouldn't understand, but I'm really not interested in anything at the moment. I'm going to go to bed. I don't feel free and easy like the rest of you. These last few days I've barely been hanging on. Not even a drop of:

Saffron soup or plain water, has crossed my lips. It's all I can do nowadays to put a good face on it and go through the motions."

"You crazy slave!" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You're perfectly fine. What's the matter with you? If you haven't been feeling well inside, why haven't you told me about it, so I could call in a doctor to examine you?"

"If you don't believe me," said Chin-lien, "just ask Ch'un-mei to bring me my mirror. Let me take another look. These last few days I've gotten so thin I hardly seem human."

Ch'un-mei actually brought the mirror and handed it to the woman, who looked at herself by lamplight. Truly:

Ashamed to face the caltrop-patterned mirror,
and retouch her powdered makeup;
She has wasted away on her lover's account, losing the freshness of her complexion.
Closing her door, she is no longer concerned with the idle breeze and moonlight;
Henceforth she will leave it to the plum blossoms to do whatever they please.⁴¹

Once again she started to sing, to the same tune as before:

Ashamed to face the caltrop-patterned mirror;
Too listless to paint in my moth eyebrows;
Secretly, my spirits have wasted away,
My good looks have become ravaged,
I am utterly emaciated and none too well.

Hsi-men Ch'ing snatched the mirror out of her hands and looked at himself, saying, "Am I any less emaciated than you are?"

"Who can be compared to you?" demanded Chin-lien. "Every day, what with:

Wine by the bowl and meat by the hunk,⁴² you're forever fattening yourself up, only the better to give other people a hard time."

At this point, Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Without permitting any further explanation,
sat down unceremoniously on the bed right beside her, embraced her by the neck, and gave her a kiss. Exploring underneath the quilt with his hand, he ascertained that she had not yet undressed, whereupon he stuck both hands into her waistband and said, "My child, it's true you've lost a little weight."

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "Your hands are ice-cold! I'm freezing to death. Did you think I was only trying to fool you? Truly:"

The fragrance has faded from the begonia's beauty;
The clothing is slack around the willow waist.

Pearly tears cascaded over her fragrant cheeks as she continued her complaint, "Nobody knows the troubles I endure. All I can do is:

Consign my tears to my stomach."⁴³

Depression only augments my boredom,
Do what I will to dispel it;
And now, even my store of pearly tears is utterly exhausted.

Coda:

Whenever I think of it,
it really burns the hell out of me!
You've ruined the springtime
of my youth.

From the way you've walked out on me, it's clear:
You may have what it takes to get started,
but you won't follow through.⁴⁴

After a brief altercation, Hsi-men Ch'ing finally succeeded in dragging her off:
Willy-nilly, dead or alive,⁴⁵ to Li P'ing-erh's bedroom, where they played a board game and drank together for a while. When she got up to go, Li P'ing-erh noticed the sour expression on her face and persuaded Hsi-men Ch'ing to go over to her place to spend the night.

Truly, it was a case of:

When her waist is thin you can be sure she's upset about something;
Traces of tears indicate the depth of the sorrow of separation.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Ever since their separation, she has lost
the freshness of her complexion;
Tossing and turning a myriad or a thousand times,⁴⁶
she is too listless to leave her bed.⁴⁷
It was only due to the intercession of P'ing-erh, who chose to do her a favor;
That the Goddess of Witches' Mountain was able to have her tryst with King Hsiang.⁴⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 39

HSI-MEN CH'ING HOLDS CHIAO RITES AT THE TEMPLE OF THE JADE EMPEROR; WU YÜEH- NIANG LISTENS TO BUDDHIST NUNS RECITING THEIR SACRED TEXTS

Emperor Wu of the Han ordained lustral rituals, erecting an altar at night;
Pouring libations of numinous water, he offered chiao rites to the immortals.
In front of the palace halls Jade Maidens arranged the incense tables;
At the edge of the clouds brazen colossi elevated dew-catching pans.¹
When will the crimson standards of the goddess ever reappear in his dream?
Where are the peaches of immortality that might enable him to mount the phoenix?²
In his tomb at Mao-ling the buried armaments are shrouded in mist and rain;
The stone horses that mark the site are silent, the spreading creepers are cold.³

THE STORY GOES that on that occasion Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in P'an Chin-lien's quarters. The woman's only regret was that she couldn't:

Bore her way into his belly.⁴
Beside the pillow she:
Played up to him a thousand ways,
Ensnared him with a myriad wiles;⁵
Wiping away her tears with mermaid silk,
Responding to him with warm compliance;

hoping thereby that she could engross her lover's heart. How could she have known that Hsi-men Ch'ing had already initiated an affair on the outside with Han Tao-kuo's wife, Wang Liu-erh?

For this woman he had laid out a hundred twenty taels of silver to purchase a house on the east side of the stone bridge on Lion Street. The house consisted of a twelve-foot-wide frontage and four interior courtyards, receding along a vertical axis. The second courtyard was occupied by a passageway in addition to a nine-foot-wide reception room. The third courtyard consisted of a three-foot-wide anteroom for the display of Buddhist effigies and ancestral tablets, a six-foot-wide living apartment, in the interior of which there were the usual recessed k'ang frame and, across from it, a fire pit for burning charcoal, all of which had been newly replastered. The fourth courtyard, in addition to a six-foot-wide kitchen, contained a three-foot-wide storage room for charcoal and space in the rear for a latrine, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Ever since they moved into their new house, the neighbors in the area were all aware that Han Tao-kuo was a manager employed by Hsi-men Ch'ing. In addition, noticing the fact that he wore an outfit of tailored damask clothing and swaggered his way along the street, and that his wife constantly did herself up till her head was aglitter with gold and made herself conspicuous by standing at the front gate, they did not dare to be remiss. All of them sent boxes of tea and presents to celebrate the housewarming. Those of middling social standing addressed them as Brother Han and Sister-in-law Han, while those of lower status addressed them as Uncle and Aunt.

Whenever Hsi-men Ch'ing came to visit, Han Tao-kuo would spend the night at the shop, leaving his wife to entertain him, so they could:

Enjoy themselves to their heart's content.

Mornings and evenings succeeded one another, and the neighbors all became aware of what was going on, but they were afraid of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who possessed both money and influence, so who would have dared to cross him? It was observed that, in the course of a month, Hsi-men Ch'ing would come to pay her a visit three or four times; that he and Wang Liu-erh were:

As hot for each other as burning charcoal;⁶
and that the clothes she wore and the household furnishings were no longer what they had been in the past.

Before anyone knew it, the twelfth month came around, and Hsi-men Ch'ing found himself busy at home preparing

New Year's gifts to be sent to people in the Eastern Capital, the officials of the local prefecture and district, the local army and guard units, and the yamen of his own Embroidered Uniform Guard. Abbot Wu of the Temple of the Jade Emperor sent a disciple of his to deliver four boxes of presents to him. One box contained pork, one box contained whitebait, and two boxes contained stuffed steamed-shortcake pastries. He also delivered the texts of the memorials to Heaven and Earth customarily burnt on New Year's Eve, new spring talismans consisting of auspicious couplets to be pasted up on either side of the front gate on New Year's Day, and a writ thanking the Kitchen God for his good offices, to be burnt on the eve of his annual departure, on the twenty-fourth day of the twelfth month, to report to the Jade Emperor on the conduct of the family during the preceding year.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the master suite eating a meal when Tai-an brought in his card, which read, "Respectfully presented by the humble Taoist prelate of the Temple of the Jade Emperor, Wu Tsung-che." Hsi-men Ch'ing opened the boxes to take a look and said, "He is someone who has left home to become a priest, yet I have put him to the trouble of sending me these generous gifts."

He then instructed Tai-an, "Go immediately and get Shu-t'ung to seal up a tael of silver and send a card to him in reply."

Yüeh-niang, who was at his side, responded to the situation by saying, "He is someone who has left home to become a priest, yet at:

The head of the year or the tail of the festival, you are always accepting presents from him. It appears that you have forgotten the vow you made some time ago, when Sister Li bore her child, to sponsor a performance, of such and such a magnitude, of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal. You might as well have him perform it."

"It's lucky you mentioned it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I vowed to sponsor a performance of a hundred twenty degrees of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal, but I completely forgot about it."

"You're just an inveterate chatterbox!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "Whose vow was it, that you should forget it so easily? If you make a vow, in which:

The words are mouthed but the heart isn't in it,⁷ the gods will all remember it. No wonder the child is forever:

Moaning and groaning.⁸
It so happens that this unfulfilled vow is oppressing him. It's all your doing."

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll fulfill my vow by arranging to have the chiao rites that I promised celebrated during the first month of the new year at Abbot Wu's temple."

"Yesterday," Yüeh-niang said, "Sister Li reported that the child was suffering from aches and pains and asked if there were any place where we could go to seek the protection of a religious name for him."

"Why should we go anywhere else to seek a religious name for him?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "We might as well arrange a naming ceremony for him in Abbot Wu's temple."

Then, turning to Tai-an, he asked, "Who is it who came from the temple?"

"It's his second disciple, Ying-ch'un, who delivered the presents," replied Tai-an.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon stepped outside to see him, Ying-ch'un hastily strode forward and kowtowed, saying, "My master bids me express his respects to Your Honor on his behalf. Having nothing else fit to offer on this occasion, he has sent me to deliver these memorials to Heaven and Earth, and some insignificant gifts for you to give away to someone if you like."

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned only half a salutation to him, saying, "Many thanks to your master for his generous presents."

Upon being offered a seat, the disciple demurred, saying, "How could I presume to be seated?"

"Sit down," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There's something I want to say to you."

The Taoist acolyte was wearing an informal skullcap on his head, his body was clad in a long black cotton gown, while below he wore sandals and white socks. Only after declining several times did he move a chair over and sit down to one side.

After drinking the new tea that Hsi-men Ch'ing called for, he asked, "What are Your Honor's commands?"

"During the first month of the new year," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I would like to fulfill a vow that I have made by troubling your master to perform a number of chiao rites in your temple. On the same day, I would like to enroll my young son under your master's protection by having him bestow a religious name upon him. But I don't know whether your master will be free or not."

The acolyte hastily stood up, saying, "If Your Honor were to ordain such a thing, no matter what ceremonies anyone else might commission, my master would not presume to undertake them. Permit me to ask Your Honor, on what date would you like the ceremony to take place?"

"You might as well arrange it on the ninth," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the birthday of His Lordship. Make it that day."

"That is, indeed, the birthday of the Jade Emperor, the Lord of Heaven," responded the acolyte, "as is clearly recorded in the Register of the Jade Casket.⁹ Ritual authorities have declared it a suitable day for celebration. The gods of the five blessings will be in conjunction. That is a most auspicious time for the celebration of a fast or the performance of chiao rites.¹⁰ On that day we will open up the main hall of the temple in order to set up an altar on Your Honor's behalf. May I inquire of Your Honor, how elaborate would you like the rites to be?"

"Earlier this year, during the sixth month,"¹¹ said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "upon the occasion of siring a young son, I swore a vow to sponsor the performance of a hundred twenty degrees of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal. Up until now, I have been too distracted to undertake it, but I might as well arrange to fulfill the vow next month. I'll turn my young son over to your master so he can dedicate him to the protection of the Three Treasures¹² and solicit the conferral of a religious name upon him."

"May I ask," said the acolyte, "how many officiants you would like to employ on the day of the ceremony?"

"Have your master engage the services of sixteen priests," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When they had finished speaking, his attendants provided a table and served another round of tea. Hsi-men Ch'ing first sealed up fifteen taels of silver to pay for the ceremony and then sealed up another tael as recompense for the Abbot's festival gifts.

He then went on to say, "There is no need for your master to lay out anything in the way of compensation for the celebrants. I'll see to the provision of everything required in the way of paper money, incense, candles, and so forth."

This pleased the acolyte so much he was ready to:

Fart ferociously and pee in his pants.

As he prepared to take his leave, he thanked him again and again and kowtowed more than once.

When the eighth day of the first month came round, Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an ahead to deliver a picul of white rice, a carrier-load of paper money, ten catties of government-grade candles, five catties of aloeswood, sandalwood, and mirabilite for the making of incense, and twelve bolts of porous ramie fabric, to provide for the needs of the celebrants. He also sent two bolts of capital brocade, two jugs of southern wine, four fresh geese, four fresh chickens, a pair of pig's trotters, a leg of lamb, and ten taels of silver, as a gratuity for Kuan-ko's naming ceremony. Hsi-men Ch'ing had also sent out invitations, inviting his brothers-in-law Wu K'ai and Hua Tzu-yü, Ying Po-chüeh, and Hsieh Hsi-ta to join him for the ceremony. The same day, Ch'en Ching-chi also rode out on donkeyback to make an obeisance on Hsi-men Ch'ing's behalf.

On the ninth, Hsi-men Ch'ing did not go to the yamen but got up bright and early, donned his official cap and girdle, set off on his large white horse, followed by a retinue of servants:

Clamoring in front and crowding behind, and proceeded out the East Gate in the direction of the Temple of the Jade Emperor. From a distance he could see the bunting and pennants and the temporary arches spanning the street, with their announcements of the nature of the ceremony. He had proceeded no more than about five li outside the gate when he arrived at the Temple of the Jade Emperor and dismounted outside the gate. When he opened his eyes wide and took a good look, truly, it was an imposing temple edifice, resembling a celestial palace in its construction. Behold:

The verdant pines are luxuriant,
The emerald cypresses are dense.¹³
Gilt nails emboss vermilion gates,¹⁴
Jade arches cast shadows within the sacred halls;
Azure tiles bedeck sculpted eaves,¹⁵
Embroidered drapes hang over jeweled balustrades.¹⁶
The forty-two-foot-wide great hall,
Displays an imperial plaque in gold characters;
The two long colonnades flanking it,¹⁷
Exhibit colorful frescoes of gods and generals.
Amid the shadows of auspicious clouds,
The gateways with their entablatures reach high into the azure skies,¹⁸
Under the light of a propitious haze,
The Yü-lo Terrace of Grand Veil Heaven¹⁹
 soars straight into the milky way.
In their golden palaces,
Are arrayed the presiding deities of the Thirty Two Heavens;²⁰
In the White Jade Capitoline,²¹
They emit a myriad rays of light from between their eyebrows.²²
Outside the gates of the Three Heavens,²³
Li-lou and Shih-k'uang manifest their bellicosity;²⁴
Beside the stairs, to left and right,
The White Tiger and Green Dragon show their intrepidity.²⁵
Before the main hall, immortal consorts and Jade Maidens,
Attired in roseate shawls present offerings of tulips;
Beneath the jade steps, the four ministers and nine chamberlains, Shod in red shoes do homage before vermilion phoenix gates.

 On a nine-dragon throne sits the indestructible golden body,²⁶
 Of the supreme patriarch of the myriad heavens,
 The Jade Emperor and prime deity, surnamed Chang.²⁷
 On his head he wears the royal crown with twelve tassels;²⁸
 His body is clad in an azure-hued imperial dragon robe;
 His waist is bound by a girdle adorned with Indigo Field jade.²⁹ Correlating himself with the eight trigrams and nine palaces,³⁰ Grasping in his hands a tablet of white jade,
 He monitors compliance with the three refuges and five precepts.³¹
 When the metal bell is struck,
 The sentient beings of three chiliocosms³²
 all confess their allegiance.
 When the jade chime is sounded,
 The myriad phenomena in their diversity³³ unite to worship the ultimate.
 In the Homage to Heaven Pavilion, Empyrean breezes waft down the sound of pacing the void.³⁴
 On the Altar for Ritual Performance, Moonlit nights make audible the tinkle of immortal pendants.
 Just such as this must surely be the true Purple Elysium;³⁵
 What need is there to seek elsewhere
 the Isles of the Blest?³⁶

As Hsi-men Ch'ing entered through the main gate, he noticed that, suspended from either side of the first entablatured gateway, there was a pair of seven-foot-long vermilion tablets on which were inscribed in large characters these parallel statements:

The shining zodiac is revealed in the sky,
 Auspiciously opening the celestial portals of the Nine Heavens,
 As we greet golden chariots with their halcyon canopies and acquire grace.
 The mysterious altar is bathed in sunlight,
 Brightly illuminating the heraldic pennants of the myriad sages,
 As we incant the holy scriptures in their jeweled cases and preach salvation.

When he reached the main hall, there was suspended a twenty-four-character announcement of the ritual to be performed, written in a large script, which read:

Numinous Treasure³⁷ ritual altar erected in order to:

Recompense Heaven and compensate Earth,³⁸
 Requite the state for benefits received,
 Enact nine recitations of the Jade Pivot,³⁹
 Fulfill the covenant by conferring a name,
 And universally bestow auspicious fortune.

To either side there hung the following parallel statements:

Anterior Heaven⁴⁰ establishes the ultimate;
 Looking up to the loftiness of the Great Tao,
 We are able to display our utmost sincerity.
 The Supernal Emperor accords his presence;

Scrutinizing the sedulousness of the rituals,
By means of which we requite his vast favor.

Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded to the front of the incense table in the altar space, where a young attendant offered him a basin and towel. When he had finished washing his hands, a verger knelt down and requested him to offer incense. A rug was laid for him on which he completed the ceremony of paying homage to the altar.

It so happens that Abbot Wu's personal name was Tsung-che, and his religious name was Tao-chen. He was of imposing stature and had a full beard, an uninhibited temperament,⁴¹ a wide circle of acquaintances, and a charitable disposition. At present he was serving as the abbot of the Temple of the Jade Emperor. For this reason many persons of high status and prominent officials chose to patronize him. The chiao rituals and other ceremonies that he presided over were sure to be all that they should be, and, in:

Welcoming visitors and treating guests,⁴² his manner was congenial. He also had three to five disciples and acolytes⁴³ who were:

At his beck and call.⁴⁴

The members of Hsi-men Ch'ing's brotherhood of ten frequently had chiao rites performed there and on birthdays and festivals did not fail to supply donations for the services performed. How much more was this true of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who had become an officer in the judicial system and had provided lavish gifts in order to sponsor a ritual performance and enroll his son under his protection through the bestowal of a religious name. Abbot Wu could not help but treat him with respect, and on that day he had undertaken to act as chief celebrant in presiding over the ceremony.

On his head he wore a ninefold-yang thunder cap⁴⁵ adorned with a jade ring, his body was clothed in a wide-sleeved ultramarine vestment on which were represented the constellations of the twenty eight lunar mansions, and his waist was enclosed with a silken sash.

Hastening down from the lectern, he saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing in the Taoist manner by touching one hand to his forehead, saying, "This humble Taoist has been the recipient of Your Honor's misplaced affection and repeatedly lavished gifts, to such an extent that it would be:

Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept.

As for the bestowal of a religious name upon your son, it is only appropriate that I should respectfully entreat the Three Treasures to assure his well-being and prolong his life. It would hardly be a sufficient return for Your Honor's past kindness for me to do so. How can I consent to accept the additional generous gifts that you have seen fit to bestow upon me? It is truly embarrassing. The compensation you have provided for the performance of the ceremony is also overly munificent, which makes me even more uneasy."

"I have put you to a great deal of trouble and effort," said Hsi-men Ch'ing:

"Without having anything to offer in return."⁴⁶

These paltry gifts are no more than an expression of my feelings."

When they had finished exchanging amenities, the Taoist priests on either side came up to salute him, and he was invited to retire to the abbot's outer quarters, an eighteen-foot-wide open chamber called Pine Crane Studio. It was embellished on all sides with translucent vermilion latticework and was a pleasant place to sit while being served tea. Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that the four walls were whitewashed, an ornamental rock formation was elegantly displayed, and the chairs and tables in the room were shiny. On the left and right sides were suspended the following parallel lines:

From the Yellow Crane Tower he ascends in broad daylight;⁴⁷
Over the Tung-t'ing Lake he has passed for the third time.⁴⁸

On the back wall were a pair of framed hanging scrolls displaying the following couplet in cursive calligraphy:

Raising two sleeves swelled by a clear breeze⁴⁹
we posture like cranes;
Facing a chamber suffused with bright moonlight
we expound the scriptures.⁵⁰

Hsi-men Ch'ing had no sooner sat down than he instructed his page boy, Ch'i-t'ung, "Take the horse and go to fetch Master Ying the Second. I fear he may not have a horse available, otherwise he ought to have been here by now."

"The donkey ridden by your son-in-law is still here," said Tai-an.

"That will do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, and he ordered Ch'i-t'ung, "Mount it quickly and go to fetch him."

Ch'i-t'ung then led the donkey out the temple gate, mounted it, and went straight off on his errand.

Abbot Wu, having finished with the scripture he was reciting, came down from the lectern, offered his guest a cup of tea, and sat down to chat with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Cognizant as I am of the:

Single-minded sincerity,⁵¹

with which Your Honor reveres the gods," he said, "I could hardly presume to offend you by being remiss. The entire clerical staff got up at the fourth watch and reported to the altar in order to commence the task of incanting the various sacred texts and the Scripture on the Deeds of the Jade Emperor.⁵² Today we will perform in their entirety the rituals of the three audiences and the nine recitations of the Jade Pivot. I have also prepared a document containing the eight characters that determine your son's horoscope and presented it before the Three Treasures, conferring upon him the religious name Wu Ying-yüan, and invoking the wish that:

The Grand Monad, the Director of Destiny,
And T'ao K'ang, whose cognomen is Ho-yen,⁵³
Shall eternally guarantee his longevity,
And maintain his wealth and distinction.

In addition, I have taken it upon myself to augment the program with twenty-four degrees of ritual expressing gratitude to Heaven and Earth, twelve degrees in praise of the Sovereign Deity, and twenty-four degrees for the salvation of the departed, making a chiao ceremony of one hundred eighty degrees in all."

"You have gone to a lot of trouble," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long the ritual drum began to sound and Hsi-men Ch'ing was invited to enter the altar space and peruse the documents. Changing into his scarlet ceremonial robe with its variegated mandarin square featuring an embroidered lion, and wearing a girdle round his waist decorated with a plaque of gilded rhinoceros horn, Hsi-men Ch'ing entered the altar space, where a lector, who was standing by in his crimson mantle of descent,⁵⁴ proceeded to declaim the text of the announcement, laying out the nature and purpose of the ceremony, as follows:

In order to uphold the Way and invoke grace, fulfill the chiao rites and ensure well-being, the faithful office holder Hsi-men Ch'ing, resident of such and such a precinct and subprecinct of Ch'ing-ho district in Shantung province of the Great Sung Empire, who was born at midnight on the twenty-eighth day of the seventh month in the year ping-yin; joined by his wife, née Wu, who was born at midnight on the fifteenth day of the eighth month in the year wu-tien.

"Are there any other relations of yours that I have failed to include?" the lector interrupted his recitation to ask.

"Just add my spouse, née Li," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "who was born at noon on the fifteenth day of the first month in the year hsin-wei, and our son, Kuan-ko, who was born at 4:00 P.M. on the twenty-third day of the sixth month in the year ping-shen."

On behalf of myself and my aforesaid dependents, I, Hsi-men Ch'ing, wish on this occasion to express my sincere devotion, and invoke your vast magnanimity. Insignificant creature that I am, a representative of the least of the Three Powers,⁵⁵ in my comings and goings, rising and repose, I am constantly aware of the protection of dragon kings and devas; as the seasons of cold and heat alternate, I am forever conscious of the support vouchsafed by deities and sages. By office enrolled in the ranks of military officials, I am fortunate to have been attached to the Palace Guard. Basking in the gracious light of imperial favor, I enjoy the disposition of generous emoluments. Ever since my appointment to office in the judicial system, I have sought a means to repay my debt of gratitude for the glorious age in which I have been born and the protection and support on which I rely. For this reason I am sponsoring the performance of a chiao rite of twenty-four degrees, to requite Heaven and Earth for their vast favor, and repay the imperial sovereign for his liberal beneficence. In addition I am sponsoring a chiao rite of twelve degrees, on this occasion of the birthday of the Lord of Heaven, in praise of the various sovereign lords and perfected lords, and to solicit the extension of the five blessings, and invite the descent of the heavenly worthies. Also, on the twenty-third day of the sixth month of last year, my secondary wife, née Li, gave birth to a son, Kuan-ko, and in order to pray for:

An untroubled accouchement, and
A fortunate parturition,

I promised to entrust my aforesaid son, Kuan-ko, to the protection of the Three Treasures, under the religious name of Wu Ying-yüan, in the hope that he would reach maturity in safety. Moreover, I vowed before Heaven and Earth to sponsor the performance of a chiao rite of one hundred twenty degrees, to ensure the continuation of my paternal line, and prolong the life of my child. Also, in order to pray for the salvation of the souls of the departed ancestors of the Hsi-men household for the past three generations, my grandfather Hsi-men Ching-liang, my grandmother, née Li, my father Hsi-men Ta, my mother, née Hsia, my deceased wife, née Ch'en, together with the souls of those who died before and will die after them, whether they should have ascended to Heaven or fallen into Hell, I have sponsored the performance of a chiao ceremony of twenty-four degrees, in the expectation that with the merciful assistance of the power of the Tao, they will all be entitled to rebirth in a higher sphere. The entire program thus consists of a chiao ceremony of one hundred eighty degrees, which I beseech you in your transforming mercy to acknowledge as the fulfillment of my vow. On this, the ninth day of the first month of the third year of the Hsüan-ho reign period,⁵⁶ on the propitious occasion of the birthday of the Lord of Heaven, I have reverently engaged the services of these duly ordained Taoist officiants to perform a plenary, day and night, Numinous Treasure ritual, in order to recompense Heaven and compensate Earth, requite the state and fulfill the covenant, glorify the spirits and ensure well-being, confer a religious name and recite the scriptures, and universally bestow auspicious fortune. I hereby invoke the presence of the presiding worthies of the Three Realms and invite the participation of the deities of the myriad heavens, that I may daily derive joy from exposure to their pure radiance, as they go in and out through the Golden Gate; and in the hope that they will periodically bestow desirable posts upon me, and vouchsafe me patents of nobility that will enhance my prestige, that my entire household may ever enjoy equal well-being, and that in all four seasons their public and private undertakings shall prosper. It is only by respectfully invoking the power of the Tao that such great blessings may be anticipated. Such is my reverent intent.

When the text of the announcement had been declaimed, a large number of documents and talismans were laid out, which the lector invited Hsi-men Ch'ing to examine one by one.

Opening up the first of these, he said, "This is the text of the announcement of your son's election to quit the world and devote himself to a Taoist vocation, and a petition of invocation addressed to the Sovereign Deity who presides over the Three Realms of the Three Heavens, the Perfected Lords of the Ten Directions, the Three Officers and Four Sages, the executive officers of the Great Mystic Metropolis, the celestial official the Perfected Lord of August Satisfaction, the celestial official the Perfected Lord of the Bureau of Chiao Rites, and the celestial official the Perfected Lord of the Bureau of Divine Descent, requesting their presence in the altar space in order to validate and superintend the proceedings."

Opening up the second document, he said, "This is a petition of invocation addressed to the Great Heaven-reaching Life-governing Sacred God of the Eastern Peak, the Goddess of Sons and Grandsons, the Sacred Mother Goddess Who Superintends Birth and Safeguards Confinement, as well as the gods who received your prayer on the occasion when you first made your promise, asking them to clear your account by accepting today's ceremony as the fulfillment of your original vow. The officiants will burn perpetual incense to the numinous deities of the three religions to ensure that they clear the account created by Your Honor's original vow, and also issue a summons to the functionaries of the seventy-five bureaus of the underworld, requiring their attendance in the altar space to accept the prayers for the salvation of the souls of the departed members of your family and escort them to rebirth in Heaven.

"This lot consists of orders authorizing the submission of memorials to the gates of the Three Heavens by the Jade Maidens, numinous officers, gods and generals, functionaries of the Merit Sections who transmit talismans, tutelary gods, and other relevant deities.

"This one is a potent talisman summoning the myriad gods of the Heaven of Jade Clarity and requiring them to take cognizance of the official documents dispatched by the high priest.

"This one is a talisman addressed to the Great General of the Bell of Fluid Gold and Fire,⁵⁷ the concretization of the Yang Rays of the Nine Stars of the Big Dipper, commanding him to open the Gates of Heaven."

When they had finished looking at the material there, the lector conducted Hsi-men Ch'ing to another table, where he opened up the first document and said, "This is an invocation issued at the morning audience, inviting the Unflattering Grand Guardian Marshal K'ang, the Bearer of Efficacious Talismans from the Nine Heavens and Inspector of the Rites, to exercise strict supervision over the ceremony, and monitor the kitchen facilities.

"This document is an invocation inviting the Protectors of the Orthodox Way, the Four Great Marshals Ma, Chao, Wen, and Kuan,⁵⁸ and the Four Great Celestial Lords Ts'ui, Lu, Tou, and Teng,⁵⁹ to oversee the altar space and guard the portals; and inviting the Four Potent Divine Lords of the Mysterious Altar, and the Nine-headed Phoenix, the General-in-chief Who Purges Pollution,⁶⁰ to cleanse the altar space and dispel pollution in order to attract the Perfected Lords.

"This lot consists of a memorandum dispatched at the morning audience, invoking the presence of the Five Masters, and another memorandum dispatched at the evening audience thanking the Five Masters.

"This lot consists of true writs ordaining the recreation of the two cosmic entities, yin and yang, the raising of the curtain,⁶¹ and the transformation of the altar.

"This lot consists of a yang missive inviting the General-in-chief of the Divine Empyrean Who Dispels Pollution to sound the metal bell, and a yin missive inviting the General-in-chief of the Divine Empyrean Who Seals the Altar to strike the jade chime.⁶²

"This lot consists of invocations in seal script addressed to the Perfected Beings Who Preside over the Five Directions, i.e., the true writ in jade characters addressed to the Ruler of the Eastern Heaven of the Nine Pneumas, the true writ in jade characters addressed to the Ruler of the Southern Heaven of the Three Pneumas, the true writ in jade characters addressed to the Ruler of the Western Heaven of the Seven Pneumas, the true writ in jade characters addressed to the Ruler of the Northern Heaven of the Five Pneumas, and the true writ in jade characters addressed to the Ruler of the Central Heaven of the One Pneuma, inviting these sovereign deities, the Five Ancients, to preside over the boundaries of the altar space, in order to validate and superintend the proceedings. Each of them is drawn in the color appertaining to the direction in question.⁶³

"This lot consists of nine memorials, i.e., the one submitted at the time of the first recitation of the scripture during the morning audience to the Jade Clarity Perfected Ruler of the Most Exalted Divine Empyrean, the Great Sovereign of Long Life of the Southern Apogee; the one submitted at the time of the second recitation to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Azure Empyrean, the Great Sovereign of Verdant Efflorescence Who Nurtures Life of the Eastern Apogee; the one submitted during the third recitation to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Emerald Empyrean, the Celestial Worthy of the Thunderclap of Universal Salvation That Resonates with the Primal Essence of the Nine Heavens; the one submitted at the time of the fourth recitation during the noon audience to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Jade Empyrean, the Great Sovereign Ancestor of Thunder of the Nine Heavens; the one submitted at the time of the fifth recitation to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Alabaster Empyrean, the Upper Clarity Great Celestial Emperor of the Grand Monad in the Azure Jade Palace of Purple Tenuity; the one submitted at the time of the sixth recitation to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Cosmic Empyrean, the Great Sovereign of the Cavernous Depths of the Six Heavens; the one submitted at the time of the seventh recitation during the evening audience to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Purple Empyrean, the Celestial Monarch and Sovereign Lord of the Subaqueous Realm; the one submitted at the time of the eighth recitation to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Luminous Empyrean, the Suzerain and Perfected Lord of the Blue Citadel and the Bureau of Merited Supplementary Longevity; and the one submitted at the time of the ninth recitation to the Ruler of the Most Exalted Crimson Empyrean, the Perfected Lord and Investigation Commissioner of the Nine Heavens.⁶⁴ These nine memorials are accompanied by memoranda addressed to the four bureaus in charge of undeserved emolument, retribution, concealed injustice, and cumulative accomplishment, and thanking the said four bureaus for their attention.

"This lot consists of orders authorizing the high priest to respectfully submit a memorial before the jade steps of the Three Heavens during the noon audience, accompanied by the Princess of Yellow Purity,⁶⁵ and the Red-robed Guardian,⁶⁶ and requiring the relevant functionaries of the Merit Sections on duty this day, those responsible for dispatching the edicts and talismans generated by the chiao ceremony, and their armored escorts, to take cognizance thereof, and transmit them safely to the Hall for the Reception of Memorials.

"This lot consists of various Numinous Treasure talismans addressed to the General-in-chief of the Three Heavens Who Holds the Precious Registers, along with the Golden Dragon and Scaly Dragon Mounted Couriers, the Messenger Boys of the Ministry of Fire, and so forth, too many to be enumerated in full.

"This lot consists of a benedictory memorial to be presented at the evening audience, rendering thanks for favors received and expressing sincere devotion, as well as orders for the distribution of quantities of imitation cloud-crane patterned brocade, paper money,⁶⁷ and paper effigies of the gods⁶⁸ appropriate for the one hundred eighty degrees of the chiao ceremony, including the presentations of memorials, and the recitations of scripture."

Moving to yet another table, the lector continued, "This lot consists of the documents conferring a religious name upon your son and entrusting him to the protection of the Three Treasures, along with an amulet on its cord, and the authorization papers that go with it. As for the rest, there is no time to examine them all in detail. I trust that you will be so good as to express your gratitude to His Reverence the High Priest, who is really exerting himself on your behalf today."

Hsi-men Ch'ing thereupon lit some incense in front of the principal altar table⁶⁹ and put his signature to the documents. His attendants then presented a bolt of silk to Abbot Wu in return for his signing the papers. Only after repeatedly refusing to accept the proffered gift did he direct a young attendant to put it away.

After this, a Taoist acolyte in a corner of the hall began to strike the ritual drum with a rub-a-dub-dub that sounded like a roll of spring thunder, and the entire group of celebrants joined in to produce a peal of music. Abbot Wu, clad in a crimson Taoist robe with variegated cloud-patterned embroidery, shod in red cloud-heeled flying-duck shoes,⁷⁰ and holding an ivory tablet in his hands, prepared to dispatch the documents, take his place at the altar, and summon the generals. As bells were sounded on either side, a verger ushered Hsi-men Ch'ing into the altar space, where he offered incense before the altar of the Three Treasures and the deities whose effigies were ranged on left and right. When Hsi-men Ch'ing opened his eyes wide and took a good look, truly, the altar space was laid out in an imposing fashion. Behold:

The stations accord with the five directions,
The altar space is divided into eight stages.
On the top level homage is rendered to,
The Three Pure Ones and the Four August Ones,⁷¹
The Perfected Lords of the Eight Poles,
The Nine Empyreans, the Ten Directions,
And the various sages of the cloud palaces.
On the middle level homage is rendered to,
The deities of the Five Peaks and the Four Rivers,
The tutelary gods of the soil and of walls and moats,
The dwellers in the blessed abodes and grotto heavens,
And all the spirits of the broad and massive earth.
On the bottom level homage is rendered to,
The officers of the dark realm of the nether regions,
The underworld courts of Mount Lo-feng,⁷²
The gods of the rivers, lakes, and seas,
And the denizens of the watery kingdom of the grave.
The twin ranks of officiants at the rites are in place,
The officers and marshals in the hall are duly arrayed.
As an auspicious nimbus of incense arises,
A thousand painted candles disperse their light;
Amid clustering blossoms on the brocade mat,
A hundred silver lamps diffuse their brilliance.
In the Pavilion of Heaven and Earth,
To left and right, the Golden Lads and Jade Maidens,
Pair after pair, lift high their feather flabella;
In the Hall of the Jade Emperor,
On either side, holding basins and presenting swords,
Rank after rank, teem pennants with divine effigies.
The breeze is clear, from the Three Worlds are heard sounds of pacing the void;

 The moonlight is cold, from the Nine Heavens descend veils of nocturnal mist.
 When the metal bell is struck,
 The high priest proffers his memorial, presenting it to the Sovereign of the Void;
 When the jade pendants tinkle,
 The chief cantor advances to the altar, doing his homage before the Jade Emperor.
 On the crimson silk robe, stars and constellations glitter;
 On the hibiscus-petal cap, golds and greens blend their hues.
 The divine marshals who guard the altar manifest their bellicosity;
 The duty officers of the Merit Sections display their intrepidity.
 The Taoist priests collectively declaim
 the sacred litanies,
 Ascending the Jade Terrace, they pour libations and proffer flowers;
 The Perfected Beings join in incanting
 the numinous texts,
 Holding their ritual swords, they tread
 the stars and pace the dipper.
 The Green Dragon imperceptibly advances along the shining zodiac;
 The white crane with a flutter descends from the Purple Palace.⁷³

No sooner had Hsi-men Ch'ing finished making the rounds of the various altar tables in order to light incense than he was invited by the attendants to return to his seat in a compartment of the Pine Crane Studio, where:

The floor was covered with brocade carpets, and
 The brazier was burning animal-shaped briquettes.

Before long, Ying Po-chüeh and Hsieh Hsi-ta appeared.

After greeting him with a bow, each of them produced a sealed mace of silver in lieu of the customary present of tea, saying, "The truth is that we had intended to bring you some tea, but it would have taken us too far out of our way. We hope these paltry gifts may serve, instead, to alleviate the cost of a cup of tea."

Hsi-men Ch'ing rejected their offerings with the words, "You needn't have bothered. I only invited you in order to keep me company for a while, you didn't have to go to all this trouble. My brother-in-law, Wu K'ai, will provide tea. Everything is already taken care of. There's no need for you to come up with anything like that."

Ying Po-chüeh hastily made another bow, saying, "If Brother is really in earnest, we might as well take them back."

Then, turning to Hsieh Hsi-ta, he continued, "It's all your doing. I told you Brother would never accept anything from us. And now that we've come up with something, we've only elicited a good scoffing for our pains."

After some time, Wu K'ai and Hua Tzu-yü appeared, each of them bringing two boxes of fancy tea and assorted delicacies as gifts for the occasion. Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that these be turned over to Abbot Wu. When they had finished their tea, a vegetarian repast was laid out for everyone on two tables, replete with salty main courses, vegetarian specialties, sweetmeats, soup, and rice, lavishly and spotlessly prepared. Hsi-men Ch'ing then discarded his formal clothes and sat down to share the morning meal with his guests.

It so happens that Abbot Wu had engaged the services of a professional storyteller who regaled them with the episode known as "The Banquet at Hung-men" from the P'ing-hua on the Western Han Dynasty.⁷⁴

When Abbot Wu had finished dispatching the documents required by the chiao ceremony, he came over to keep them company and asked, "Will your son be coming today, or not?"

"The fact is," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the youngster is still very frail, and my wife was afraid that he might be disturbed having to come such a distance, so he won't be here. At noontime, we can present some clothes of his before the Three Treasures for their acceptance and blessing. It will amount to the same thing."

"I had thought of that myself," said Abbot Wu. "That will be fine."

"Everything else about him is all right," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but he is somewhat timid. We've got three or four maidservants and waiting women at home, who take turns looking after him, but he's still afraid of things. They don't even dare let cats or dogs come near him."

"It's no easy thing to raise a child to adulthood," opined Abbot Wu.

As they were talking, whom should they see but Tai-an, who came in and said, "Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh from the licensed quarter have sent Li Ming and Wu Hui here to deliver gifts of tea."

"Tell them to come in," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Li Ming and Wu Hui came in carrying a pair of boxes, knelt down, and opened them up for inspection. They were filled with cream puff pastries, pine pollen pastries, little molded cakes sprinkled with crystallized sugar with the character for long life embossed on their surfaces, and rose hip flavored pastry rolls. All of these, at Hsi-men Ch'ing's direction, were turned over to Abbot Wu.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then turned to Li Ming and asked, "How did you know that I was sponsoring a chiao ceremony here today?"

"This morning," replied Li Ming, "I happened to run into Uncle Ch'en Ching-chi on the road, riding a donkey. It was only after I asked where he was headed that I found out you were sponsoring a ritual performance here today. When I got home I told Li Kuei-chieh and Aunt Li the Third about it and said to them, 'Why don't you act quickly and buy some presents for the occasion?' Later they got in touch with Wu Yin-erh, and so we are here. They asked us to convey their best wishes to you, and to say that they would have come in person but didn't know if it would be appropriate. These boxes of inferior tea things are only for you to give away to someone if you like."

"The two of you must stay a while and have some vegetarian fare," directed Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Abbot Wu conducted the two young men out of their presence to a place where they could sit down. Even the porters who had come with them were all enabled to eat their fill.

To make a long story short, when the time came for the noon audience, after the memorials had been dispatched, Abbot Wu showed them a large portable table⁷⁵ on which there had been prepared:

Cone-shaped piles of fruit, ingot-shaped cakes, and High-stacked pyramids of square-shaped confectionery, together with forty saucers and bowls containing different kinds of steamed and fried vegetarian dishes ingeniously made to counterfeit nonvegetarian fare, sweetmeats, soup, and rice, as well as a jug of Chin-hua wine. Also prepared for Kuan-ko there were a jet satin gold lamé Taoist cap, a jet silk Taoist robe, a little undergown of green cloud-patterned satin, a pair of little white damask socks, a pair of little blue Lu-chou pongee shoes with stitched facings, a sash of yellow wool yarn, a yellow cord bestowed upon him under the aegis of the Three Treasures, a locket on a purple cord bestowed upon him under the aegis of the Goddess of Sons and Grandsons,⁷⁶ a silver amulet to be worn around the neck, on which were incised the words:

Gold and jade fill up the hall,⁷⁷

Long life, wealth, and success,⁷⁸ and a talisman of yellow damask designed to dispel pollution, on which were written in vermilion ink the eight characters:

The Grand Monad, the Director of Destiny,

And T'ao K'ang, whose cognomen is Ho-yen, and which was attached to the aforesaid yellow cord. The above objects were all displayed on the table in square trays, along with four trays of preserved fruit.

A young attendant was instructed to take the texts of the various documents and petitions written on safflower red paper,⁷⁹ and an itemized program, in sequential order, of all the rituals performed during the three audiences, out of the scripture cases in which they had been put, and show them to Hsi-men Ch'ing, after which they were packed up with the other gifts enumerated above, making eight carrier-loads in all, and sent ahead to the Hsi-men residence.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was extremely pleased and promptly dispatched Ch'i-t'ung to accompany them home, with instructions to reward the acolyte in charge of the consignment with two handkerchiefs and a tael of silver.

To resume our story, that day was P'an Chin-lien's birthday, and Wu K'ai's wife, Old Mrs. P'an, Aunt Yang, and Big Sister Yü had all forgathered in the master suite, where they were sitting with Wu Yüeh-niang and the other female members of the household. When they heard that a vegetarian repast had been delivered from the temple, together with lots of preserved fruit, and a portable table for the display of gifts, so much, in fact, that not even four tables could accommodate it, they all bustled out to see for themselves.

"Sister Li," exclaimed P'an Chin-lien, "why don't you hurry out and see what's here? Your son's master from the temple has sent it all for him. There are lots of things, including a little Taoist cap, a Taoist robe, and, my, just look at this, even a pair of little shoes."

Meng Yü-lou then stepped forward, picked them up, and examined them, saying, "Elder Sister, look at this. How clever the Taoist priests are. These little shoes have white damask soles, which have been backstitched in a pattern of interlocking lozenges. This ornamental cloud-pattern is also very well done. My guess is they must have wives to help them, otherwise they would never be able to produce such fine stitchwork themselves."

"Needless to say," exclaimed Yüeh-niang, "as people who have left home to become priests, how could they have wives? Surely they must have hired someone to make them."

P'an Chin-lien, picking up where Yüeh-niang left off, said, "If that is evidence that Taoist priests have wives, it follows that Buddhists like Nun Wang and the abbess, here, who are good at embroidering handkerchiefs, must have husbands."

"Taoist priests," said Nun Wang, "can disguise themselves by putting a hat over their topknots and go anywhere they want. We Buddhist members of the Sangha, on the other hand, can be readily recognized whatever we do."

"I have heard tell," said Chin-lien, "that the Taoist Temple of Mystic Illumination is located right behind the Kuan-yin Nunnery where you reside. As the saying goes:

If a male convent lies next to a female convent,

Though nothing need occur, something may occur.”
“This Sister Six,” said Yüeh-niang, “is prone to indulge in such:
Ridiculous blatherskite.”

“And this,” said Chin-lien, continuing with the inventory, “is the locket on a purple cord bestowed upon him when his name was consecrated under the aegis of the Goddess of Sons and Grandsons. And here is a silver amulet to be worn around the neck, on which there are eight characters incised. It ought to look very good when he has it on. And his name is engraved on the back, Wu something or other yüan.”

“That’s the name chosen for him by the master,” said Ch’i-t’ung, “Wu Ying-yüan.”⁸⁰

“So that’s the character ying, is it?” said Chin-lien. “Elder Sister, these Taoists are impertinent. What reason could there be to change the child’s surname?”

“Now see here,” said Yüeh-niang, “you just don’t understand the ritual involved.”

Then, turning to Li P’ing-erh, she said, “Why don’t you go fetch your son and bring him here so we can try out this Taoist costume on him and see what it looks like, how would that be?”

“I’ve just put him down for a nap,” said Li P’ing-erh. “Do I need to get him up and bring him out again?”

“It won’t do any harm,” said Chin-lien. “Just pat him until he wakes up.”

Li P’ing-erh did, in fact, go after him.

Now P’an Chin-lien knew how to read, and, picking up a red paper envelope and pulling out one of the petitions that had been sent from the temple, she noticed that under Hsi-men Ch’ing’s name it read, “joined by his wife, née Wu,” after which there were only the words, “and his spouse, née Li,” without mention of anyone else.

More than a little incensed by this, she showed it to the others, saying, “Just you tell me if that lousy ruffian, sorting people so differentially into:

Three classes and nine categories, is practicing favoritism or not. The only one whose name is written on here is the one who bore the child. The rest of us simply don’t count. We’ve all been:

Relegated to the realm of the superfluous.”⁸¹

“Is Elder Sister’s name there, or not?” asked Meng Yü-lou.

“If Elder Sister’s name were not there,” said Chin-lien, “that would really be laughable.”

“That’s enough,” said Yüeh-niang. “As long as one of us is there, it’s all the same thing. You don’t mean to say that if a family had a whole troop of women, their names should all appear. Wouldn’t that give the Taoist priests a laugh.”

“Are we all nothing but:

The ghosts of Liu Chan’s daughters?”⁸² demanded Chin-lien. “Compared to whom is it alleged that we:

Don’t amount to anything?”⁸³

Which of us did not undergo ten months of gestation in the womb?”

As they were speaking, Li P’ing-erh came back from the front compound carrying Kuan-ko.

“Hand me his clothes,” said Meng Yü-lou, “so I can help him on with them.”

Li P’ing-erh held him while Meng Yü-lou fitted the Taoist cap onto his head and put the amulet around his neck, together with the two cords. The baby was so frightened at this that he closed his eyes tight and:

Hardly dared to breathe,⁸⁴
for some time.

When Meng-Yü-lou had finished fitting him into his Taoist costume, Wu Yüeh-niang said to Li P’ing-erh, “You ought to take these documents and petitions, along with a bundle of paper money, and go to the Buddhist chapel in the rear to burn them yourself.”

After Li P’ing-erh had departed on this mission, Meng Yü-lou, who was holding the baby and playing with him, said, “Dressed in these clothes, he’s just like a little Taoist priest.”

Chin-lien picked up on this, saying, “A little Taoist priest, my eye! He’s more like a little god.”

This sally provoked a serious reprimand from Wu Yüeh-niang, who said, “Sister Six, what kind of talk is that? You mustn’t speak that way about the child.”

Chin-lien was at a loss for words and had nothing more to say.

After a while, the baby, who was frightened by the new clothes he was wearing, began to cry and, when Li P’ing-erh hurried over to take him and change his clothes, produced a diaperful of shit.

Meng Yü-lou laughed at this, saying, “What a fine Wu Ying-yüan! It seems that even when he shits, he’s good for a trayful.”

Yüeh-niang hurriedly directed Hsiao-yü to fetch some absorbent grass paper and wipe up the mess. Before long the baby reclined on Li P’ing-erh’s breast and fell asleep.

“Little Brother,” said Li P’ing-erh, “you seem to be tired. Mother will take you back up front and put you to sleep.”

Wu Yüeh-niang then distributed the place settings of gifts that had been sent from the temple and invited Wu K’ai’s wife, Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P’an, and the others to come into the outer room and enjoy a vegetarian repast. As they did so, it gradually grew late.

It so happens that, on the eighth day of the month, because Hsi-men Ch’ing was going to participate in the chiao ceremony on the following day, he was expected to abstain from meat and wine. For that reason the eve of Pan Chin-lien's birthday had not been celebrated in the customary way, and it was not until he returned home on the evening of the day itself that he would be able to offer her a congratulatory cup of wine. She went out and stood by the main gate in expectation of his arrival, but how could she have anticipated that at sunset time all she could see was Ch'en Ching-chi returning home on his donkey.

Hsi-men Kuan-ko Tries on His Taoist Vestments

"Is Father on his way?" Chin-lien asked.

"I'm afraid Father will not be able to make it," said Ching-chi. "The chiao ceremony is not over yet. They've just begun the ritual of penance, which is likely to go on until the first watch. How likely are Taoist priests to:

Let anyone lightly out of their clutches?⁸⁵

And after that, still to come, are the ceremony of dismissing the generals and a banquet."

When Chin-lien heard this, without saying another word, she went back to the master suite in a huff and said to Yüeh-niang, "It seems that:

Blindman Chia, the masseur, unaware of the time,
Got up at the fifth watch for nothing.
If you throw your guts over the wall,
You must resign yourself to your fate.
If the string on your waistband breaks,

On what can you depend?

Just now, I stood for a while at the gate, and all I saw was Ch'en Ching-chi coming along on his donkey. He said that Father would not be able to make it because the chiao rites were not yet over and had elected to send him back in his stead."

"If he's not coming home, so be it," said Yüeh-niang. "That leaves us free this evening to listen to the abbess and Nun Wang recite tales of karmic cause and effect, and sing Buddhist songs.

As she was speaking, what should they see but Ch'en Ching-chi, who lifted aside the portiere and came in, already half inebriated, saying, "I've come to kowtow to the Fifth Lady."

Turning to his wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, he said, "If there's a goblet around, find it, and fill it with wine, so I can offer her a drink."

"Where would I find a goblet?" said Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "All you need to do is kowtow to the Fifth Lady. If it comes to that, I'll offer her a drink on your behalf. Just listen to that drunken voice of his. It's just as though the chiao rites today were only for your benefit, that you've come home in such a befuddled state."

"Is your father really not coming home?" enquired Yüeh-niang. "Is that slave, Tai-an, not returning either?"

"Father saw that the chiao rites were not over yet," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and fearing that there was no one at home to look after the place, sent me ahead for that purpose. He's retaining Tai-an there to wait on him. The Taoist priests were importunate in their unwillingness to release me.

Willy-nilly, dead or alive, they insisted on my drinking two or three big bumpers before letting me go."

"Who all are there with him today?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"Today there are your elder brother, Wu K'ai, Brother-in-law Hua the Elder from outside the gate, Uncle Ying the Second, Uncle Hsieh Hsi-ta, and also Li Ming and Wu Hui, the two boy actors. Now that night has fallen, who knows how long they'll carry on. Only your elder brother, Wu K'ai, has gone home today. Father insisted that Hua the Elder from outside the gate remain with them. It looks like it will be an all-night affair."

Chin-lien, noticing that Li P'ing-erh was not present, said, "Son-in-law Ch'en, even you persist in calling him Brother-in-law Hua. How he is entitled to claim such a relationship only her dead husband knows. If he were really any brother-in-law of ours, it would be appropriate to refer to him as Brother-in-law Li. How can you refer to him as Brother-in-law Hua?"

"Fifth Lady," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "you ought to emulate:

The country girl who brings herself to marry Cheng En,⁸⁶

By keeping one eye open, and one eye shut.

If a son is born too soon after the wedding,

Who knows whose account he should be chalked up to?

All you can do is split the difference."

"You lousy jailbird!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ta-chieh. "Hurry up and perform your kowtow. The sooner you go up front and sleep it off the better. That's enough of your delirious nonsense."

Ch'en Ching-chi thereupon asked Chin-lien to assume the position of honor and then proceeded to kowtow to her four times before staggering off for the front compound.

Before long, the room was lighted with lamps and candles, a table was set up and spread with viands, and Old Mrs. P'an, Aunt Yang, Wu K'ai's wife, and the others were all assembled. After drinks had been offered in celebration of the occasion, they all sat down and consumed the birthday noodles. When the wine ran out, the utensils were put away, and the table removed from the room.

Yüeh-niang then ordered Hsiao-yü to close the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds. After this, a small table was placed on the k'ang, and they all gathered around it, the two nuns occupying the center, where they burnt incense and set up a pair of wax candles, so they could listen to them recite a tale of karmic cause and effect.⁸⁷

The abbess began the recitation as follows:

I have heard tell that, in the Great Buddhist Canon, a story is told of the Buddhist Dharma, relating how the Thirty-second Patriarch⁸⁸ of the Western Heaven descended to the world to be born in the Eastern Land and transmit the mind-seal of the Buddha.⁸⁹ It was in former days, during the third year of the Hsien-heng reign period⁹⁰ of Emperor Kao-tsung of the T'ang dynasty,⁹¹ but we will not elaborate on national affairs in the Central Kingdom. To resume our story, in P'ao-tu village of Ling-nan township, there was a certain householder, named Chang, whose family was very well-to-do, possessing quantities of gold and silver, with slaves and maidservants at their beck and call.⁹² This householder had taken unto himself eight wives, who enjoyed themselves day by day, basking in diurnal luxury, enamored of romance, and neglectful of good works. It happened one day that Master Chang went out the gate for a stroll when he came upon a crowd of true believers, carrying incense, lamp-oil, polished rice, and such things, and reciting Buddha's name. Approaching them, he asked, "Where are you believers going?" One among them answered, saying, "In the first place, we are going to share a vegetarian repast, and in the second place, we are going to listen to the scriptures." The householder went on to ask, "What merit will accrue to you for fasting and listening to the scriptures?" To which the crowd of believers replied, "For humans living in this world,⁹³ the Buddhist Dharma is hard

